He was slightly puzzled by Yorna’s gratitude, however, Kafma replied with that.

Yorna changed her assessment of the man who returned to his role and bought the necessary time.

Although it did not change her impression that he was a hard-headed and inflexible person, if he carried through with those intentions of his, he truly was a virtuous person. If circumstances and conditions permitted, he would be one of the people she could love.

Although, Yorna’s number one position would not be overturned forever—.

Yorna: “We’re going to descend. Hold on tightly.”

Taking the tighter grip from Louis clinging onto her as a reply, Yorna travelled towards her destination utilizing the wreckage of the building, the overturned ground, and even masses of dirt, all floating in midair, as footholds.

Along the way, she instructed the residents, who appeared to wish further information, to, at any rate, distance themselves from the Crimson Lapis Castle—or rather, from the former site of where the Castle once stood, while she herself was heading for the rooftops of a house away from the Castle.

There, waiting leisurely for Yorna’s arrival, was—

Yorna: “Surely, I thought that His Excellency the Emperor would have come.”

???: “Hmm.”

Standing there majestically with arms folded was a dark-haired man, his face covered by an oni mask.

Once Yorna landed before the man's eyes, Louis left her arms and ran up to him, as if she had been waiting for him.

Then, Louis grabbed the man's arm and pointed towards the Castle, her long blonde hair bouncing about,

Louis: "Uau!"

Abel: "I understand it without you needing to tell everyone. After all, we had a disagreement regarding your treatment. You have quite some nerve, to show your face before me."

Louis: "Uu! Uh!"

Abel: "Do you intend to obey me? If so, I shall add you to our numbers."

The man responded to Louis's complaint in a nonchalant manner as she tugged on his arm. Louis looked annoyed at his answer, but eventually released his arm as if there was no other way.

Even so, the reason why had not just rushed out was probably because she had pondered it over just like a little girl would.

—She had to recover the boy who had been swallowed by that black shadow at any cost.

Abel: "Yorna Mishigure, you understand the state of affairs. This Great Disaster cannot not be left unattended."

Yorna: "I agree. As the ruler of the Demon City, there was no choice but to abandon that jet-black darkness that turns all to nothing with just a touch. To say nothing of the fact that it consumed my castle. —Were you aware that something like that would happen?"

Abel: "I thought there was something going on. But what it was specifically, was outside of my estimation."

Yorna: "…"

Squinting, Yorna attempted to gauge the sincerity of the man in front of her.

But the man’s heart was hidden behind the oni mask, and she could not see through it even if she wanted to. Even if the mask had not been there however, it would have been impossible to peer into his heart.

A solitary existence that did not allow anyone to know his thoughts, heart, or intentions—that was the way of the Seventy-Seventh Emperor of the Sacred Vollachian Empire.

That was—

Yorna: “—Your Excellency.”

Abel: “Do not call me that carelessly. Unless you desire me to tear up your hopes within the missive.”

Yorna: “Pardon my discourtesy… How in the world did you find out what I desired?”

Abel: “There was no certainty. Not until you returned my messengers safely.”

Hearing his answer, Yorna was both impressed and dismayed by the thinking of the man in front of her.

He was going to determine whether his thoughts were correct or not by utilizing her meeting with his messengers the previous day, checking whether his messengers returned safely from there or not.

In this respect, Yorna felt bitter that she had been dancing on the palm of his hand.

But more than that—

Yorna: “Those child messengers should scold Your Excellency at least once.”

Abel: “That comes after all the matters are settled. Yorna Mishigure, follow my directives.”

Yorna: "—. If that's what's best for you, I have no choice but to comply."

The man's oppressive way of speech, however, caused a moment of hesitation and resistance.

Yorna had something to protect. The Demon City of Chaosflame and its inhabitants. All that was needed to protect it, was someone with the ability to handle this affair correctly.

Not in the meaning of ability to wage battle, but of ability to manage it.

Yorna also had her own pride in this power. But it would be wrong to use him as an object of comparison.

Who could compete in a bout of ability with a man who controlled and ruled the great Empire, the nation with the largest landmass?

Yorna: "So what are you going to do?"

Yorna asked, ready to take any measure to protect the Demon City.

Louis, who had lined up next to her before she knew it was also looking on in agreement with Yorna's intentions.

Meeting the gaze of the two, of Yorna and Louis, the man—Nay, the ruler of the Empire, nodded in assent.

And then—

Abel: "—Abandon the city and beat a retreat. The Demon City has no choice but to permit that shadow to swallow it."

Chapter 56:
The Great Disaster

1

—Abandon the city and beat a retreat.

In response to the declaration of the man in the oni mask, Yorna's cheeks stiffened and her gaze sharpened.

She had just now decided to respect the opinion of the man in front of her, because Yorna believed it was the best way to protect her domain, Chaosflame.

But contrary to Yorna's resolution, the man spoke of the abandonment of the city,

Yorna: "I cannot possibly accept such an opinion."

Abel: "Ho. Why is that?"

Yorna: "Is it not obvious? This is the Demon City of Chaosflame, the last place for those who have been pursued by the Empire and have no one to turn to, nowhere to go… To throw that away…"

Abel: "Is unacceptable, is it? —Worthless sentimentality."

Yorna: "—Hk, Vincent Vollachia…!"

Gritting her teeth and the coldhearted words spoken by the man crossing his arms, the ruler of the Empire, Yorna called out his name, accompanied by a stern gaze. In reply, the man touched the oni mask with his hand.

And once the black eyes, visible even through the oni mask, reflected Yorna,

Abel: "I go by the name of Abel now, so it is inappropriate to call me that. And if you are planning on begging benevolence from the Emperor, that would be quite thoughtless."

Yorna: "—. The people of the Empire must be strong, is it?"

Abel: "Indeed."

The Emperor—or rather, the man who called himself Abel, proclaimed that that exactly was the way of the Empire.

The Emperor, the pinnacle of the Vollachian Empire, must be the embodiment of the iron-blooded code which the people of the Empire believed in, revered. Whether it was true or not, the Emperor had to affirm it.

With Abel's assertion, Yorna admonished herself for wrongfully making a request.

Was Abel aware of the identity of that shadow to begin with? Of the titanic blackness that had engulfed Crimson Lapis Castle whole?

Was that why he had come to the callous decision to abandon the city?

Yorna: "Do you deem it so dangerous that we have to flee immediately? What in the world is that?"

Abel: "—The Great Disaster."

Yorna: "Great, Disaster…?"

What followed to Yorna's spree of questions were a scant few hushed words.

However, running opposite to the quietness of his tone, the weight of the words he had spun was enough to stir bewilderment in Yorna. —A large tragedy, it meant.

Yorna: "By "Great Disaster", what exactly do you mean?"

Abel: "Something that endangers the existence of the Empire, and brings about ruin that not even the light of the sun can reach… That was what the Stargazer spoke of it. When I first heard it, I assessed it as an overstatement."

Yorna: "…"

Abel: "Looking at that thing, you will find that there was not the least bit of exaggeration in the expression used."

Pointing at it with his chin, at the manifested darkness—at the Great Disaster that brought about ruin, as Abel had named it.

Yorna could not help but feel some bitterness inside as the word "Stargazer" echoed, spoken by his mouth. The existence of the Stargazer was one of the Vollachian Empire's evil practices.

At least, that was the only way Yorna could describe it.

To begin with, the genesis of Yorna's strong, fervent wish was by no means unrelated to the Stargazer.

Anyway—

Yorna: "So, will you take the Stargazer's word for it and turn tail and run away? If so, that'd surely be an expression of gutlessness. I think you're the embodiment of the Empire's way of doing things… A very, very good example of it."

Abel: "If you believe you are able to sway me with some cheap provocation, you would do better to correct that misconception post-haste. First of all, I was not the one who took the Stargazer's words at face value, and perpetrated this outrage."

Yorna: "…I see that you also have some thoughts on what the Stargazer foretold."

Abel: "Any owner of sound judgment would have no pleasant thoughts of it. But even if those are unnecessary and ignored, more shall follow. That is the troublesome thing about them. —Hm."

Louis: "Uu!"

As he spoke, Abel's words were interrupted by the eager Louis's growl.

She seemed to be reproaching Abel and Yorna for having a conversation not directly related to how the Great Disaster would be quelled.

That would be only natural. The Great Disaster had—

Louis: “Uau!”

Abel: “—.Yorna Mishigure, I want to make sure of one thing.”

Yorna: “…What, is it?”

Narrowing his eyes at Louis’s strong appeal, Abel pointed to the Great Disaster wriggling about wildly. Once he directed his question at her, Yorna narrowed her almond-shaped eyes.

She could roughly envision what words would follow, and what questions would be asked.

That was—

Abel: “If you and this girl are together, there must be one more person, a black-haired child. Where has that one vanished to?”

Yorna: “—. If you mean that child…”

As she took a glance, Yorna’s gaze conveyed the answer to the question far more eloquently than words would.

Yorna’s line of sight turned towards the Great Disaster, to which Louis was franticly pointing at. The boy was present when the darkness that had swallowed up the Crimson Lapis Castle first poured out.

—No, from what Yorna had seen, the Great Disaster had apparently overflowed from within the boy.

Abel: “As I expected.”

In response to Yorna’s silent reply, Abel placed the last piece of the puzzle, in his mind.

It sounded like an ultimatum, and Yorna looked at Abel, calling out, “You…”. But at the call, Abel gave a slow sideways shake of his head.

Abel: “Though our intentions have gone awry, there is no way around it. No point in obsessing over plans, if ultimately no results are obtained.”

Yorna: “So, that means?”

Abel: “The strategy is yet the same. Abandon the Demon City and beat a retreat. —But damage shall still occur. We shan’t be able to avoid it wholly.”

Yorna: “—Hk, I can’t agree to someth…”

And, at the moment Yorna was about to tell him that she could not accept such a decision, something happened.

Louis: “Aa, uh!”

Abel: “Guh…!”

Letting out a cry of pain, Abel fell to his knees on the spot, clutching his stomach in his hands.

Faster than Yorna could close the distance between him and herself, Louis rushed into the gap, driving a palm strike into him with her short little arm.

She threw a glare at the one who had made a ruthless decision, Abel, and growled in her throat with a violent snort,

Louis: “Uau… Uau!”

Exclaiming this, she turned around and disappeared from sight in the blink of an eye.

It was the instantaneous teleport that she had displayed during the battle atop the castle tower against Olbart. Not being able to teleport long distances, Louis teleported repeatedly, returning once more to the battlefield dominated by the Great Disaster.

Far in the distance, Kafma was stalling the Great Disaster using the insects within his own body.

For Yorna, it was hard to believe that the girl possessed anything that could deal a decisive blow against the Great Disaster.

If she did, they would have tried to rescue that boy on their own, instead of relying on Abel. So she was without a trump card.

If there was such a thing as a trump card, it would be—

Yorna: "—Wouldn't it be possible to oppose it with the Flame of the Yang Sword?"

Abel: "…"

Yorna: "You!"

Still clutching his stomach, Abel knelt on the roof of the building.

While she believed that Abel deserved the blow from Louis, Yorna also believed that Abel was the only one who held the key to overcoming the situation.

The Emperor of the Vollachian Empire was endowed with a truly Enchanted Sword, a sword counted as one of the Holy Swords.

With the Flame of the Yang Sword, even that Great Disaster's existence would—

Abel: "—I have no intention of drawing it out."

However, Abel's answer to Yorna's appeal was not the one she had hoped for.

And Yorna could not consider that this answer was one a normal person would have given. Even if she was aware that the Great Disaster was an unusual occurrence, one that prompted a readiness to abandon the Demon City in him while deeming the thing as something of utmost danger.

Yorna: "But still, you won't draw the Yang Sword… How could you possibly just let that be?”

Abel: “…”

Yorna: “Answer me, Vincent Vollachia! If you are the… If you are the Emperor of this Empire, then there must be a role for you to carry out! If you are the Emperor, then…!”

Her vision grew red, and Yorna grabbed Abel by the collar as he was kneeling down, making him face her gaze.

During all that, the city governed by Yorna, Chaosflame, was in dire peril. To what extent could Kafma and Louis resist the Great Disaster? To what extent had the impact of the Crimson Lapis Castle’s explosion assisted in diminishing the power of the Great Disaster?

She did not understand anything. What she did understand was that she could not leave things as they were.

At this rate, Yorna’s vow, her desire, would go unfulfilled.

For that, no matter what, whatever the cost, she required the cooperation of the man in front of her.

Yorna: “If you are the Emperor of the Vollachian Empire…”

Abel: “…I shall not utilize the Yang Sword.”

Yorna: “—Hk, you…”

By displaying her sharp canine teeth, Yorna attempted to intimidate Abel, stubbornly refusing to change his opinion.

Rarely would she make a gesture as crude as showing the fangs in her mouth. However, if such was her wish, these fangs of hers could easily tear the slender neck of the man in front of her to scraps.

But such threats were routine for the man in front of her, Abel.

The Emperor of the Vollachian Empire was an entity holding a position in which he was constantly confronted with the unceasing murderous intent and hostility of those around him. It was for this reason that the man held that sort of position—

Yorna: "If you are the Vollachian Empire's…"

Abel: "—When shall you understand, Yorna Mishigure?"

Yorna: "—Hk."

Abel: "The Emperor of the current generation, Vincent Vollachia, differs from the Emperor you envision. I am not obligated to perform the likes of acting according to your desires and ideals."

Faced with his stance, clearly severed from her own, Yorna let leak a small sigh.

Finally, her hand parted from the neck of the man it had grasped, and she took a single unhurried step backward. Stepping back, Yorna gnashed her teeth as she fixed her gaze on Abel, holding his own neck.

She understood it, without being told so.

With or without the oni mask, the man before her eyes did not bear the slightest resemblance to the man Yorna envisioned. Even if the blood of Yorna's beloved ran through his veins.

Yorna: "…I cannot accept your words."

Abel: "If you do not abandon the Demon City, you shall lose everything else as well."

Yorna: "This Demon City right now is my everything!"

Yorna answered with open arms, pulling out the kiseru she had inserted into her bosom and lit its tip. Immediately after, she sucked the smoke from the kiseru with all her might, before blowing it into the sky.

The purple smoke spreading out formed a massive, humongous cloud which headed for the outskirts of the battlefield in which the Great Disaster was stirring—over the heads of the people of the Demon City, many of whom were terrified at the sight of that menace.

Following that, the puff of purple smoke slowly dissipated and fell down upon each of the residents—upon each of her children, purple smoke settling within their hands.

Yorna: "—Love me."

Yorna's murmur was so faint that only Abel, present in the same place, could hear it.

However, Yorna's will was understood by all those who held the purple smoke that had descended upon them. Therefore, although her voice did not reach them, they collectively tossed the purple smoke into their open mouths.

Yorna: "—Be loved by me."

Yorna's continued words, her mutterings did not serve anyone or anything.

If anything, the words were surely an indulgence offered to Yorna, by Yorna herself. It was a necessary ritual, an invocation, for the sake of pushing herself forward.

Those whom Yorna's purple smoke reached, those who ingested it, slowly, unhurriedly raised their gazes. —And, within one of the eyes of each one of them, a flame alighteth.

Those loved by Yorna, those who loved Yorna; their souls commenced blazing, looking up towards the Great Disaster.

Without a doubt, this was a communion of souls—the power of the Soul Marriage Technique completely enveloped the Demon City.

Yorna: "This city, the city of Chaosflame won't be lost. —I wish that you all, alongside me, get that ill-mannered guest of ours to return from where it came."

While adopting a stance, Yorna swung her kiseru in front of her.

What could be heard from all around and throughout the city, was the earth rumbling. Fiercely and fearfully, the noise of innumerable shoes resounded, of innumerable footsteps, of innumerable breaths, and of innumerable wills to fight.

In accordance with the loving call of the leader of the Demon City, the converging loved ones advanced.

Witnessing them, Yorna bent her knees slightly, then leapt high into the air.

The destination of this leap, that which awaited her, was the shadow of disaster, filled with great darkness.

As the one repelling all things that threatened the Demon City—

Yorna: "—I, Yorna Mishigure, the Flamboyant, will serve as your opponent."

2

As the sound of the earth rumbling echoed, there was a furious war cry, akin to the entire city clamoring.

With the world dominated by those, Abel dropped the hand from his neck, as he observed the battlefield.

Abel: "…"

Performing a reckless charge during her shout, Yorna easily manipulated the wreckage of the cityscape and the Crimson Lapis Castle alike, hammering a fierce attack on the Great Disaster.

Using a building to strike at something of ambiguous nature could be called quite the unorthodox attack; yet, due to that nature, the jet-black darkness nevertheless expanded itself—what effect the attack had borne on the Great Disaster remained unclear.

Had it been effective to some degree, or had it been wholly meaningless?

Abel: "—It sure shall not be wholly meaningless."

It was not that he was moved by Yorna's reckless assault, but, for certain, the enemy was not one that would be completely immune to such an attack, as was noticeable from how it stopped taking action as often.

Crimson Lapis Castle had been engulfed by the Great Disaster as of the latter's appearance; in spite of her attachment to this castle that had served as her long-time abode, Yorna had performed an attack by transforming it into a destructive force, certainly slowing the momentum of the Great Disaster.

If not for that, the Great Disaster would have continued to grow at its initial pace, and swallowed the Demon City whole, and in that manner, stretched its abyss to the entire Empire.

—However, the collapse of the Empire had only been delayed. If left in this current state, it was inescapable.

Abel: "That is the most detestable part about it."

Grinding his molars, Abel recalled the details of the man who had foreseen the Great Disaster.

A convenient being who had foreseen the coming threat, yet refused to be asked for more. Or should he call said being, a pawn of the Observers?

In any event, his resentment of that person did not help him here. If he had to, it was perhaps worth pondering about that individual as one in a similar position.

Abel: "—Natsuki Subaru, you are…"

With his focus on the Great Disaster that continued writhing about, muttering, Abel mentioned the name he had been avoiding.

And at that moment.

???: "Abel-chin! We're back!"

Abel: "…"

Amidst all the noise that was not unlikely to be swallowed by the rumbling and bellowing of the earth, a high-pitched voice firmly reached Abel's ears.

Turning his head back, the owner of the voice fell from the sky. Landing behind Abel with a light thud, was a girl waving her hand, and a brown-skinned woman holding her.

Abel: "You have returned, Medium, Taritta."

Medium: "Somehow! Isn't this situation different from what you talked about before, Abel-chin? Where's Yorna-chan?"

Abel: "—. Over there."

Freed from Taritta's arms, Medium directed a question at Abel as she descended onto the rooftop, to which Abel cocked his chin. Ahead of them, skipping about in midair, Yorna attacked the Great Disaster with physical strikes repeatedly by freely manipulating buildings.

In addition, Yorna was assisted in her challenge against the Great Disaster by another, by Kafma, who likewise had the means of using long-ranged attacks.

However, since Kafma's thorn vines were also "insects" raised inside his body, it was not a good idea to let them be swallowed up by the inexhaustible Great Disaster.

In addition, the residents of Chaosflame had assembled, each of them dismantling the buildings in their environs, then attacking by having several people throw chunks of buildings like cannonballs into the Great Disaster.

In the past, at the time Yorna had raised the banner of revolt against the Imperial Capital, the very city itself had been wielded as a weapon. A fearsome collective tactic that had caused great distress to the Imperial Soldiers to gain total control of the city.

However, it was unclear whether that tactic, which had been effective against a group of hostiles, would be effective against a Great Disaster whose strength was unfathomable.

To begin with, he could see from a distance—

Taritta: “The Great Disaster, is it getting bigger…?”

Medium: “That thing, we can’t leave it be?! Abel-chin, what should we do?”

As they witnessed the Great Disaster spread slowly but surely, Medium and Taritta requested for Abel’s decision.

Originally, the goal was to withdraw and abandon the Demon City with Yorna’s assistance, but that would go unfilled due to Yorna’s obsession with the Demon City.

In that case, the tide would change depending on what Vincent did. —No,

Abel: “—Or, before that, can you change the situation, Taritta?”

Taritta: “Eh…?”

With Abel having mentioned her by name in his question, Taritta opened her narrow eyes in surprise, at a loss for words.

However, that surprise was not because she had no clue as to what he was talking about, but rather because she had not expected that to be told to her at this time.

In other words, she had an idea of what Abel had just pointed out.

Medium: “Th-The way you said that was kinda strange, wasn’t it? What do you mean?”

Abel: “It concerns you not. Taritta, what did you call that thing?”

Taritta: “Wh-What are you talking about…”

Abel: “—The Great Disaster, that is what you called it. Where did you obtain knowledge of that name?”

To Abel’s pressing words, Taritta gasped.

The exchange between the two of them left the dumbfounded

Medium wide-eyed, letting out a “Grate Disastur…?”, as that was a term unfamiliar to her.

But Medium’s response was natural.

Laying eyes upon the existence of an unknown being such as that, and calling it a “Great Disaster”, did not mesh well. Only those who knew of its existence could rightfully call it the Great Disaster.

In other words—

Abel: “Have the stars taught you how to escape annihilation?”

Taritta: “—Hk! W-wait a moment, I…!”

Abel: “…”

Taritta: “I…”

Taritta advanced a single step, putting a hand over her chest, yet words beyond those got stuck.

Her face was pale, her eyes began moving frantically; Taritta’s appearance became an unusual one for her, and Medium rushed to stand beside her, to support her body with a “Taritta-chan!”.

However, Taritta did not have the luxury to respond to Medium’s compassion.

Perhaps she had believed she could hide it all along. She had believed that, just maybe, she could have remained silent forevermore.

Abel: “Fool.”

There was no such thing as a well-kept secret or an unexposed truth.

At the very least, if no effort was made whatsoever to cover up that secret or truth, the day when it would be revealed would surely come. All one could do, was to delay the inevitable.

Or perhaps, it could be delayed till death; the way she perceived it, she could keep it as a secret as long as she remained in the world of the living.

Abel: “Taritta, if you do know about the Great Disaster, do you regret it?”

Medium: “Regret? Regret what… Abel-chin! What are you talking about?! What’s Taritta-chan…”

Abel: “Is it not obvious. —I am speaking of how, back in that forest, you failed to kill me with an arrow.”

Taritta: “…”

Aghast, all color now drained from Taritta’s face, the light in her eyes wavering feebly.

Looking straight into her two eyes, Abel paused, let out a sigh, and continued.

Abel: “Or, shall you respond to that commandment above from this moment on, hunter of the jungle. No, should I instead approach you in this manner?”

Taritta: “…”

Abel: “The one who has inherited the commandment to prevent the Great Disaster, the one to become the new Stargazer.”

3

The tempestuous rumbling of the earth, the reverberation of howls, it was as if they were clamoring for the end of the world.

???: “Uh, uhh, uhhh… Hk!”

If he were to try holding his head and covering his ears, he would be unable to do so.

It was the curse of possessing only a sole arm. He was unable to use both his hands to cover his own ears, as to completely dissociate his consciousness from this end of the world.

Putting his right ear against his lifted shoulder, he stuck the fingers of his outstretched hand into his left ear, attempting to counter with an inadequate earplug. It was impossible.

The ground trembled. The air was terrified. The world was dying.

All of them were symbolic of the horror that was eating away at Al and robbing his whole body of strength.

Al: “Why… Why, here… Hk!”

His voice trailed off, as he cursed and cursed all the despairing events that had taken place until this moment.

Of course, such cursing meant naught. Because that was no curse at all. He was merely being a poor loser, doing nothing more than comforting himself after the game was over, saying that it would have been better to do it like this or like that.

He was prepared for this to happen, or so he had believed.

—No, he did not. He had never been prepared for it. He had just averted his eyes from it, pretending to be optimistic that it would not come to pass, even when the possibility crossed his mind.

The danger that this would happen, as long as he was working with Natsuki Subaru, was plenty. Not just a little, but more than enough.

Rather, this situation would not have occurred had he acted alongside anyone besides Natsuki Subaru.

Even so, it could not be helped. Because he could not leave him alone. There was no way he could have left him alone. Back then, Natsuki Subaru should not have given in.

As a result of that, because it was necessary, was why he himself—

???: “—Mymy, I was wonderin’ who was cryin’, turns out it’s ya.”

Al: “—Hk?!”

???: “Kakakakka! Look at how ya jumped just now! Ya were like a caterpillar, so funny, so darn funny!”

Hearing a sudden voice in the middle of the room, he jolted his body in a panic and turned his head.

Witnessing his overwhelmingly uncouth appearance, the other party clapped their hands—Nay, stomped their feet, as they let out a burst of laughter.

Unfortunately, clapping their hands was apparently not something the other person was likely to ever do again.

Because—

???: “Geez, the right hand that’s been with me for more than ninety years went on ahead without me. I’m screwed. How am I ever gonna make ration balls from now on? Kakakakka!”

Having said that, a cheerfully laughing, monstruous old man—Olbart Dunkelkenn, was waving, showing his right hand which had vanished from the wrist down.

Chapter 57:
I Can’t Live Wiser

1

—He was within a bleak, dark space.

Swaying. Wandering. Being tossed about. Being violated.

It was as if his four limbs, along with everything from his neck up, had been separated from his torso, each of those parts at different places, floating, drifting, rocking, being fiddled with.

His memory was terribly hazy as to what had happened and what was occurring.

Everywhere was pitch-black, leaving him to wonder as to why he had been thrown into such a completely empty space.

—.

———.

————.

Nothing, came to mind.

There was no possible reason for him to be trapped in a place such as this, his head and limbs detached, and floating aimlessly.

If that were the case, there would be no pretext as to why he had to be in a place like this, in the first place.

???: “—I love you.”

Every time a thought of the sort flashed across his mind, a faint voice that restrained him from thinking reached his ears.

The voice was hard to hear, be it because it was faint, or simply because it was distant. But it was an impassioned voice that instinctively made him want to listen carefully to it, to lean his head in that direction so that he could hear it.

???: “—I love you. I love you. I love you.”

Every time he heard that voice, the thoughts he’d had till that moment would be reset, returned to zero.

The matter of which option was correct, of whether it should be called bothersome or unavoidable, was unclear.

However, with that being repeated over and over again, a novel issue came into being. Could somehow something be done about the distance of that audible voice?

???: “—I love you. I love you. I love you. I love you. I love you.”

As if to interrupt even that notion, the lines from that faint, pleading voice increased.

That was counterproductive, however. Since desiring to hear that voice, to be with the owner of that voice, was the pretext for the birth of that thought, for him to attempt to reach one, starting from zero.

Henceforth—

???: “Someone…”

With his limbs and head detached from his torso, he was unable to move, unable to do anything himself.

Ergo, he would prefer to rely on the help of those around him, those who would seemingly be able to do something about this situation.

Did someone, anyone, who could help him exist?

Someone who could be capable of lending him a hand, even in such a hopeless situation.

Was there someone who had treated him well?

If that someone arrived alongside him, surely, so would the solution.

—Based on that, for the sake of reaching the voice reverberating from so far away, he would extend his hand.

2

Al: "—Hk."

Olbart: "Oh? That was quite the spirited blow just now."

That instant, a large and potent roar echoed through the air, the tremors travelling across the ground and reaching the two men in the travelling inn.

Outside the window, a huge black shadow ran rampant, slowly eroding the Demon City from its center outwards, taking it into itself, digesting it, turning it into something not of this world.

It was, with certainty, the worst nightmare dreaded by every being in the world.

Reminding everyone of exactly that at a single glance, it was an embodiment of the end.

And the one to comprehend the horror brought about by the end of life, with their own skin—Or rather, to know it with their soul, more so than anyone else, was Al.

Abel and Medium, among others, were currently on the move to defuse the situation.

Instead of joining them, he was crouching here, holding his shaking head in his hand, in this predicament. How on earth could he have said that he would follow them and help them?

Al: "I'm… I, am…"

Had he followed them only to fully realize how powerless he was?

That being the case, for what reason was he, in the first place, doing—?

Olbart: “Good grief, here I am, hurryin’ my ass back, and all I find here’s just one young’un scared shitless on the ground? Well, it’d be a problem if His Excellency were here as well.”

Al: “…”

Olbart: “But Kafma’s fightin’ that thing, isn’t he? Does that mean that His Excellency ordered him to do it, and has no intention of runnin’ away? Do ya know?”

Having spoken so, Olbart walked up to him, sending a question his way.

The small old man cracked the bones in his neck and bent down to look into Al’s face, the latter crouching down. His brain, numbed by fear, barely assimilated the contents of that question.

Vincent, the absent false Emperor, had reached some kind of agreement with Abel, and—

Al: “H-he’s with a lil’ miss called Tanza…”

Olbart: “Tanza, you mean that deergirl? I dunno what he’s thinkin’, at this point… His Excellency’s a lil’ short on words, ya know. Would be nice if he’d left a note ‘bout what he’s gonna do.”

Al: “Y-you’re…”

Olbart: “Yeah?”

Olbart’s expression formed a frown as he stood up, hearing Al speak. Not wanting to let that monstrous old man distance himself even a bit, Al used his trembling tongue and throat to compose his words.

Olbart had returned to this place, but what would he do after this?

Al: “You’re gonna fight that thing, aren’t you?”

Olbart: “Oioi, don’t be stupid.”

Al: “Huh…”

Al was stunned by Olbart answering as if he had nothing to do with the situation.

Then, as Al stared on, stock-still in front him, Olbart pointed out the window.

Olbart: “Nah, got it at first glance. That thing’s pretty darn bad. I’ve got my right hand taken away, too, so I don’t wanna do anythin’ so dangerous.”

Al: “…”

Olbart: “The reason I came back here’s that I gotta get His Excellency out if he’s stayin’ here without a care. If he’s not here, we need ta find him and get him outta there… Do you happen to know where His Excellency went with that deergirl…?”

Asked by the ever-aloof Olbart, Al simply denied it with a shake of his head.

It was not a lie, but a fact. Most of the exchanges between Abel and the others that had taken place at travelers’ inn after that black shadow engulfed and flooded the Crimson Lapis Castle did not remain in his memory.

With some difficulty, he only remembered that Kafma had flown out as ordered, and that Vincent had left accompanied by Tanza. And that afterwards, Abel had left an useless Al behind, with Medium concerned about Al until the end. That was all.

Olbart: “We’re in serious trouble then, if so. Looks like this town’s bunch’ve been motivated by the foxgirl’s command, and it’s gettin’ harder and harder ta find His Excellency… I don’t wanna stay at this absolute cock-up for too long.”

Al: “—Hk, wh-what do you mean by that? No way, you’re running away?”

As he felt his train of thought reaching an unbelievable conclusion, Al’s voice cracked.

Faced with Al’s astonished look, Olbart shrugged his shoulders and voiced, calmly, “What else can I do?”.

Olbart: “Don’t feel I can do anythin’ ‘bout that thing. What’s important to me’s my life and my dream. I don’t see any reason to stay.”

Al: “Th-The Emperor! You gotta protect the Emperor, old man…”

Olbart: “The fact that His Excellency’s thinkin’ and actin’ on his own means he’s doin’ what’s best for himself. If he thinks he’s got my help here, he doesn’t get me either. That’s why him bein’ called the Wise Emperor’s also a cryin’ shame.”

Al: “Oh…”

Olbart: “Here’s some advice for ya, ya better run away too. Ya won’t get anythin’ by riskin’ yer life here. Meanin’, the one who lives wiser wins.”

Olbart’s philosophy, something that blended the deadly Vollachia-style iron-blooded code with the fact that his life as a shinobi had been long, was bloody and rock-solid.

This was something that could not be changed, no matter what an outsider such as Al said. —No, most likely, Olbart’s thinking could not be challenged by anyone other than Olbart.

No one should allow others to dictate and distort one’s life.

For that reason, this man, Olbart Dunkelkenn, reigned as the strongest shinobi. He was a shinobi who had been perfected with him not holding anything as precious, or having anyone to whom he devoted his heart.

No emphasis had been placed on the title of General, on the position of shinobi head-honcho, or on the sense of duty to protect the Emperor.

Not freedom. But lawlessness. —The world's greatest "outlaw", those were his true colors.

That idea would not budge. It could not be swayed. Not by anyone.

Then, having a back-and-forth regarding his ideology here would yield naught.

Al: "…"

Strongly, firmly grating his molars together, Al lowered the arm he had been pressing against his ear.

The audible booming roars and rumblings of the earth, the cries of the residents of Demon City as they confronted the black shadow, echoed like the scene was a depiction of hell on earth, shaking Al's heart.

His heart, was about to fracture. His mind, was about to shatter. His soul, was close to dispersing.

But I haven't. I haven't yet. If they haven't.

Al: "…Old man, lemme ask you one thing."

Olbart: "—? What is it?"

Al: "That… That black mass of shadows's got something to do with bro, doesn't it?"

Gritting his teeth to the point of tasting blood, Al assembled words, hiding the trembling in his voice for only a moment.

Al's deathly resolve—as that was concealed behind the cloth mask, Olbart perhaps understood so from the expression of the former's eyes, gone unseen, and from his tone. Bringing his left hand to his own goatee, he spoke,

Olbart: "Oh, right. To me, it looked like the shadows came out of the boy."

Al: "…"

Olbart: “After hearing that, have ya decided what you’re gonna do?”

Closing his eyes, Al masticated what Olbart had just told him.

It was something he already knew. Natsuki Subaru was beneath that black shadow. —No, Natsuki Subaru was at the center of everything.

If so, in that case, Al had to raise his face with the resolve of having his molars broken.

If Natsuki Subaru was there, Aldebaran needed to follow him.

Al: “You told me to live wiser, old man.”

Olbart: “Yeah, right. That’s what I believe.”

Al: “But I don’t agree with it. Old man, your way of life ain’t a wise one, it’s a cunning one. —I don’t wanna be a cunning adult.”

Boom, a powerful noise was heard.

Not from outside, but originating from right beside Al. He had slammed his own fist into the floor, the pain and momentum of the slam raising his body. He rested his uplifted body against the wall, having somehow managed to stand up.

Knees trembling, heart frightened, spiritually wounded all over, even though he had not even fought, and yet—.

Al: “This ain’t the time to sit around… Won’t be able to look my parents in the face if I do that, will I…!”

Standing up with his hand on the wall, Al bared his teeth inside his mask.

Hearing of his dogged determination amidst blood-curdling cries, Olbart raised a long, bushy eyebrow. Sending a sharp look out the window, closing one eye to Al’s howling back,

Olbart: “Yer enthusiasm’s good and all, but ya really think we got a chance ta win against that thing?”

Al: “No fucking way! No one can win against that! Even if I tried ten-thousand times, I couldn’t win! Winning against that thing… Only Natsuki Subaru can do that!”

With a large swing of his arm, Al turned around with a bang on the windowsill.

Looking at the monstrous old man directly in the face, Al stepped forward, both his eyes blazing in a conflagration,

Al: “Old man!”

Olbart: “Whoawhoa, you’re gettin’ fired up. I’m just gonna tell ya, if ya want me ta lend ya a hand, I gotta refuse…”

Al: “I don’t want it! Instead, just turn me back, ya shitty geezer.”

Olbart: “…”

Al: “If you want time to run away, then I’ll make some. So give me my Authority back!”

Stretching his stubby right hand straight out, Al bellowed that towards Olbart.

Olbart’s breath caught in his throat as he heard Al’s cry, a mixture of a bestial roar, of a mournful lament, and of a fiery sense of purpose.

Then, giving a slow sideways shake of his head, the monstrous old man,

Olbart: “Well, if you’re gonna go ta the trouble of playin’ the martyr, I can’t argue with’cha. The boy won the game in the first place, so I gotta keep my promise.”

Al: “Bro, won?”

Olbart: “That’s right. That boy actually caught me in a game of tag. It was a real big deal, in my opinion.”

As Olbart said this, Al went out to meet him face-to-face, Olbart greeting him with a wave of his left arm.

Having heard what Olbart had to say, Al felt a single note of relief and admiration ring out over his pulse ticking like a bomb.

At a time when even the sound of the wind caused Al to stiffen in fright, Subaru had carried out his task, going head-to-head with Olbart, and managing to ultimately pull off a win against him.

Surely, having accumulated defeats that could not have happened merely once—

Olbart: "Tho', I just wanna hear one thing outta curiosity."

Suddenly, a hoarse voice interrupted the beating of Al's heart, and he looked at the other man silently.

Displaying his teeth, Olbart smiled towards the unwelcome look in the other person's eyes, as he gently placed his outstretched left hand on Al's chest.

And then—

Olbart: "How do ya intend ta challenge an enemy ya can't win against even if ya try ten-thousand times?"

Al: "Pipe down, you shitty geezer. —I'll go and die, even if it's a million times."

3

Abel: "The one who has inherited the commandment to prevent the Great Disaster, the one to become the new Stargazer."

The moment this was pointed out, Taritta's world was rocked, dramatically so.

The Great Disaster's rampage was causing the Demon City to shake, earthquake-like roars could be heard without end. But the reason for the illusion of collapse beneath her feet was not that.

It was what the oni-masked man in front of her—what Abel had pointed out which gouged her heart of hearts.

Medium: “Star, gazer…?”

Standing by Taritta’s side as to gently support her unsteady body, Medium muttered that unfamiliar term as if to confirm what it was.

It was a term unknown to her, and one she did not need to know.

In reality, had Taritta continued to live peacefully within her hometown in the forest as a simple member of the People of Shudraq, she would have never had any need to associate with it, even.

But—

Taritta: “I…”

Medium: “Abel-chin! I have no clue what’s going on! What are you talking about?!”

On behalf of Taritta, her voice quivering, Medium lashed out at Abel.

She had been shrunk yet she remained steadfast nevertheless, her thin chest puffed out as if to protect Taritta, as she glared straight at Abel.

Medium: “What’s that Stargazer thing you’re talking about? Why is Taritta-chan becoming that?”

Abel: “—. A Stargazer is one who has taken on the role of foreseeing the future based on the alignment of the stars and their guidance. No, calling it a predestination, rather than a role, would be more accurate.”

Medium: “…Are you putting it in such complicated words on purpose?”

Abel: “That is not my intent.”

Abel, hearing Medium's words as she frowned and struggled to understand, gave a small sigh.

After that, putting Medium aside, Abel called out to Taritta once more using her name, "Taritta". Her shoulders hitched involuntarily; Abel, looking directly at her, spoke,

Abel: "The reason why I was ousted from the Imperial Capital in the first place is closely related to the Stargazers. Taritta, you should be aware of that matter, right?"

Taritta: "B-by the matter, you mean…"

Abel: "Of course, that the ruin of the Empire was foreseen. You knew that. —That is why you wished to murder me in the Buddheim Jungle."

Taritta: "—Hk."

Taritta's cheeks tensed up, and she lowered her head due to Abel's matter-of-fact statement, crossing his arms.

The shock of being called a Stargazer nearly overshadowed the fact that Abel had pointed out something that could not possibly be overlooked.

He had stated it with certainty. —Taritta was the hunter of the jungle.

Did she regret missing her opportunity to shoot him down?

When put into words—

Taritta: "Since when…"

Abel: "…"

Taritta: "Since when have you known I was after you…?"

Medium: "Taritta-chan?!"

Face turned downwards, Taritta raised this question without being able to look Abel in the eye.

Hearing Taritta's words, a voice of utter shock leaked out of Medium. Of course it did. From hearing her question, it was evident that she had no margin to deny Abel's pressure.

It was a confession of the truth. Taritta had attempted to kill Abel with her archery.

Abel: "The Stargazers' foreknowledge… Commandments are, for the most part, shared among fellow Stargazers. It was to be expected that my pursuers would come at me after I escaped the Imperial Capital, aware of that commandment. In addition…"

Taritta: "In addition?"

Abel: "That I would rely on the People of Shudraq, based on knowledge of the throne's mechanism, could be conjectured. In all probability, there is an assassin amidst the Shudraq."

Taritta: "…"

Abel: "I only obtained definite proof of the assassin's existence, however, when you targeted Natsuki Subaru, mistaking him for me."

Hearing Abel's line of reasoning, Taritta grasped the hem of her clothes tightly.

That was true. Taritta, living in one end of the Empire, possessed no way of knowing the countenance of the Emperor of Vollachia. All she knew was that black hair and black eyes were characteristics of his outward appearance.

Never would she have thought that multiple owners of such unusual features would appear in the forest on that day, at the same time.

Abel: "Your reaction to seeing the two of us, me and that one, trapped in the village's cage, was remarkable… For a pawn of the Observers, your nature is a far too honest one."

Taritta: "—Ah."

Abel: “You accompanied me in both the capture of Guaral and the journey to the Demon City that followed, but you were not at all willing to follow the commandment. Why is that?”

Taritta: “…”

Abel: “Why do you refuse to obey that commandment? From what I have heard, a Stargazer’s predestination is not something one can resist even if they are aware of it. I do not believe you have the will to resist that predestination.”

Had she that sort of strong will, of self-discipline, Taritta would not have accompanied them on this journey in the first place.

Abel’s judgment was harsh, but correct. Correct enough to draw blood.

Taritta did not possess the strength to abandon her own commandment.

If that were possible, she would have abandoned a burden of the sort much, much sooner.

For certain she knew that, if she did not obey that commandment, the Great Disaster would destroy the Empire—.

Medium: “—Oh my gosh! I don’t get it at all!”

Taritta carried on in anguish, while Abel continued on in pursuit.

Sandwiched between the two, and yet kept out of the loop, Medium exploded. She glared at Abel with her blue eyes, spreading both her arms in order to shield Taritta behind her back.

Medium: “I don’t know anything about Abel-chin being targeted, or that it was Taritta-chan who targeted Abel-chin! First of all, if Taritta’d have had her mind set on it, Abel-chin would’ve been killed by now! Right?”

Abel: “You, learn to watch your tongue.”

Medium: “Right! Abel-chin, can you run away from Taritta-chan?”

The shape of Abel’s mouth took contours of loathing after Medium spoke her words filled with vigor.

He could not deny her words. But doubts on this front had been posed to Taritta by Abel, already.

In other words, just as Medium had stated, she could have done it if she wanted to, so why hadn’t she?

Taritta: “…Because, I couldn’t find, a meaning to it.”

Abel: “—. What reason do you require, beyond saving the Empire from ruin?”

Taritta: “I! I didn’t even know that you were the Emperor, or how you were chased out of the Imperial Capital……! That’s because, to me, to me, as a Stargazer, I am—”

The anguish that had been locked away at the back of her chest for so long finally began to overflow with the opening of her mouth.

And what had unleashed the anguish she had been unsure of how to put into words for a long time, had been none other than Abel’s hounding.

But before she could clearly put it into words—.

Medium: “—Nooo!”

A wide-eyed Medium exclaimed, and Taritta and Abel’s attention quickly shifted upward.

Right above, black darkness covered the building directly above where the three stood—No, that was not it. It was not just sable darkness spreading, but rather a huge black arm.

Endowed with five fingers, it stretched itself upright, then swung down on the building from directly above.

As if attempting to smash the three people present at this place—

No, as if attempting to grab them with its huge hand.

Taritta: “—Hk, Medium! Abel!”

The moment she witnessed its approach, all extraneous thoughts disappeared from Taritta’s mind.

The scene of verbal assault from just before vanished into thin air; Taritta moved as her instincts dictated, embracing Medium in front of her, carrying Abel on her shoulders, and leaping directly backward.

With that, she attempted to escape the gargantuan black arm’s range. —Not enough, however.

Caught by the falling fingertips, they were helplessly snatched away from this world.

???: “I will not allow that to happen—!!”

However, just before the titanic arm reached Taritta and the others, a huge mass was wedged with great violence overhead, between the three of them and the giant arm.

Tightly entangled in emerald-green thorny vines, the castle walls had been torn apart and seized.

With tremendous centrifugal force, it became a dome that protected the group of three in which Taritta was included, trying to intercept the falling giant arm.

Naturally, the limb was not something that would be halted by anything of the sort.

Once the huge black arm touched the wall, the latter came undone as easily as candy, disappearing in a second like a leaf being devoured by a winged insect.

However—

???: “I won’t tolerate any further disorder in my city—Hk!”

A woman clad in a kimono dived right under the disappearing castle wall, the beast ears on her head all perked up, kicking her long legs upwards, propelling the wall towards the gargantuan arm.

A wave of pressure broke through, beckoning the collapse of the building it focused on. However, the unfathomable might of the woman's kick caused the gigantic arm on the other side of the wall to bend, halting the erosion.

But, it only stopped for a moment.

Still, that one moment was enough.

Taritta: "—Hk, we're safe!"

Narrowly escaping the giant arm's range, her heels grinding into the ground, Taritta exhaled.

Released from her arms, Medium and Abel also landed on the ground. The three of them looked up to see the building that had been their perch earlier being swallowed up by the shadows.

Medium: "Y-Yorna-chan is…!"

Abel: "She's safe. Though it looks like we are being pursued even more than we were a moment ago."

Jerking his chin, Abel answered as Medium cast her gaze all around her with a worried look.

At the place her glance was directed to, jumping around while being chased by the shadows running amok, was the kimono-clad woman who had just let loose a potent blow—was she Yorna Mishigure?

That transcendent force was worthy of qualifying for the Nine Divine Generals.

It was understandable that Abel would wish to have someone like her on his side. A person as powerful as her could easily accept a destiny that would determine the course of the world.

Unlike Taritta, there would be no hesitation if the time came.

Abel: “You saved me once more, Taritta.”

As if seeing through Taritta’s indecision, Abel examined the kneeling Taritta.

She was unable to calm her breathing down, for reasons aside from her exertion immediately prior. However, Abel would spare no quarter to Taritta, either physically or mentally.

Abel: “Had you not extended your hand, I could have lost my life without any effort on your part. And yet, you saved me; was that because you cannot fulfill the commandment you have received without getting your hands dirty?”

Taritta: “Th-That’s wrong…!”

Abel: “If so, how come? Your conduct is inconsistent with—”

Medium: “But more importantly, thank you for the help, right?!”

Once again, Medium came to Taritta’s rescue, rendered speechless after the accusation of inconsistent behavior.

Medium, her beautiful golden hair disheveled, was thrusting her finger at Abel right before the latter’s eyes. The difference in stature between the two was visible in her gesture, but even so, Medium did not let go or yield her claim.

Medium: “Abel-chan, you and I would’ve died if Taritta-chan hadn’t saved us, no? We gotta thank her, first of all. Taritta-chan, thank you~!”

Taritta: “H-huh…”

Medium: “Then, back on track! What’s up with that, Abel-chin? What do you wanna have Taritta-chan do?”

Medium looked back and thanked her, then quickly turned to Abel.

Her questioning was delayed somewhat by the exchange between

Abel and Taritta, with the former sighing that Medium could not keep up with her understanding of the situation.

Abel: “I already conveyed that to Taritta. I do not require that you understand.”

Medium: “If I don’t understand, I’ll just keep disturbing you ‘til I do, okay? How about that?”

Abel: “—. In order to quell the Great Disaster, I must lose my life. That is the future the Stargazer has seen, and the commandment bestowed upon Taritta.”

Medium: “—? I got no idea of what you mean. Why would that big black shadow calm down after Abel-chin’s death? That’s so weird!”

In response to Medium’s persistent pleas, Taritta bit the inside of her cheek.

Certainly, she could understand the foresight that the Empire would be spared from destruction as a result of fulfilling that commandment. How exactly would that be brought about, Taritta was unsure.

However, that being pointed out only made Medium realize Abel’s ruthlessness—

Abel: “—Is it not odd?”

But Taritta’s conjecture was stalled by the echo of Abel’s words that followed.

Baring her teeth, Medium voiced out “Odd”, in vehement protest. To which Abel, covering his mouth with his hand, once more repeated it, “Odd”.

Abel: “Taritta.”

Taritta: “Ah, wh-what is it?”

Abel: “The commandment you have received, to take my life to avert the Empire’s ruin. Are you certain of it?”

Taritta: "—Hk."

Being directed a question to again, hesitantly, Taritta nodded her head.

She had been told that the commandment she was unable to execute was necessary.

But after ascertaining this, Abel once more spoke, "If so",

Abel: "Would that not be what you know as destruction?"

Taritta: "Huh…"

Abel: "You know of the divination that a Great Disaster would bring about the ruin of the Empire. But you hold the belief that that thing, and the Great Disaster, are one and the same. Are you certain of that?"

With that question, Taritta's thoughts began racing, trying to discern its meaning.

What could one call that entity that evoked dread and horror, the black shadow gradually spreading from the heart of the Demon City, if not the Great Disaster?

Time and time again, a nightmarish spectacle was displayed to her repeatedly.

Every night, a nightmare, urging her to not forget, over and over again brought Taritta visions of the coming doom. That thing was certainly a manifestation of that, however—

Taritta: "Is that, the Great Disaster or not…"

Abel: "You have not obtained knowledge of it, is that so? Then perhaps some other Stargazer has."

Taritta: "Some other…"

After that sentence, Taritta's eyes began moving frantically.

Although Abel had stated Stargazers were connected to each other, Taritta was an exception. —No, “exception” was not the correct word. To begin with, they were different from the get-go.

That was why Taritta had no idea about the existence of other Stargazers.

Taritta: “Ah…”

If she were to have an idea about that Stargazer, it would be the person she had encountered just a few moments ago.

Taritta: “…”

That delicate man who did not let go of his carefree attitude, that obnoxious person who had not even given his name, was so well-informed that he had called Taritta the “Disgrace of Shudraq”.

He knew of Taritta’s sin. Perhaps due to the connection between Stargazers.

What had he, the Stargazer, said upon laying eyes on the Great Disaster?

If she recalled correctly, the man had stated—

Taritta: “That, it was outside his responsibility…”

Abel: “—. Truly, was that what the Stargazer said? I see.”

Medium: “Abel-chin?”

Hearing Taritta leaking that expression, dumbfounded, Abel nodded, then turned away.

Frowning her eyebrows at that, Medium wrapped around Abel as to go towards his front and peer into his face. And once she did, Medium’s round eyes widened. Startled.

The reason for her surprise was evident in Abel’s immediate reaction.

Abel placed his palm on his own face covered by the oni mask, and fixing his stare solidly on the heart of the Demon City, where the Great Disaster—or rather, where the all-consuming jet-black mass continued its rampage,

Abel: “—The Empire’s ruin, is it not that Great Disaster?”

With this murmur, Abel then cleared his throat slightly, letting out a short exhale.

To Taritta, who was unable to see the expression on his face, it had nearly sounded like a laugh.

Abel: “If so, there is no reason for you to stumble along the way. —I shall have you disappear from the board, you interloper.”

Chapter 58:
Those With No Place to Turn to 1

—Taritta first began being tormented by nightmares related to a “commandment” three years prior.

Up until then, Taritta had lived a life wholly detached from a “commandment”.

Of course, she had also been completely ignorant of the existence of Stargazers.

—Once people heard the word “commandment”, what would come to mind?

Fate and destiny, the inevitable trials and obstacles in the walk of one’s life.

When it comes to thinking of such, there was a clear difference between those and a commandment. Things that were unavoidable, very much like the falling rain when walking on unsheltered roads.

The People of Shudraq, too, had an understanding of something such as inevitable events.

Putting it in honest words, it could be said that death was the most inescapable fate among all.

Old age and illness, hunger and injuries as well, things associated with death were the curtain of destiny that would arrive without exception, something difficult to avoid.

No matter the person, one could not go against their destiny. Nor should they consider that they should defy it.

When a compatriot of theirs died, they prayed and sung, so that their soul would be welcomed into peace.

Singing, feasting, and seeing them off was the Way of Shudraq, a value Taritta believed in.

Her older sister, Mizelda, was an outstanding Shudraqian. Although she was not as prominent as her sister, Taritta had also inherited the blood of a lineage that continued to carry the role of Shudraq Chieftain for generations.

Being a Shudraqian was an unquestionable truth for Taritta.

Following the teachings of Shudraq was only natural, something not to be questioned.

Taritta had never been good at mulling over stuff. She was not one to be bothered with things, nor did she wish to add to her own worries.

She had believed that her life would be one of following her older sister's footsteps alongside the People of Shudraq, her own people, who shared her blood and her own path, from beginning to end.

That was to be her fate, her destiny—

???: "Hey, Taritta. I was chosen to be a Stargazer, and I have a commandment to fulfill."

—That was, until the one closest to her, her "soul sister", confided in her.

2

The man in the oni mask stared straight ahead at Taritta, her resolve shaken, wobbly on her feet.

The writhing, jet-black thing visible from a distance was instinctively recognizable at a glance as a "Great Disaster"; however, the man—Abel, ridiculed the notion of being afraid of it.

Abel: "If so, there is no reason for you to stumble along the way. —I shall have you disappear from the board, you interloper."

Abel stepped forward, stating clearly, and with much grit, that it was something undesired.

At that very moment, the small Medium shouted “Wait, wait!” from beside him. Grabbing the hem of Abel’s clothing, she halted his movements with all her might,

Medium: “You’re suddenly really determined, aren’t you?! But, it’s too dangerous for you Abel-chin!”

Abel: “Fool. It is clear what needs to be done. If that were likely to be the Great Disaster, I would lament that the preparations were beyond insufficient. If that is not the case, however…”

Medium: “Then what?”

Abel: “Then it is merely a sideshow before the real deal. There is no time for such entertainment. As far as that is concerned, we shall promptly put an end to it. —You too, shall become aware of that if you observe it from a distance.”

Jerking his chin, Abel indicated the Great Disaster to Medium, after her question. But, much like she was unsure of his intent, Medium frowned.

Back and forth, she took glances at Abel and the Great Disaster, sizing them up,

Medium: “I don’t understand a single thing you said! You’ve got a bad habit of putting on airs, Abel-chin!”

Abel: “Are you holding me responsible for your lack of intellect?”

Medium: “Like. I. Said! If I can’t grasp the point of this, then I’m going to get in your way! Abel-chin, you’re just getting in your own way! If you were smart, you’d realize that!”

Abel: “…”

Stomping on the ground and puffing out her cheeks, Medium would not let go of the hem of Abel’s clothing.

Perhaps thinking that he didn't have time to ponder over Medium's defiance, it being one of her strengths, Abel let out a small sigh, and then,

Abel: "If you have not noticed, that girl, Yorna Mishigure, Kafma Irulux, and the people of the Demon City, are struggling desperately to stop that Great Disaster."

Medium: "Mmm~, that bad habit of yours again?"

Abel: "—. That thing has a will. It has a clear, obvious, human will."

Abel spoke, and Medium tilted her head, "Will?".

Taritta, standing behind Medium, also raised an eyebrow at the latter's question. That Great Disaster, the embodiment of the end of the world, possesses a will?

Furthermore, Abel labeled it the will of a "person". Where could such a thing exist there?

In the first place, the idea of considering that thing as a living entity was one she could not even conceive.

The figure, which was whittling away at the world with all of its entirety, bubbling away, writhing, spelled the end of the world itself.

What in the world could Abel have seen that had made him conclude that it possessed a will?

Just when Taritta and Medium arrived at that very same question—

Abel: "Earlier, that thing reached out to you people."

Medium: "Huh?"

Taritta: "—Ah."

Abel's seemingly unexpected words made both of them let out dumb noises.

Medium happened to have no idea of that, but Taritta felt a faint discomfort. —When she'd snatched the two of them away from the shadows, that had come swooping down, Taritta had sensed it as well.

That, from that abhorrent jet-black thing, there was something akin to a slight attachment.

Abel: "Most likely, it reflects the will of the one struggling deep inside it. Seeking salvation, it keeps reaching out its hands. Behold."

Before Taritta's astonished gasp, Abel now extended his hand as to indicate the Great Disaster.

Taritta and the others, drawn by the gesture, looked at it, and now understood Abel's point.

Sitting at the center of the Demon City in place of the collapsed Crimson Lapis Castle, the Great Disaster spread unrelenting destruction and demise to the surrounding area, expanding—but that which the darkest of shadows extended to as to reap it, bringing its demise by taking it unto itself, were not buildings nor the very earth, but human beings.

And that, too—

Medium: "—Louis-chan and Yorna-chan are the only ones being attacked?"

Taritta had the same impression as what was contained in Medium's faint mutter.

As they watched the fierce battle against the Great Disaster from a distance, they could easily see the bias in the shadow's aim.

The two main targets were Yorna, who was unfolding a fight across several fronts, and Louis, who was evading the shadows she had attracted with instantaneous movement.

Even Taritta was impressed, her eyes opened wide, by Louis's incredible movements, but, wielding destructive power, Yorna's offensive and defensive abilities were a testament to her transcendent strength as one of the Nine Divine Generals.

But the man from the Insect Cage Clan was no less capable, demonstrating suppressive abilities comparable to those of Yorna, keeping the damage caused by the Great Disaster at a minimum again and again by use of his vines of thorns. And yet, the only attacks that flew in his direction, and in the direction of the building-throwing residents of the Demon City, were basically akin to stray arrows.

Medium: “If it’s targeting Louis-chan as well, it means it’s not going in order of who’s stronger.”

Abel: “Taking into account strength, and strength only, she is not too far behind Kafma Irulux. But, assessing it from a bird’s-eye view, it is self-evident. It possesses a will. Meaning it only makes sense for me to move.”

Taritta: “Wh-What makes you, so sure about that…?”

Abel: “It is a given. There is no way that thing is fond of me. Let us say that it is reaching out hands as if to cling onto someone, then the likes of me are not fit candidates for such a thing.”

Taritta found Abel’s disinterested manner of speaking a baffling, puzzling thing.

She understood Abel’s thought, defining the existence of the Great Disaster of being something with a will. However, it was peculiar that, using that as a basis, the Great Disaster’s selection criteria would be clear.

It was as if Abel knew to whom the will of the Great Disaster belonged.

Abel: “—It is Natsuki Subaru.”

Taritta: “—Hk!”

Medium: “Huh?!”

As if to push Taritta’s doubts and Medium’s lack of understanding out of the way, Abel trained his line of sight at the Great Disaster as he asserted that.

Viewing the two staring motionless and in shock, Abel gave a deep nod, and continued,

Abel: “It was something that overflowed from within Natsuki Subaru. Then, it is no wonder that his will intervened. All along, I had regarded him as a man of numerous secrets, but this is beyond my expectations.”

Medium: “W-wait a minute, Abel-chin… You’re saying, that’s Subaru-chin…?!”

Abel: “Strictly speaking, it is something that permits Natsuki Subaru’s will to be reflected. I’m not saying that it’s him, or something serving him. —Either way, the result is the same.”

Medium: “Abel-chin, why do you seem to be so calm about it?!”

Medium, her round eyes wide in surprise, complained in a voice that made it seem like she was about to cry.

Looking down at her small figure, Abel’s black eyes, on the other side of the oni mask, narrowed. Just like an adult troubled by the tantrum of a child.

Abel: “Do I look calm to you? He let that thing overflow from inside him, and my whole plan fell apart. Reconsideration is required for this, and yet I do not possess the time for that now. And yet you say I look calm to you?”

Medium: “No! No, that’s not what I’m talking about! It’s not that, it’s… Subaru-chin’s calling out for help, right? But even so, you’re so calm about that, why?!”

Abel: “—Would cuddling up with that thing in its suffering bring the situation at hand under control? Unfortunately, reality is not so accommodating nor benevolent.”

Medium’s fervent words, however, failed to sway Abel’s heart of iron.

That was because he was a cold man, incapable of understanding people's hearts—no, he was a man that regarded the human heart as unimportant, but who at the same time he was a man who could separate his priorities.

For those who stood at the top, like politicians and leaders, it was a quality that must be possessed.

The same would be required of Taritta, who had to assume the position of Chieftain.

But—

Taritta: "For me, I…"

She was unable to think in the same way as Abel did, nor could she have his decisiveness.

Much less, she was also unable to head-on say that she hated something if that was the case, just like Medium.

Abel: "I have no time to argue with you here. I shall take my leave. I must converse with Yorna Mishigure."

Medium: "…With Yorna-chan? But how?"

Stating that he could not spend any more time answering her questions, Abel attempted to step forward. But Medium interrupted him, her gaze testifying eloquently to the difficulty of proceeding.

Having declared the place he was going to, Abel, in his attempt to talk with Yorna, would find himself in the frontlines against the mad rampage of the Great Disaster.

The battlefield where a split-second decision from those transcendent people could mark the difference between life and death.

It was evident that Abel would only endanger his life, were he to step forth. In fact, he would not even be able to make a move that would change the course of the battle—.

Taritta: "…"

Taritta's whole body froze at the thought of a move that could change the course of the battle.

Or, perhaps, it was an option available only to Taritta. Only Taritta had the means to appease the disgusting harbinger of death that was the Great Disaster.

The only one aware of the commandment bestowed upon her for the sake of repelling the Great Disaster, Taritta—

Medium: "—I'm going to go to the front too."

Abel: "What?"

At the prospect of such a big decision, Taritta's body shuddered.

To Taritta's side, Abel's voice was filled with doubt as Medium declared so. Black eyes flickered as if peering into the heart of the little girl restraining herself,

Abel: "You, what are you thinking? To begin with, have you even been listening to me? The only grounds on which I shall be taking my leave, is because I believe that thing is not fond of me. If you go there…"

Medium: "I got that already! So I'm not going with you! I'm going where Louis-chan and Yorna-chan are fighting! I want Subaru-chin to find me."

Abel: "…"

Medium: "If it is as Abel guessed, Subaru-chin will reach out to me, right? If that's the case, Louis-chan and the others will have a teeny bit less trouble, won't they? Maybe that way Abel-chin won't be targeted either."

Abel: "To begin with, I am less likely to be targeted."

Medium: "Maybe then it'll be even less likely! Right?!"

Stepping forth firmly, Medium emphasized her own bid.

For a moment, it was clear that Abel was considering Medium's proposal in earnest. As per her words, if the Great Disaster reflected Subaru's will, then it was highly likely that Medium would be targeted.

However, Medium remained as a concern, her stature still diminutive, her mobility still hampered.

Even if she were to take on the role of attracting the attention of the Great Disaster, there was a good chance that she would be swallowed up by the shadows without being able to fulfill her role in any significant way. If that much were to happen, it would generate a mental turmoil to those around her.

He didn't think that none other than Taritta herself would be able to tolerate Medium's without batting an eye.

Energetic, full of life, and unafraid to be around others, Medium was one of Taritta's favorite companions. She would be incapable of facing her brother, Flop, either.

—In that case, she wondered if she, in her current state, would be able to face anyone.

Abel: "Denied."

Medium: "Abel-chin!"

Abel: "I considered it for a moment, but in your condition, you would not be able to fulfill the role of a decoy. The impact of your death on those around you would be a greater concern. I cannot accept such a gamble."

Adjacent to Taritta at a standstill, Abel dismissed Medium's proposal out of that very same concern.

However, gnashing her teeth out of anger, Medium's eyes transmitted a lack of satisfaction. At this point, it was quite possible that she would disregard Abel's opinion and leap onto the battlefield and raise her voice toward the Great Disaster.

And amidst that sort of perilous situation—

???: "—Then I'll protect Lil' Miss Medium. You shouldn't have any complaints then, right?"

Stepping over the rubble, the voice of a newly-arrived figure interrupted.

At the sound of the familiar voice the group of three, all in their own worlds, turned to look at the person speaking to them.

The Blue Dragon Sword hanging from their thick right arm and an ugly rag covering their face, they possessed a suspicious appearance. Although the sense of them being a particularly powerful person had never been there, for some reason, at this moment, in this place, the man standing there was brimming with a fighting spirit so striking that it was almost too much to look at—Al.

Medium: "Al-chin! You've gotten bigger… and back to normal?!"

Al: "Right, I just happened to run into the old man coming back. I didn't have time to go back to the inn to get my helmet, so you'll have to overlook this clumsy presentation for a tad."

Medium: "Not at all, so cool! But if Gramps is there…"

Barring the rags wrapped around his face, Al had returned to his original state. Medium's voice seemed sunnier due to his words, which made her look around restlessly as well

Naturally, as Medium was in the same state, she would opt for returning to her normal self.

But, Al appended with "Sorry" regarding Medium's situation,

Al: "Sorry, I couldn't bring the old man along. He said he'd be wise about it."

Medium: "Umm~, I see. Mhm, I get it! But I'm glad, even if it's just Al-chin who's back! Have you stopped being so scared now?"

Al: “Being scared, that’s something that ain’t gonna stop for the rest of my life.”

Medium switched instantly from having her eyes downcast for a moment as hope was taken away from her. Hearing her words, Al lowered the tone of his voice, shaking his head.

His voice was filled to the brim with unconcealable fear and anxiety. In the face of that Great Disaster, everyone held instinctive fear. No one could condemn them for that.

Whereas Al harbored true fear. However, whereas Al harbored no feigned fear of the sort,

Al: “Still, I gotta do it… Bring it on, oh inevitable fate.”

Medium: “Al-chin…”

Suddenly, Al raised the clasped Blue Dragon Sword overhead; Medium looked impressed by his determination.

Meanwhile, a small snorting sound interrupted their conversation.

Abel: “For a trembling, shriveled abomination, you sure talk big. That Olbart Dunkelkenn should have no ability to inspire others.”

Al: “And you’d be right. The old man just said a lot of things that pissed me off. It wasn’t that lil’ shit that made me stand up.”

Abel: “Then what did? After having been rendered unmoving, how will you convince me that you can be included in my future plans?”

Al: “…”

Abel, kept like that by Medium seizing the hem of his clothing and being held back, asked that of Al.

Those cold eyes of his, piercing his oni mask, were probably still thinking of the victory that had to be grasped. How would Al be able to convince Abel to add him to his ranks, here?

With Abel turning his gaze towards her, Taritta had trouble breathing, unable to imagine how he would convince him.

Under the watchful eyes of Taritta, Abel, and finally Medium, Al—

Al: “Sorry, but I ain’t gonna waste my words to convince you, Abel-chan.”

Abel: “Ho.”

Al: “The only master I got is the sexy-cute Princess. The reason I’ve gone along with you like this, is so that I can give bro some assistance… So that’s what I’m gonna do. Feel free to work my moves into your equations however you want, Abel-chan.”

Declaring so with a defiant attitude, Al shouldered the Blue Dragon Sword. That brisk and clear decision made Abel’s oni mask-covered face tense slightly.

But even if the answer was not in accordance to his own thoughts, Abel had neither the power to drive Al away nor a relationship valuable enough to hold him back. Exactly as Al had predicted.

No matter what, Abel would have to formulate a plan with the assumption of Al’s presence.

Abel: “If your sanity returned, then what has merely returned is just a bothersome clown. How do you plan to fight it?”

Al: “Trade secret. —Well, I ain’t gonna let you die, Lil’ Miss Medium. And don’t worry, I’ll protect you too, Abel-chan.”

Medium: “Al-chin…”

With the Great Disaster’s rampage right before his eyes, Al’s reply was far too reassuring.

What in those wordshad caused Medium to open her eyes wide, was the surprise that Al had recovered from what Abel had described as a “disgrace”, becoming an embodiment of honor.

Consequently, Medium strongly nodded, and, Medium: “I’ll do my best with Al-chin! Abel-chin, is that fine with you?”

Abel: “—. From the beginning, the presence of you two was not part of the plan.”

Medium: “Thank you very much. Just the apparent fact that we weren’t included among those with fighting power makes it feel like we’re getting special treatment.”

Shrugging at Abel’s answer, Medium lined up with Al, who stepped forward. Only then did Medium’s hand part with Abel’s sleeve at last.

Waving his released arm, Abel released out a small exhale, then turned to face the Great Disaster.

Abel: “—Taritta.”

Taritta: “Ah…”

Abel: “If you prefer to target my back, so be it. But take in mind. —Ultimately, you will have no choice but to make the decision of whether or not to follow your commandment by yourself.”

Rather than turning towards Taritta, he let her hear that from over his back; and then, Abel’s steps proceeded in the direction of the battlefield.

Medium and Al, both of whom were facing in the same direction as he was, also seemed to be accompanying him in his advance.

Taritta: “—Hk.”

Only Taritta was unable to move forward or backward. She could only see off the backs of those three people.

The words that Abel had just said to her kept echoing in her mind over and over again, as if a reminder to herself. To just shoot down Abel’s back by nocking an arrow to the bow in her hands would be an uncomplicated affair.

But if she could take the plunge into an uncomplicated affair without batting an eyelid, Taritta would not be so worried.

Taritta: “Obey or disobey, the commandment… I… I…”

Biting her lip with force, Taritta cast her head downwards while holding back the heat slowly rising in her body.

She was unable to muster the resolve to take aim with the arrow in her grasp, or the courage to spit out the thoughts rooted in her heart.

Amidst the demolished Demon City, dominated only by the continued violent tremors and roars, Taritta looked downwards.

—Similar to how, one certain day, she was swept away, ridiculed by the stars.

3

While she guarded against the encroaching jet-black darkness, a tempest swept fiercely within Yorna’s heart.

Yorna: “…”

Swinging her kiseru, the purple smoke produced served as a barrier that halted the offensive of the Great Disaster, restraining its expansion.

At intervals, parts of the city would be fired, akin to cannonballs, in an attempt to inflict even a single piece of damage to the Great Disaster.

By repeating this over and over again to deal with the extending shadows that would dispossess her of her life from just a graze, she would devote everything in her mind and body to manage it as best as she could.

However, she would not keep up these increasingly ineffective actions for long.

Yorna: "—Hk, what are you becoming so fainthearted about?"

To object to the timidness that had entered her own heart, Yorna curved her beautiful lips.

Regardless of its effectiveness, she held no intention of withdrawing the caustic words she had left Abel with. This city belonged to Yorna, and those who lived in it were under her protection.

The last stronghold for those with nowhere else to go, they could not afford to lose it—

Louis: "Uuaaauuuu!!"

Yorna: "Child…!"

Abruptly, copious amounts of black corruption poured down, targeting Yorna. Before Yorna could deal with it, a small shadow appeared and rushed over, moving towards her waist, and in the blink of an eye, the world changed immediately afterwards.

For nary a moment, there was the wobbly sensation of her head shaking, but upon seeing the ground a number of meters to her side becoming gashed right after that violent assault, Yorna grasped that she had been protected.

The one to pull that off, was a blue-eyed girl, her golden hair pulled back in a bun—Louis.

Her slender shoulders violently heaving up and down, Louis, her lovely face having taken a grim color, glared at the Great Disaster motionlessly with round eyes widened in grief.

What she was looking at was not the Great Disaster itself, however, but what was within it.

Yorna: "You're worried about that child, aren't you?"

Louis: "Uau…!"

A short reply to Yorna's words, and Louis's figure once again bounced like a ball and headed for the Great Disaster.

Louis was jumping around the top part of the Great Disaster—That bubbling, amorphous Great Disaster, in which there was nothing that looked like a head, but if there was one, she was jumping around the part that corresponded to it – attracting its attention.

Aimed at Louis's petite body, nearly a hundred shadowy arms were shot out in succession; avoiding all of those, Louis's contribution to preventing the spread of damage was immeasurable.

Were it not for her, it would be hard to believe that Yorna and the residents of the Demon City would have been able to contain the Great Disaster on their own. That only made it all the more horrifying.

Kafma: "Use that! Little girl!"

Louis: "Au!"

Assisting Louis to break through, was the wielder of thorny shrubs extending from both arms, Kafma.

Offering the vines of thorns which boasted significant suppressive ability as a scaffolding, he adroitly supported Louis's evasive maneuvers. Of course, those thorns late to retract would be swallowed by the Great Disaster, but Kafma seemed to not be affected by this; as could be seen by the earnest look on his face, his mute yet masterful performance would resume playing an active role.

Behind Louis, Kafma, and Yorna in their battle, the residents of Demon City continued to resist the Great Disaster, albeit on a lesser scale. Those with flames lit in one of their eyes were under the influence of Yorna's Soul Marriage Technique, their power increased.

However, there were individual differences and limits to how much the level of one's strength could be raised.

Moreover, Yorna's Soul Marriage Technique had the disposition of favoring the weaker ones.

It was a tool that enabled the weak to face the strong, not a substitute for the strong to face something stronger.

That was nothing more than the difference in the quality of one’s soul, something Yorna was unable to influence in any way.

Therefore—

Yorna: “—And yet, it’s only been a few minutes.”

It seemed as if an endless amount of time had passed, but only a few minutes had gone by since the Great Disaster engulfed Crimson Lapis Castle, when Yorna and the others began their all-out battle.

Nevertheless, the wear-and-tear on Yorna and her group was not negligible.

That was what it was like, being smack-dab in a place where you were always overly anxious of fatal injury.

That probably marked the difference between those considered true warriors, and Yorna Mishigure, a woman who just so happened to be endowed with power.

Were she a true warrior, she would challenge this Great Disaster that could erase her entirely without any discretion and wrest out a win, however she did not consider herself that blessed of an existence for such.

That self-awareness was a strong point of the leader of the Demon City, named Yorna Mishigure.

And thus—

???: “Hiyahhh—!!”

With a vigorous call to arms, a fresh fighting force entered the battlefield, which seemed to be tilting towards dire straits.

A girl of petite build, wielding a cleaver in her hands, charged in with a momentum such that the words “launch in” served as an apt descriptor.

The intrusion of the little girl, launching herself in with her long braids dancing in the air, all while maintaining a lively atmosphere, lead everyone on the battlefield into a state of bewilderment; Yorna included.

Of course. Just what would happen with the entrance of a lone girl on the battlefield? All that could be seen was a little girl who was displaying foolhardiness, and whose bravery would be her downfall.

Moreover, she was not the sole odd intruder.

???: “Let’s go, Lil’ Miss Medium! Let’s battle proudly!”

So barked a masked man that landed behind the girl, carrying the Blue Dragon Sword.

He was one of the people who had visited the castle tower as messengers the previous day, but unlike that time, hiding his face was not a helmet, but rather a mask of cloth, and the way he held the Blue Dragon Sword was bizarre.

For some reason, he had the blade of the Blue Dragon Sword tucked close to his own neck as he broke into a run in such a perilous stance.

One mistake, and just like that, he would inadvertently cut off his own head.

In any case, the battlefield’s atmosphere froze due to that passing party of two, which evoked only bewilderment.

However, that congealment only affected the defenders who were aware of this melee. —The Great Disaster, apparently devoid of any will, was unsurprised by these reinforcements.

Nonetheless, the fact that, perhaps having a sense of what one may perceive as annoyance, the majority of the shadows cast by the Great Disaster lashed out neither upon Yorna nor Louis, but rather at the girl who had just rushed out; almost as if in a state of emergency.

She had to protect them; Yorna made a sudden move, but—

Al: “To the right! Step on the scaffold and jump! Place the tips of your feet on the rubble, then up you go!”

Medium: “Urya!”

There was a shout from the masked man, and the girl bounced in time, raising an enthusiastic voice.

Doing as she had been told to by the man, the girl jumped to the right, stepped on a piece of rubble, and flew forward. Once the girl’s foot reached the rubble ahead of her, she used the strength of her fingers to fly upward in a big leap.

In turn, the shadow caressed, scraped, and encircled the places the girl had moved to.

The girl, however, barely managed to dodge it, achieving not being harmed.

Yorna: “That’s…”

This was the same scene she had witnessed at the tower as of the previous day; when messengers had partaken in a bout proposed by Yorna, and were targeted and attacked by the Emperor—or rather, by a man dressed as the Emperor, alongside the group he commanded.

That masked man had escaped the crisis by directing his allies to take preventative measures against Kafma’s thorns and Olbart’s attacks. Aside from that, the man seemed to have no special abilities.

Was it just tremendously good intuition, and no reason beyond that?

Whereas she viewed the latter to be most likely, she could not reach a conclusion as to why that would be exactly.

Even so, the situation had changed.

Medium: “Al-chin! What’s next?!”

Al: “Don’t rush me, I’m a nervous wreck! Hey, tattoo-bro over there, gimme a hand! I’ll tell you what to do! Obstruct that thing’s movements!”

Kafma: “I refuse! Why should I follow someone as suspicious as…”

Al: “Up there! Spread the vines wide!”

Kafma: “Wha?!”

Much like how he’d been called out by the little girl, the masked man—who had been referred to as Al by the little girl, now called out to Kafma.

Kafma was naturally reluctant to follow the other party’s command, as his competency was unknown, but the jet-black shadows that surged in concert with Al’s cries proved that this was no time for quarrels.

Thorn vines spread from Kafma’s arms as he bent down in haste and raised his hands above his head, as the great wave of shadows changed course to stream along the briars.

Of course, the vines of thorns could not totally withstand those all-consuming shadows, yet Kafma had saved his own life with that single second earned.

Bursting into a gap and having escaped that hardship, Kafma glared towards Al, “You…!”,

Kafma: “Can you read the movements of that Great Disaster?”

Al: “We have a bit of a connection. Are you ready to hear what I have to say?”

Kafma: “—. It is unavoidable, if for the sake of reducing damage. But I will not tolerate thoughtless words!”

Al: “You’re more flexible than I thought you’d be, thanks.”

With Kafma openly admitting his superiority, Al chuckled sarcastically and stepped forward.

Then instructing the girl and Kafma again, the Blue Dragon Sword still trained on his own neck, he began taking command of the front line against the Great Disaster.

And adjacent to that struggle—

???: “—Yorna Mishigure.”

Yorna: “You are…”

About to join the unexpected combat forces of Al and the little girl, Yorna turned her attention toward an oni mask making its way over, treading over the rubble—in the direction of Abel.

Few minutes had passed since their parting earlier, but he was not a man of such an affable nature that he would change his mind in such a short time.

In the first place, the disconnect between Yorna and him was not the kind of thing that could be easily wiped away with the passage of time. That sort of turbulence seemed to lay in the background.

And, as if in support of Yorna’s thoughts—

Abel: “Abandoning the Demon City; have you cooled down enough to consider that suggestion?”

Blithely and ruthlessly, Abel once again threw a proposal at Yorna that had been discarded once before.

Of course, “cooled” was a word unfitting of a mind aroused with fighting spirit. As long as the situation and their relationship remained the same, the answer on Yorna’s side would not change either.

Deeming arguing as pointless, Yorna turned her back on the cold-blooded Emperor.

Abel: “You stated this was the last place for those who had no place to go, no place to stay.”

Yorna: “…”

Abel: “My notion of it as worthless sentimentality remains. But allow me to correct your mistake.”

Yorna: “My, mistake?”

By that inexcusable argument, Yorna’s attempt to return to the battlefield was halted.

It was absurd, Yorna being mistaken in regards to the Demon City of Chaosflame. This was Yorna’s city. All of its residents were Yorna’s beloved children.

That towards them, Yorna would hold misconceptions or anything of the like—.

Yorna: “Just what exactly am I erring in, then?”

Abel: “It is not to this city that those weeping cling and rely on. It is you.”

Yorna: “…”

Abel: “The Demon City was originally built on desolate land, a city composed of the leftovers of warfare. The Crimson Lapis Castle was erected as a symbol, but the true symbol has always been its tower. Namely, you.”

Once more, Abel’s eyes were fixed on Yorna, as he concluded so.

Her eardrums struck by the power and the true meaning of those words, Yorna’s cheeks stiffened.

She understood the logic. But it was very much lip service.

Whether Yorna was a spiritual pillar for the residents of Demon City or not, the fact remained that when it rained, they needed shelter, and when they were hungry, they needed something to eat.

Whatever a city could provide, Yorna could not provide alone in comparison.

Yorna: “Or do you believe that these children would say that they would endure odious things, such as enduring an empty stomach or getting wet in the rain as long as I am there?”

Abel: “—They would!”

Yorna: “Eh…”

Abel: “Do you believe everything under your wing is a suckling baby? A baby, grumbling for comfort, waiting to be fed milk? —That is not my opinion.”

Due to Abel’s figure as he replied, Yorna quietly gulped.

Immediately afterward, a violent booming sound erupted behind them, and pieces of debris wrapped up in the maelstrom of the Great Disaster flew towards Yorna and Abel. One of the fragments landed right next to Abel, who stood still, as the impact struck the slender man, ripping the oni mask from his face.

Yorna: “—Hk.”

His pale face had become uncovered, and blood was running down his forehead, having been slightly grazed by a splinter, yet his countenance did not waver in the slightest. The handsome man picked up the oni mask that had fallen by his side, clutching it in his hands.

Donning his true face, Abel—Nay, Vincent Vollachia, stared at Yorna.

Abel: “The populace is foolish. If it does not hurt, they forget to resist, if they have no enemies, they do not even arm themselves. They know not how to unite without disaster, and they are so afraid of death that they avert their eyes from it.”

Yorna: “…”

Abel: “And for all that, it is that weakness and foolishness that makes them, them. The Empire rules its populace by means of iron and blood, and, in the Demon City, your way of being has served as guidance for the inhabitants’ own. Consequently…”

Cutting off his words there, Abel then turned his gaze in some other direction. The place towards which his eyes had been lured, was to those who had Yorna's love lit in their eyes; the form of the inhabitants opposing the Great Disaster.

Resolutely, they continued fighting valiantly to protect this city.

No—

Abel: "For your sake, they shall endure hunger and the rain. And, for the day when the sun shall rise again, for the day their stomach shall be full, they choose to desire with you!"

Consequently—

Abel: "Abandon the Demon City. Their destination is the same as yours. And the only place they can turn to, is yourself."

Yorna: "—Ah."

Abel: "Or do you lament that you cannot do that? Do your own desires and those of the ones who struggle for you not overlap?"

As he voiced this, Abel wiped the blood from his forehead with his sleeve, putting the oni mask once more on his face.

Yet again his expression was concealed by cognitive disruption, but the words declared just before penetrated deep into the depths of Yorna's heart, becoming a thorn that would not fall out.

From the moment Yorna read the missive, she understood that Abel knew what she desired.

But for that to come out and be used as a reference at this juncture, was far too barren of compassion. And that void of compassion was a quality desired in the Vollachian Emperor of the current generation.

It was for that reason, that taking all the necessary measures was—

Yorna: "If we abandon the Demon City and escape from that Great Disaster, what shall you do? That thing may drink this city dry, but it may not stop there!”

Abel: “Are you attempting to size me up this late in the game? You get what I am saying fully.”

Abandoning the Demon City, and allowing the Great Disaster to do as it pleases, just what was the true meaning of those words?

Abel responded to Yorna’s query with sullenness, jerking his jaw. That gesture of his indicated the Great Disaster itself—or rather, the base below the raging Great Disaster.

Put into other words, there, laid the site of the Crimson Lapis Castle, where the Great Disaster had first made its appearance—

Abel: “Do the same as you did when that thing swallowed the Castle, but now, for the Demon City. —The swallowed Castle was not enough to blow it away, but your beloved Demon City will be a different matter altogether!”

From a distance, the wind fluttered the hem of his outfit, piercing black eyes gazing upon the Great Disaster that laid ruin upon the city.

Yorna’s scheme to minimize the spread of the damage as much as possible, along with Kafma, the city dwellers and other unexpected contributions of military strength, appeared to be manifesting some effect.

However, that would not last for long, either.

To an undeniable extent, the threat that was the very darkness of the Great Disaster, was overwhelming.

Perhaps in ancient times, people would personally witness such things, and, resigning themselves for the end of the world, left behind legends to pass on their fears to the survivors.

The most extreme of these was the Witch of Envy. This Great Disaster was another, just like the former.

???: "—The Great Disaster that would destroy the Empire, it is a disaster of a different sort?"

???: "It is, it is. Oh nooo~, this could be an issue, no? That it'd happen like this wasn't foreseen, I feel like forgetting my place and complaining to the stars myself."

With arms folded, standing still at an overlook, was a man—Vincent; and looking at the same sight to his side, was the blue-robed Stargazer crouched down.

Along their journey, the man had not even chirped as to give them advance warning, yet had yelled out "Aaat~ aaany~ raaate~, that's outside my responsibility" in regards to the thrashing Great Disaster, as to dodge any and all blame.

However, one of the few virtues of the Stargazer was that he would not lie about what he had seen.

So for a Stargazer to be so bold, this disaster, and the ruin of the Empire foreseen by the Stargazer, had to be a different problem.

In other words—

???: "Oh, comin', comin'. Geez, I was rushin' quite a bit."

Ubilk: "My my, Old Man Olbart."

Behind Vincent who squinted in thought, an old man with a faint presence appeared. The Stargazer was first to call the name of the elderly man—of Olbart, who nodded his head with an "Aye aye".

Shooting a sideways glance at Olbart lined up next to him, Vincent's eyebrows scrunched in a scowl.

Vincent: "You, did you leave your right arm somewhere?"

Olbart: “Just as I’d expect, you’re quite perceptive, Your Excellency. Actually, I keep my right hand tucked in Your Excellency’s breast pocket… Well, at least it’d be funny if I did. It was swallowed by that great shadow.”

Ubilk: “I seeee~. Sounds like quite the painful experience.”

Olbart: “Yeaaah, ‘twas painful. Even at my age, I was ‘boutta cry and whine like a lil’ kid. Embarrassin’, embarrassin’.”

With a flutter, Olbart ranted and raved as he waved his right hand, which was missing from the wrist down.

Leaving Olbart and the Stargazer’s charade aside, Vincent once more looked upon the battlefield.

At the former site of the Crimson Lapis Castle, the Great Disaster stirred. Plus, there was the city’s strength pushing it to keep it at bay.

The measures necessary to repel the Great Disaster were already being relayed to Yorna.

So after this—

Olbart: “But is it alright for Your Excellency to just casually stick ‘round at this place?”

Vincent: “It is of no importance.”

To the words of an Olbart tilting his head, Vincent responded quietly.

It was his role to transmit the plan to Yorna and persuade her. In return, Vincent had to carry out the role as Vincent would.

Therefore—

Vincent: “That move has already been made. —The move that should be made as Vincent Vollachia, Emperor of Vollachia.”

Chapter 59:
Taritta Shudrak

1

The one to confide in Taritta, was another of the People of Shudraq, Mariuli.

All Shudraqians were born and raised in the Buddheim Jungle, and that, was where their lives would come to an end.

Hence, all the fellow villagers in the settlement were like family, and Mariuli was no exception to that.

For Taritta, however, Mariuli was a special and close friend. The reason for this was that she and Taritta had been born on the same day; soul sisters who had raised their birth cry in the same place.

—A belief of the Shudraq, was that the souls of children born on the same day were connected.

The connection was considered stronger than the one between one’s mother and sisters, they were treated as the very half of themselves.

It was an ancient Shudraq custom that soul sisters were connected by a deep and profound bond; Kuna and Holly were likewise soul sisters, having been born on the same day.

When thinking of the friendship between those two, the existence of a bond that transcended that of blood could be keenly understood.

The beautiful Shudraq, the woman named Mariuli, her black hair dyed a pink color at the ends, was Taritta’s soul sister.

She was gentle and calm, someone with good chemistry with Taritta, the latter someone anxious and shy.

Taritta also consulted her soul sister about her real sister often. She would ask her to listen to her anxieties and her lack of confidence in her ability to support her older sister, who would eventually take over as Chieftain of the tribe.

Any conflicts or embarrassing insecurities she had, she could naturally confide in Mariuli.

So when Mariuli told her she had a secret to disclose, Taritta was happy to be asked for advice, feeling compelled to repay her trust.

And so, she spoke.

—She had been chosen as a Stargazer, bestowed with a commandment to fulfill.

Mariuli: "To fulfill the commandment is a Stargazer's important role. It's a great honor, Taritta."

Taritta: "Well, I don't understand… What are the heavens telling you, Mariuli?"

Mariuli: "It's not the heavens, Taritta. It's the stars who tell us. The stars assign us a role to play. A very, very important role… In fact, I wasn't going to tell anyone, but…"

Taritta: "…"

Mariuli: "You, are my soul sister."

Looking over to the smiling Mariuli and her trust, Taritta was unable to say anything.

It was merely a topic that her soul sister, Mariuli, had confided in Taritta, trusting her. The thought of revealing it to anyone but herself was not one that Taritta possessed.

Besides, that sort of thing which seemed like an obsession, could quickly be forgotten as a passing delusion.

It was truly a passing delusion that really did not need to be taken seriously. By believing this, Taritta averted her eyes from the matter of Mariuli.

But changes manifested themselves, slowly but surely becoming anomalies.

And then, one day.

When Taritta and Mizelda returned from hunting, Mariuli, who was taking care of the village children, was singing an unfamiliar song. —That was bizarre.

The People of Shudraq, in the village, could be split into two roles.

One of those, was the role of the hunter, those who left the settlement and made it their profession to hunt prey; Mizelda, Taritta, and many other Shudraqians belonged to this group.

The role of the others, was that of a guardian who would stay in the village, raising the children, and defending the settlement.

Mariuli, she belonged to those with the role of guardian.

Her hunting skills never improved; her ability was so ruinous that should she draw the bow she would miss all shots out of one hundred. However, she was an excellent cook and seamstress, and her strong points were in singing songs and telling stories of the past to the children.

Henceforth, it was not surprising that Mariuli was singing.

Mariuli was an excellent singer, and at feasts, everyone would beg her to sing.

Taritta on the other hand, was useless at most of a guardian's duties, and was not very good at singing either. Truly, the two were halves of one person, or else they would not be able to fulfill one whole individual's worth of work.

And yet—

Mizelda: "—I can't remember hearing Mariuli's song before."

Taritta: “S-sister…”

Mizelda: “But, it’s a good song. Pleasant.”

Stopping to listen to the same song, Mizelda paid no mind to the abnormality.

The same went for the others, Kuna and Holly. They all noticed that Mariuli was singing a song they did not recognize, but they did not think twice as to its significance.

Only Taritta was fearful and apprehensive about the source of the song.

It was Mariuli who had spoken of the stars having informed her of the role she should perform, such as the commandment.

Surely, she would not say that even that song had been taught by the stars—.

Mariuli: “No, Taritta. That’s a misunderstanding. I didn’t learn it from the stars, I just sang a song I already knew.”

Taritta: “You know, the song?”

Mariuli: “Yes, I know the song… Not personally though, another Stargazer does…”

Taritta: “—Hk, I don’t understand what that means!”

It was not the answer Taritta had feared.

In a way, however, Mariuli’s answer had gone beyond what Taritta had feared.

This Stargazer remark was proof that she had not forgotten the tall tale that had come out of her mouth. It was proof that the fantasy still perdured. —No, it was proof that it was getting worse.

However, due to Taritta not understanding anything of what she spoke on the subject of Stargazers, Mariuli made a lonely face.

Because it had seemingly betrayed her trust, Taritta agonized due to something impossible for her to understand.

—After that, the honeymoon period with Mariuli's Stargazer continued.

She would spend her days demonstrating unfamiliar knowledge, singing unfamiliar songs, telling unfamiliar stories, and fulfilling an unfamiliar commandment.

It was a Mariuli that Taritta did not know.

Always, she would discuss everything with Mariuli.

There had never been a time in her life when Taritta did not seek Mariuli's advice on a decision. The same was true for Mariuli, even regarding her daughter's name.

Yet Mariuli's attention was always on the sky.

Seemingly prioritizing something other than the People of Shudraq, something aside from Taritta and her daughter, her life slowly and gradually became trapped by the stars, bound by the commandment.

Someone, someone who was not a star, was placing wisdom in her.

Suspecting this, Taritta had even attempted to indirectly pry around her surroundings. However, with her role as guardian she never left the village. There was no opportunity for her to gain knowledge of the outside world.

It was really as if the stars were whispering to her.

Taritta: "Are you the one who's misleading Mariuli?"

Looking up at the night sky, she inquired to the stars that could be seen through the gaps in the treetops.

The stars that spoke to Mariuli, however, did not speak to Taritta, to whom she was connected by soul.

Unfamiliar knowledge, the songs no one had ever heard, a commandment one must fulfill—.

Taritta: "—Give me my soul sister back."

Drawing her bowstring with force, Taritta took aim at the brightest star in the night sky.

As soon as she released the string, a sharp arrow roared up into the night sky—And naturally, it fell down aimlessly, not hitting anything.

The stars, refused to acknowledge even Taritta's rebellious will.

The stars did not speak; they did not hand down commandments.

Then, what exactly had changed Mariuli? She could not understand it.

She did not even know who she should let hear this lament.

All the troubles and sufferings that she could not express had been heard by Mariuli. Then, who should she turn to, to listen to her worries and sufferings caused by Mariuli?

She was certain that her older sister would not comprehend. Her older sister was strong and composed.

That she could dwell on anything or stand still was inconceivable. Besides, the horror of confiding in her older sister was larger than that of just not being understood.

The current Mariuli was antithetical to the teachings and to the way of life of the People of Shudraq.

Would Mizelda, now the Chieftain of the tribe, approve of that? Or was it possible that she would banish Mariuli from the village because of her dangerous ideas?

Some had been driven away from the tribe in the past, unable to return to the Jungle ever again.

She did not want to lose sight of Mariuli.

Even if now, Mariuli had changed from the one whose soul Taritta's own had been connected with.

Therefore, Taritta kept her anguish bottled up within her chest for a long time.

And then—

Mariuli: "—What should I do, Taritta? I'm a Stargazer, and yet…"

—And then the incident of that day, the same as the nightmares she saw every night, truly began.

2

Sensing the change in the state of the battle, everyone on the battlefield began acting in their own way.

As the situation was irreversible, no one was falling behind, their faces alert as a result of their nerves being on edge.

The Great Disaster raged on, the rampaging shadows engulfing and consuming the surroundings, chipping away, magnifying demise.

However, none of those who had steeled their hearts to resist the Disaster faltered. That was the hard-earned reward of those who had overcome the very first obstacle.

There was a condition for mounting a challenge on the Great Disaster.

They had to be warriors. —That meant that they must possess the strength to fight. Simultaneously, it also meant that they must possess a heart able to oppose it.

If either strength or heart were lacking, one could not stand on the battlefield as a warrior.

Conversely, as long as one could prove that they held both of those, there would be no other obstacles in their path to challenge the Great Disaster.

Louis: “Uau!”

Raising a soundless voice, with clenched teeth Louis continued evading the shadow’s onslaught.

She had neither any attachment nor a connection to Chaosflame, no stake in whether the city would be destroyed or not. If the city were to disappear, it would not bother her in the slightest.

Albeit she appeared young and frail, she was endeavoring her utmost to survive the Great Disaster, but for other reasons.

If that conferred Louis with strength, with heart, no one had the right to hold her back.

And that was not limited to only Louis.

Medium, wielding a barbarian sword with her small frame; Al, holding the Blue Dragon Sword against his own neck; Kafma, mobilizing all the power of the “insects” within his body; and the residents of Demon City, one of their eyes ablaze; all those held a determination to not retreat against the Great Disaster equal to that of Louis.

Each of them had their own, different reasons for taking on the Great Disaster that was destroying the Demon City.

For those that had made it past this first hurdle, the Great Disaster behaved in a simple manner and, despite its danger, it was not too complicated to deal with.

—The Great Disaster was not a living thing. That, was the greatest factor.

The Great Disaster was no longer a disaster of that nature; instead, it could be said that it was a phenomenon of destruction itself.

Shadows that chipped away at everything they came in contact with; an amorphous figure, bubbling and writhing, that did not allow one to be sure an attack had been successful. —However, that was all there was to it.

Al: “It doesn’t even have the brains to respond to our attacks or to change the way it acts.”

Running across the battlefield using debris as footing, Al stared intensely at the Great Disaster while issuing directions to those around him.

Although there was no way to erase the panic leaking from the core of his body, via a show of bravado and with his grasp on the situation, he was able to give his mind some respite. Respite, for Al to think.

The behavior of the Great Disaster was, to put it simply, predictable.

It would shake off or absorb anything that drew near, and would wriggle and engulf its surroundings to cause further damage, were it to go undisturbed.

However, the defensive forces, Al included, would not permit the Great Disaster to proliferate further.

By driving attacks in, or by dispelling its attention from the goal of the overflowing shadows through becoming bait themselves, they would generate a pause on its engorgement, wasting its time. Repeatedly.

Had the Great Disaster been a living being, it would have learned, taken in how to react and change the tide of the battle.

Or else, it could have brought forth a change of its behavior because of emotional aggravation, which certainly should have generated a change in the course of the battle. But because that did not come to pass, even this fighting force was able to hold it back, albeit barely.

However—

Yorna: “—All of you, get ready to move back.”

With a single stomp the earth shattered, and the billowing shockwave split the Great Disaster's gargantuan body in twain.

Of course, not long after that the Great Disaster squirmed, quickly reverting to its original state, but it was the absolute suppressive ability of the Demon City's Mistress that allowed her to inflict a discernible level of damage.

The one who had performed that deed, Yorna Mishigure, her thick-soled geta producing loud sounds, blocked the shadows which came surging forth like waves of the rough seas, as if to sweep the earth and everything on it away.

Medium: "Yorna-chan!"

Yorna: "Stand down! Though it is frustrating, we'll do as that man says."

Medium: "You mean Abel-chin?"

As they conversed amidst the storm, Yorna's slender jaw went up and down in a nod in response to Medium's question. Her almond eyes regarded a handsome man wearing an oni mask, standing atop a hill overlooking the battlefield.

Even if he did not have the ability to join the fight, he was not running away, still present, perhaps because of some pride.

In any case, the plan he had elaborated via the perceptions circling in his mind had been conveyed to Yorna, and she had adopted it as her plan of action.

Then—

Yorna: "—I'll allow this city to be swallowed up, and then I'll blow it up from within. Aside from this, there's no other way to nip the buds of that Disaster causing this debauchery."

Kafma: "Can you do it?"

Yorna: "If one castle isn't enough, then it's just a matter of using one city. But if that's not enough, then I'll have to be made Empress and use the country.”

Kafma: “As one of his retainers, I must admonish you firmly for such a thing!”

Having heard Yorna’s plan, Kafma yelled at her, red-faced due to her unnecessary comment. Still, the honest warrior of the Insect Cage Tribe changed his expression at once and nodded his head in assent with an “Understood”.

That was probably because he had realized that Yorna’s decision to abandon her city was a choice that brought pain akin to cutting her own body.

Kafma’s short answer falling upon her ears, Yorna’s eyes were cast downwards slightly, followed by a charming, delicate smile.

Yorna: “There’s no need for your concern. With me and those who love me, a city like this can be established. —Me and them both have that solace.”

Yorna, putting her hand on her chest and stating as much, had no objection.

In fact, just how much power the ace up Yorna’s sleeve would demonstrate was unclear, but he fully understood that, aside from it, there was nothing else that could tip the scales against the Great Disaster, right now.

Henceforth—

Medium: “—We’re all gonna have to fight our way back together! As fast as we can!”

Those brief words asserted by Medium were the cue for the final gambit in the battle of the Demon City to be carried out.

3

—The nightmares she had every night started on one chilly night, under a moon pale and freezing cold.

After professing to be a Stargazer, Mariuli had gotten to the point where she was revealing unknown knowledge.

Her brethren did not care where this knowledge came from, but Taritta's fears grew day-by-day. However, she could not disclose the anguish she carried to anyone.

Mariuli had never told anyone aside from Taritta that she had become a Stargazer. Not because of self-interest, but rather because of the simple bonds between the two.

There were vows and secrets, which were only exchanged between fellow soul sisters.

Kuna and Holly, who both had a strong sense of belonging to the Shudraq, certainly also had their own secrets, which they had not told their other brethren.

In Mariuli's case, that would be her role as a Stargazer, which she had confided to Taritta. Plus, it was nigh unthinkable that a soul sister would let slip a secret, confided with such faith, to others.

And thus, Taritta's anguish continued to gnaw at her heart, unable to share it with anyone else.

However, those days would come to an abrupt end, in a way she had not conceived.

That would be—

Mariuli: "—What should I do, Taritta? I'm a Stargazer, and yet…"

Mariuli's words came as a shock to Taritta, who became so stunned that she was unable to move.

Because, what had come out of her mouth were not merely her frail laments, but also fresh, red blood, which drenched the front of her chest.

Her body had not been healthy to begin with.

The reason she had toiled as a guardian, instead of a hunter, was not just down to her inexperience in hunting skills, but also the frailness of her body.

Back when she was a kid, she would often be bedridden due to illness. But as she got older and those bouts grew less common, everyone must have let their guards down, assuming everything with her would certainly be alright.

And despite that, the demon of ill health had been slowly gnawing into her very core, to a point of no return.

Mariuli kept puking up blood over and over again, her face white as a sheet. Anyone could clearly see that her body was growing more haggard by the day, and that the light of her life was starting to flicker out.

Thus—

???: "The rest depends on Mariuli's willpower, Taritta."

Taritta: "Big… Sister…"

???: "Spend some time with Mariuli. Until her last. That's the duty of a soul sister."

Making her drink an infusion, Mizelda left those words behind, which weighed on Taritta.

The duty of a soul sister, that felt just like a commandment.

A commandment spoken to her by her big sister, no different to that of the heavens, saying that she must carry it out.

Other Shudraqians who had known Mariuli for a while, such as Kuna and Holly, each exchanged some words with her. They then took their leave, leaving behind a few words for Taritta.

Everyone understood that this was their last chance to talk to Mariuli.

And, the one who would see Mariuli's end with her own eyes, would be none other than Taritta. Her soul sister, who had been born on the same day as her, but would die on a different one.

???: “Maa…”

Mariuli’s young daughter, who still could not comprehend what was going on, clutched her mother’s hand and softly rubbed her own cheek against hers.

Prompted by their surroundings, mother and child finished their last farewell without a semblance of understanding. A farewell between an innocent daughter, who held no doubts in her belief that she would see her again tomorrow, and her mother who lay on her deathbed.

Mariuli: “Goodnight.”

Mariuli finished giving her farewells to her waving child, as well as to her brethren who had spoken to her in turn; now faced with her own death, was something special.

There was no doubt that Mariuli, who Taritta believed in and loved, was strong at her core.

However—

Mariuli: “What should I do, Taritta. I still haven’t fulfilled my commandment, and yet…”

Taritta: “Mariuli…”

Mariuli: “I still haven’t finished it… Why… Me…”

As soon as she was left alone with Taritta, the tension broke audibly.

Mariuli’s face turned even paler than it had been. What she was worried about was not death looming before her, nor the future of her child, but rather something incomprehensible like the whispers of the stars.

Mariuli’s eyes were filled with tears as she despaired, wondering why.

But Taritta was the one who despaired first, even before her tears and expression.

Taritta: “Y-you’re still going on about that…!”

Mariuli: “Taritta…”

Taritta: “Commandments or whatever, nothing of the sort exists. Absolutely not! You’re Mariuli of Shudraq! There’s nothing more to it than that, what more do you want than that!”

Live as a Shudraqian, die as a Shudraqian.

That should have been the most important thing, the biggest priority.

So, what needed to be done in order for Mariuli, one of the Shudraqs, to die as one, was—

Mariuli: “—Meaning for having been born.”

Taritta: “…Mea… ning?”

Mariuli: “That’s what I want.”

Mariuli’s words, which even at a time like this, saw worth in the commandment, pierced through Taritta.

Born like a Shudraqian, live like a Shudraqian, die like a Shudraqian.

Upon being asked what could she desire further, she replied by telling her she desired the meaning of being born.

—She had a daughter. She had Taritta. She had the Shudraq. And yet, she said she desired meaning.

In that very instant, she, Mariuli, had renounced the blood flowing through her, dismissing it as meaningless.

She had betrayed her blood, and declared that she found worth in the whispers of the stars, which were nothing but a sham, of all things.

This kind of betrayal was one very difficult to forgive, as far as Taritta was concerned.

So, for that reason—

Taritta: "—Enough already."

Mariuli: "…"

Taritta: "I'm, your soul sister… How can you even speak about the meaning of being born in front of me."

As if she were saying she couldn't bear to hear any more of this, Taritta displayed her intentions using her cold blade.

She had drawn out a dagger, its tip quietly pointed against Mariuli's pale throat. Taritta hoped Mariuli would be brought back to her senses, making her withdraw her words with how sharp and frigid the blade was.

Naturally, it could be that these threats would not get through to Mariuli, given she was on death's doorstep.

However, Taritta could not conceive of any other way. Henceforth, only this method remained.

Even so, that was the greatest mistake Taritta had made in her life.

Mariuli: "Right, Taritta. —I had you."

Taritta: "Huh?"

Her face white as a sheet, Mariuli focused on Taritta.

The hue of her eyes seemed different from what Taritta had ever known of Mariuli, and that made her body tense up.

That very instant proved to be a fatal one. —For Mariuli.

Taritta: "Mariuli…?!"

Mariuli’s thin hand pressed firmly over Taritta’s, pushing down the blade pointed at herself.

Taritta immediately tried to resist, but was prevented from doing so due to her momentary confusion and by how atypically strong Mariuli felt.

The blade was one that opposed the thick pelts of beasts.

With how sharp it was honed, the blade sliced through Mariuli’s body like it was water, shedding blood. There came a sickening sound along with a sickening sensation; there she knew that the tip of her dagger had fatally torn into Mariuli’s chest.

Taritta: “We need to…! We need to get you patched up immediately…!”

Mariuli: “No, Taritta! You have a role to play…”

Taritta: “Please stop saying these foolish things! This isn’t the time for that…”

Mariuli: “LISTEN TO ME!”

Taritta: “—Hk!”

She uttered a scream that felt like she was spewing up blood—No, she literally was spewing up blood.

Her chest had been torn into by the dagger, the light of her life growing ever dimmer by the moment; however, Mariuli’s arm would not let Taritta go. As blood foamed from the corner of her mouth, her eyes bored into Taritta.

Clinging to her life, which she was about to lose at any moment, she spoke while forcibly digging her nails into her,

Mariuli: “After… a thousand nights have passed… I’ll… You’ll… Come across a traveler…”

Taritta: “…”

Mariuli: “This traveler, is an ally of the Great Disaster that’ll bring this land to ruin… So, you must, kill them…”

Taritta: “Mariuli……”

Mariuli: “Must… kill them…”

Taritta: “Mariuli…? Mariuli!”

Her voice, filled with anguish and mixed with the coughing of blood, robbed Taritta’s arms of their strength.

But before she even knew it, Mariuli’s unbelievable strength fizzled out. That was when she should have stood up and called for someone. —No, it was too late to do that. It was too late for everything.

The grim reaper had already placed its fingers around Mariuli’s soul, and it was about to be taken away.

Delaying that for even a second was mere wishful thinking.

Mariuli: “A traveler, with dark hair, and dark eyes… Kill them.”

Taritta: “…”

Mariuli: “Stop the Great Disaster, Taritta… That’s my duty… I can’t fulfill it anymore… So, please… Taritta… My, soul sister…”

Taritta: “Y-you’re still saying tha…”

As she shed blood, Mariuli used the last of her strength for this entreaty; and for that, for the very first time, Taritta hated her.

All this time, Taritta had been desperately trying to keep her in check, due to how they were connected in soul. And yet, she had ignored this altogether and brought that up in her very last moments.

It was so despicable; those words struck Taritta in her very heart.

Hearing Taritta’s tearful voice, Mariuli’s eyes flickered slightly.

And just like that, strength ebbed away from Mariuli’s body, and her head slowly slumped down,

Mariuli: “…U… ta…”

Taritta: “Mariuli?”

Mariuli: “…”

Taritta: “MARIULI!!”

At the very end, a weak, hoarse breath escaped from her, and that was her last.

There lay Mariuli’s body, limp and with no pulse, a dagger still stuck in her chest. Taritta remained stunned for a few seconds, then quickly ran out from the cabin, in an attempt to call her big sister and the others.

However—

???: “—Ah.”

Taritta threw open the cabin door, and tried to run off outside, however she stopped in her tracks.

Sitting there, was a small silhouette that should not have been there.

Perhaps she had been worried about her bedridden mother, or perhaps she had felt a bad hunch as a child would.

Whichever one it was, the young girl, who had what it took to become an excellent hunter, had shown her qualities on a night in which she should never have done so, slipping past the eyes of the adults.

The young girl, Utakata, was staring at Taritta, who was soaked in her mother’s blood, shedding tears upon tears.

The shadow of the Great Disaster rampaged on, and a cataclysmic earthquake fractured the Demon City from the inside out.

Yorna's decision reached all residents of the Demon City, for each and every one of them to abandon the land that had become their home.

A bitter decision had been made. For them, this was the very final place that had welcomed those with no other place to go, that had permitted them the freedom of not having to run and hide.

The loss of all of this, how could one not lament it?

However—

Yorna: "If there's life, I'll save it. For the sake of witnessing a new Demon City with our own eyes, we must be quick, without delay."

Since the Mistress of the Demon City, the last stronghold of the helpless, had announced it, the people believed that they could rally and rebuild their home; they started running, turning their backs to their land, the home they were accustomed to living in.

Ruin engulfed, pulverized the Demon City; the responsibility for that lay within the Great Disaster, its scale ever-enlarging.

The shadows it wielded grew in density, the wriggling jet-black mass swelling exponentially before their eyes.

The increase in both its size and the number of shadows utilized going unchecked, signified that the Great Disaster posed increased danger.

As the area covered by the wave of destruction widened, the earth itself and the cityscape being gouged out, Yorna was astounded by the great efforts a certain meritorious person was undertaking to keep the human casualties at a minimum—Al.

Al: "Lil' Miss Medium! Back off! That's enough! You won't make it if you stay there any longer as you are right now, Lil' Miss! Time to go!"

Medium: “Uh~! So frustrating! But, thank you!”

Trusting the judgment of Al, shouting so, Medium, carrying the barbarian sword, fled at once.

A barrage of shadows shot out in pursuit of the young girl’s back, which were blocked by a wall of thorns of vine that sprang out from the side, allowing the girl, whose petite body had played the perilous role of a decoy, to escape.

Al: “Thanks for the save, Antenna-bro! But it’s about time you…”

Kafma: “About time? Are you going to tell me to retreat? If so, then I, Kafma Irulux, will not listen to such talk!”

Al: “No, y’know, I do consider you a character who’d say that, but I really mean it.”

Kafma: “What are you trying to say?!”

Al: “Whatever.”

Shrugging his shoulders, Al shook his head loosely at Kafma’s angry bellow.

As a result of going without Kafma’s support, the battle against the Great Disaster would have been much more precarious. Although Al was grateful for his assistance, his hot-headed disposition was annoying.

Anyway—

Al: “—Fox-babe!”

Yorna: “I’m not pleased with the way you’re calling me, but I got it.”

At the voice Al had cast her way, Yorna nodded in assent.

From the center of the city to the outer gardens, the operation to withdraw from the Great Disaster had reached its climax. Yorna’s decision to abandon the Demon City had been made known, and the evacuation of a significant portion of the population had been completed.

Just as they had decided, they would then let that which had swallowed the Demon City, the Great Disaster, feel its retribution. —If only there were some mistake about it, and there was no necessity for that.

Yorna: “Is there perhaps, a lingering attachment…”

The Great Disaster suddenly reaching its limit, collapsing, and vanishing beginning from its edges, or a weak point being suddenly exposed, allowing an attack just on that one spot; such convenient miracles would not happen.

They understood it without a hitch. —The Great Disaster, was a calamity that would continue on inexhaustibly.

Were it to go unstopped, it would not cease with the Demon City alone; much, much more would be caught up in its destruction.

To prevent this, they must sacrifice their precious Demon City.

Yorna: “…”

Closing her eyes, for nary a moment, she hesitated, regrets flashing through her mind.

Even in the history of the ability called the Soul Marriage Technique, Yorna’s own was unique.

In essence, the mass of souls that an individual was able to carry made no difference whatsoever, no matter how big the difference between them was. However, Yorna, because of certain circumstances, was in possession of a soul thousands of times more voluminous than others.

It was not a power she desired. If she were up-front about it, she even wished to relinquish it.

It had been useful in getting the position she was currently in, but she had not anticipated that an opportunity in which she was required to make use of it would come knocking. —No, rather, it should be stated that she had avoided thinking about it.

Hence why it had taken her so long to make a decision when the time came.

And that—

Yorna: "—That man."

Having been seen through by him, Yorna looked over her shoulder at the figure of a man wearing an oni mask, watching on in the distance.

Standing in the outer gardens of the Demon City, a place that could no longer escape destruction, the man with his arms crossed did not waver in the slightest. Perhaps his emotionless gaze was because he regarded the sacrifices necessary to halt the Great Disaster as a foregone conclusion?

Even so, the fact that he had stayed there, unmoving, to see the conclusion with his very eyes was perhaps the way of the man to display humanity to Yorna, urging her to make a decision.

Al: "—Hk, that idiot!"

A moment later, as she resolved to give her all to her opponent, the Great Disaster, Yorna's eardrums were struck by the sound of cursing.

Turning towards its origin, then seeing that it had been Al, and following the gaze from behind his mask directed to the Great Disaster, Yorna understood what he was swearing at.

A small body kept bouncing all around the Great Disaster, kicking debris and keeping it in check—Louis's.

Her golden hair dancing, her white attire stained with dirt and dust, her shoulders heaving up and down heavily, her whole body drenched in sweat, the girl continued mounting an assault against the Great Disaster.

Louis's goal was merely one. To find the black-haired boy who had been right where the Great Disaster had sprung—.

Yorna: "That child."

Because she had not found the means to rescue him, Yorna had agonized while coming to this conclusion.

It was equally as painful as abandoning the Demon City, or perhaps even more, bringing pain akin to cutting her body.

Once this plan came to fruition, what would happen to what the Great Disaster had absorbed? Perhaps if that were returned, the black-haired boy would be included.

But Yorna knew that had a pup's chance to happen.

For that reason, she also knew that Louis's dogged struggle would end in futility.

Kafma: "We have to bring that girl back!"

Al: "You gotta be joking! Leave the brat alone! In the first place, she's…"

Kafma: "What about that girl?!"

Al: "She's a… Hk."

Shouting at the sight of Louis bouncing about, Kafma glared at Al. Showered by Kafma's sharp glare, the latter choked on his words, seemingly holding some thoughts on Louis.

Yorna wanted to save Louis. —As long as Louis's desire could not be fulfilled, Yorna wanted to at least save her life.

Perhaps, she would be happier if they died together.

That was what Louis possibly desired from the boy absorbed by the darkness.

Al: "Shit, shitshitshit, for fuck's sake! Why do I gotta worry myself stupid ‘cause of her? I’m gonna resent you, bro!”

Shouting this wildly, Al started running with vigor that did not betray the tone of his voice.

At his destination was Louis, constantly leaping from side-to-side against the Great Disaster. Louis was agile enough to not let that jet-black monster set its sights on herself, however—

Al: “I can see through you!”

Louis: “Uh?!”

Dodging the rain of debris, the aftermath of the shadow’s actions, pouring down on him, Al wrapped around Louis as if he knew how she would move, then snatched the girl’s body in an underarm carry.

With the two as they were, still grappling with each other, the pair narrowly avoided a storm of shadows aimed at them. Al had unbelievably protected the two in a close-cut, just barely escaping the range of the attack.

Louis: “Uu! Uau! Aau!”

Al: “—Go to sleep!”

Louis: “Uhk.”

All the while, Louis struggled about in Al’s arm, trying desperately to reach out in the direction of the Great Disaster. However, Al drove a callous blow with the hilt of the Blue Dragon Sword, and Louis’s head fell, limp.

And with that, Al lifted Louis’s small body, then initiated a sprint, turning his back to the Great Disaster.

Al: “Antenna!”

Kafma: “It’s Kafma Irulux!”

In response to his urgent call, Kafma’s vines unfolded an escape route for the fleeing Al. The Great Disaster intensely pursued Al, attempting to corner him, as he dashed towards the thorny shrubs' path.

However, while they produced a path for Al, the vines also created barriers to the Great Disaster.

Al, carrying Louis, ran across the battlefield in a tremendous combination of offensive and defensive cover fire, then—

Abel: "—Do it, Yorna Mishigure!!"

In a final move, a shout urging for decisive action was raised from behind, and Yorna thrust her hands out in front of herself.

The gesture itself was meaningless. Very much like when the Castle was swallowed. It was merely a gesture for Yorna to make known how much she was willing to sacrifice in order to achieve this.

Yorna: "I, do not love you."

With those few words, unto the Great Disaster that had swallowed the majority of the Demon City of Chaosflame, Yorna's soul exploded. Its potency was certainly as if the very city had crashed down—

The impact of the explosion produced something akin to a blast wave, and a tremendous gale blew the Demon City up.

Rocked by the shockwave, all that composed the Demon City was broken, crushed, obliterated. Amidst all this, the Great Disaster at the nexus of the shockwave was engulfed by the destruction, and was certainly likewise destroyed.

With that, by a single blow unleashed in exchange for the city itself, the Great Disaster was negated—

Abel: "—Was it not enough."

Amidst the unrelenting tempest and the lingering plumes of smoke, the voice of a quiet man echoed.

Realizing that this was the voice of a man who never turned away, even in a situation where nobody could help but face down, Yorna, her body losing strength, held her breath.

It had suffered a blow into which she put her utmost, yet nevertheless, the presence of wriggling darkness remained on the opposite side of the columns of smoke.

It had connected. But it was not sufficient. This end result made her grind her molars.

Yorna: "—Ah."

Before she resolved to take action to paint over her disappointment, Yorna's voice escaped her.

The reason was simple. —Something had acted faster than she did.

However, the inextinguishable embers of the Great Disaster were not that something.

That—

Yorna: "—Tanza?"

Had been the small figure of a deergirl leaping out of the blown-up inn's basement.

5

Utakata: "Uu saw it. Maa stabbed herself, with Taa's hands."

The testimony of Utakata, Mariuli's daughter, the young child who had witnessed the whole affair, was the deciding factor.

Mariuli's body had been pierced by Taritta's dagger, the latter did not even make any attempts to wipe off the blood she was drenched in. To anyone's eyes, this horrifying spectacle would appear as if Taritta had murdered Mariuli.

However, Mariuli's daughter, of all people, disproved this view, annulling Taritta's disgrace.

—Killing their own kin disgraced their soul, forbidding them to return to the same soil as the spirits of their ancestors.

That was which the Shudraq abhorred above all else, the “Disgrace of the Shudraq”.

Utakata’s testimony denied this suspicion. Additionally—

Mizelda: “The way she was stabbed. If Taritta had stabbed her, she would’ve aimed for a spot that wouldn’t have brought suffering. It wasn’t my sister’s doing.”

The way the blade had pierced the body and, even more importantly, the location of the wound.

With just one glance, Mizelda was able to determine that Mariuli had stabbed herself.

The same thing was also noticed by other, more-perceptive-than-average Shudraqians, those among the most perceptive; those who were not, were convinced by Mizelda’s verdict.

They did not conclude that the Chieftain, Mizelda, was trying to cover for her biological younger sister, Taritta.

Rather, it was the opposite. —Only Mizelda had never attempted to defend Taritta. Not because of a lack of sisterly affection, but because Mizelda was a Shudraqian among Shudraqians.

Their strong Shudraq blood was the basis for Mizelda’s judgement.

It was decided that Taritta was not at fault, and that Mariuli, having taken the dagger from the former, had committed suicide using it.

Perhaps in an attempt to escape the agony of her illness, or perhaps to leave her death in her own hands, rather than the demon of ill health’s hand. From the Shudraq’s point of view, the latter option would have been seen in a better light.

But—

Taritta: “I, let Mariuli die……”

It was none other than Taritta herself who did not see it that way.

Taritta had drawn her dagger to shut Mariuli's mouth. To prevent her from speaking words she wished not to hear, to prevent her from leaving any more curses behind.

Without Taritta's imprudence then, Mariuli would not have died in such a manner.

And above all—

Taritta: "—A commandment."

On the verge of death, Mariuli made Taritta listen to the commandment bestowed upon herself.

Until then, Mariuli had never explained the slightest thing about the contents of the commandment to Taritta, although she had told the latter it had been handed down to her. Only on her deathbed did she let Taritta hear it for the first time.

Taritta: "—Great Disaster."

The commandment was to avoid destruction, and that destruction was the Great Disaster, so had Mariuli explained.

The implementation of countermeasures to prevent it, was Mariuli's commandment.

Taritta: "—A traveler, with dark hair, and dark eyes."

Would there truly be a thing such as a traveler who would appear a thousand nights from the present?

How could the death of the traveler stave off destruction large enough to even be called a Great Disaster?

But until the very end, Mariuli had believed in the commandment, in a Stargazer's duty.

Going without fulfilling it wholly made her feel as far as her life had been meaningless.

Taritta: “That it was meaningless…”

That it was absurd, was something Taritta could assert without doubt.

How many times had Mariuli’s words, Mariuli’s kindness, been salvation to her?

Due to her existence, Taritta had been spared from being crushed by the inferiority complex she held towards her own elder sister, worthy of bearing the name Shudraq. Devoid of her support, Taritta would not exist as she did this day.

This too, was Mariuli’s achievement. Taritta would not permit anyone to state that it had been meaningless.

Above all, Mariuli had Utakata, the child she gave birth to after a painful pregnancy.

Taritta: “I won’t let anyone say that all of it was meaningless…”

Biting her teeth with force, she raised her eyes to the night sky.

The sky replete of heavenly stars had not changed. They did not confer Taritta with any of their teachings.

Of course not. The stars spoke naught. Mariuli’s mind was trapped within a delusion.

Even so, even if she had sought salvation in that delusion, even if she had sworn a vow.

Taritta: “These stars or whatever, I wish they would shatter…!”

Simultaneously with directing her hatred towards the night sky, however, Taritta beseeched this.

As Mariuli had whispered, a traveler would come to the forest.

Mariuli’s soul, ruled by despair and regret, would continue to wander, unable to finally join with their ancestor’s spirits.

Without severing that despair and regret, her soul sister would not meet redemption.

What had happened in those final moments, was a secret that the still-young Utakata could not know.

It was a secret that even blood relatives should not meddle with, only soul sisters should.

Taritta: “Surely, my arrow—”

Would shoot the traveler dead, severing Mariuli from her lingering attachments.

For that end, she waited and waited and waited without end for the traveler’s visit, and finally—

—One day, Taritta drew her bow at the sight of her much-awaited traveler.

Subaru: “—Rem!!”

The shot set loose from the bow drawn tight missed its target, and the dark-haired, dark-eyed traveler leapt to the protection of the girl at his side.

Having fixed her aim towards his heart, Taritta’s heart sprung mightily, as she clenched her molars.

After a thousand nights, a black-haired traveler had made their appearance in the forest.

Struck by a shock akin to her heart being frozen over, Taritta nocked an arrow to her bow, and became a hunter.

Calmly, coolly, the tip of the arrow was steadied, aimed at its target.

But her soul was bellowing in fiery applause. Bellowing. Bellowing.

Bellowing, it was bellowing.

—The moment the deergirl jumped out, all sound vanished from the world.

The tremendous shockwave just before that, with the Great Disaster at its center, caused the world to literally shake; the force blowing the very city itself away in a violent explosion holding the energy to stamp out the Great Disaster.

Their entire bodies were engulfed in the violent winds of the shock, it was enough for them to hold the conviction that any existence engulfed in a shockwave thousands, tens of thousands of times more powerful than this one, would be shattered into pieces.

However, overpowering even that conviction, the Great Disaster survived this destruction.

Though it could not be said that to be alive and well, Taritta, having become a bystander, aware that she was shaking as she knelt on one knee, sensed the presence of the Great Disaster having escaped annihilation from beyond the plume of smoke.

Louis, Medium, Al, the people of the city, they were watching this desperate resistance.

Unable to decide how she should be, unable to confront the commandment she had continuously been controlled by, and recollecting Mariuli's face stained with the color of blood, Taritta was unable to move in the face of the Great Disaster.

Everyone carried out their own role, leaving the worthless Taritta behind.

Just as Yorna Mishigure, the ruler of the city, struck a blow at the expense of her beloved city.

Just as the deergirl, seeing that the blow was insufficient, jumped out of her hiding place.

Tanza: "…"

Running fiercely, her right eye alight, was the girl in a kimono, the messenger who had made her appearance at the inn.

At the destination of the girl who had introduced herself as Tanza, was the Great Disaster on the other side of the fluttering plume of smoke. Taritta did not understand just what in the world she was going to do.

However—

Yorna: "—Don't!"

Reprimanding her shaking legs, Taritta understood Tanza's aim and resolve by chance upon hearing Yorna's reaction, screaming towards the back of the girl running past.

Tanza was risking her own life, to challenge the Great Disaster by means of some technique.

Yorna, with a guess as to what she was doing, and because of her love for the girl, tried to stop her.

But to stop the young girl would mean missing a golden opportunity to destroy the Great Disaster, whose movements had been arrested by a single blow with the Demon City as a sacrifice.

Or perhaps, if Yorna, one of the Nine Divine Generals, was so inclined, she may be able to perform the clincher against the Great Disaster, and drive it away in some other fashion.

—But was that really true?

Taritta: "—Hk."

Cursing herself for trying to harbor such wishful thinking, Taritta gasped quietly.

Casting her sight to her surroundings, Taritta longed for the means to change the situation, for a chance to make a move. She even hoped that someone other than herself would take action.

However, the wreckage of the blown debris, and the people who were tossed and scattered by those, had no strength left to deal with this situation. —Only Taritta did.

Only Taritta, who had hesitated to participate in the frantic offensive, trying to weather the passing of the storm, was in possession of options at this point.

And then—

Abel: "—Taritta."

Taritta turned her gaze at the faint call, and saw the figure of a man standing up on a hill.

Abel. Blood flowing from within his oni mask, his dark eyes looked fixedly at Taritta. Rather than utilizing language, he silently pointed his finger towards the heavens.

To look to the sky, was not what he was conveying.

Abel indicated the heavens, or rather, the stars. —Namely, the commandment.

Being told to choose, Taritta was forced to make a decision.

Tarrita: "…"

The bloodstained Mariuli's final moments, and the commandment to kill the dark-haired, dark-eyed traveler were resurrected within her mind.

Were she to execute it, they would escape the Great Disaster. Mariuli's soul would be freed from its shackles.

Consequently—

Taritta: "…"

Taritta quietly, and without hesitation, drew an arrow from her quiver and, putting it on her bow, took aim.

It was a hunting procedure she had repeated thousands upon thousands of times; it transformed Taritta from a frightened, bewildered, and foolish girl who was unable do her job, into a hunter.

If she were told something as high and mighty as to choose a method to save the world with, this would be how she would elect to do it.

All along, Taritta's answer to the proposition of the heavens, to the whispers of the stars, had long since been decided.

In other words—

Taritta: "—I don't even know what sort of thing a commandment is."

The bowstring was released, and the nocked arrow flew furiously through the air, cutting through the wind.

And it did not miss its mark; as it pierced the leg of a tall woman who was about to get up and break into a run.

With a startled cry, the woman fell forward and stumbled over.

Impatience and surprise etched on her white face, the woman reached out her hand in grief, raising her voice.

SETOWI

Even in a world where all sound had vanished, Taritta understood very well that this voice was calling out the name of the girl pushing onwards towards the Great Disaster.

Even so, she had made her choice.

—Disobeying the commandment entrusted to her soul sister, she allowed the young girl to achieve her greatest wish, pushing on to stake her life.

Tanza: "—Yorna-sama."

Kicking off the ground, just before she burst into the opposite side of the cloud of smoke, the girl's lips invoked that name with loving devotion.

And then, her petite body was swallowed up by the Great Disaster that awaited her beyond the wisp of smoke—

—A monumental second shock, an extreme explosion comparable to the Demon City's own, blew the Great Disaster away this time.

Chapter 60:
The Planting of a Tumultuous Seedling

1

Vincent: "—Yorna Mishigure must abdicate the Demon City in an attempt to destroy the Great Disaster. The Soul Marriage Technique might succeed in this, but there is no guarantee."

Tanza: "…Supposing the Demon City were offered, and it's not enough…"

Vincent: "If that does come to pass, the Great Disaster, with no way to stop it, shall threaten to engulf the entire Empire, or perhaps even more, spreading outside its borders. With the Demon City as its epicenter."

Tanza: "…"

Vincent: "…"

Tanza: "Yorna-sama will not approve of giving up this city."

Vincent: "This is not a situation for sentimentality. Regardless of whether you want it or not, the city shall be abandoned. In the first place, it is not up to me to persuade you to do so."

Tanza: "You believe he can convince Yorna-sama?"

Vincent: "If he cannot, everything shall turn to dust. If he must, he shall undertake it. That is the type of person he is, he has maintained that way of being since forever."

Tanza: "…I don't understand. If you know that much, and are so sure about him, what do you want from me?"

Vincent: "You should already be aware of what I intend. You are young, but you are in a position to be utilized plenty by the ruler of the Demon City."

Tanza: “…”

Vincent: “In case the Great Disaster is not destroyed, Yorna Mishigure shall suffer tremendously. The Demon City shall be used against a Great Disaster that has yet to develop fully, but if that does not suffice—”

Tanza: “—I…”

Vincent: “…”

Tanza: “Yorna-sama… For Yorna Mishigure’s sake, the most magnificent among all, a lady akin to a compassionate mother, For that far away love I am to die a martyr’s death, I assume.”

Vincent: “—. It is a grand undertaking.”

Tanza: “I do not need consolation nor compliments. —Except, Yorna-sama’s tears.”

2

Yorna: “—Don’t!”

Tanza ran with Yorna’s voice behind her, the latter reaching out her hand, shouting with a pained expression on her face.

Pitching forward, Tanza nimbly kicked the ground, her right eye blazing red, her young body filled with strength that even heavily-armored Imperial Soldiers would be unable to match.

She was no exceptional fighter, nor did she excel in magic or special techniques.

Still, no one could stop her current self.

The reason for that was that she was aware of being loved by Yorna, more loved than anyone else was.

She supported Yorna by her side, was given affection, spoken to, helped, thought of, prayed for.

To love Yorna, and to be loved by Yorna, were the necessary qualifications to receive the maximum benefits of the Soul Marriage Technique—yet Tanza's love for Yorna was not out of self-interest.

One may perhaps say that love requested naught in return, speaking with a know-it-all look.

However, Tanza believed in that. —She believed that the feeling of loving someone was in itself a reward.

The thought of that person and the beating of their heart was the reward for love.

Then Tanza had to reciprocate it, with all of her little body, in return for what she had received.

That was exactly—

Tanza: "The reason why I was given this life."

The first time Tanza was granted audience with Yorna, having been driven away from someplace else, she was far too young. Concealed behind her kind older sister's back, unable to do anything besides looking up towards Yorna and her dignified conduct.

But, for the first time in her life, she had been promised that she could live her days without being threatened by anyone. Believing in that promise, she had thoughts more than fleeting about spending her days with her older sister.

The second time she was granted audience with Yorna, having had her older sister stolen by horrible things, Tanza snapped at Yorna in desperation; however, Yorna did not reproach her.

On the contrary, she listened sincerely to Tanza's pleas and even helped to avenge her lost sister's death. —Even if she would be stigmatized as a rebel, in return.

Why, should she not love her?

A kind person, who had given so much love and compassion to Tanza priorly.

She wept at the death of Tanza's older sister, regretted being unable to keep her promise, and apologized to Tanza.

—Why, should she not love her?

Tanza: "…"

In front of her, she could observe a horrifying, writhing black mass of stagnation gathering behind a plume of smoke.

The city beloved by Yorna had been destroyed, and yet her stubborn persistence remained unshattered. Tanza was not intimidated by the darkness that made everyone wish to avert their gaze from itself.

If fear was a reason to falter, then that was not what ruled Tanza's heart.

Accordingly, Tanza jumped forward using the debris as footing, pushing headlong into the flickering Great Disaster.

If she turned around, it would become a lingering attachment. She knew it would in turn become a curse.

But—

Yorna: "Tanza—!"

Hearing the one she loved calling out her name, Tanza's gaze was directed behind her back.

There she saw Yorna lying on the ground, reaching out her hand. A single arrow had painfully pierced her leg; she understood that the person wielding a bow far away from her had been the one to perform that deed.

Were it not for that arrow, Yorna would have rushed towards the Great Disaster, towards Tanza.

Tanza was thankful to the arrow's shooter, as she could not have done anything as drastic as that.

And then—

Tanza: “—Yorna-sama.”

Her lips moved.

Whether the words that followed reached Yorna or were inaudible, she would not know.

However, in that moment, just like she did every day before sleeping, every time she woke up had she even the slightest of time, she offered a prayer.

—May you, my beloved, be in good health each and every day.

3

The light blew away everything, white scorching the retinae of all.

As the light faded and the seared eyes gradually regained their capabilities, all beings witnessed the end of the Demon City.

???: “…”

The ground zero of the explosion had caved in, as if a circle had been gouged out, and, at the center of the Demon City, where the Crimson Lapis Castle should have been located, a titanic hole had been opened wide.

It was as if a giant’s arm had dug up the large pit, a literal mark that proved the existence of a fearsome entity that had swallowed up the entirety of the Demon City.

And the Disaster, which had been defied by the forces of concerted battle, had vanished abruptly.

It was the result of the trump card played by Yorna Mishigure, the Mistress of the Demon City, and all those who had participated in the battle knew that the final push had been performed by the little girl who had staked her life.

In other words—

???: “—We were saved by that girl. I am deplorable.”

A man so muttered as he peered into the bottom of the gaping hole, stretching out the vines of thorn he wielded—Kafma Irulux.

There was no falsehood; probably, those words were true, from his heart. As typical of a warrior a cut above the rest, this honest young man who adhered to the philosophy of the Empire reproached himself for having allowed others to correct his own shortcomings.

And making it all the more aggravating, was that a young girl’s life had been spent to cover for that.

Kafma: “Originally, I am at odds with you and your people. Now that things have settled down, I see that the truce should end here, and that we should turn towards that…”

???: “…Then, you’ll fight us?”

Kafma: “—. We should not.”

Looking back at the big hole behind him, Kafma shook his head at the question.

Facing Kafma was Medium, her barbarian sword, too large for her small frame, carried on her back. The query of the battered girl covered in mud was a shining ray of light, even amidst the devastation.

That beautiful beam of light was what Kafma believed necessary to keep things from deteriorating.

At any rate, the end result was that the Demon City of Chaosflame had been destroyed, and no building could be found standing straight. From here, the survivors’ struggle to pull through would commence.

Of course, Kafma’s role as a General of the Empire was to deal with those refugees and with Yorna Mishigure, who would lead them.

Kafma: “Right now, I am travelling as the bodyguard for a very important person. First and foremost, I must give priority to meeting up with said individual. Everything else is trivial at this point."

Medium: "Trivial? Trivial, you say? I think putting it like that is awful!"

Kafma: "N-no, that's not what I meant…"

Receiving an objection for being unscrupulous, Kafma flinched slightly at Medium's barbs. But, a somber voice called out to her just like Kafma, "Lil' Miss Medium", offering him some timely help.

Looking toward them, slowly coming their way, was a one-armed figure—

???: "That's just that guy's own concern. He's saying he's got more important things to do, so he won't fight us. So let's settle it with that, that about right?"

Kafma: "…I cannot say anything myself. I will leave how you interpret that up to you."

???: "Heyhey. Plenty of people like you around; y'know, roundabout like you here, big bro."

Shrugging his shoulders in exasperation, the one-armed man—Al, stood next to Medium. Looking up at him, Medium's eyes widened with an "Ah".

And then, once she pointed at his face.

Medium: "Al-chin, you actually managed to find your helmet?"

Al: "Yeah, somehow. It was lying in the vicinity of where the inn was, so it was a blessing in disguise. I just needed to find it, since I knew it wouldn't break."

Medium: "—? You mean it's tough?"

Al: "Yeahyeah, I mean tough. No one in this world can break it."

As he declared that, Al rapped his fingers on the jet-black helmet he donned. Medium nodded her head with a “Really~?” in reply, but Kafma shot a sharp look at Al.

Noticing the look in his eyes, Al tilted his head, asking “What do you wanna do?”.

Al: “Your opinion’s that you don’t wanna fight us, right? Of course, same goes for us… Or perhaps I should say that we’re all too worn out for that.”

Kafma: “You directed us brilliantly during that battle earlier. Why did you know how the Great Disaster would move?”

Al: “Trade secret. If I don’t tell you that, no truce?”

Kafma: “—. No, I will not retract my statement.”

Shaking his head, Kafma responded to Al’s answer with genuine sincerity. He then dusted off his tattered cloak with his hand, turning his back on both Al and Medium.

He turned to what he had stated was a very important person.

Kafma: “I cooperated with you this time because of these developments. But you and I are enemies… Lest you reconsider, we will see each other on the battlefield. At that time, I will not stay my hand.”

Al: “Even if you didn’t tell us that…”

Medium: “Same goes for us as well…! Thanks for helping us.”

Kafma: “I only did what I was supposed to do as a General of the Empire.”

With these words, Kafma spread his transparent wings across his sturdy back and flew away in one swift movement, the beating of his wings producing a loud noise.

Medium and Al watched his back as he moved away, a cloud of dust and smoke enveloping him as he kicked up dust. As Kafma disappeared from sight, Medium: "…Al-chin, thank you so much. Really, thanks. You saved my life."

Al: "Well, it's a win-win situation. If it weren't for your persistence, that big thing's assault would've been much more lopsided. There would've been a lot more dead people."

Medium: "Dead people…"

Hearing Al's answer, Medium gently lowered her eyes.

Looking at Medium casting her gaze down with a heart-rending expression on her face, Al fiddled with the seams of his helmet's visor with his fingers, and said,

Al: "I know you dunno what I mean, and I know it's not much consolation, but if that kid… If Tanza hadn't done that, we would've been wiped out. For sure."

Medium: "Maybe, you know, we could've tried harder."

Al: "Nah, that way wouldn't have worked out. —Experimenting with that went up in smoke."

The dejected Al's words really made no sense to Medium. However, she would have been lying if she said it was not comforting.

She understood that Al had said something for the sake of consoling Medium. So it was a genuine consolation.

Medium: "Thanks, Al-chin."

Al: "…You're welcome."

The words Al responded with, once again, made no sense to Medium.

4

???: "Have you finished settling your mind on what needs to be done, Yorna Mishigure?"

Yorna: "…Is that, you?"

Piles of rubble, the broken remains of buildings, and an unfathomably large hole had been created in the aftermath of the fierce battle.

While Yorna stood on top of a hill, surveying the spectacle of scars that remained as a result of the Demon City of Chaosflame going to all-out war against the Great Disaster, a man appeared beneath her.

Abel, his face hidden behind an oni mask, inquired as to her feelings in a tone of voice audibly devoid of even a hint of emotion.

Unhurriedly, Abel made his way through the rubble, desiring to see the same scene as Yorna; however, without inserting any emotion into his voice he spoke,

Abel: "What I can offer you is exactly as I wrote in the missive. Let us hear your answer."

Yorna: "Is that really what you should say when looking at this tragic scene?"

Abel: "Will comfort provide shelter, or pity a refuge? You and I both were born amongst the haves, part of those who chose their duty. As such, a second from us is not of equivalent value to a second from others."

Yorna: "…"

To not wish for comfort, nor for sympathy; he was someone who had chosen that way of being.

Understanding that, Yorna held back from rebelling against his attitude. Most importantly, Yorna would gain nothing by antagonizing him here for emotional reasons.

Yorna: "I've already lost too much today."

Abel: "The city, its citizens. It would be a mistake to add the time you took postponing this matter to those."

Yorna: “She was, Tanza.”

Abel: “…”

Yorna: “The beloved child who sacrificed herself to save us at the end… Her name was Tanza.”

With these words, Yorna pulled out the obidome from her kimono and showed it to Abel.

Abel threw her a sidelong glance as she scrubbed it in a circular motion, questioning her intentions mutely. The outer corner of Yorna’s eyes lowered slightly due to that questioning gaze,

Yorna: “This obidome was fashioned from the horns of that girl’s older sister. When mourning over her sister’s corpse, Tanza made it for me… and aside from that…”

Abel: “…”

Yorna: “Both these hairpins and kanzashi are tributes from my beloved children. These are the marks of those children who have been driven away from their homes, those children who have nothing, and gave of themselves to repay me.”

The colorful ornaments, the hairpins, the kanzashi were all tributes from the residents of the Demon City.

Some had removed their scales, some had gathered feathers, some had polished their horns and fangs, only to then offer them to Yorna, their way of life and gratitude giving them form.

To Yorna, they were more valuable than any precious gem and treasure, and for having been given such things, she felt that she had to live up to their love.

And yet—

Yorna: “I cannot afford to make any more mistakes in my promises…”

Abel: “—. Sooner or later, the departed Vincent Vollachia and his group shall begin moving. They shall not make a move here given the situation, but it is only a matter of time. There is no time to spare."

Yorna: "What will you do regarding the place where my children go to?"

Abel: "We shall have no choice but to use the Fortress City as a base at first. Along the way, we shall seize other towns and add them to our banner. With you and the inhabitants of the Demon City, it is possible."

With the loss of the Demon City's faculties, it was necessary to find a place to receive its stranded residents.

Abel's proposal was a forceful, absurd thing that forced the unreasonable upon others. But Yorna had similar priorities. To save those she loved, that was Yorna.

And aside from that—

Yorna: "Are you sure you're truly prepared to fulfill my wish that was in your missive?"

Abel: "I do not intend to speak of it twice. However, you must ponder it over carefully."

Yorna: "Ponder it over…"

Abel: "Which do you prioritize, your long-held wish or your own "love"?"

With Abel, whose emotions were not visible, Yorna could not tell whether his words, or rather what seemed to be his advice, were given out of favorability or unfavorability.

But Yorna, struck by his words, pulled a kiseru from her belt, fixed its crooked tip with her finger, set it alight, and let the purple smoke waft out.

Below, Yorna's loved ones were probing the broken city, gathering their lives, the parts that sustained them, preparing for what would follow.

It was up to Yorna to give them shelter, and be the light to show them the path towards tomorrow.

To give Abel the benefit of the doubt, and drag Vincent Vollachia—no, the fake who acted as him, off the throne, and make him fulfill the promise in his missive.

And on the contents of promises to be fulfilled—

Yorna: "—Shouldn't it be that parents die first, Tanza?"

And so, the beloved child who had decided her own destiny vanished, just like the purple smoke in the fleeting wind.

5

As she observed the purple smoke rising from a distance, she greeted the man in the oni mask as he walked out from underneath it.

The one being received, Abel, gave a small snort at the sight of Taritta standing stock-still there,

Abel: "If you are preoccupied with the leg you shot through, then it is nothing more than just needless worry. The wound has already begun to heal. It shall recover fully by tomorrow."

Taritta: "…I'm glad for that. It's not what I was worried about though."

Abel: "Ho?"

As Abel had stated, no physical discomfort was visible in Yorna's posture as she stood on the hill. Her kimono and disheveled hair, seen from the back, let off a sense of exhaustion, but her right leg, shot through with an arrow, gave off a different aura.

That in and of itself was possibly a benefit of the secret arts she manipulated. However, the result of inflicting the wound was heavier than the wound itself.

Of course, Taritta was well-aware of that weight.

Taritta: "…"

At that last moment, having been entrusted with a choice, Taritta herself had left the decision to an arrow.

If she were to follow Mariuli's commandment as a Stargazer, Taritta should have shot Abel through the heart with that arrow. It was true that this was the most promising possibility among Taritta's options, although it was hard to imagine what sort of causality would lead this to quell the Great Disaster.

But considering that Mariuli, who was so dear to her, had turned into an existence unbeknownst to her, solely obeying the stars, it was a decision not any different to one of cutting one's own life short.

—At the very end, that was the one point that had made Taritta settle on that decision.

Taritta detested the stars that had changed Mariuli. Thus, she did not follow the stars.

Perhaps just following the commandment would have meshed well with Taritta's personality, someone comfortable with being told what to do, with being shown the way, with being at the beck and call of others.

However, the meeting between Taritta and the stars had been a bad one.

If the stars had spoken to Taritta from the beginning instead of Mariuli, Taritta may have lived for the stars. But that was not what had happened.

Therefore—

Taritta: "—At that moment, I pushed the back of that deergirl who ran without hesitation."

As a result, the girl somehow gave birth to the light that would then destroy the Great Disaster from within.

In exchange, the young girl’s life vanished, and the amount of damage done to the land where the Demon City once stood was not negligible. It was possible to declare, however, that she had been able to protect that which she wished to protect.

Abel: “Yet in spite of that, you do not appear so pleased.”

Taritta: “…I was right, wasn’t I? Not following the commandment, and not shooting you.”

Abel: “As if I, in the position of the one not being shot, would tell you that you should have taken the shot. How correct or wrong your decision was, is not in the scope of the things I should speak of either. As clichéd as it may sound, the rightness of your choice can only be proven by your own actions later on.”

Taritta: “…Those words, I don’t think they belong to you.”

Abel: “Correct. From “Iris and the King of Thorns”… A quote from a classic.”

Having spoken of a matter Taritta did not understand, Abel shook his head sideways, stating “You needn’t comprehend it”.

He then surveyed Taritta from top to bottom,

Abel: “You may possess some trepidation even now, but you seem to have gotten over it to some extent. Now, what shall you do?”

Taritta: “I don’t know for sure. I just want to go back to that city and have a conversation with my sister and my people. I would like to talk to the daughter of my already-late soul sister.”

Abel: “A soul sister, which left a commandment to you, huh… That clarification as to why you yourself are not a Stargazer does make sense now. An increasingly abominable bunch.”

Taritta: “Abominable…”

Abel: “You are not who I was speaking of. I understand your general plan.”

Abel turned his head around in response to Taritta’s mutterings.

A large number of people marched into the streets that had become ruins, gathering household goods that had escaped damage, as well as materials that could be used for some purpose, and began prioritizing what was needed in order to stay alive.

Taritta was struck by the resilience of the way of life held by those from the Demon City.

Recalling the origins of the Demon City, they were probably accustomed to being persecuted, oppressed, and losing. Even taking that into account, that was.

However—

Taritta: “Those people, are you going to drag them into your fight?”

Abel: “Indeed.”

Involuntarily, Taritta felt daunted due to that short, definitive answer.

There was no hesitation; Abel observed the people trying their best in the devastated land, yet stayed consistent with his original purpose in coming to Chaosflame, putting his heels together with a noise.

Then—

???: “—Though Abel-chan’s opinion might be right, I wonder if the people around him are gonna obey so quietly. Even the foxbabe might have a hard time being on our side emotionally, right?”

While expressing a reasonable opinion, Al joined Abel and Taritta.

He had been out of sight for some time, but judging from the way he had set his familiar helmet back on his head and languidly walked toward them, it seemed that something aside from his normal size had been recovered.

At Al's side was Medium, who looked up at Abel with her round blue eyes,

Medium: "I feel the same way as Al-chin. I'd be happy if Yorna-chan was on our side, but after what happened with Tanza-chan and the city, I'm not sure she would want to be a part of this…"

Abel: "Are you saying that Yorna Mishigure shall not follow us, those who have brought along the existence at the center of the catastrophe? That idea is an overly sentimental one. She has already made up her mind."

Medium: "Really? Abel-chin, you didn't tell her something awful again?"

Abel: "Regardless of how heartless they are, I shall say what needs to be done. My intentions are clear."

Medium's cheeks puffed up at Abel's refusal to deny the question she had posed.

In fact, from what Taritta's ears had picked up, the exchange between Abel and Yorna had not been emotional, but it was far from being gentle, calm, and cuddly.

Still, the reason why Abel did not doubt Yorna's intentions like he did was because,

Al: "You're prepared to take advantage of Miss Yorna's weakness… After all, if she doesn't walk the same path as us, she can't protect the city's residents who've got nowhere else to go, right?"

Medium: "Good gracious…! Again with your heartless words, Abel-chin."

Abel: "What other choice do they possess? The only other option remaining for them is to stick with their meaningless obstinacy and die a dog's death."

Medium: "There's no other way, but there's another way to say it! Why don't you get that!"

Abel directed a frigid gaze towards Medium through his oni mask, the latter pressing him for an answer by raising her voice.

Taritta was fairly certain that Abel would make a callous judgement regarding Medium's complaints, but her emotions were close to Medium's.

However, as long as he followed the Covenant between the Emperor of the past and the People of Shudraq, Taritta was unable to abandon Abel and cut off their relationship.

The likes of allies by sentiment, held no significance on a very real battlefield.

Al: "You're right to be angry, Lil' Miss Medium. However, I personally don't dislike Abel's idea of using whatever he can. I wouldn't have any objection if Lil' Miss Yorna came with us just for utilitarian purposes."

Medium: "I'm telling you, I've got many objections with it. I hate you too, Al-chin!"

Al: "There's a pain in my heart from hearing that Lil' Miss Medium hates me. That aside…"

Cutting off his sentence there, while keeping Medium, who was glaring at Abel and himself, at bay, Al cast his gaze around, turning his attention toward the large hole in the center of the demolished area.

Once that movement captured Taritta and the others' attention, and, turning to it as well, he voiced,

Al: "Let's talk about one of ours. —About bro."

Everyone: "…"

As Al broached the topic, the parched air grew tenser ever so slightly.

It was a topic that they all knew must be talked about, but at the same time, it was a topic that they were all feeling a bit uncomfortable about, wondering what to say.

At any rate—

Medium: “Subaru-chin, where have you gone…?”

Medium’s somber muttering spoke of a damage of smaller proportions wrought by the Great Disaster.

Compared to the fact that one of the larger cities the Empire took pride in had completely disappeared, and the fact that the lives of two Emperors had been endangered, that damage could perhaps be said to be quite trivial.

However, for the group that came to the Demon City, it was damage that could not be overlooked.

Medium: “Yorna-chan said that the shadows overflowed from Subaru-chin.”

Al: “Old Man Olbart said that as well. He was smiling even though his right hand was gone. As someone with a long history of having one arm, it was unbelievable.”

Taritta: “The old man’s attitude, you mean? Or was it what he said?”

Al: “It’s frustrating, but here, it’s the attitude. As to what he was saying, I’m certain it’s true.”

With a click of his tongue, Al said that he trusted Olbart’s testimony.

Taritta also did not have a good impression of the monstrous old man, but it was also true that he had no reason to lie. As long as what he had stated matched up with what Yorna said, it was probably true.

Suddenly, what came to Taritta’s mind was the memory of Mariuli’s last will and testament, “A traveler, with dark hair, and dark eyes”.

Upon first sighting Subaru in the forest and aiming for his life, there had been no doubt in her mind about him. Later, once she learned of Abel's existence and identity, him being trapped in the village, she believed that she had misjudged her opponent without a doubt, but—

Taritta: "What if…"

What if it had been Subaru, and not Abel, the one responsible for the Great Disaster foreseen by Mariuli as the Stargazer?

That could be why the Great Disaster had overflowed with Subaru at the center.

Such doubts kept nagging at Taritta's heart.

Abel: "There is one thing we must unify our views on."

Taritta's anguish was put aside as Abel held up a finger at the center of the group.

Having caught their attention, Abel surveyed the faces of Medium, Al, and Taritta respectively, then declared,

Abel: "From your way of speaking, that thing's… Natsuki Subaru's survival is not something you hold doubts on. Do you believe in earnest that he survived that wretched scene?"

Medium: "—Hk, of course! Him dying's something…"

Abel: "Do not say anything such as not wanting to think about it. Even if it is difficult for you to accept, things that are meant to happen shall happen. The life and death of others walks a fine line."

Medium: "Abel-chin…"

Abel's matter-of-fact tone clashed head-on with Medium's emotional insistence.

As for Taritta, her sentiments here, too, leaned towards Medium. But she was not hopeful that Subaru could have survived, as he had been at the heart of this catastrophe.

Perhaps, it was because her daily life was spent hunting, coming into contact with the life and death of living beings.

The People of Shudraq were brave warriors, but even routine hunts were deadly. Sometimes, beasts would fight back in their death throes, and her companions would lose their lives.

People died. Easily. Whether those people were important or not made zero difference.

Taritta: “Unfortunately, Subaru…”

Al: “Bro’s alive.”

Medium: “—Al-chin!”

Shaking her head, Taritta tried to express her condolences. But her statement was interrupted by Al’s words full of conviction; hearing them made Medium’s face light up.

Naturally, Abel turned his eyes, which seemed to be in a foul mood, towards Al,

Abel: “Clown, how can you be so sure of his survival?”

Al: “Plain and simple, it’s ‘cause Natsuki Subaru’s that kinda guy. Or rather…”

Abel: “Rather?”

Al: “The world hasn’t been destroyed. That’s my basis.”

Taritta could not fully stomach the rationale and the logic that Al laid out. It seemed the same went for Medium, who also tilted her head with a look of incomprehension.

Abel too, cut him down in one go, telling him to “Quit being a fool” verbatim,

Abel: “I do not possess the leisure to listen to your nonsense. If you wish to be a clown, do it around Priscilla.”

Al: “I’d love to do just that, but unfortunately the Princess ain’t here. Speaking of that unfortunate fact, I’d like to ask the same of you, Abel-chan.”

Abel: “What is it.”

Al: “What do you think, Abel-chan? Do you believe bro’s dead?”

Touching the chin of his helmet, Al inquired Abel as to the latter’s thoughts. His opinion, however, seemed to be set in stone. He was the one who had originally started the questioning in such a tone, questioning their sanity for believing Subaru was still alive.

Naturally, for him, the belief that Subaru, who had been within the Great Disaster, had survived—.

Abel: “—Since that was not the Great Disaster, a role for him to fulfill remains. If he possesses the ability for that purpose, it would be premature to assume he is dead.”

Taritta: “Huh…”

Medium: “Abel-chin?!”

But what Abel actually declared was the opposite of what Taritta had expected.

The answer made Taritta become speechless, and even Medium, who should have obtained the answer she was looking for, rounded her eyes in surprise.

However, Abel, not meeting the gazes of Taritta and the others, turned his body immediately after, and slowly walked away from that place.

Glancing at each other’s faces, Taritta and Medium then followed him. Al followed the backs of those three as well, leaning his head in befuddlement.

Medium: “Abel! What do you mean, explain already?!”

Abel: “What is it you need an explanation for?”

Medium: “Everything! You were talking like Subaru-chin was dead until just a moment ago, that’s why.”

Abel: “I just said that, if you believe he survived, you need to present me with an argument other than an emotional one. I do believe he has a reason for surviving. That is why I think he survived. End of story.”

Medium: “~~Hk!”

Abel’s answer bereft of kindness made Medium go red in the face, and express her dissatisfaction. That, too, bore no effect at all on Abel; he did not even glance back.

Abel’s feet, with the three of them in tow, finally stopped after walking for a while. They did so right in front of the gargantuan hole made by the now-scattered Great Disaster, where the Demon City once stood.

And there—

???: “Uau…”

There, crouched at the edge of the hole, was a small girl—Louis, hanging down her head.

Her white clothes were completely stained with mud, and she was feebly shoveling soil with her bare hands. Her hands were filthy from the dirt, but it was also noticeable that they had been stained red due to the bleeding of her broken fingernails.

Medium: “Louis-chan…!”

In a panic, Medium rushed up to Louis and embraced the girl from behind; even with Medium’s embrace, Louis’s hands still would not stop.

Pawing away at the ground, or pushing aside debris, the girl kept searching for something. —No, not something.

Taritta: “She’s looking for Subaru…”

Al: “For better or for worse, I guess… Tch, it doesn’t leave a good taste.”

As they watched the back of the petite Louis, Taritta and Al each exhaled their own thoughts.

Unbeknownst to Taritta, Al’s attitude toward Louis had become terribly irritated. However, Al had been the one to protect Louis from the final strike, the one that blew away the Great Disaster. So Taritta could not quite decipher the relationship between the two in that regard.

Prodding into it now probably would not make anyone happy. She had a vague idea, but Taritta acted as she had not listened to the topic that had been delved into.

Abel: “Stop it already. Digging through the dirt and looking underneath the rubble shan’t help you find what you are looking for.”

Louis: “U… Aau!”

As Louis was hugged by Medium, Abel stood behind her. Turning her head to see the gaze of the oni mask directed at her, Louis made a face that was not quite one of anger, nor one of sorrow.

It seemed to be both condemning Abel and appealing for him to not stop her.

Abel did not care if it was the former, and even if it were the latter, it would reach deaf ears. So, he cocked his chin in the direction of the large pit to Louis’s side—

Abel: “Discovering him shall require much effort of you. At the very least, he will not emerge even if you paddle through the dirt alone. —Furthermore, you are not even aware of where he was blown off to.”

Louis: “Au! Aau! Uauua!”

Abel: “You may search like the simpleton you are, but you shall never find him. You would do good to recognize that.”

Louis: “Uu! Uuuu!”

Abel’s cold-blooded words caused Louis to turn red and open her mouth in vehement protest.

From her vigor and look of anger, it was evident that she would never give up looking for Subaru, and that she was keen that she would find him without fail.

And then—

Medium: “Abel-chin, is there a way to find Subaru-chin?”

Louis: “Uh, uh?”

Medium: “The way you just said it, about how Louis-chan can’t find Subaru-chin alone. Do you have a better method in mind? Or doesn’t it exist? Do you have one?”

While Medium posed a question to Abel, looking into his eyes, Louis grew more excited as Medium embraced her. As Louis’s vigor subsisted because of Medium’s words, Abel shut one eye, and,

Abel: “You are not very perceptive, but you have good instincts, don’t you? You and your brother are like two peas in a pod.”

Medium: “Of course, because big bro and I are brother and sister. More importantly, answer me properly! Is there a way to find Subaru-chin? Is there? Is there?!”

Expectations swelled, and Medium threw out the same question over and over. Sighing at Medium pitching forward, Abel paused for a beat, then added,

Abel: “It is not anything as proper as a search method. The original aim would not be to find someone who has disappeared, but to secure a pretext to stir trouble in the Imperial Capital.”

Medium: “Make it easier to understand!”

Abel: “…If that plan works, you and this girl’s wish may come true. After all, the whole Empire shall search high and low for that one person.”

Taritta: “The entire Empire, looking for Subaru… you say?”

Picking up on an intriguing part of Abel’s words, Taritta’s eyebrows frowned.

Like Medium, Taritta was not the most perceptive of people. The only difference was that Medium would say out loud that she did not understand what she did not understand, while Taritta would keep it to herself.

In any case, Abel’s explanation, which he had attempted voicing in an easy-to-understand manner, was not quite grasped by Taritta due to her lack of knowledge beforehand.

However—

Louis: “—Uau, auau?”

The intent behind those words had been only conveyed with certainty to the one whom it had been addressed to.

Louis, who had been on the verge of a violent outburst, relaxed in Medium’s arms; and, staring at a motionless Abel, she cast a question without the use of language.

In response, Abel nodded, voicing “Of course”. Although, he probably did not know its exact meaning.

Al: “So what are we gonna do? How can we implement this plan to find bro?”

Abel: “Nothing so difficult, just spread the word.”

Medium: “…”

Abel responded to Al’s question, and Medium glared sharply at him again. Then, Abel sighed, as if anticipating the hounding that would follow from Medium, and resumed.

Resumed with—

Abel: “—That Vincent Vollachia’s illegitimate son, a black-haired, black-eyed abomination, is seeking his father’s position. Precisely like a reenactment of “Magrizza’s Guillotine”.”

6

—On the same day, at the same time, in a certain place.

???: “—Hk.”

They forcibly pushed their soaking wet body up, pulling themselves nearer to ground, to which their fingers were just barely clinging to. There would be no returning if they were to let go of this feeling, even for a moment.

This person was literally in a struggle to the death—no, more like, in a struggle for their life.

The pitch-black water, which offered no refuge, sapped away their body temperature and stamina something fierce, so many times making them feel like they would breathe their last. They were unable to distinguish whether this was a dream or reality.

They felt as if they had been bitten over and over again by a large fish lurking beneath the water. They felt like they had drowned, all the while tasting blood, the inside of their lungs being filled with acrid water, unable to breathe. There mayhave been some times in which they had passed out from a hypothermia or lack of stamina, their life being snuffed out amidst sleep.

And so, while repeating that, piling that up, floundering, like so, finally they—

???: “Bah, bwaaah…”

They forced their body up onto the shore while coughing out water they had swallowed. This was tough, anguishing, and heavy. From the bottom of their heart, they wished that they could utilize both of their hands to make things easier. However, they could not do so.

Opposite to their right hand, which had clasped the shore, wrapped around their left arm, there was something which they could never let go of.

They had failed over and over before they had understood its identity. They had ended up letting go.

However, once they understood what it was, they absolutely could never release it. And so they had piled up so, so many mistakes; and yet, they had not given up—

???: "…"

Before they did so to themselves, they pushed the one wrapped around their left arm up onto the shore.

Though small in size, they were still heavy. The fact that the one doing the carrying was not in perfect condition, and that neither of them were dressed for swimming, was unfortunate.

Even more so regarding her, since she was wearing a kimono, and those had more cloth to them than normal clothing. Meaning, it would soak up more water.

They hoped she would forgive them for removing some of her kimono enroute, to make her lighter.

Something had also sharply dug into their flank and nape upon pulling her towards themselves. The reason for that, had been the splendid antlers sprouting from her head. —With this pain, they would prefer that she would interpret this as putting the two of them even.

All that was left was—

???: "Uh, guh…!"

They pushed the girl up to the shore, and now all that remained was to muster the last of their strength, and get themselves onto the coast as well.

However, perhaps because the thread of tension was cut once the girl had been put on the waterfront, they were incapable of procuring that last strength to muster, and their hands only clawed fruitlessly at dry land.

Their wavering head and the ringing in their ears chided them, conveying to them that they could not remain as they were.

It was the omen of their consciousness fading. And losing their consciousness here, meant death.

If the tension were cut, and their willpower to accomplish anything were severed, they would be stuck repeating dream and reality to obtain this luck once again.

Anything but that, they thought, struggling in earnest more, and more, and more, as to revive their consciousness.

Their consciousness, grew faint. Eventually, their hand let go of the shore—

???: "—Oops, careful."

At that moment, as they loosened their hold on the shore, and once again sunk into the water, someone held onto that hand.

Firm, slender fingers gripped their wrist, pulling their plummeting body up onto the coast. Their face rose from within the water as they gasped for air, and right before losing consciousness, they looked at the other person.

Just who was it that had caught their hand, however—

???: "Nah, let's not have that. You're on the verge of losing consciousness at any moment, right? That'd be a tad shoddy if so. Having gotten this chance, I'd rather kick things off in a more dramatic fashion."

Of all things, the hand opposite to the one holding onto them came to cover their eyes as they attempted to get a look at the other. What they observed, was no more than the wrinkles of the other person's palm.

The hand of an unknown someone with palm lines that were unusually long.

With that as the last thing they saw, their consciousness, faded away—

???: “However, nice job swimming all the way here! Really, such a strange coincidence, walking wherever the wind took me got me here! My my my my, real nice, isn’t it?!”

Caught by their fading consciousness, that cheerful voice accompanied them all the way until its end.

That voice, almost akin to a high-spirited thunderclap.

???: “—Don’t you just get the feeling that a grand tale’s gonna begin?”

With that unanswerable question, their consciousness—Natsuki Subaru’s consciousness, was lost without answering.

Chapter 54B: Covering the Blue Sky

1

—The piercing blue sky cast a majestic gaze down on the activities of the people beneath.

Brilliantly twinkling white sun, big white clouds flowing slowly.

A lukewarm breeze caressed their neck and ruffled their pale blue hair, as they breathed deeply and quietly.

Feeling the world with their entire body, realizing that they were part of it.

It was a quite pretentious phrase, and it felt as if someone had spoken an exceedingly difficult thing. However, having been told that this was what was required of them at the moment, they put it in practice first, and cast doubt on it later.

They had requested to be taught on their own volition, to boot. These were still the early days as well. Their temperament was not so short as to make them resign from those lessons.

Although—

???: "…I cannot lie about my impatience."

Gently placing their hand on their own chest, they awaited the inhaled air to exert its power within the lungs.

They could not quite tell whether this feeling would nurture them from inside. It was frustrating, and it made them feel hateful of their own petty nature to seek instant gratification.

—No, maybe it was not that it was in their nature to desire immediate results, but the reason was rather the situation they were placed in.

Not their own, but that of someone not present, who was endeavoring to fulfill their role elsewhere—

???: "—Ah! There you are!"

And then, a voice called out behind them to their quiet meditating backs, reminding them of the breath they had been holding. As they exhaled the air that had built up in their chest, they looked back, seeing a small figure running up to them.

It was a young boy with fluffy, pink hair. He was such a precarious child with a lovely face, cherry-red cheeks, and dazzling white bare legs in short trousers.

The boy, who looked about eleven or twelve years old, smiled as he made his approach.

Boy: "Priscilla-sama wants to see you! I would like you to come with me!"

???: "I understand. Thank you very much for taking the trouble, Schult-san."

Schult: "Absolutely not! This was not something that would merit such gratitude."

Carrying himself modestly, his cheeks being dyed by delight, the corners of the boy's—of Schult's mouth slackened due to the circumstances.

But the matter he had brought along was an errand. The two could not just keep talking and smiling with that in mind.

On that note, he tensed his relaxed cheeks and nodded with a small exhale, and then—

???: "So, shall we go together?"

Schult: "Yes, of course! I will join you, Rem-san!"

Bouncing up and down, Schult saluted them with a hand to his head, and the girl—Rem, somewhat surprised by Schult's vigor, nodded, and the two of them headed towards the one who had beckoned her.

Towards Priscilla Barielle, Rem’s provisional master in the Fortress City of Guaral.

2

The fall of the Fortress City of Guaral—About ten days had passed since that terribly absurd operation had been carried out, resulting in the capture of the city with minimal human casualties.

Fortunately, there was little chaos in the city, much thanks to the ability of Zikr Osman, commander of the Imperial Soldiers, and the leadership of Mizelda, whose influence did not diminish even after handing over the role of Chieftain to her sister.

The presence of those two exercised authority on those endowed with military might, preventing disorder and tragedy from occurring beforehand.

Of course, not only those able to fight were present in the city.

Rather, the overwhelming majority of those present would be the townspeople, who were divorced from any martial matters. However, even if they did not fight for a living, Guaral’s townspeople were still very much in the thick of the action.

Initially, reports of strong contempt for Zikr and the Imperial Soldiers had been rife, as they had been deprived of real authority after the City Hall had been taken over with little to no fight.

However, such complaints by the townspeople were soon drowned out.

That was because—

Priscilla: “It is the custom of the Empire to follow the strong. It should have been obvious to everyone that my actions were more righteous than those of people who only parlor.”

Rem: “That’s…”

Priscilla: “Those are the words of those unworthy of being heard, or perhaps of those who bow their head, bearing the tempest, crying aloud when the wind ceases, demanding that their abodes be repaired. Is the word of such a person worth anything?”

Rem: “No matter how you slice it, that sort of extreme is unfair in my opinion.”

It was not merely a simple standpoint, but a way of speaking of someone that looked down at another party from a higher position. In response to this way of sealing off one’s escape route, Rem calmly retorted in response.

There was a pause before her answer, and then arrived a slight scoff,

Priscilla: “You insult me as a coward? I see, you are quite daring, Rem.”

Rem: “It would be reckless if my life were at stake. But Priscilla-san isn’t someone that short-tempered.”

Priscilla: “You dare measure me by your own standards?”

Rem: “Because I don’t have anything else to measure others with, for starters.”

Crimson eyes stared her down, yet Rem steadfastly refuted it.

For Rem, who had lost her memories and had no real past, every thing she saw was new, every action she took was an unknown experience.

To dread something that may incur Priscilla’s displeasure as a result, would mean being unable to take a step forward. What was certain to her current self, whose existence had begun approximately twenty days prior—was that, for these last few days, Rem had been able to spend time with the woman in front of her without losing spirit.

Therefore—

Priscilla: “Hmph, what a petulant thing to say. What an uncute girl.”

Stating so, she buried the hatchet, not betraying Rem’s expectations.

Albeit Priscilla operated in absurd ways for reasons beyond Rem’s understanding occasionally, her impression of Priscilla was basically that she was a rational woman who kept her boisterous remarks to herself.

Priscilla sat upon a luxurious chair, resting her chin upon her hand, with a book open in her lap. She appeared quite picturesque, behaving as if she were the master of this palace, or perhaps mansion, albeit this was only a temporary abode.

Priscilla, currently sojourning in the Fortress City, had seized the largest mansion in the city, leisurely spending her days there. The mansion was, barring the City Hall, the largest building in the city; a luxurious waste of space that could accommodate twenty to thirty people.

Of course, there had been some protest from the original owners of the mansion regarding the seizure, but it was settled in the way of the Empire—the way of barbarism, accompanied by some shedding of blood.

In other words, for each side to force the acceptance of their claim, the use of force—

Rem: “…”

Quickly, Rem directed her gaze to one corner of the room.

In the room where Priscilla had summoned and gathered those in a position of servant, another person aside from Rem and the smiling Schult was present as well.

This man was the one who had brandished a sword in the “duel” over the management of the mansion.

Rem: “Heinkel-san.”

Heinkel: "…What."

Rem: "No, it seemed like you were looking at me in some kind of meaningful way, so I thought something was wrong."

The man who responded to Rem's call in a low voice made a sullen face due to the repeated questions. With that, he scratched his own red hair wildly,

Heinkel: "It's no big deal. I was simply stunned that you were such a reckless girl, talking to Miss Priscilla like that."

Rem: "After being called daring, I am now reckless, is that so? But that really isn't the case…"

Heinkel: "It just looked that way to me. Don't be petty about it."

With a small click of his tongue, the man waved his hand, scratching his head at Rem's answer.

The man with fiery red hair, a well-built, tall figure, and looks whose innate manliness became spoiled by his stubble, was a man named Heinkel, one of Priscilla's subordinates.

After Priscilla had arbitrarily decided to remain in the Fortress City of Guaral, Heinkel and Schult flew in from their original headquarters. Together with the man in the helmet—with Al, they made up Priscilla's followers.

Schult: "Of course, Rem-sama's also one of us now!"

Heinkel: "Don't decide that on your own whim, pipsqueak. This woman is friends with one of Miss Priscilla's enemies. Not only is she not on our side, but she's also a potential enemy."

Schult: "Ehhh?! Rem-sama, you were our enemy?!"

Rem: "Ehhm, that's on hold."

His perfectly round eyes widening in surprise, Rem responded to a panicking Schult raising a commotion.

Heinkel's way of putting things was extreme, but that Rem's position was complicated was something that could not be denied. Rem, having lost her memories, lacked the awareness and the information to confirm her affiliation.

Of course, that which contributed most to establishing Rem's tenuous standing was—

Rem: "…Him."

She knew that that black-haired boy's presence—Natsuki Subaru's presence, someone who had left the Fortress City to fulfill his appointed role, was something that brought certainty to Rem's vague position.

However, Rem's feelings were that she could not lend an ear to his words, nor accept them so meekly.

The reason as to why Rem could not accept his actions and words, was the horrific Miasma that surrounded Subaru's entire body—No, right now, that was not the sole reason.

The Miasma certainly did hinder Rem from taking Subaru at face-value, but she had already recognized that there was nothing deceptive or malicious in neither his words nor his deeds.

The reason for not accepting him so docilely, was that Rem's own foundation was unstable.

Who she was and what kind of relationship she had with Natsuki Subaru and the others, she wondered.

If she were unable to face it, Rem's frozen time and halted feet could not move forward.

Although Rem wanted to face Subaru in order to solidify her existence, in order to face Subaru, she had to solidify her own existence.

It was already a dilemma, akin to being lost in a maze with no way out.

Priscilla: “You appear to be experiencing plenty of turmoil. The crease between your eyebrows is clear evidence of that.”

Rem: “That… is true. I’m trying to put Priscilla-san’s advice into practice, but…”

Priscilla: “What is it?”

Rem: “Priscilla-san’s conversations are always so difficult to understand.”

Her eyes cast downwards, a Rem bearing shame explained that she herself was the reason for her own ignorance.

Speaking in riddles, Priscilla’s choice of words was esoteric and difficult to understand. More importantly, Priscilla was quick-witted, and on top of that, she rarely held any consideration for others.

The nature she possessed pretty much resembled that held by Abel—Or perhaps it should be rephrased as them having the same nature, rather than them being similar. Perhaps both Priscilla and Abel would be displeased if this were to be mentioned, so Rem would not bother bringing it up.

Heinkel: “Advice? What are you talking about, advice? Miss Priscilla advises this woman?”

Schult: “Yes, Heinkel-sama. I am aware of it! Rem-sama is studying with Priscilla-sama! And she takes care of Priscilla’s personal needs, just like me!”

Heinkel: “Oi, oioioi, are you out of your mind, Miss Priscilla? What’s in it for us? You’re just helping our enemies grow.”

Heinkel, who had not been told the details of the situation, was left blindsided upon learning of the Contract between Rem and Priscilla.

Striding up to Priscilla on the podium and pointing to Rem, he then opened his mouth,

Heinkel: “I thought you were just keeping them close to you as a lackey… So that they could give out information on their Camp. Going out of your way entirely to simply be in an unfavorable position, there's a limit to games…"

Priscilla: "Silence, simpleton. Do you intend to order me around?"

Heinkel: "Guh…"

Priscilla: "I have dealt you a number of painful blows, but you are a man who never learns, are you not? My hands are not free to beat you. Because their task is to turn the page of this book."

Tracing the cover of the book on her lap, Priscilla announced that to Heinkel with a glare.

There was no specific anger in Priscilla's voice, but Heinkel gasped in reaction, as if he had been confronted with a sword, taking a step or two backward.

Rem felt that Heinkel's fear was too exaggerated.

Of course, she had witnessed Priscilla's prowess and swordsmanship defeat one of the Empire's mightiest warriors, one of the Nine Divine Generals, with her very own eyes. Even ignoring that fact, Rem felt on her very skin that Priscilla was a woman of unparalleled power.

However—

Rem: "I don't think Heinkel-san is that far below her, though…"

But Rem needed to preface, that this was just from her point of view.

However, during the seizure of this mansion, with a swordsman representing the owner of the mansion as his opponent, Heinkel had triumphed without dispossessing him of his life by snatching away his sword before he could do anything about it.

His pure fighting spirit, and his superior swordsmanship, were such that even if the Imperial Soldiers in the area were to gang up on him, they would be no match to him.

Nevertheless, Heinkel's fear seemed to be the pinnacle of overreaction.

That said, Rem was an amateur, even at being "herself". The strong may have a way of looking at things in the world that was impossible for Rem to grasp.

Anyway—

Priscilla: "Setting my eyes on this girl is merely a whim. But it was also on my whim that I picked up Schult starving to death in a barren land, and that I summoned you when bloodied from your fruitless efforts."

Schult: "Yes! I was saved thanks to Priscilla-sama's good mood! I was very lucky!"

Heinkel: "Are you really fine with that…?"

Rapping her finger on the cover of the book, Priscilla declared that it all was dependent on her mood. Rem was overwhelmed, almost in shock because of those words, while Schult happily boasted of his good fortune.

Heinkel, too, seemed to be spared from the fear he'd had until then, but some wariness yet lingered in his eyes as he looked toward Rem.

Perhaps he was the one with the most straightforward view of things.

Rem: "So, Priscilla-san, what is your reason for calling all of us?"

Priscilla: "Hmm."

Rem: "If it's just about looking after your person, why not just me or Schult-san? There's no reason I can think of for Heinkel-san being here as well."

In terms of division of responsibilities, Rem and Schult were plenty capable of sharing the care of Priscilla's daily life at the mansion. Rem had become quite accustomed to living with a cane and simple household chores were of no worry to her.

Perhaps, she did something such as partaking in these duties before.

Since the work was divided in such a way, there was no reason for Heinkel being there.

If she were to go even further—

Rem: “What exactly does Heinkel-san do… I only see him swinging his sword, drinking, or playing with Schult-san.”

Heinkel: “…I’m telling you, I don’t remember playing with that pipsqueak.”

Schult: “That is correct! Heinkel-sama often takes care of me, but it is me who has been approaching him because I want to! Heinkel-sama always seems to be lonely when he is alone, so I thought I would make sure he does not get lonely…”

Rem: “Oh, I see, Schult-san is very kind.”

Schult: “Hehehe.”

The question that had arisen in her mind was resolved, and Rem gently stroked Schult’s curly-haired head. There was a strange charm about Schult that made Rem want to pet him like this.

Of those within the city, Rem also wanted to pet Utakata, who would come by every now and then.

Perhaps, she simply wanted to dote on younger people though.

Heinkel: “Eh, shit, I can’t keep up with you. Miss Priscilla! Just answer the question now. If you don’t need me, I’ll be at the tavern…”

Priscilla: “—It is about time for those who have left this city to arrive at the Demon City.”

Heinkel: “Ah…”

Priscilla: “If circumstances were to change, the likelihood that this opportunity would be made the most of is high. Do not lower your guard.”

The humidity in the air changed as Priscilla spoke this, resting her cheek upon her hand on the armrest.

The parched, stale air was a sign that attention had been correctly applied to Priscilla’s words; Heinkel’s expression sharpened, and Rem felt as if she had been prodded in the chest.

Only Schult, Rem’s hand on his head still, had shown appreciation for the group who had embarked on a long journey, saying, “Al-sama, thank you for your efforts~”.

Rem: “…”

If circumstances were to change, was what Priscilla had prefaced her statement with. But at least for Subaru and the others who had departed, it would bring about definite changes, both good and bad.

Negotiating with the only potential ally—this negotiation would certainly determine Abel’s decisions from henceforth.

Heinkel: “This whole thing about, this opportunity being made the most of… Miss Priscilla, is there something particular that you noticed?”

Priscilla: “No, it is nothing so concrete. It is merely a rule of thumb of mine.”

Heinkel: “Rule of thumb, is it? What is that supposed to…”

Priscilla: “When great things move, they move all at once, as if the quietness that had prevailed up to that point were a lie. It is as if by design, all at once, akin to lined-up building blocks falling down in a row.”

There was a kind of ineffable compelling force in Priscilla’s indifferent manner of speaking.

Ultimately, it was a singular point about not letting one’s guard down, yet Rem took a deep breath and looked down to regard her feet again. If she were to get hung up about Subaru and the others so much as to neglect what was close to her, that would be like putting cart before the Galewind Horse.

To begin with, putting something such as getting hung up over Subaru into words yet again made her realize just how unpleasant the situation was.

Rem: “Whether he’s around or not, he’s a troublesome person…”

Schult: “Rem-sama? Is everything fine? Your face is somewhat red.”

Rem: “It’s okay. Something was just surging within me. I was seething, angry.”

Schult: “It is not good to be angry! Rem-sama looks wonderful when she is smiling~!”

The corners of Rem’s eyes lowered due to Schult flapping his limbs and raising a potent appeal. Heinkel’s face, on the other hand, became serious after Priscilla’s admonishment,

Heinkel: “Miss Priscilla, if that’s all you want to talk about, then I’m going.”

Priscilla: “Do as you like. You are free to indulge in alcoholism or spend your time in sloth.”

Heinkel: “I’m not in the mood for booze. I’m going to go talk to the shaggy-headed commander at the City Hall.”

Answering right back with an earnest look on his face, Heinkel walked out of the room with broad steps. Seeing him off, Rem then turned to Priscilla,

Rem: “So, what is it you’re going to do, Priscilla-san?”

Priscilla: “Are you concerned about mine activities?”

Rem: “That is… a given. I don’t think that everything Priscilla does is correct, but…”

Still, Priscilla judged things with knowledge and insight that Rem did not have.

For Rem, who possessed very little, this was a valuable resource to determine what to decide next. At Rem's remarks, which were extremely rude in a sense, Priscilla let out a laugh,

Priscilla: "So you are not planning to become a doll without a mind of its own? Well, there would not have been any meaning in having you at my side in such a case."

Rem: "Priscilla-san?"

Priscilla: "Guessing from the answer to my question, preparations shall be laid out by that simpleton. The General and the People of Shudraq may also be used accordingly. With that, I shall…"

Rem: "Priscilla-san will…?"

With a slight gulp, Rem waited for Priscilla's next words. Unknowingly, next to Rem, Schult also clenched his fists in anticipation, waiting for their master's answer.

As she met the gaze of the two, Priscilla's almond-shaped eyes narrowed, and,

Priscilla: "—Prepare a hot bath. Float the petals and burn the incense."

Rem: "…Huh?"

Priscilla: "What, do not make me say it twice. I shall take a bath. Prepare the bathhouse as soon as possible."

With a fluttering wave of her hand, Priscilla urged Rem and Schult to hurry up.

Of course, Rem was incapable of hiding her bewilderment, letting out a "Wh-Wha?". But Schult saluted her in a snap,

Schult: "Understood, oh yes indeed! I will go and heat the water right away~!"

After answering cheerfully, just like that Schult ran out of the room with great energy. Seeing off his small back, Rem then turned to Priscilla.

Priscilla was still resting her chin on her hand, set to resume reading the book once again.

Priscilla: “Shall you not go? If left to Schult alone, I am sure he shall forget the plug and much hot water shall be wasted.”

Rem: “I’ll help Schult-san. It’s just, what are you thinking?”

Priscilla: “Your skepticism is also a sign of your preconceived notions. Do you regard me as this world’s Observers, who can manipulate every event at will?”

Rem: “I wouldn’t go that far, but…”

Persuaded by facts and logic, the momentum of Rem’s questioning deflated.

Priscilla scoffed at Rem’s behavior, and continued, “Listen”,

Priscilla: “Everything in this world is made for my convenience. But that does not mean that everything shall follow mine will. Such tedium is not what I desire.”

Rem: “Having everything according to your will, is tedium?”

Priscilla: “Where is the point of facing tomorrow if everything that can happen is as written? Rem, do you desire a world where everything has been over since the day you were born?”

Rem: “…”

Upon being asked that by Priscilla, Rem shut her mouth in silence.

Priscilla’s words were again esoteric, so she barely comprehended the point of the conversation. To live one’s days as desired meant never encountering the new or the unknown.

And that, was undesirable for Priscilla.

However—

Rem: “As someone who can’t perform many things properly, I will strongly disagree.”

Rem had seen Subaru off on his journey, remaining in the Fortress City beside Priscilla. Underlying this was a desire for the “Rem” that had been lost, and a search for a way or a chance to break free from her current inadequate self.

Priscilla’s way of enjoying what did not follow her wishes was incomprehensible to Rem, who suffered from being unable to do anything the way she wanted.

Even if that made Priscilla give up on her, regarding her as an uninteresting woman.

Priscilla: “I do not expect you to be like me, nor do I expect you to want the same thing. Do as you please.”

But Priscilla’s reaction to Rem, who was even prepared to speak out of her pathetic conviction, was unexpectedly soft.

Priscilla looked at Rem, eyes rounded in amazement, as if gazing at a helpless puppy,

Priscilla: “The world is beautiful just as it is.”

Priscilla’s quiet mutterings seemed to contain her true feelings without any compromise.

Posteriorly to thinking so, Rem dismissed the idea as ridiculous. Because if those were her true feelings without any compromise, they were far too grandiose.

Priscilla loved and cared for things far too grandiose.

Rem: “Caring for and cherishing is the exact opposite impression I get from Priscilla-san…”

Priscilla: “Did you say something?”

Rem: “No, nothing of importance…”

Rem shook her head loosely; the fuzziness in her chest had faded slightly.

Not all was clear, but that dark cloud that had just been there had disappeared. Indeed, Rem had just finished a step further into her self-analysis and—

Schult: “W-W-W-Wah~! Hot water, hot water is overflowing! I am drowning~!”

And so, they heard Schult’s urgent screams coming from the bathhouse of the mansion. Sure enough, Rem was reminded of Schult, the latter amidst an unexpected situation, and directed her face upwards.

Priscilla’s eyes meet hers, the former then jerking her white chin and commanding her, “Go”.

Rem: “I won’t move to your whim, Priscilla-san.”

Priscilla: “But you cannot ignore Schult’s screams. See, the victor is I.”

Rem’s resistance to at least not being at her mercy dissipated, as if ephemeral.

Because Schult’s safety was at stake, no further defense was raised.

3

—Priscilla’s advice, it had with certainty driven a wedge deep into Rem’s heart.

When things moved on a grand scale, they would pay no heed to every individual puny human.

With nary a worry for those who embroiled into it, they washed over the latter much like surging waves.

Rem believed she had experienced this first-hand.

Having woken up without memories, the current Rem's memories started in an unfamiliar place, with an unfamiliar someone holding her arm.

Running from that boy, coming across him once more, being captured by many Imperial Soldiers after that, being rescued from within the smoke and flames, she now spent her days in this city just going with the flow.

So much so that Rem believed that "turbulence" was just the word for what she had been through.

—However, the fact that even that understanding of hers was too naive was something that Rem would soon be made aware of.

Rem: "—Priscilla-san?"

Rem's brow creased due to Priscilla, who stood up after smoothly evading her hands.

Enveloped by warm vapor, Rem was in the mansion's bathroom, wrapped in a bath towel. The principal reason for which Priscilla had requisitioned this mansion was the existence of this splendid bathroom.

A bath that you could fill with hot water, stretch your limbs in, and be completely submerged in, seemed to have been made on the design of the mansion's owner. Nothing in the world could replace it.

While in actuality Rem would be allowed to bathe in it only after she had finished assisting Priscilla with her own bath, she'd had such an experience with it that she could even understand Priscilla's feelings of wanting to hog it all for herself.

At any rate, during her bath in the bathhouse, Priscilla stood up gently, distancing herself from Rem's hands which were washing her hair, and headed towards the bathroom's window.

Rem: "Priscilla-san, I'm still in the process of washing your body so… Ah!"

What are you trying to do, that question of Rem’s seemingly fell on deaf ears, as Priscilla, her beautiful body generously exposed, opened the bathroom’s window.

Cold open air which could not compare to the hot steam entered the bathroom, and Rem unconsciously drew in her body. However, Priscilla’s sudden actions did not stop there.

She leaned her body over the open window, and continued out towards the balcony outside the bathroom.

Rem: “Wh-What are you doing?! Others will see you! No matter if this is the top floor, you can’t just…”

In a rush, grabbing onto the cane and a towel, Rem pursued Priscilla who had gone outside. Draping the towel over her slender shoulders, she admonished herself for believing herself adapted to her suddenness.

However, ignoring Rem’s introspection, Priscilla with her gaze turned towards the sky、

Priscilla: “—It is the sky.”

Rem: “The sky… We’re not so high up as to be there. Come on, before the water gets cold, let’s—”

Go back in; as she tried to pull on her arm, Rem’s movement was interrupted.

Priscilla turned around, having gently and smoothly pressed her finger onto Rem’s lips. In front of Rem whose eyes had unconsciously opened wide, Priscilla’s blood-red pupils swayed and、

Priscilla: “Look to the sky, Rem. —It appears to be the end of this vacayshon.”

She did not understand that word, her tone had not allowed Rem to hold any doubt.

Her line of sight was simply carried up as if guided, and Rem too turned her eyes towards the sky Priscilla looked up at. Rem's blue pupils focused so as to see the same thing Priscilla had seen.

However, the fact that she had definitely not failed to notice it, was something that she could not enthusiastically declare.

As for why—

Rem: "That's…"

Above the balcony, overhead from Rem and Priscilla basking in the wind, in the sky that the overly big sun was shining upon, there was a black spot of light floating there, slowly approaching.

The black spot was a single one—Nay, two, three, slowly multiplying; as their blurry shape became more and more distinct, Rem's throat unwittingly released a gasp.

Their numbers increasing, the true identity of the approaching black spots was—

Priscilla: "—Hurry, and tell those below to make ready weapons. A flock of winged dragons is no laughing matter."

Priscilla's advice becoming more pronounced with reality, was something Rem perceived with her skin, with her soul.

—At the same time, gazing at a city surrounded by tall walls from above, golden pupils narrowed.

Body entirely wrapped by the azure sky, traveling through a grand space like they owned it, an existence that cut through the wind flying next to the clouds—This greatest of all the world's creatures, a swarm of flying dragons.

???: "—The Fortress City of Guaral."

Putting the target city's name on their tongue, their seething, burning fighting spirit fired up the blood in their entire body.

Responding to that rising fighting spirit, the spirits and enthusiasm of the flying companions surrounding them increased. The sound of neighing mixed with the flapping of wings in the sky, as their anticipation for the hunting time drew near before their eyes escalated.

Whoever rebuked this as rashness, would be nothing but a shame to the hunters of the azure skies, the dragons.

Whoever did not have their blood boil from this expectation, was a coward without the qualifications to be adjacent to the white clouds.

Dragon: "—Kiryararahhh!!"

???: "Understood. Let's do our job properly, as the senile old man said."

The appeal rising from below their feet was the expectation displayed towards the hunt from the one who's back they borrowed.

On the back of a flying dragon flapping its wings, the small figure of a person with arms crossed expressed their understanding of that excitement.

Sky-blue hair that met at the shoulders, and golden eyes that shone brightly. The florid dress that wrapped that seemingly dainty figure did not express in the slightest the ferociousness and savageness of that existence.

At a glance, some could even describe it as a charming appearance. However, that was only till one laid eyes on the two black horns that rested atop that figure's head.

Even in the Vollachian Empire, where horned races were not few, laying eyes upon black horns was something that seldom—Nay, never should come to pass.

Because that was nothing if not proof of an existence that should not be.

???: "Everyone, are you ready?"

The figure with black horns that should not be, their call beckoned innumerable neighing—the responses of the swarm of flying dragons, of the rulers of the sky, of the uncomeatable swarm of several hundred.

With the sun at their backs, crossing the blue sky, the embodiment of ruin advanced in droves.

A catastrophe should they swoop down, shouts and screams would reverb in the air. All life would be extinguished, vanishing to naught.

Strangely, at the same time a Great Disaster laid waste to a far-off city, a catastrophe in a different form approached the city protected by a fortress.

Before the curtain call of the absolute, inescapable, cruel hunt, that existence's golden eyes—those of Madelyn Eschart, narrowed, her cheeks contorting into a smile.

The Flying Dragon General, Ninth of the Nine Divine Generals, having been ordered to destroy the city, passed her judgment.

Madelyn: “Tremble in fear, try and flee. You all have nowhere to run. —For I, the dragon, have come.”

So she spoke.

Chapter 55B:
The Cacophony of the Fortress City

1

—Time goes back only a little further before the attack of the winged creatures.

???: “Ugh, I messed up again… I really am no good at this…”

A boy walked down the street, shaking his head crowned with pink fluffy hair.

The boy from the city’s largest mansion—Schult, was wearing short pants that exposed his white legs. With a sigh, Schult, looking downcast, held and opened his slender, soft, not-too-sturdy hands.

Schult, still young, had already decided that, for the rest of his life, he would only have one master.

Born in a poor village, Schult was reduced to a meager existence by the weight of the year’s tax collection, destined to starve to death on the side of the road after being evicted from his home. Hungry and thirsty, he ate mud and nearly made that the last meal of his life, but the radiantly beautiful sun came along and saved him—.

He had been saved by that way of life that scorched the whole world to the ground, and that posed as the reason why Schult existed right now.

That was why Schult sincerely hoped to devote his entire current, and future being, to his benevolent master.

And yet—

Schult: “I hate myself for not being able to help in any way…”

With a deep sigh—and even that sigh was weaker than the average person’s with his lung capacity as rationale, Schult’s head, chest, and heart were collectively aching due to his own inadequacy.

Recently, he had been struggling to fulfill his important master's mandated tasks, even messing them up completely.

To fill the bathhouse with hot water was a trivial task, but the water ended up overflowing, plus the magic stone used to heat the water had been mishandled, leaving everyone in a state of confusion.

He was still a newcomer to Priscilla's service, and that, too, had inconvenienced Rem, someone with faulty legs. And this time, he really was fed up with how pathetic he was.

Schult: "Priscilla-sama and Al-sama both tell me that I do not need to rush to change…"

He was glad for the kind Priscilla's and open-minded Al's intentions to console him like this.

But Schult hated himself for being unable to repay the two of them in any way. In this respect, Heinkel saw things in a distinctive manner compared to the two of them, and therefore, treated Schult differently, seemingly being more understanding of Schult.

Heinkel had also taught Schult to practice swordsmanship in a way different from how Al had done so, the former having stated that it did not suit Schult. Thanks to this, he felt that his biceps were more rigid than they were before.

Schult: "Heinkel-sama's way of swinging the sword every day was better for me than Al-sama's way of taking ten days off after one day of swinging. I can't tell Al-sama because I do not want to disappoint him…"

Regardless, with such signs of growth, Schult was also in a bit of a rut.

And the heavens did not forgive Schult's naivete nor his complacency. Schult reflected on the fact that this had been what led to the fiasco at the bathhouse.

By now, Rem was probably helping her master, Priscilla, bathe in the bathtub that had been refilled with hot water. Schult sincerely thought Rem could do anything and he respected her for it.

Schult: “Just like Yae-sama… Yae-sama, how are you…?”

Suddenly, the memory of a cheerful and bright maid named Yae Tenzen, who used to work for Priscilla, was revived in Schult’s mind.

She was previously in charge of Priscilla’s personal care, was always happily talking with Al and was kind to Schult; because of that, Schult was fond of her.

But one day, she had a family mishap and abruptly quit her job at the mansion to go back to the countryside. This left Schult with no time to say goodbye, making him feel quite desolate. The last one to see her off, Al, had told him to give Schult her regards.

Perhaps Rem could fill Yae’s shoes as the servant closest to Priscilla.

If the kind and hardworking Rem did become that someone, Schult would be quite glad about it; she got along well with Priscilla, and he was certain Rem would enjoy it too.

Above all—

Schult: “Everyone is so very happy when together with Priscilla-sama.”

His own personal experience underscored the magnitude of Priscilla’s presence in Schult’s mind.

Rem, too, was perhaps at a moment in her life in which she would be troubled by many things; she was often gloomy and preoccupied with her thoughts. Even if Rem carried such a gloomy, troubled face, perhaps the sun that was Priscilla would make her brighten up.

???: “Ah, Shuu’s here.”

Schult: “Mmm! That would be me!”

With this thought in mind, Schult, who had been moving his head up and down, stopped in his tracks. The reason for that was that he had heard a familiar voice. In front of him, he saw someone pointing in his direction.

Right in front of Schult walking down the street, pointing at him, was a young girl with black hair dyed pink at the ends. Next to the girl was a young man and upon noticing Schult and the girl becoming aware of one another, he let out a cheerful “Dear me!”.

???: “Isn’t that Butler-kun there? Princess-kun’s not with you, is she?”

Schult: “Priscilla-sama is at the mansion, Flop-sama. Were you and Utakata-sama in the middle of a stroll?”

???: “It’s rare for Uu to be called sama. It’s funny.”

The young man, donning a soft smile and waving his hand—Flop, nodded with an “Exactly” to Schult’s question. Utakata, the girl with him, also put her hand on her cheek, apparently deeply touched by the honorific Schult had given her.

Flop and Utakata were the first two people Schult had met after arriving in Guaral. According to what Schult had heard, Flop was a merchant who traveled from town to town, and Utakata was a warrior from a tribe called “The People of Shudraq”.

Both were fine people with their own places to be.

Flop: “Oh? That’s a rather depressed face you’ve got there, Butler-kun. I’m wondering if you’ve perhaps got a problem with your face.”

Schult: “Ehh?! Th-That is amazing! Flop-sama understands?!”

Flop: “Oh, of course I understand! Most people have their worries! And my little sister, who may look like she has no problems at all, actually does as well!”

Utakata: “Midii didn’t seem to have troubles.”

Flop: “She does have them! Surprising, isn’t it?!”

Putting his hands on his hips, Flop opened his mouth greatly and let out a burst of laughter. Seeing Flop's cheerful attitude, Schult also felt cheered up somewhat.

Flop, like Priscilla, was like the sun that brightened the world in their surroundings. Surely, many colorful flowers would be blooming around Flop.

Schult: "Like a prince in a field of flowers."

Flop: "Hahaha, I'm nothing as great as a prince. I'm merely a peddler! So, Butler-kun, what sort of issue ails you? Why don't you talk to me?"

Schult: "Are you sure? I thought you were on a walk…"

Flop's body leaned over, bending at the waist; Schult was grateful that he would listen to him. Glancing at him was Utakata, supposedly taking a stroll with Flop.

However Utakata narrowed her widened eyes and shook her head, not looking bothered in the slightest.

Utakata: "Uu has time. Playing with Fuu was just for killing time, so let's hear about Shuu's problems."

Flop: "Exactly. Oh, don't think of it as killing time. Every problem's important to the person suffering from it. So let's listen carefully."

So, after a not-so-tough chest thump, Flop led Schult and Utakata both to the end of the street, toward the edge of the curb of the flowerbed there.

So the three of them, putting their butts on the curb, started talking in the breeze.

Schult's problem, as aforementioned, was that of being useless.

For Priscilla, he wished to be more self-sufficient, to be capable of doing more.

Schult: "So how did you, Flop-sama and Utakata-sama, become the great people you are today?”

Flop: “Hoho, I see, how did we become the way we are now, huh? What a philosophical question!”

Schult: “Filosofical… Is that so…?”

At the smiling Flop’s answer, Schult braced himself at a hint of yet-undiscovered wisdom.

Without understanding what this filosofy was, could Schult’s concerns be answered? If so, he was willing to study that filosofy as well.

Utakata: “Uu became Uu, because Maa gave birth to Uu.”

Schult: “Maa, is it? That would be…”

Utakata: “Uu’s mother! She was good friends with Taa. But then she stabbed herself and died.”

Schult: “I-is that so…”

As she recounted the story of her mother’s death, Utakata swung her dangling feet.

Although Utakata’s attitude was a detached one, Schult was astonished to hear of happenings that he had not expected. Flop, opposite of him with her in between them, patted Utakata’s head gently.

Flop: “I see, your mother did such a thing. That’s a terrible thing, Miss Utakata.”

Utakata: “It was harder for Taa than it was for Uu. Everyone helped Uu grow up, so everything’s fine. I grew up just like that.”

Flop: “Yes, indeed, Miss Utakata’s growing up very well. I’m sure your mother’d be happy to hear that.”

Utakata: “—? Maa’s dead, so she wouldn’t be happy. You say weird things, Fuu.”

While he stroked her head, Utakata regarded Flop with a curious look on her face. However, being patted on her head by Flop did not feel so bad to Utakata, and so, she did not try to stop his hand.

Utakata's reaction was met with a quiet narrowing of Flop's blue eyes,

Flop: "Well, Miss Utakata's answer was very pleasant. In fact, if we're going to talk about how I became the person I am today, I believe my answer would be very similar."

Schult: "Similar… So, Flop-sama, were you raised by the People of Shudraq in the same way Utakata-sama was?"

Flop: "If that were the case, I'd be very pleased for having such a large family! But my family's dead, the only one I have left's my little sister, Medium. You may think it's very sad and lonely."

Schult: "…Is that, so?"

Flop employed in his usual stride for the first half of his speech, then his voice faltered a tad during the latter half. His eyes downcast because of his answer, Schult once again felt disappointed about himself.

He had inquired both Utakata and Flop about some very insensitive things.

Even Schult would be unable to give a happy answer to someone asking about the family that had abandoned him. He should have been more thoughtful before asking.

Flop: "It's nothing to beat yourself over, Butler-kun. You'll learn from this. And that's exactly what leads to the next part of my answer from earlier."

Schult: "From earlier… the one that is supposed to be like Utakata-sama's?"

Flop: "Yes, exactly, just like Miss Utakata, I've been influenced by the people around me to become the person I am today."

Spreading out his hands, Flop smiled as if to show off his current self.

His cheerful smile and reassuring tone of voice were both important elements of Flop's "Flopness". Were those also cultivated through the influence of others, Schult wondered.

Flop: "A long time ago, my little sister and I were living in quite the terrible environment. It was an orphanage, but there was very little food, they didn't pay us for our work, and the adults there would beat the children whenever they got into trouble. It was an awful place."

Schult: "Th-That's an awful place…! What is a child to do in such a place?!"

Utakata: "Uu'd burn it down."

Schult: "Burn it down!"

Flop: "Haha, that might've been a good idea. But it didn't turn out so."

Schult agreed with Utakata's suggestion of burning down Flop's harsh past. But Flop, laughing at their answer, had already moved past that.

How exactly had they gotten past it—

Flop: "Well, it was thanks to someone else's help. There was a benefactor who helped us. That was my little sister and mine's family. They're dead now, though."

Schult: "…They helped you, is that right? I'm relieved to hear that."

Flop: "Do you understand me, Butler-kun?"

Schult: "I understand… I was also saved by Priscilla-sama."

Gently placing his hand on his chest, he felt through his fingertips that he was no longer a body with nothing but skin and bones attached. That, was proof of what Priscilla had bestowed Schult with, to this day.

Schult's toughness, strength, energy, and respectability proved that Priscilla's actions on that day were no error, and Priscilla would not be made to regret them.

At the glint in Schult's red eyes, Flop chuckled a little, and,

Flop: "For the most part, I've got similar feelings. So I'm in the process of trying to make my big goal come true. It's a hard road, but I want to keep going and not give up."

Schult: "I hope you do not give up! Ah! But, please, be a little more specific. How are you doing your best, Flop-sama?"

Flop: "Hmm, I wonder. After mulling it over plenty… I'll tell you one thing, but not about me, about my little sister. I'm going to tell you about my little sister, who's taller, stronger, more energetic, and more skilled than I am."

Schult: "Ohhh, I see!!"

The reason why Flop put his hand so far above his head was because his sister, the topic of discussion, was that tall of a person.

This was not the first time Flop had mentioned his sister, but Schult had yet to meet her in person, as at the time he and Heinkel arrived at Guaral to meet up with Priscilla, Flop's sister had already left for another place.

Leaving that aside—

Utakata: "Midii's big and strong. Mii's impressed."

Flop: "The best thing about her, is that she's vocal and unafraid. And of course, she's also very skilled, which is something I, as her big brother, am very proud of! She's been working hard to become stronger."

Schult: "To be strong… is that so?! How virtuous!"

Undoubtedly, she had been working hard to become stronger, staying positive and never losing sight of her ambition.

Schult tried to accept that maybe the key to progress was to keep trying one’s best without losing spirit; however, Flop shrugged saying, “No, no”.

Flop: “You’d think so, wouldn’t you? But, by the way, Medium got stronger is a bit more negative.”

Schult: “N-negative? What does that mean?”

Flop: “Hmm, it’s simple. —When I was beaten up by adults, Medium, well, she always stroked my wounds gently.”

Speaking nostalgically of the past, Flop stated so, lowering the corners of his eyes.

Schult was bewildered by the discrepancy between the gentle tone of his speech and the content of his words, however. Being told that stroking a wound from a beating was the beginning of getting stronger made zero sense.

Schult: “I am so sorry that you were beaten up. But, Flop-sama, what were you doing when your sister was gently stroking those wounds?”

Flop: “Me? I was smiling. I was happy for Medium’s feelings. If I didn’t smile, she, the one being defended, would be worried sick.”

Schult: “…”

Flop: ”So, the first time I couldn’t cover for her and she took a hit, she was surprised from the bottom of her heart. When she stroked the wound she received from being beaten, she felt pain. It didn’t heal, nor did the pain go away. As regrettable as that is.”

Shaking his head loosely, Flop replied forlornly.

Hearing Flop’s answer, even the dense Schult finally understood his true intentions. He finally understood why his sister had desired to become stronger, and how had she managed to not give up along the way.

Utakata: "If you don't want it to hurt, you have to not get hit. Is this what Midii thought?"

Flop: "Well, that's precisely it! A very simple and good answer, even though she's my little sister. Thanks to that, Medium's stronger, and our siblings' journey's become safer!"

Flop exaggerated his smile as he spoke, but to Schult, it looked a little different.

Not only was it bright, but it appeared to be a proud one. Surely, Flop was proud of his sister from the bottom of his heart. That was something to be envied very much.

Schult: "I want to be stronger too. Just like your sister, Flop-sama…!"

Flop: "I'm sure Medium'd love to hear that. No, she might be embarrassed. It's not often you get to experience being someone's role model, that sounds like a lot of fun."

Flop smiled and gave his stamp of approval to Schult, the latter clenching his tiny fists.

While listening to the exchange of those two, Utakata looked at Schult and asked, "Shuu?", Utakata: "If you want to be strong, will you practice with Uu? Practice the bow."

Schult: "Bow, is it? But I also practice the sword… Hmm, I will do it! I will do both! That way, I can be twice as strong!"

Flop: "If you're able to do both, then it's exactly as you say! How wise!"

Raising both his hands to the sky, Flop joined Schult in his burning determination. Utakata, too, puffed up her nostrils and pushed out her chest at the promise of training together.

Then showing Schult the bow on her back, Utakata: “Uu will work hard, like Schult, to become a master like Taa.”

Schult: “Well, I would like to meet Taa-sama, too. Utakata-sama, why do you want to become a bow and arrow master?”

Utakata: “Maa said something. For Uu to kill a traveler, with a bow and arrow.”

Schult: “I see. Wait, what…?!”

Because the answer was more extreme than he had expected, Schult’s realization was delayed for a beat.

To kill a traveler, was what she had said earlier, but what exactly did that mean? Schult, having just reflected on the situation, wondered if it would be okay to ask for more details.

—And so, while Schult worried over it, he was deprived of the time for enquiring about it.

Flop: “—Butler-kun! Miss Utakata!”

Schult: “—?!”

Utakata: “Fuu?”

Suddenly, a sharp voice called out to Schult and Utakata, and Flop’s expression morphed. Schult’s shoulders hitched because of the vigor, and Flop’s hands gripped his shoulders stoutly.

Then, Flop pulled Schult and Utakata, sitting on the curb, closer to him, and shouted,

Flop: “The sky’s starting to feel dangerous! Let’s just hurry up and get out of here!”

And—

2

—At the time the flock was seen in the distant sky, Heinkel was at the City Hall.

The people present were the appointed commanders of the garrison stationed in the Fortress City.

General Second-Class Zikr Osman and his men, who had originally been sent to the city but had joined Priscilla's ranks—or rather, the ranks of the man named Abel, to be precise, at the time of capturing the Fortress City.

And then there were the People of Shudraq, a tribe of hunters from the Jungle, smaller in number than the Imperial Soldiers present, yet no less powerful individually, alongside the one who led them, their acting Chieftain, Mizelda.

When Heinkel visited the City Hall, the two were in the midst of a face-to-face meeting to discuss the future.

Though Priscilla had spoken of omens that were much like predictions, Heinkel did not believe that Priscilla had the power to foretell the future, but he also knew not to underestimate the power of the eyes of a being so far from the norm.

Not only Priscilla, but those with special powers and destinies, had a higher perspective compared to ordinary people.

Those that could gaze at the world from a higher place would witness a scenery different from what others would. Those who could see farther compared to an average person—or rather, compared to an ordinary person, would never be able to understand the latter.

Heinkel had learned this painfully well over the past forty years of his life.

Therefore, he did not dismiss things without even lending an ear just because he did not understand them.

This was also the reason why he did not dismiss Priscilla's words and went to the City Hall.

And then—

Mizelda: "…"

The first to notice the anomaly outside the window was Mizelda, sniffing; her face was as if she had a hunch about something.

She was the former Chieftain of the People of Shudraq, who had apparently lost one of her legs in a battle during the capture of the Fortress City. To replace her foot, she wielded a stick like the tip of a cane attached to her right leg, which was missing below the knee.

Every time she walked, the cane made a sound, and when she turned around, the same sound was also heard.

The moment the profile of the rugged beauty Mizelda, owner of piercing eyes, stiffened, Heinkel and Zikr, who were present, instantly realized something was wrong and looked in the same direction.

Then, upon laying eyes on the swarm of black dots coming in from beyond the sky, Zikr muttered to himself.

Zikr: "—A flock of flying dragons."

Mizelda: "—Hk! Zikr! Give word to your soldiers! I'll mobilize the Shudraq!"

Immediately after realizing the danger, Mizelda would have leapt with a tremendous kick from the roof of the City Hall and over Zikr's wide shoulders.

However, she had just lost one of her legs. Instead of leaping out the window, she skipped down the stairs and ran out in a great hurry.

Caught up in her momentum, Zikr sharpened his blank expression and shouted,

Zikr: "Ring the bell! Enemy attack! They are coming from the sky!"

His shout gave a kick in the back to his aides so they would alert the entire Fortress City to the critical situation.

After seeing the reactions of all of them, Heinkel also put his hand on the sword at his waist. Then, as loud and sharp as the ringing alarm bells, he clicked his tongue.

Zikr: “Heinkel-dono! Priscilla-dono is…”

Heinkel: “Miss Priscilla’s at the mansion. She knew something’d happen. She’ll be on the move soon.”

As Zikr turned around, Heinkel turned his attention to the enemy shadows in the sky.

In mere seconds the swarm had clearly darkened in color and increased in size, approaching the city at tremendous speed. There was nary a moment to lose.

Heinkel: “Assuming this is an enemy attack, do you have any idea who the attacker might be?”

Zikr: “—. The number of flying dragons is extraordinary. The Imperial Capital does not have the strength to mobilize that many flying dragon riders, so… There is only one possibility.”

Heinkel: “So, what is that possibility?!”

Heinkel’s words became rough, as time was being cut shorter by Zikr’s roundabout way of talking.

Faced with Heinkel’s hounding him, Zikr paused for a beat, and then said,

Zikr: “The Flying Dragon General, Madelyn Eschart… She controls flying dragons. In other words…”

Heinkel: “Shit, one of the Nine Divine Generals… Hk.”

Heinkel scratched his head due to the mention of a familiar name.

He was not an expert on the inner workings of the Empire, but he was the Deputy Commander of the Royal Guards of the Kingdom of Lugunica. Because of his position, he was far more knowledgeable about information regarding other countries than most people.

He had at least heard the names and aliases of the Nine Divine Generals, the highest military force possessed by the Empire.

It seemed that all of them were warriors with extraordinary abilities, and only the best in the Kingdom, a group in which Marcos, the Commander of the Royal Guards, was also included, would be capable of being a match to them.

And, of course, there was the Kingdom's most powerful person, the Sword Saint, but—

Heinkel: "Didn't someone say something ridiculous like some guy fighting Reinhardt…"

The strongest swordsman in the Vollachian Empire was said to be as good as Reinhardt.

Of course, the Nine Divine Generals would possess their own strengths and weaknesses, but the thought of being attacked by a monster on the same level as that person, was Heinkel's worst nightmare.

Heinkel'd had no intention of coming to the Empire to begin with.

He had simply gone along for the ride when Priscilla decided to go to Vollachia of her own accord. He had no interest in the existence or destruction of this Fortress City.

But—

Heinkel: "I can't afford to displease Miss Priscilla… Even if Miss Priscilla becomes the Monarch, it'll all be meaningless if she drives me away."

Priscilla was eccentric, and, ultimately, he had no idea of what was in her mind.

Whatever had brought it on, she had Heinkel on-hand for now, but if he did not prove himself useful, he would be discarded of, and would come out empty-handed.

That must not happen. Priscilla was now the only person who was a straw for Heinkel to cling on to.

Heinkel: “We don’t have time for idle chatter. Let’s get rid of the flying dragon flock. Zikr, you’re here to oversee the whole thing!”

Zikr: “I intend to, but what about you, Heinkel-dono?”

Heinkel: “—I’ll do as I please.”

Unlike Zikr and Mizelda, Heinkel had no soldiers nor companions to lead.

Even if he did, his title as Deputy Commander of the Royal Guard was merely decorative. He had stopped studying the basics of military strategy a long time ago, and more importantly, no one would listen to his instructions.

So, from the beginning, there was only one thing that Heinkel could do.

Heinkel: “…”

Immediately after making this decision, Heinkel, without hearing Zikr’s reply, ran to the balcony of the City Hall and leapt from there to the city below.

He put his feet on the roof of a tall building, kicked off the rooftop, and then ran to the next building. He continued to leap repeatedly, bathed in the wind, as he headed to the top of the fortifications surrounding the city.

Jumping onto the towering fortress wall on the western side, where a flock of flying dragons was heading towards, he took a breath.

Alarm bells had already rung across the city to warn of an enemy attack; blended together everywhere in the city, was disorder among the people, with the bellows of the guards urging them to evacuate as to suppress the chaos.

Heinkel: “…Ahh, shit.”

The smell in the air changed noticeably, and the taste of spit on his tongue became bitter.

As the presence of the battlefield, of blood and steel, drew nearer, Heinkel was forced to listen to an illusory, high-pitched ringing in the depths of his ears.

In addition to Heinkel, Imperial Soldiers had also rushed to the western ramparts.

If Zikr's guess was correct, the attacker was one of the Nine Divine Generals. How were they prepared to fight against an opponent in the position of General First-Class of the Empire?

Did they not think that anything about that was wrong, even more so if they were under the same banner? Or was it all fine, as long as they could fight? If they were to die fighting, would they be satisfied with that?

Heinkel: "Fuck, fuck, fuck, fuck all of them, fuck all of them…!"

A boiling, throbbing, black heat poured out of his chest and into his entire body.

Heinkel gritted his teeth to the point of creaking as he savored the dark heat that began in his heart, traveled through his internal organs and lower abdomen, then onward to the tips of his limbs and fingers.

Heinkel's hand slowly reached for the sword at his waist, the sword bearing the name "Astrea", as he gripped the hilt tightly.

And then—

Heinkel: "—All of you can go to hell, motherfuckers!!"

With a howl of unbearable rage, Heinkel's sword flashed out, and the thick neck of a flying dragon passing by spurted blood, and split asunder.

3

Alarm bells rang as the screaming of people running away from the city overlapped in a quite exquisite, yet also frightening way, the Fortress City of Guaral having become a battlefield filled by auditory pandemonium.

The army of flying dragons encroaching from the western sky, composed of no less than several hundred specimens of majestic appearance, had shattered the hearts of the residents, who had been reassured by the fact that the city was protected by walls on all four sides.

If there was a weakness to these walls, which could withstand even the destructive energy of powerful Magic Stone Cannons, it would be none other than terrifying beings able to bypass even large walls.

Whether that be a being which could step over the walls, or a ruler of the sky that capable of flying over them.

Undoubtedly, it was no exaggeration to say that on this day, the Fortress City was being assaulted by its greatest, most formidable enemy.

Flop: "—This isn't very good."

Avoiding the main street in which screams echoed, Flop peeked out from an alley and frowned.

A few minutes after spotting the flying dragons in the sky, things took a turn for the worse; having yet again transformed into a battlefield much like had happened ten days prior, the Fortress City's brief respite was erased from its people's minds.

This time, however, compared to what had transpired ten days prior, this change was for the worse.

At any rate—

Flop: "Husband-kun was trying to cause as little damage as possible, but… this time, the opponent apparently doesn't seem to have that kind of consideration."

Subaru had aimed to pull off a "bloodless siege" by the bold means of crossdressing as a woman.

Although this goal had been foiled by an unexpected intruder, the amount of blood spilled would have been incomparably greater if a plan other than Subaru's had been employed.

The fact that the feelings of the Fortress City's residents, alongside with those held by the Imperial Soldiers stationed there, had not degenerated to an extreme degree, was something Flop wondered about; perhaps, that had been the result of Subaru's consideration.

This time, however, the enemy seemed to possess no such chivalrous thoughts whatsoever.

Schult: "Hii!"

Schult screamed beside Flop as a terrifying roar and earth-shaking impact traveled through the air.

It was no wonder. The enemy's assault with the flying dragons was just that severe and effective.

Flop: "Although they're just letting the flying dragons carry the rocks and then dropping them from high in the sky."

What they were doing was simple and straightforward, it was just a primitive attack.

However, though even a boulder the size of a human's head would cause serious injury, the rocks that had been dropping from the air for a while now, were as large as one or two heads.

The force of the rocks destroyed stone buildings, created huge craters in the streets. Of course, were someone to be hit, it would be a disaster one would wish to not witness ever again.

Flop and the others had rushed into the alley, but they had no confirmation that that place was a safe one.

Fleeing underground, or heading towards someone that was simply strong; if a safe place existed, those would be it.

Utakata: "Mii and the others are in the big building in the middle."

Schult: “P-Priscilla-sama is in the mansion…!”

Flop: “Oh, yes, of course. You’re both very smart, I agree with you. The problem is, we’re right in the middle of both those places!”

The called-upon Mizelda and Zikr were reliable in their ability to defend the city.

Although she was a fighting force of one person only, Priscilla’s ability was comparable to that of the Nine Divine Generals.

Flop was torn as to which direction to rush to, as well.

And while they were worrying—

???: “H-help… Uwahh!!”

Right in front of the alleyway where Flop and the others were hiding in, a figure fleeing down the street screamed, then disappeared. —No, he had not disappeared. The man’s body was snatched up into the sky by a shadow flying at great speed, taken away in one fell swoop.

Apparently, the flying dragons in the raid had different roles and were divided into two groups. The ones from earlier, those that let large stones fall, and those that attacked directly.

Or, more likely, there were flying dragons that had taken on other roles.

Schult: “J-just now, that person… Hk.”

Flop: “Even if we wanted to help, we wouldn’t be able to! And we can’t bypass them either. If we get caught in the claws or fangs of a flying dragon, the three of us will be taken into the sky together.”

Utakata: “Uu’s bow is here! With this, I can take down a flying dragon!”

Speaking enthusiastically, Utakata showed the bow and arrow in her arms. Had it been Holly, Kuna, or another adult Shudraq, Flop would have considered it.

However Flop, having once accompanied Utakata to bow practice, understood that her abilities were not enough for a real battlefield.

Flop: "—You want the best for children, was it? I get it."

With his eyes closed, Flop thought of the benefactor who had saved him and his sister from rock-bottom.

He always had a blunt and crude attitude, but in spite of that, his benefactor had never bent his principles. So, Flop wanted to be an "adult" he would not be ashamed of.

They could not stay hiding and holding their breath where they were forever. Whether they went to the City Hall or to the mansion, they needed to take some sort of action.

In order to get both Schult and Utakata to safety—.

Flop: "—I want you both to listen to me. From now on, I will…"

Taking a small breath, Flop attempted to convey his plan to them with determination.

And, in the moment in which the two children looked at Flop as the latter spoke.

???: "OHHHHHHH—!"

???: "—KIRYARARAHHHH!"

With a blood-curdling roar of anger, something huge fell from the sky onto the street. What slammed onto the ground accompanied by a mixture of angry screams and cries, was a flying dragon, black blood pouring from all over its entire body.

With its wings spread out, the flying dragon would be three to four meters in wingspan. Desperately trying to escape, it flapped its wings which had been broken from the impact of the fall.

Thereupon—

???: "Don't run away! Don't you dare, bastard!"

The flying dragon fell to the ground together with the figure, who rolled vigorously and jumped on its back. He then thrust his sword into the writhing flying dragon, skewering its heart from behind.

The screams of the flying dragon persisted for a long time; then, it collapsed in place as it shed tears of blood.

Then, having seen that the flying dragon's breathing had halted—

???: "Those little shits…"

A red-haired man came down from the back of the dead flying dragon, his shoulders heaving up and down. Upon sighting him, Schult, who was in Flop's arms, shouted an "Ah!",

Schult: "Heinkel-sama! So you were safe!"

Heinkel: "Haaahn?"

The high voice of Schult called out, prompting the red-haired man to turn around with a bad attitude. Immediately, Schult's throat caught, his words blocked because of the man's appearance, his entire body dyed bright-red.

Then, the wide-eyed Schult escaped Flop's arms, rushing to the man's side. Seeing Schult, the man wiped his bloody face with his sleeve.

Heinkel: "What the hell, it's you, pipsqueak?"

Schult: "You are all red, Heinkel-sama! Where are you hurt?!"

Heinkel: "Hurt? Oh, if you mean the blood, it's just the dragons'. If I'm hurt, it's merely a scratch."

Schult: "Oh, really? Is that so…?"

With a surprised look in his eyes, Schult touched the bloody man's body to make sure. Seeing that his attitude showed no concern for getting his hands and clothes dirty, the man looked down at the boy and sighed.

At this exchange, Flop let out the breath he had held due to his determination from before, and said,

Flop: “Butler-kun, I don’t think you need to worry. He doesn’t look to be putting up a strong-front, and he isn’t really hurt, right?”

Heinkel: “You’re… that weird man. You together with these pipsqueaks?”

Flop: “That “weird” part is a tad offensive, but you’re right! I was just running around with Butler-kun and Miss Utakata though. I’m relieved you’re here.”

When Flop smiled at him, the man covered in blood—Heinkel, looked away.

He was not embarrassed, that reaction was of being displeased. In fact, he even clicked his tongue. But it was true that he had slain the flying dragon, which had played a role in giving Schult some peace of mind.

Like Schult, Heinkel seemed to be one of Priscilla’s followers, and although Flop had expected him to be able to fight on the grounds that he carried a sword, he seemed to be more skilled than one would expect.

The tremendous amount of blood that stained his body vermilion could hardly just be attributed to the blood spurting from the flying dragon he had just killed. It was evidence that he had been exposed to blood spurting from multiple flying dragons.

Schult: “We were going to head towards Priscilla-sama now! What about you, Heinkel-sama?”

Heinkel: “To Miss Priscilla’s…? You’d be safer that way. But…”

Flop: “There are very few places in the city that are safe right now. If our enemies are all flying dragons, I think it’d be a good idea to find a building with a basement and a place where spices are kept.”

Utakata: “Spyce…?”

Flop interrupted Schult and Heinkel's conversation, while Utakata tilted her head at the part in the conversation she did not understand. Looking towards Flop, Heinkel's eyes were similar, holding confoundment.

It would not make sense to one unacquainted with the ecology of flying dragons.

Flop: "Flying dragons have a very good sense of smell. They can smell blood from a great distance. On the other hand, they don't like strong, pungent smells. So, if we sprinkle peppa all over our body, we may be able to avoid being caught by them."

Heinkel: "…You seem well-informed."

Flop: "I'm a peddler who travels from place-to-place! Also, I happen to know someone who knew a lot about flying dragons. He may've been the person most knowledgeable about them in the Empire!"

However, he had often heard about the good side of flying dragons from that person, so he had not expected to face them as a threat in this way.

At the very least, if the knowledge he had acquired was true, his plan to get covered in spices in order to escape the flying dragons should work.

It was fortuitous for Flop and the two children that they had been able to join up with the capable fighter that was Heinkel, but overall it was not fortuitous in this battle for the Fortress City.

Flop: "I can't say it's a good idea to use Redhead-san as our escort."

Heinkel, who could go toe-to-toe with flying dragons on his own, was a valuable asset to the city under attack by a countless number of them.

No matter how the battle turned out from here on, he would be one of the factors to influence the outcome of the battle. It was not a good idea to put him alongside the three non-combatants.

Therefore—

Flop: “We’re going underground to escape the eyes and noses of the flying dragons. Could Redhead-san accompany us to a nearby restaurant or warehouse? There, we can deceive their eyes… Or rather, deceive their noses? Once we do that, we can take care of the rest on our own.”

Schult: “Flop-sama…”

Schult’s face was aghast at Flop’s suggestion, as if the idea of splitting up had not occurred to him at all. But contrasting Schult’s surprise, Utakata nodded and said,

Utakata: “Uu thinks the same as Fuu. Uu and Fuu will protect Shuu. Don’t worry.”

Schult: “Utakata-sama will… as well?”

Utakata nodded her head in affirmation, and Schult’s round eyes lowered. A few seconds later, he looked up with a determined expression on his face and looked at Heinkel.

Schult: “I understand. I’ll do my best with Flop-sama and the others. So, Heinkel-sama, be careful of your injuries…”

Heinkel: “—I’ve been thinking this for a while, but don’t get yourselves all excited. Why should I suddenly start obeying what you guys tell me to do?”

Schult: “Eh?!”

However, Schult’s resolve was purposeless, as Heinkel frowned and bluntly stated this.

He wiped the gore from his sword with his cloak, indicating his surroundings with his chin,

Heinkel: “Let me say this now, I don’t owe this city anything. If I failed to protect this pipsqueak, Miss Priscilla’d probably be displeased, right? I’d rather avoid that.”

Flop: “W-wait, wait, wait, Redhead-san! Wait a sec! So you think protecting Princess-kun’s mood’s more important than protecting the city? That's…"

Heinkel: "—Correct."

Flop: "…"

The reply was so clear and definitive, that Flop could not help but involuntarily let out a disappointed look. Heinkel stared at Flop's face, his blue eyes glinting amongst the red filth covering his face.

Heinkel: "I got something more important than this city, more important than someone's life. And it's not this pipsqueak. Miss Priscilla, who dotes on this pipsqueak, has something I need her to give me no matter what. If that's what's needed to get that, then I don't care how many people die."

Flop: "Redhead-san…"

Heinkel: "Besides, I'm not that much of a big shot, and neither are you. You need to know your place. There's only so much you can do. Don't try to reach outside of that. You'll only make a fool of yourself."

Flop: "…"

Heinkel: "No one can be a sword."

As he spat this out, Heinkel's hand reached for Schult's shoulder.

As Schult's slender shoulder was gripped by his hand, the young boy turned his moist eyes toward Heinkel. The fright that filled those eyes—

Schult: "Heinkel-sama, you look like you are in pain."

—No, not fear, but rather compassion.

Heinkel's cheeks stiffened slightly, bathed by the boy's earnest gaze. But it did not move his resolute heart.

Heinkel: "I'm taking this pipsqueak to Miss Priscilla. You guys are on your own if you want to follow me. But don't make the mistake of thinking that I'll protect you."

With that, Heinkel grabbed Schult and turned his back on Flop and Utakata. He would step out into the street, heading toward the mansion where Priscilla was located.

Flop was hesitating on whether he should heed his warning, when —

???: "—You're the one killing us dragons?"

—A moment later, accompanied by those short words, a falling shadow landed on the ground with a furious roar.

???: "…"

A dense cloud of dust and debris was kicked up as an intruder suddenly carved up a large hole in the ground.

A small figure was standing with its short arms crossed in front of Heinkel as he tried to take Schult away, blocking their path.

—It was difficult to understand who it was, at a glance.

What had just happened, and the impression that the figure gave, did not match at all.

A small stature, a lovely face, blemish-free white skin, a sky-blue attire that enhanced their loveliness; as their appearance did not seem so different from Schult's or Utakata's, it was hard to believe that they had just appeared with a ground-shattering impact.

However, what had happened was all that mattered, and no one could deny what had happened.

The shadow that appeared narrowed its golden eyes, glared at the four standing in the street, and nodded.

And then—

???: "You have shed the blood of us dragons, and so in atonement, your blood shall be shed until there's none left. —You fools."

Chapter 56B:
The Flying Dragon Cataclysm

1

—The moment he saw the little girl standing amidst the plume of smoke, alarm bells went off in Flop's head.

Not the real alarm bell echoing throughout Guaral however; it was the clanging alarm of his own survival instincts as a living creature. So loud was its noise, that it made his head ache.

Quite frankly, Flop was unlike Medium; he was a man unable to fight.

Attempting to train his body had brought him some degree of frustration, and he wished to not detract from his sister's role, which she had chosen in her own way after much thinking, upon realizing that she was actually causing her brother pain by stroking his wounds.

Therefore, he possessed no warrior's intuition nor discernment.

And yet—

Flop: "That girl's bad news."

And then, he swallowed bitter spit as the little girl propped her leg out of the gaping hole made by the impact of the fall.

Girl: "…"

A young girl of short stature, the pupils of her golden eyes narrowed, glaring at Flop and the others.

She appeared to be two or three years older than Schult and Utakata, but the atmosphere she exuded was on par with that of Medium or Mizelda—no, even more dangerous.

It was almost like that of the imposing Divine General that had dispossessed Mizelda of her leg.

Flop: "…Redhead-san, do you think you can manage to create an opening? I want to let at least Butler-kun and Miss Utakata escape somehow."

The one to whom Flop gave that suggestion to in the form of a whisper was Heinkel, also the one person who held any fighting strength in this place.

Having demonstrated his swordsmanship by slaying a flying dragon, he would be more than capable of assisting in the protection of Utakata and the others, as opposed to having Flop become a meat shield.

Ideally, it would be great if Heinkel were strong enough to defeat that little girl.

Heinkel: "—Hk."

Flop: "Redhead-san?"

Leaving his guard up toward the girl, Flop questioned Heinkel, from whom there was no reply.

He was hesitant to take his gaze away from the threat before him, but working with Heinkel was the top priority. Having readied his resolve, Flop glanced at Heinkel to examine him.

—Heinkel's eyes were wide open in shock, his face pale with greasy sweat streaking across it.

Schult: "H-Heinkel-sama? Are you all right?"

Heinkel: "Uh, ah…"

Flop and Schult took notice of Heinkel's unusual behavior at nearly the exact same time.

Schult voiced his clear concern for Heinkel, and the red-haired swordsman's cheeks became rigid due to the youngster's words, an inarticulate voice escaping his throat.

It was difficult to tell, from looking from the side, whether the response was because he was aware of the girl's identity. However, regardless of the question, there was one clear, unequivocal fact.

That was—

Girl: "What's with you? Are you scared?"

The squinting girl's gaze was directed at Heinkel's legs as he stood there. His legs were trembling at both knees, so much so that he was barely managing to keep standing.

What was present there, obvious to anyone who laid eyes upon him, was plenty of fear and trepidation. In other words, despair.

Flop: "Hey there! I've never seen you before, little lady, would you mind talking to me for a bit?!"

Having observed Heinkel's despair, Flop immediately shouted that out.

Immediately, Heinkel and Schult's shoulders hitched, and the girl in front of them turned her eyes filled with suspicion toward him. Her gaze alone would not kill him, but the oppressive sensation coming from it was such that it was not be surprising if it did.

But Flop rallied his heart, loosened his cheeks, and spread his hands wide, producing a smile.

Flop: "I'm Flop O'Connell, a humble merchant. I'm in a rather difficult and bewildering situation. You seem to know more about it than I do, don't you?"

Girl: "—. Are you collateral damage? Then you're out of luck."

Flop: "Well, being out of luck's a phrase I'm not used to being told. I got a lot of things missing, but I'm proud to say that I do have luck. Why would I be out of luck?"

Girl: "You may kill everyone in this city. That's what the senile old man said."

Flop: “Everyone in the city.”

The little girl jerked her chin, answering by gesturing towards her surroundings, to which Flop gave a strained smile. But, deep inside, his state of mind was far from corresponding to that of a bitter smile, he was more panicked than anything else.

Would there be room for negotiation, given her objective was to annihilate the city’s inhabitants completely?

If only he could talk to the “senile old man” who had ordered her to do such a deed.

Flop: “From what I’ve heard, the senile old man seems to have made a mistake in telling you to wipe out the whole city. So why don’t you double-check that with your friends and colleagues who have come with you?”

Girl: “There are no friends or colleagues. There are only brethren and enemies with I, the dragon. —You, are mocking this dragon. It appears you don’t know fear.”

Flop: “Mocking you, that’s outrageous! I want to get along with you. For starters, I was just thinking about asking your name. Don’t you agree?”

Schult: “Y-yes, that is correct! I would like to know your name too! Mine is Schult!”

As the girl lay on verge of becoming ill-tempered, Flop clapped his hands, asking his allies for agreement. Schult, taking advantage of the situation, then said his name as he raised his hand.

With Flop and Schult now having been introduced themselves, the girl wrinkled the brow of her pretty face, and,

???: “—Madelyn Eschart. I, the dragon, am of the Nine Divine Generals.”

Heinkel: “Nine Di…!”

Unassumingly, the girl—Madelyn introduced herself via her title, to which Heinkel became at a loss for words.

His knees, which had been trembling ever since they had met, worsened further upon hearing her title, a corroboration of her strength. It was a miracle that he did not fall on his buttocks.

Even Flop was unable to laugh at Heinkel. Heinkel's opponent, whom Flop had considered to be as dangerous as a Divine General, turned out to actually be a Divine General.

And beyond that—

Flop: "—Miss Utakata."

Quietly, Flop noticed a change in the situation, invoking the name of the person who had caused this change.

Utakata, the girl called upon by Flop, stirred, focusing on Madelyn in front of her. Retrieving the bow from her back, she prepared an arrow, aimed at Madelyn.

The distance between them amounted to seven or eight meters; even considering her abilities, she would not miss.

If that were to be called an advantage, however, that could not be farther from the truth.

Utakata: "That enemy is the leader of the flock of flying dragons. She's the same as Mii was before, and the same as Taa is now. Defeat that enemy, and the fight is over."

Schult: "I-is that so?"

Flop: "Perhaps Miss Utakata's conception is correct. Unless there are other Divine Generals besides her."

When Flop took a glance towards her, Madelyn said nothing of it.

Judging from her attitude so far, she was a child who would respond to the words being spoken. If they were to state something obviously wrong, it would be more natural for her to react in some way.

In other words, Madelyn was leading the assault on the Fortress City. Utakata's view that defeating her would force the flying dragons to withdraw would be correct.

The only problem, was that it did not appear to be something that could feasibly be done.

Madelyn: "You're a warrior, you're a warrior, and you… won't run away. You're a warrior."

Schult: "Huh…Me, you mean?"

Madelyn: "Yes. You're a warrior as well."

Suddenly being pointed towards, Schult's eyes became rounder after being appraised as such.

To Schult's surprise, Madelyn pointed with her small hand to Utakata, Flop, and himself, describing them as "warriors".

Following on, Madelyn's finger was pointed at the last one, Heinkel —

Madelyn: "You're no warrior. Even though you slew a dragon, you're a coward."

Heinkel: "Guh…"

Madelyn: "Draw your sword. For I, the dragon, will strike you. For every drop of blood that has been shed."

As she said this, Madelyn slowly took a step toward him.

And so, slowly, Madelyn's feet closed the distance headed toward the flying-dragon-killer Heinkel, uncaring of being targeted by Utakata's arrow.

Utakata: "—Hit her!"

Synchronized with that declaration of intent, Utakata's arrow was loosed, aiming at Madelyn's chest. It flew straight at Madelyn, but was caught between two fingers of Madelyn's lifted hand.

Madelyn did not even look at Utakata. Her line of sight was trained straight towards Heinkel.

Flop: “Redhead-san!”

Schult: “Heinkel-sama!”

Realizing the danger, Flop screamed and Schult tried to pull on Heinkel’s arm. However, Schult’s lack of power was not enough to make Heinkel even twitch.

Rather, faced with Madelyn approaching him, Heinkel cleared his throat, shook off that arm of Schult’s attempting to pull him away.

Schult fell on his butt; Heinkel clenched his molars.

Heinkel: “Oh, ohhh…!”

Heinkel’s sword hand gripped tightly, infused with force. His cheeks turned vermillion as he clenched his jaw and mandible, the blood pumping through his body attempting to dispel the fright making his legs tremble.

Yet despite that, Madelyn did not halt, still closing her distance to Heinkel.

Compared to a flying dragon, this little girl was incomparably smaller in size.

Against the approaching petite child, Heinkel struck a blow with his sword—.

Heinkel: “—Oh.”

With a high-pitched clang, the sword tumbled from Heinkel’s trembling hand.

At the moment the full extent of his sword technique was to be unleashed, he was unable to raise his arm, letting his sword go.

And—

Madelyn: “After all, you’re no warrior.”

Madelyn’s contemptuous words were driven into Heinkel’s side accompanied by a fist.

The blow struck Heinkel’s stout frame, and with tremendous force, the red-haired swordsman was blown sideways. His entire body slammed into a stone building, cracking the stone wall in the shape of his human form.

The blow, that one hit, caused Heinkel’s eyes to roll to the back of his head, also producing an intense gale.

Regardless of having fired off a punch that produced a boom, that fist carrying energy not below that of the rocks being repeatedly hurled by the flying dragons at the city, Madelyn’s ire did not abate.

Heinkel: “Kah!”

As Heinkel slumped forward, Madelyn’s other fist smashed into his nose. The back of his head slammed against the wall, and as he ricocheted in return, a punt from the girl pummeled his torso.

The impact went through him, causing the house behind him to collapse thunderously, exposed to that destructive power. Grabbing Heinkel’s leg as it was engulfed in a plume of smoke, Madelyn brutally threw him in the opposite direction.

Heinkel’s body rumbled and tumbled vigorously as he fell back onto the ground of the street. The building across the street from the house that had just collapsed, now gave him a firm welcome.

Windows shattered on impact, the scattered debris showering down on Heinkel like rain. The fallen Heinkel did not even twitch as they left fine cuts all over his body.

Flop: “…”

Were it Flop, that onslaught would have been fatal.

Besides Flop, most people would have died to that assault. It was uncertain whether Heinkel was dead or alive, having been showered by a series of attacks that perhaps even Medium would be unable to survive.

But Madelyn, whose profession was fighting, would not permit such half-hearted denouement.

Madelyn: “Wimp.”

Madelyn’s hand reached behind her back, muttering in a voice that did not conceal her contempt. The belt on her back was unbuttoned, and immediately afterward, an item that had been stored there was opened with a noise.

It was a foldable, razor-sharp blade, a long weapon shaped like a wide-open pair of scissors. Flop recalled seeing something similar during the hunts of nomadic people across the wide, grand grasslands.

Called a Flying Winged Blade, a skillful user could throw it for dozens of meters, spinning the blade around and back to the user’s hand.

However, Madelyn’s weapon was as tall as she was small, a sharp weapon possessing a specialized handle that could be used for purposes other than throwing.

Devoid of mercy, she directed it at Heinkel laying on the ground, having entered that state after being beaten up by her bare hands. Were he to be struck by that weapon, assuredly no trace of him would remain.

Flop: “Won’t you stop, Miss Madelyn? I understand your anger. I know how angry you must be after your friends were killed. But if someone’s attacked, they have no choice but to fight back.”

Biting his lip to brace himself, Flop said this to Madelyn’s back. With the Flying Winged Blade in her hand, she turned away and responded to Flop, “Don’t be mistaken”,

Madelyn: “Dragons are the greatest creatures in the world. If you people snap right back at dragons, you deserve to be exterminated. Besides…”

Flop: “Besides?”

Madelyn: “Is it possible to tolerate the action of such a coward, I wonder?”

Madelyn’s golden eyes quaked with anger, and Flop realized the reason for her irritation.

Naturally, she was angry about flying dragon accompanying her having been murdered, but more significant was the fact that the one who had performed that deed, Heinkel, was unable to wage battle, having let go of his sword.

She was angered that her companion had been felled by someone so insignificant.

It was an insult not only to Heinkel, but to the life of the flying dragon he had slain—

Flop: “Uwah!”

Utakata: “Uh!”

A moment later, Madelyn kicked a pebble on the ground to stop Flop before he could move. The pebble struck Flop, about to make a move, and Utakata, who was about to nock her next arrow, hitting their legs and arms respectively, hence hindering their actions.

In the meantime, Madelyn raised her Flying Winged Blade as to snuff out Heinkel right beneath her eyes.

Schult: “N-no, please don’t—!”

Unlike the two who were hit by pebbles, Schult, who was standing away out of precaution, rushed in-between them in desperation. The young boy held out his hands and stepped in between Madelyn and Heinkel.

Schult’s small body covered Heinkel, a shelter far too fragile to resist the storm that was approaching.

But Madelyn was not so kind as to hold back, upon seeing the boy's recklessness.

Madelyn: "Nobody was going to let you live anyway."

Madelyn's eyes narrowed, and the Flying Winged Blade was driven down into Schult's head.

2

???: "—Rem! Are you safe?!"

Shouting so, a slender woman opened the large door and rushed into the mansion.

Rem, who had been running through the hall, looked towards the familiar voice and replied with "Yes!",

Rem: "Kuna-san! And Holly-san"

Holly: "I'm glad you're okay~! The whole city is a huge mess already~!"

Before Rem's wide-open eyes, a pair of footsteps rushed towards her, one light and another heavy, belonging to two members of the People of Shudraq stationed in the city, Kuna and Holly.

Upon hearing the voices of those two, Rem's eyes eased in slight relief,

Rem: "I'm glad that you two are alright. Do you have any injuries?"

Kuna: "We're fine, for now. It's just…"

Holly: "…Everyone is so beat already~."

The tone of the two's voices drooping, they looked about the hall that Rem ran through, speaking their mind.

Around the three of them, residents who had been hurt and injured amidst the chaos that had sparked within the city were being brought in droves. The place gave the appearance of a field hospital, as volunteers helped in patching everyone up.

If the wound was shallow, it could be sewn shut and bandaged. However, if the wound was deep and life-threatening—

Rem: “I need to do something…”

Biting her lip tightly, Rem clenched her hands.

Her right hand, opposite the cane, was already smeared with blood that was not Rem’s. No matter how many times she tried to scrub it away, the blood on her hand had dried far too much.

Soon after Rem and Priscilla witnessed the flock of flying dragons from the bathhouse’s balcony, the black specks approaching from afar quickly turned into a threat, launching an assault on the city.

Some of the flying dragons hurled down large rocks from the sky, while some of them engaged in a cruel hunt, snatching the fleeing people from the ground to then drop them right back from great heights.

The citizens who lacked the strength to fight against either of these attacks, were nothing but easy prey.

Having been exposed to such danger, the people had rushed here for a shelter and center of treatment; that was the reason behind the misery currently present within the mansion.

One would think Priscilla to be greatly upset with such happenings, and yet—

Priscilla: “To begin with, the mansion was taken in order to make the precious healer’s whereabouts somewhere distinct, somewhere sound. Zikr and the others were also ordered to escort the wounded.”

Rem: “I-is that so…?!”

Priscilla: “What, did you really believe that I seized the mansion only for its bathhouse? The true reason, is for its bathhouse, and its spaciousness.”

And so, it should be noted that such an exchange had previously occurred.

In any case, Priscilla had allowed the wounded into the mansion. Apparently, Zikr, Mizelda, and other key personnel in the city had been informed of this.

Rem: “So then, I don’t know why I wasn’t told anything about it, being the most important aspect, but…!”

Because she felt that obtaining a satisfying answer was not possible, Rem did not probe it any deeper.

Above all, Rem had no time for worrying over Priscilla’s childish mischievousness. After all, injured people who required Rem’s help were being brought in one after another.

Rem: “Kuna-san and Holly-san, you two are…”

Holly: “Chieftain… Ah! Not anymore~! Former Chieftain Mizelda said this~!”

Kuna: “The more people die, the lower the morale will get. We don’t want fewer people to be able to fight, so we’re Rem’s guards. Leaving that aside…”

Cutting her words off there, Kuna narrowed her almond-shaped eyes. Because of the sharpness of the look, Rem stiffened, as Kuna indicated the wounded in the mansion with her chin,

Kuna: “Where’s that princess who was taking care of you? Don’t tell me, she’s relaxing in her room with all this mayhem going on?”

Holly: “If so, she’s a very heavy sleeper~. I am too, but even if I were snoozing and had my belly full, I’d wake up with this much noise~.”

To the pair’s questions, their tone differing in tension exquisitely, Rem shook her head sideways.

Certainly, Priscilla was the proprietor of a self-centered, arrogant personality, and it was understandable that the two of them would be concerned about her being so whimsical.

Rem: “Surprisingly, Priscilla-san is a very dependable person.”

And immediately following Rem’s comment on the absent Priscilla,

???: “—Kiryararahhh!!”

A high-pitched sound, like a strong wind blowing between buildings, descended headlong onto the front yard of the mansion.

Propping up a tremendous cloud of dust by scraping the lawn, was the massive body of a dragon possessing wings, which had just failed a landing from above. Its total wingspan would put the flying dragon at roughly four meters long; it landed in an unsightly manner, as if it had just flown for the first time.

Although, that was only natural.

The basic landing maneuvers that would normally have been founded in experience and instinct could not have been satisfactorily demonstrated, given its head had been smashed in.

Just then, right next to the crashed corpse of the flying dragon, a figure landed from the sky. A beautiful woman, the hem of her red dress fluttering, a jeweled crimson sword in her hand—Priscilla.

Priscilla: “You used me as a guard. This debt shall cost you greatly, Rem.”

Rem: “Thank you very much. I shall wash your hair as a show of my heartfelt gratitude.”

Priscilla: “How audacious of you, to attempt to get away with such a thing. I shall allow it. I am pleased with it.”

Priscilla acceded to Rem’s reply with a hawkish response given through the opened doorway.

She had been making full use of her extraordinary physical abilities to cut down and repel the flying dragons that had come soaring towards the mansion.

Witnessing this firsthand, Kuna and Holly, as would be expected, could not conceal their astonishment.

For some reason, Rem felt petty pride resulting from the reactions of those two. However, Priscilla, squaring off against the dragons, was not entirely free of concern.

The primary reason for this laid within the beautiful red-jeweled sword wielded in her hand—

Rem: “Priscilla-san, how is your Yang Sword doing…?”

Priscilla: “As you can see, the sun has darkened. For now, this is merely a blunt object that cannot be called a sword. Although…”

Having revealed that something was wrong with the Yang Sword, Priscilla turned back around.

In that instant, a flying dragon plunged towards Priscilla, its open mouth lined with ravenous fangs aimed at her back. Priscilla ruthlessly plunged the Yang Sword, dull as it was, into the dragon’s maw.

The fangs shattered as the tip of the Yang Sword pierced the back of the dragon’s throat with brutal force, killing it.

Priscilla: “Before me, a winged dragon amounts to naught, even with a blunt object that cannot cut.”

With a sweep of her sword, Priscilla tossed the dragon’s corpse to the edge of the garden. Having now easily disposed of the threat, she turned to notice Kuna and Holly standing beside Rem.

Priscilla: “Shudraqians, is it. I suppose you have come to protect Rem.”

Rem: “Priscilla-san, the two of them came to help the wounded…”

Priscilla: “Do not lose sight of reality because of romantic ideals. What use are the wounded on a battlefield? Who is the most valuable one here? Aside from me, it is you.”

Rem: “—Hk!”

Rem choked up, faced with Priscilla’s sharp rebuttal. Kuna nodded her head in affirmation of Priscilla’s ruthless assessment, “That’s right“,

Kuna: “It’s our role to protect Rem. And Rem’s role is…”

Holly: “To minimize the casualties, as much as possible~!”

Kuna’s hushed words were buttressed by Holly’s cheerful remark.

Burned by both of their words, and by Priscilla’s gaze, Rem admonished herself. Just the previous day, Rem had been feeling sorry for herself, for not being in such an important position.

No longer could she be complacent about her position. Above all, Rem herself had desired it.

Rem: “I will fight my battles myself. Kuna-san, Holly-san, thank you very much.”

Kuna: “Oh!”

Holly: “You’re the one in charge~!”

Kuna and Holly nodded, responding to Rem’s determination with encouraging smiles.

The two granting salvation to her feelings, Rem looked towards Priscilla. She had been defending the mansion until guards capable of protecting Rem arrived—

Rem: “You’re leaving, aren’t you?”

Priscilla: “It seems to me that there are many situations in which you shall not be able to stand without me. Zikr will know how to dispense with the lack of strength, but he shall not be able to stand up to the enemy’s main force.”

Rem: “The enemy’s main force being…”

Priscilla: “—Naturally, that would be a Divine General.”

Rem gulped, as Priscilla answered with one eye closed.

The existence of the Nine Divine Generals was a critical factor affecting the tide of war in the Empire. In order to recruit as many of them as possible, Subaru, Abel, and the others had set out for Chaosflame.

Nevertheless, the fact that one of the Nine Divine Generals was attacking this city was no coincidence.

Priscilla: “Of course, this is the doing of someone from within the opposing party. Abel’s situation looks increasingly bleak. How come he built something upon such shoddy foundations?”

Rem: “I can’t say anything about that, because I don’t know much about how Abel works. Leaving it at that, I’m sure it would have been very difficult for the people around him…”

While Rem had many qualms about Subaru, she did not believe Abel’s attitude was a commendable one either. Abel, who stood out for his arrogant behavior stemming from his cleverness, foresight, and ability to read the situations, was a difficult opponent for Rem, who had no memories to support herself with.

Being at the top of the country, he must have been surrounded by a great many people. It was very unlikely that all of them would have accepted his ideas and obeyed him so easily.

That was also why a rebellion had been raised. However—

Rem: “Nonetheless, to allow something as terrible as this because of that…!”

Rem, who had built herself upon a fragile foundation, appealed to Priscilla with her gaze.

Priscilla produced a scoff, accompanied by a smile, due to Rem’s exclamation, as if suggesting she knew what she was thinking. As Rem’s eyes widened in response, Priscilla turned away, the smile disappearing as if it had never existed at all, Priscilla: “This flock of flying dragons can not be explained through the taming of flying dragons. This General First-Class must have sprouted during mine absence. If what Serena spoke was true, a comrade of hers became the Flying Dragon General.”

Rem: “Surely, the Ninth… That person should be somewhere in the city…”

Priscilla: “—The City Hall.”

Rem: “…”

Priscilla: “If the enemy is not too foolish, that is where they shall head. After all, they have a direct path to it, cleaving through the skies. There is no reason why they would overlook the commanding post.”

Rem’s thoughts became clouded for a moment due to the obviousness of such a remark.

However, as soon as those words registered in her mind, she was immediately struck by the urgency of the situation. However, Priscilla’s calm and nonchalant demeanor brought Rem to the verge of panic.

Rem: “I-isn’t it a crisis that the command post is being attacked?! Priscilla-san?!”

Priscilla: “Fool. Plump though he may be, Zikr yet remains a General of the Empire. He shall not perish that easily, nor he is so foolish as to keep by his side those who cannot do battle.”

Rem: “That is… Ah. Speaking of those who can’t fight, Schult-san!”

Reminded of the boy who had left the mansion before Priscilla and Rem started bathing, Rem grew anxious.

Hardworking but clumsy, Schult was a boy with no more power than those that needed Rem’s help.

If only he had someone, an adult he could rely on, to join up with, but if not—

Rem: “Priscilla-san, quickly, please hurry!”

Priscilla: “At the very least, it is your duty to earnestly beseech me for my safety. In fact, you needn’t be in such a hurry, Schult shall not die so easily.”

Rem: “Huh…?”

Replying with a casual demeanor, Priscilla snorted at Rem, who was impatiently motioning with her hand.

Rem furrowed her eyebrows into a frown, not understanding the meaning behind Priscilla’s words. Kuna and Holly, naturally, had no clue as to them as well, their faces conveying confusion with that child’s appearance as the reason.

How could she be certain that Schult, wielding only his cuteness and diligence as weapons, would be safe?

Facing the skeptical eyes of Rem and the others, Priscilla put her hand on the door of the mansion, keeping them out of the way of the flying dragons’ onslaught.

Priscilla: “—Because he has won mine favor with his charm and bravery, you know.”

And with that answer, the door of the mansion was closed.

3

A harsh, dull thud rang out, and Flop felt his soul crushed under the weight of his own helplessness.

The pain from the pebble stopped him in his tracks, a tragedy that did not even allow him to reach out.

He wished to shut his eyes, to avert his face from their demise, but he did not. Doing so, he believed, would mean running away from his responsibility, stemming from his powerlessness, from his inability to do anything.

At the very least, he himself had to ascertain the result of what he had done, and of what he had been unable to do.

With such modest resolve, Flop refused to look away.

And then—

Madelyn: “What, are you?”

Madelyn swung down the Flying Winged Blade in her hand, intending to slice her prey in two with its sharp edge.

Undoubtedly, she had tried to cut both of them in half simultaneously, the disgraceful Heinkel and Schult, who tried to protect him, alike. It was not as if she had paused midway through her attack.

And yet—

Schult: “Uhh, uhhh…!”

Gnashing his teeth firmly with a groan, Schult covered the fallen Heinkel.

His body had been neither torn nor crushed. However, Madelyn’s blow should have caught him squarely in the back of the head, shattering it.

In fact, Flop had witnessed the blow with his very eyes, and had heard its dull sound.

However, only the dull sound had echoed.

Madelyn: “—?”

Madelyn tilted her head, her curious eyes repeatedly moving back and forth between her weapon and the back of Schult’s head. Her head still inclined, Madelyn brought the Flying Winged Blade down on Schult once more.

Once, twice, three times, four times, over and over again, in rapid succession—

Schult: “No, no, please stop! It hurts!”

Madelyn: “That’s strange. I, the dragon, intended to kill. Why don’t you die?

Flop: “That… Maybe, your reluctance towards killing a person’s making your hand slacken just before the weapon hits… Guah!”

Madelyn: “Don’t make fun of this dragon!”

Lamenting about not understanding a thing, Madelyn’s ire was directed at Flop.

She sent a stone larger than the one she had used to stop Flop in his tracks previously flying with a punt; it hit him square in the chest, knocking him flat on his rear.

His sternum creaked from the force of the impact, leaving Flop no longer able to breathe properly.

However—

Schult: “O-ouch, it hurts…”

It was a fact that, Schult, having been struck again and again by the sharp blade, grunted in pain, yet did not die. This bizarre occurrence ultimately sparked an outburst from Madelyn.

As her hand grabbed Schult’s peach-colored hair, hoisting his body, Madelyn gnashed her teeth together.

And then,

Madelyn: “You, what in the world are you hiding…?”

Schult: “~~Hk!”

While being hoisted up, Schult screamed in agony. But Madelyn’s reaction, as she turned her angry eyes towards him, exceeded his.

Madelyn’s golden eyes widened, her lips quivering with a wince. Flop, teary-eyed with pain, could nonetheless make out what had made her react in such a way.

A dramatic change in Schult's appearance had been triggered.

That change was—

Utakata: "Schult's eyes, they're burning."

Utakata, witnessing the same scene, succinctly and accurately described it so.

At first glance, what Utakata had pointed out made no sense, yet there existed no better way to describe what was happening. From Flop's perspective, it was precisely as she had described it.

It was a thing most unusual; in both of Schult's red eyes, a flickering flame blazed.

Schult: "Eh, eh, eh…"

However, the one being talked about himself, Schult, was oblivious to this fact, blinking his eyes, his face conveying that he was unable to make sense of the reactions of the people around him. His wandering eyes eventually landed upon his own face reflected in the Flying Winged Blade that had struck him, then realized what it was that had drawn everyone's attention.

Schult's features, reflected in that curved blade, appeared distorted, but he could clearly see the fire burning in his eyes.

Schult: "Wh-What is this? H-hot! Ah! It's not hot!"

While running his hand all over his face, Schult exclaimed about his inability to feel the flames.

PRISCILLA'S SERVANT

It appeared that, while it was not like his face had just burst in flames spontaneously, the cause of the fire was still inexplicable. However, only Flop and his companions were puzzled as to the meaning of the flames.

Looking into Schult's face, Madelyn found her cheeks stiffening in astonishment, as she recognized the conflagration blazing within the child's two eyes.

Consequently, she exclaimed her suspicion.

Madelyn: "You… can't possibly be friggin' related to that foxperson?!"

Schult: "Fox…"

Flop: "Person?"

Utakata: "—?"

Agitated, Madelyn batted her eyes because those three people had no inkling as to what she was talking about.

Without the mental leeway to notice her tone of voice breaking just before it actually did, she was overcome by strong surprise and confusion, staring at Schult.

The hand gripping Schult let go of him, and the boy, falling forward with a "Wah!", dropped to the ground. Madelyn kicked off the ground with force in front of the boy, who was again covering Heinkel.

Madelyn: "…"

In one go, Madelyn's figure leapt, ascending to the sky above the street.

Its abruptness and velocity made it appear to Flop as if she had simply vanished. However, the ground that she had stepped on caved in violently and in addition, the building she had utilized as a foothold to accelerate her motion crumbled.

Madelyn, having risen high up into the air in such a manner, lifted the Flying Winged Blade aloft in both her hands with all her might.

Madelyn: “Yer friggin’ getting in this dragon’s way again… Friggin’ disappear, YOU NUISANCE—!!”

That voice of protest echoed through the air, and the Flying Winged Blade swung down, furiously approaching the ground.

Its principle was the same as how the flying dragons threw their stones, but the force behind the readied blade was orders of magnitude greater. Unlike the large rocks being hurled without aim, this blade aimed to cleave Schult’s body in two.

By some underlying logic, Schult’s body had become sturdy.

However, being struck again and again still caused Schult to cry out in pain. Meaning that it was not that his body had become impervious to the impact from her blows.

Moreover, no matter how sturdy their body may be, a child would still cry out if they were in pain—

Flop: “If I don’t do something, Medium will be angry with me.”

Enduring the pain of his creaking chest, Flop rushed towards Schult.

He knew not just how much of a shield his body would be in face of that attack. But if he were to lessen the impact even ever-so-slightly, saving Schult, he would be satisfied.

Devoid of any more time to think, Flop exposed himself to the menace that was the Flying Winged Blade,

???: “—Well done.”

Unknowing of the reason, he clearly heard that voice even though it was not a loud one; there was a crash, and the impact of violent, mutual blows produced light that scorched Flop’s eyes.

Flop: “…”

This radiance, was produced by a bright-red jeweled blade clashing with the side of the rapidly spinning Flying Winged Blade approaching from directly above.

Crimson light burst forth silently, and Flop felt the false sensation of his whole body being enveloped by the wind.

With that over, what followed were the dull thuds of flesh hitting flesh.

Flop: “—Hk!”

Looking upwards, the figure of a person flew through the air at an angle accompanied with a cry of pain, crashing into a building on the ground. Flop quite belatedly realized that it had been Madelyn’s body who had so violently caused the stone building to crumble.

The one responsible for this was a beautiful woman adorned in red who landed in front of the breathless Flop and his companions.

Flop: “Princess-kun!”

Schult: “Priscilla-sama!”

Utakata: “Puu!”

Priscilla: “Should you not know by now? What you must shout at a time such as this, is praise.”

While leisurely brushing the hem of her dress, Priscilla stated such.

At a time the city was under siege by attacks from flying dragons, with even a Divine General being dispatched, her indomitable attitude and way of being was incomparably reliable.

In truth, she had just dealt a serious blow to Madelyn, and, in the process, rescued Flop and the others from a life-threatening situation.

Priscilla: “However, that you would have been kept at a place like this was something I was certain would not happen. I thought that you would naturally aim for the City Hall right away.”

Flop: “Yeah, we were struggling to decide if we should do so. Wondering if we should go to the mansion where Princess-kun and Wife-san are, or to the City Hall where Ballhead-kun is…”

Priscilla: “Absolutely not. That is precisely the target of the General First-Class who attacked the city.”

With a jerk of her chin, Priscilla stopped Flop from continuing, indicating the place where Madelyn had crashed into.

Hearing that, Flop’s mind was lost in thought for a moment, but readily dismissed that as unimportant for the time being. Then, he called out to Priscilla, “Princess-kun…”,

Flop: “Thank you for saving us. I’m going to find shelter together with Butler-kun and Miss Utakata, but please tell us where to go. I have to take Redhead-san with me as well.”

Priscilla: “Ho, so you can make a reasonable judgment? In that case, head for the mansion. It shall be safer there than in the City Hall, the focus of their assault. And…”

Priscilla’s line of sight shifted over, glancing at Heinkel, laying on the ground behind him. Priscilla narrowed her crimson eyes, then let out a minute sigh,

Priscilla: “Feel free to leave that behind. If it is of no help, then that is the end of it.”

Flop: “Unfortunately, that’s not going to happen. Redhead-san’s going to be a valuable asset once he wakes up, and most importantly, your precious Butler-kun went through a lot of pain to protect him.”

Priscilla: “…”

At the sound of Flop’s words, Priscilla’s gaze was suddenly set on Schult.

Water welled up in Schult's eyes, overwhelmed from having been saved in the nick of time by his master's appearance. Both his eyes still burned, the tears and the blaze making for a spectacle.

However, Schult did not express his anxiety over the strange situation that had befallen him; instead, he squeezed the leg of the fallen Heinkel,

Schult: "I-I will be carrying Heinkel-sama…! But, Priscilla-sama, what will…"

Priscilla: "There is some business that still requires being taken care of. Certainly, you comprehend."

Schult: "Y-es. Something great that only Priscilla-sama can handle…!"

How did that brave boy's faith, Schult's faith in her, affect Priscilla?

Priscilla, whose expression did not change, simply nodded mutely, accepting Schult's words. Without a moment's pause, she then glanced towards the alley,

Priscilla: "Avoid the main street, take the alleys at the side of tall buildings. Schult, you should recall the path."

Schult: "Yes! I walked down that path every day, diligently!"

Priscilla: "I shall give you my commendation."

After a brief note of praise for his efforts, Priscilla turned her back to Schult.

Her attitude was clear; time for chatting was over. Flop's instincts too, informed him that remaining in that place any longer was not a good idea.

If they stayed near Priscilla however, they would be safe from the threat of the flying dragons.

Flop: "Butler-kun, I'll need you to show me around. I'll somehow manage to carry Redhead-san. As for Miss Utakata, be on the lookout on the streets in our stead. I’m sure you’re used to hunting, I’ll be relying on you!”

Schult: “I-I understand. I will do my best to show you the way!”

Utakata: “…Uu understands as well.”

Utakata, visibly hesitant to run away for a second, nodded as she was given her part.

With this, the division of the roles was complete. All that remained was—

Flop: “Princess-kun! Thank you once again!”

Priscilla: “Gratitude or the like are needless. Nothing but words of praise towards mineself are required.”

With her back towards him, Priscilla responded to Flop’s gratitude. Chuckling at her frank demeanor, he proceeded to pick up Heinkel’s fallen body.

Tall and well-trained, his body was quite heavy. It was a good thing he was used to carrying Medium and escaping in times of emergency. Carrying his body over both shoulders like a piece of luggage, he was somehow still able to move.

Schult: “We must not forget this, either.”

And so, Schult picked up Heinkel’s fallen sword, gripping it tightly within his thin hand.

With that, Flop, Schult and Utakata briefly faced each other and nodded, only for them to then run into the alleyway, the mansion as their destination.

Before they had completely gotten away however—

Schult: “Priscilla-sama, this fire, was surely… Thank you so very much!”

With his burning eyes opened wide, Schult voiced his gratitude towards Priscilla.

4

—And so, after Schult and the others had left noisily and hurriedly.

Priscilla: “Schult, and that guy who named himself as Flop or something. Were that other man in such a predicament without such assistance, he would have been rife with bad luck.”

Amidst the street devoid of people, Priscilla quietly muttered this.

That comment was directed not to Schult, whose eyes blazed, nor to Flop, who made up for his inability with tact, nor to Utakata, her magnanimity too large for her size, but to the final person remaining.

He had survived in a situation that would have definitely killed him. It was nothing but the devil’s luck.

Although—

Priscilla: “It is doubtful that someone who does not perish when they should have, ought to be dubbed lucky.”

Not pity, but something close to pity had been inserted into those words.

It melted into the wind of the battlefield, laden with the scent of blood, and vanished, going unheard by anyone.

At that moment—

Priscilla: “…”

With a sound, the ornament that adorned Priscilla’s orange hair shattered.

By that, it did not mean that a fragile portion of the jeweled hair ornament had broken, rather that the entire ornament cracked and shattered to dust in one fell swoop.

Instantly, Priscilla’s long, collected hair unfurled, flowing down her back in waves.

And then—

Madelyn: “—You won’t friggin’ die either?”

Slowly, a shadow appeared in the street, alongside the sound of debris being kicked up.

There, a being whose entire body was smeared with dust, however, whose body itself was yet energetic—a figure with two black horns sprouting from her head, at which Priscilla narrowed her eyes,

Priscilla: “A dragonkin. Where was such an antique unearthed?”

Madelyn: “Are you friggin’ looking down on this dragon? Surely you don’t friggin’ believe you can get away without consequences, do you?”

Baring her teeth because of Priscilla’s words, the girl—Madelyn, squinted the dragon-like pupils of her eyes.

As she felt the draconic energy emanating from her small figure as if it were the wind, Priscilla gently stroked her unraveled hair with her hand,

Priscilla: “You seem to resent the fact that I am not dead, do you not?”

Madelyn: “Well, I should’ve friggin’ flattened those overinflated breasts. People who won’t die even if they have their hearts crushed are friggin’ annoying, no matter who they are.”

Priscilla: “—Even if their hearts are crushed, huh?”

Sighing at Madelyn’s manner of putting it, Priscilla looked downwards at the breasts the former had indicated; her own.

Priscilla’s ample breasts were more pronounced than usual, due to the constricting design of her dress, but Madelyn’s blow had certainly reached those prized breasts.

It had not been visible to Schult nor to any of the others, but battling in midair had been a painful experience.

Just as Priscilla's strike had sent Madelyn flying, Madelyn's counterattack had also struck a harsh blow to Priscilla's chest.

If it looked like Priscilla was looking at things like it was no big deal right now, that was because—

Priscilla: "Apparently, even my property itself is unwilling to see me lost to this world."

Madelyn: "—The Soul Marriage Technique."

As the unexpected words came out of Madelyn's mouth, Priscilla raised her eyebrows.

Madelyn kept glaring at Priscilla, pointing at a building in the street—No, far, far beyond it, far away to the southeast.

Madelyn: "You're the friggin' same as that foxwoman. Do you friggin' know her?"

Priscilla: "I do not. If you possess any idea about something similar to this of my own possession, then they are a rip-off of me. I am the original."

Madelyn: "—?"

Priscilla: "Do you not comprehend?"

Words she had never heard of before were hurled at Madelyn, confusion dawning on her visage. Consequently, Priscilla decided to make things simple in an attempt to clear up the confusion.

In other words—

Priscilla: "Much like someone with the awareness that this shall be a difficult affair for them, within yourself, you know you are no match for me."

Madelyn: "—Hk, are you making a friggin' fool of this dragon?!"

Priscilla: “Nonsense. As if you get to choose who you are. — Mineself is at the top, and everyone else is at the bottom.”

The moment she answered with a smile, Madelyn’s anger reached the boiling point.

The dragonkin, red-faced and with glowing golden eyes, roared, a threat looming before her eyes.

With Madelyn to her front, Priscilla glanced to the sky.

As if searching for the sky—Nay, searching for the hilt of the crimson treasured sword, which had the atmosphere as its sheath,

Priscilla: “Has the sunshine ceased? This shall be somewhat more complicated.”

5

—The shock and destruction began in one corner of the Fortress City, but did not end there.

???: “…”

The fierce battle had initially begun in the south side of the city, bringing forth a chain of destruction to a cluster of densely-packed buildings; in which seemed to be all too telling of the enormity of the cataclysm caused by the flying dragons, accompanied by a plume of smoke.

However, that which plunged the southern part of the Fortress City into a state of devastation was not the cataclysm brought by the flying dragons.

Of course, the hunt of the flying dragons, as they cast down large rocks from the sky, laying waste to the land below, was a calamity in itself.

When people running for cover in fear of the raining rocks showed up, the claws and fangs of the gliding flying dragons would rend and chew them to pieces, leading to the number of dead piling up on the streets.

Some would resist. Some would strike back by shooting their bows at the flying dragons, grounding them.

However, most people, exposed to the one-sided assault of the flying dragons, only sought salvation.

That, was just how immense and tremendous the damage caused by the flying dragons was.

But the fierce battle was so destructive, that even those flying dragons avoided approaching it.

Madelyn: “GaaaaaaaaaaAHHHHHHHHHHHH—!”

The howling, leaping little body clutched a mighty Flying Winged Blade with both arms.

The crooked blade adroitly sliced through the resistance of the wind and air alike, and, upon being thrown, would revolve to then return to its original position. For experts, it served as a throwing utility which could zone in on the heads of distant prey. However, it had been thrown with terrific energy, flying around, scything down everything in its path.

Its weight, sharpness, and destructive power all, were beyond comparison to the supposedly-small Flying Winged Blade.

If a conventional Flying Winged Blade were about the size of a one-handed sword, this one was as massive as two large swords joined together, and even heavier than ten large swords melted and cast together.

Once upon a time, ten swords, of Enchanted and Holy type both, holding special powers, were brought forth in this world.

This weapon, made of metal allegedly on par with those, fully demonstrated its power, a fiendish weapon that was far more deadly than it appeared.

With each throw, an area of several dozen meters would be shaved wholly; anything in its path, whether building or living creature, would be struck indiscriminately.

The dragonkin's unusual physical strength and mentality of caring naught for the resulting damage to the surroundings were the reason for these devastating tactics, which would have only been possible if the dragonkin had been able to destroy the south side of the Fortress City.

Those defying the flying dragons in various parts of the city, had no time to turn to look at the ground, ergo, did not come to notice it.

Of course, the sound of the roar and earthquake reached them, but they were far too occupied looking up at the sky, exchanging words with whomever was beside them, to pay any attention to the damage.

And that, was fortune amidst lack of it.

Had they been witness to the overwhelming destruction, they would have forgotten to even cling to the thin threads of survival, to drop to their knees.

To a certain extent, the existence of the rampaging dragonkin was a disaster of a kind apart from the catastrophe brought about by the flying dragons.

To be struck by two natural disasters simultaneously, in a single city, was nothing short of a nightmare.

And moreover, of those natural disasters, one was being brought about to destroy merely a single person.

Priscilla: "…"

Priscilla kicked the ground as if she were dancing, continuously avoiding the attacks in Madelyn's rampage.

Although the physical prowess of the dragonkin was not to be underestimated, Madelyn's fighting style lacked finesse. She had not learned any sort of martial arts. Perhaps, that was because she underestimated humans as inferior.

Priscilla: "Although, I have never learnt the martial arts myself."

If there was anything Priscilla recalled seeing well, the movements of those that wielded swords would be it. Aside from that, she held a perfect grasp of what her body was, and how it moved.

If there was a reason as to why she managed to handle the Yang Sword like a master, it was precisely because of that reason.

However, at a time she could not draw the Yang Sword, each blow of Madelyn's was a threat.

Priscilla: "…"

The daylight had ceased, the sun having dipped below the horizon.

There were certain rules for the utilization of the Yang Sword. The sun did not always shine. For half of a day, it shared its responsibilities with the moon, using the time to build up its strength.

If there was a sun that shone always, then that would be none other than Priscilla herself.

Although—

Priscilla: "The longer this takes, the deeper the wound shall be, is it?"

Priscilla was cautiously responding to Madelyn's attacks. Of course, the lack of the decisive Yang Sword was a pretext for her being unable to push through, but the high vitality of the dragonkin was also of concern.

If not slain in one fell swoop, Madelyn's counterattack would likely reach Priscilla.

Reaching a stalemate via mutual injury, much like how she had done the first time around, was not something that could be repeated over and over again.

If the conclusion of this kept getting postponed like this, the damage to the Fortress City would only spread.

Just as the southern part of the city had been directly razed by Madelyn’s destruction, elsewhere the casualties would continue to mount, as assault after assault by the flying dragons continued to rain down.

Besides—

???: “—Kiryararahhh!!!!”

Madelyn caught the Flying Winged Blade gliding in return, then planted both her feet on the ground; proof of her fighting spirit. The dragonkin’s continuously rising spirit, transmitted through the air, inspired the flying dragons in the city’s skies.

For humans, it would be a morale-boosting phenomenon, but it had the effect of arousing the instincts of the fiercest species living in the wild, an effect that ought to be dubbed as madness.

Were the flying dragons to become more and more ferocious, more and more aggressive, they would become literally unmanageable.

She desired to get things moving before that came to pass. To that end—

Priscilla: “I need one more move.”

To make the situation move forth, she needed some kind of grand move.

Priscilla: “…”

Ducking under Madelyn’s attack and taking a great leap forward, Priscilla stood amidst the collapsed cityscape.

The city touted as the Fortress City, its robustness the pride of its residents, a pillar of peace and tranquility, was now a shadow of its former self. Even after this calamity had been driven away, reconstruction would be no easy task.

However, all those things would only be an issue after the great disaster before it had been eliminated.

Madelyn: “Next, will hit…!”

As she continued to lay on these insipid attacks, which Priscilla was able to repeatedly dodge with ease, Madelyn roared like a beast.

But she was also slowly correcting her tactics, all whilst she kept on launching unsuccessful attacks. It would be excellent if she were an enemy possessing scarce will to learn; but as that was not the case, she would grow during battle.

Madelyn exhaled sharply a white breath in front of Priscilla, hoping to avoid any further development.

The dragon’s blood circulated through her body, the rise in body temperature provoking steam to rise from the girl’s diminutive frame.

Combined with the white breath, her figure seemed as though it were even enveloped in white smoke—

Priscilla: “—Nay.”

How odd, so thought Priscilla as she closed one eye shut as she peered towards Madelyn.

As the battle protracted further, it was no wonder that the dragon’s blood had awakened. It was also clear that Madelyn’s budding emotions, dragonkin as she was, were causing the flying dragons to become frantic.

However, amidst the climate of the Vollachian Empire, her exhaled breath was white and misty.

Not to mention—

Priscilla: “It is not possible for it to snow.”

Glancing around, Priscilla noted white flakes falling languidly at the edge of her vision.

Slowly but surely increasing, snow fell upon the Fortress City, while most of the shelters protecting its people were being lost.

Words like “rare” did not suffice to describe this event, one could call it a sort of natural disaster.

In Vollachia, there were more than a few people who had never witnessed snow.

To be struck by two natural disasters simultaneously, in a single city, was nothing short of a nightmare, as had been stated.

But what if there were a new natural disaster, a third one, that coincided with it?

Would that be a nightmare or—

???: “—That’s enough.”

A voice echoed from the ground, amidst the cold drops from the heavens slowly falling upon them.

A beautiful, yet resonant sound, akin to the ringing of a silver bell.

—This third natural disaster, if it were to coincide with the others, would it be a nightmare?

—Or could it be a grand move?

???: “I’m in a bit of a hurry, but I can’t let this pass. —I’m reaaally angry.”

In that place where anything and everything had met the onslaught of a great disaster, the footsteps of a silver-haired young girl echoed.

In search of her missing knight, a Witch, accompanied by snow, had come to the Fortress City.

Chapter 57B:
I Don’t Mind Being Called a Moron

1

—Once she became unaware of Natsuki Subaru’s whereabouts, Emilia panicked and made the biggest commotion of her life.

Emilia: “Please, Subaru… I really hope you’ll be alright with Rem.”

The tempest of the shadows which attacked the Pleiades Watchtower, that was when both Subaru and Rem were blown away—Nay, to be precise, it was not just those two. She knew there had been one more unknown component alongside them.

That Emilia had gotten through that without losing her composure, was because Beatrice and Ram, who had a connection to those two, had confirmed their survival.

Of course, even if they were alive, the possibility they could come face-to-face with something dangerous or scary still existed.

In fact, it was because he had to save the sleeping Rem in an unknown land, that it was definitely, absolutely assured that Subaru would act recklessly. However, because Subaru did not have Emilia, nor Beatrice with him, he must have been in quite the panic.

Emilia: “I have to hurry and find them…!”

With that resolution, Emilia and the group that had proceeded to conquer the Pleiades Watchtower moved out.

For starters, they had to find a way to enter the land to the south believed to be where Subaru had gotten blown off to, the Vollachian Empire—the country which had forbidden travel to and from the Kingdom of Lugunica.

???: “We’re gonna try ‘n tackle this one from Kararagi. Security might be laxer in Kararagi in comparison, as Lugunica and Vollachia've been havin' a stand-off."

Those were Anastasia's words, promising to cooperate with the search for Subaru.

Anastasia's group, of which Julius and Echidna were a part of, were believed to not have much to spare by any means, having had such a torrid experience at Pleiades Watchtower.

But that they had still offered to do that for Subaru's group, was something that made Emilia very happy.

Emilia: "I'm very glad I became friends with Anastasia-san."

Anastasia: "Weeell, I think we're a wee bit different from friends. Like before, our positions'll stay that of rivals 'n whatnot. But…"

Emilia: "But?"

Anastasia: "After this Natsuki-kun 'n Royal Selection business's all done 'n dusted, how 'bout we become friends? I'm much like Emilia-san, in that I ain't got many friends."

Saying so with a light-hearted attitude, Anastasia promised to lend her strength to them.

Despite knowing that now was not the time, to Emilia, that promise —the one for Subaru's search, was something she was also glad for. However, the day in which the fulfillment of her promise for them to become friends was one she longed for.

And—

???: "If Anastasia-sama will devise a means to go through Kararagi, then us trying to simply find a way through the Vollachian border would be the best plan, wouuuldn't~ it?"

Having reunited with Emilia and the others once they came back from Pleiades Watchtower, Roswaal, understanding the urgency of the situation, respected Emilia's desire to search for Subaru immediately.

However, even using Roswaal's rank and power, it appeared that entering the Vollachian Empire was not a matter so simple. And even should they fly in, it seemed flying dragons would gnaw at them.

Even having earned Roswaal's approval, entry into the Empire would not be easy.

Above all, though it was called an Empire, it was very large. Even if they somehow managed to cross into it, they did not know if they could find Subaru's group right away.

In the middle of this increasingly agitating situation, a proposal to break this deadlock came from someone who yet again proved his reliability.

???: "About the way to get into the Vollachian Empire, I may or may not have an idea. However, it is not quite the commendable way, and there is some risk to it."

So was stated, breaking the ice with some hesitation, by the one whose return coincided with the Emilia group's return home, Otto.

That person, having stayed in the Watergate City of Pristella to recover, returned alongside Garfiel, who had remained alongside him, and indicated a path towards hope for Emilia's group, who was greatly troubled over their challenge.

However, those means were decidedly—

Otto: "—Entering via smuggling. In Picoutatte… One of the Five Great Cities to the south of Lugunica. I may be able to prepare a means for you to enter from that city, my hometown."

Entering through smuggling was the furtive passage into the nation, circumventing the regular procedures and arrangements.

As Otto had said, it was not a very commendable method, and it was undeniable that it was quite the dangerous choice were they to be found.

However, if there was no other way.

Emilia: “We have to do everything we can for them.”

Steeling her strong resolve, Emilia conveyed her resolution to everyone else.

Nobody said anything like “Let’s not” to Emilia’s resolve, even Ram and Otto who were under a lot of stress. Everyone prayed for Subaru’s safety.

Emilia was most proud of that, above anything else.

???: “No matter what it takes, we’ll bring back Subaru safely, in fact. We will do it, I suppose.”

Emilia: “Yeah, that’s right. —Let’s do our best.”

Her hand being gripped tightly by Beatrice’s own, the one most anxious about the estranged Subaru, Emilia answered gently, by tightening her grip in return.

And then, in Otto’s hometown, going through a quarrel with Otto’s old acquaintances that were after his life; going through Petra’s handsome negotiations with the group who would smuggle them across the border, and aided by the bridal panic concerning Frederica’s special constitution, the group searching for Subaru crossed the country, and—

Emilia: “—That’s enough.”

In the Fortress City with madness swirling about, Emilia, who brought down snow, proclaimed so.

2

Numerous buildings collapsed, as the once-beautiful cityscape collapsed with nary a trace of it remaining.

And yet, Emilia’s anger only soared as she observed large figures moving left and right through the sky from afar, making complete use of their wings to crush the lives of people.

Just how could they do such a terrible thing?

Could there have been a better way to do it, and had they even made a proper effort at finding it?

Nevertheless, even the one who believed this, Emilia herself, could not think of a way to halt the fight at this moment aside from using her own power, which was frustrating.

That was why, Emilia would be as frustrated as she could be, trying to not forget that feeling.

To that end—

Emilia: "—Ice Age."

Around Emilia, as she muttered this, the world started to lose its heat at a furious pace.

The air slowly cooled, white snowflakes began falling gently from the chilling sky. Rapidly, without exemption, Emilia blanketed the city's perimeter with cold.

With great care, adjusting the magic power, being cautious to not overdo it.

She could not afford to err, and let the city turn to ice like the Great Forest of Elior, Emilia's homeland. Needless to say, even if she had thoughts of melting it later, to cool it down to the point of suspended animation, like Regulus's wives, was strictly forbidden.

All Emilia had to do, was to bring an unbearable ice season to lands unacquainted with the cold, those of the Empire.

The biting cold wind, the falling white snowflakes accumulating, the white breath of the magical season of ice, would cover the Fortress City struck by this flying dragon cataclysm.

And then—

Priscilla: "Dragonkind is weak against the cold. And when it comes to flying dragons, which have never known freezing cold, the harshness will be even more pronounced on their wings.”

With that, a figure leapt onto the half-destroyed wall on which Emilia stood, accompanied by the light sound of footsteps.

Glancing over, Emilia then nodded with a “Yes”,

Emilia: “Before I took off, Petra-chan told me that flying dragons don’t like the cold. She’s reaaally good at studying, and learned a lot about the Empire very quickly.”

Priscilla: “So you relied on the wisdom of your servant? No wonder, you had me thinking it was a decent plan, for a half-devil devoid of wisdom.”

Emilia: “There’s no need for you to put it like that. Besides, how do you know that I’m a half-elf… Huh?”

And then Emilia rounded her amethyst eyes, her lips forming a pout because of how the other person had spoken.

A woman in a red dress, her long orange hair blowing in the cold wind; her hairstyle was different from what she remembered, but there, was—

Emilia: “Huh, Priscilla? Why are you here? This isn’t Lugunica, you know?”

Priscilla: “I shall return you with the same thing. Although, I have an idea as to why you have set foot in the Empire… How did you cross into the country?”

Emilia: “Oh, the method is a secret. I’m not supposed to tell you. I’m also supposed to hide who I am. So I have to be careful. I…”

Emilia was surprised to see Priscilla, a woman she had never expected to lay eyes upon in this foreign country to the south, yet she was strangely moved by the sight of her.

However, she could not stay just being surprised there. The manner through which Emilia had entered the Empire was an irrational act, something labelled as a misdeed.

Therefore, she did not want to make that clear to Priscilla unless necessary.

But—

Emilia: “—! Priscilla, look out!”

Interrupting what she was about to say, Emilia prompted Priscilla to pay heed.

The next moment, Priscilla, clicking her tongue, bounced away, and a blade—a Flying Winged Blade, spinning furiously, gouged out the spot she had been at.

The battered, near-collapsed wall, was cleanly sliced away by the sharpness of the blade, and conversely, it was miraculously spared from collapsing. Priscilla, having managed to avoid the blade, landed closer to Emilia this time, right next to her, the hem of her dress fluttering.

And—

Madelyn: “One after the other, what the frig’ are you people?”

The girl’s voice, full of wrath, reached Emilia as the former caught the returning Flying Winged Blade with a single hand.

Looking down towards the destroyed cityscape, amidst it stood a horn-wielding girl, her bright eyes glaring at Emilia and Priscilla standing side-by-side.

It seemed the one standing there was very angry. But Emilia was very angry as well.

Therefore, Emilia jabbed her finger out toward the girl,

Emilia: “My name is Emili… Emily! I’m just a Spiritual Arts User passing through!”

Almost giving out her real name in the heat of the moment, Emilia succeeded in giving a false name that had been previously agreed upon. Priscilla’s eyes narrowed at Emilia’s boldness, and the little girl, to whom Emilia had introduced herself to, muttered, “Spiritual Arts User…”, with a wary look in her eyes.

Madelyn: “Are you the friggin’ same as that doggirl…?”

Priscilla: “If Arakiya is the one you are thinking of, she is a Spirit Eater, not a Spiritual Arts User. That would be a misconception, Madelyn Eschart.”

Madelyn: “Guh…”

Priscilla’s point was as if she had read the thoughts of the little girl —of Madelyn, which made the latter’s cheeks become stiff. However, there had been something just now that Emilia could not help but hear more about.

Emilia: “What is a Spirit Eater? What do they do with Spirits?”

Priscilla: “It is exactly as you have heard, she feeds on Spirits. They take their power onto themselves and utilize it to the fullest. It is a practice near extinction, Arakiya being the last remaining user in the Empire.”

Emilia: “They eat Spirits?! How awful…”

For Emilia, a Spiritual Arts User who had forged Contracts with many Micro Spirits herself, this was a bewildering thing to hear.

If Puck or Beatrice were to meet a Spirit Eater, would their forms be gobbled up? Just thinking about it made her feel sorry for them.

However, rather than worrying about such things that had yet to happen, the priority right now, was the problem at hand.

Emilia: “You’re, Madelyn-chan?”

Madelyn: “…Do not belittle this dragon, you half-devil.”

Emilia: “Then let’s talk it through properly, Madelyn. You’re the one who’s having those flying dragons attack the city. I want you to stop this, right this instant.”

Turning her gaze into the distance, Emilia looked out beyond the place Madelyn had rampaged in, at a group of flying dragons resuming their assault on the other side of the city. Their movements seemed to be slower than they had been a moment ago, albeit slightly.

Emilia's power was lowering the temperature, which was in turn affecting the vitality of the flying dragons.

Were things to proceed in this manner, it would be possible to ground the flying dragons in the area. However, she wished to avoid doing that if possible. She did not want to have the flying dragons die, either.

Emilia: "If you care about the flying dragons, then please listen to my request."

Madelyn: "…"

Emilia: "Madelyn?"

As honestly as possible, Emilia tried to convey her words.

Perhaps Otto, Ram, and Petra could have communicated better. But upon seeing the city being attacked by a flock of flying dragons, Emilia had been the only one to rush towards it.

Now that Emilia had been first on the scene, she would do everything she could to help.

As a result—

Madelyn: "It's extremely friggin' conceited of you to make a request to this dragon, you human…!"

She would do so even if it sparked Madelyn's anger.

Priscilla: "—She cannot be persuaded by anyone, even were it not you. It is not an auspicious thing to listen to the words of a dragonkin, let alone one who is firmly grounded to the earth."

Faced with Madelyn's reply laced with outrage, Emilia held her breath upon hearing those words. Priscilla, who had been silently listening to the exchange between the two, expressed her observations regarding the breakdown in negotiations.

Emilia widened her eyes, as that seemed to be encouraging her.

Emilia: “Priscilla, I always thought you were so mean to me.”

Priscilla: “I do not consider it wicked to say that that which is not worthy, is not worthy. Do not pervert my benevolent words. —Now, how shall we go about this?”

Emilia: “Hmm.”

Nodding, Emilia created a hairclip of ice in her outstretched left hand. Presenting Priscilla with the hairclip, the latter closed one eye with suspicion.

Towards Priscilla’s reaction, Emilia nodded in assent, and,

Emilia: “Let’s stop that girl together. Don’t be mean.”

Priscilla: “Do not demean my deeds as a manifestation of childishness, you lowly half-devil.”

Striking back with an insult, Priscilla accepted the hair clip from Emilia’s hand, then gathered her long, flowing hair, and fastened it in place. Hearing the clasp of ice clicking together, with Priscilla’s mood returning to the one she was acquainted with, Emilia then turned to Madelyn below.

And—

Madelyn: “—People who are fearless regarding dragons are so friggin’ tedious.”

Emilia: “I just had a fight with a big Dragon a while ago. So…”

Madelyn: “—Hk.”

Emilia: “Even if you wanted me to be scared, I can’t be scared of you!”

Madelyn's threat as she brandished her white fangs was given a clear-cut answer by Emilia.

Immediately afterward, Madelyn's eyes narrowed like those of a ground dragon, and the Flying Winged Blade in her hand was hurled ferociously, targeting Emilia and Priscilla with tremendous momentum and speed.

Witnessing its spinning approach, Emilia created a large hammer of ice, holding it in both hands.

Emilia attempted to repel the revolving Flying Winged Blade with an upwards swing of her hammer of frost coming from below.

Emilia: "Hiya!"

Feeling a powerful recoil in both her hands, Emilia, rushing in, did her utmost possible with the upwards swing of the icy mallet. Though just barely, she deflected the trajectory of the Flying Winged Blade, which passed over the heads of both Emilia and Priscilla.

But the ice hammer shattered with incredible force, and Emilia looked down at her hands, speaking,

Emilia: "So strong… Maybe stronger than I am…"

Madelyn: "That's friggin' natural! It is wrong to compare I, the dragon, to people using the same standard—"

The petite form of Madelyn stepped forward in triumph over the pained Emilia. —Only for a block of ice more massive than the City Hall to come crashing down on Madelyn's head.

Madelyn: "—Hk?!"

The sudden appearance of the mass of ice, coupled with its size and weight, caused Madelyn to be at a loss for words, then her figure was flattened.

Shockwaves of cold surged in all directions, centered on her; white winds blowing away debris and crumbling buildings, eliciting tremendous destruction.

Priscilla: “You, how dare you destroy this city?”

Emilia: “Huh?! But it was already destroyed…”

Priscilla: “You have a rather superficial way of looking at things. I am sure that manservant must be very weary. Nevertheless, you shall finally understand.”

Emilia: “Finally, understand?”

Looking at the spot where the ice block had fallen, Priscilla crossed her arms and narrowed her eyes. Emilia cast a question towards her profile, yet the answer arrived simultaneously, from Priscilla’s lips, and from the spectacle in front of her.

The ice block that should have crushed Madelyn against the ground, trembled slightly, as a loud sound akin to that of the world cracking, began to echo from within the ice block itself.

It originated from the piece of ice that was supposed to have made ground, from where the girl had stuck her arm in the air at the point of impact.

Priscilla: “—Just how troublesome dragonkin can be.”

Immediately after Priscilla’s words, the long block of ice broke in half with a thunderous roar.

The impact of the destruction was felt throughout the entire area, and the shattered ice turned into Mana particles starting from the outside. Amid this scenery of ice shards scattered about, the very incarnation of a Dragon, a dragonkin, leapt towards the duo with a roar.

3

—Freezing winds raged, beautiful women danced across the battlefield where the throngs of destruction roamed.

Were anyone to witness the battle from afar, they would not have believed their eyes due to the sheer majesty of it.

Was it reality, or was it merely a dream?

Madelyn: "—RRRRRRAH!!"

With enough force to shatter the ground she was standing on, the small dragonkin threw swirling death.

A flying blade of destruction traced an arc; with beauty that betrayed the atrocious danger it brought forth, it cleaved everything in its path, it severed, it tore through the world.

Had this been a painting, or even a beautiful pruning of the world, rather than destruction, it would have been a beautiful sight for anyone's eyes to behold merely based on aesthetics.

Madelyn Eschart's anger was refined, instinctual rage, to that much of an extent.

However—

Emilia: "Priscilla! Go up!"

A heavenly beauty of dancing silver hair created footholds of ice in midair, dodging the Flying Winged Blade thrown at her; then waving her hand down towards the ground, the streets, lost of their original form, froze over.

Rising from the frozen earth, was a beautifully adorned sword of frost.

A beautiful princess, running as she made her way through, pulled it from the earth in a fluid movement, and,

Priscilla: "The fingers of anyone but me would have fallen off. — But the embellishments are acceptable. I shall utilize it."

A pale-blue slash of ice flashed, slashing through Madelyn's body diagonally.

However, Madelyn, with whatever kind of power was concealed within her petite body, only recoiled slightly upon being struck by the blow. Instead, the ice sword that had delivered the blow shattered.

And after that, the approaching Madelyn reached out a hand to Priscilla, and,

Emilia: “Hya!!”

Not allowing that act of violence to go unchecked, Emilia’s two feet hit Madelyn as she fell from directly above.

Both her feet encased in ice as she spun and drove a blow from up high, Emilia smashed into Madelyn’s two shoulders with a merciless attack, causing the sturdy girl to totter a step back.

In that instant—

Emilia: “Please!”

Priscilla: “Do not tell me what to do.”

After Emilia landed on the ground and put her hands, Priscilla took the newly-created pair of ice swords and leapt over the crouching Emilia to slash at Madelyn.

The frost blades in Priscilla’s right hand and left hand each came at Madelyn from different angles, yet were quickly caught by the latter with the claws of her outstretched hands, causing a high-pitched clanging sound to echo.

Madelyn: “Don’t push your luck…!”

Emilia: “Eryaaa!”

Having dealt with the twin swords, Madelyn was about to go on the counter when an icy spike passed right next to Priscilla’s head. Madelyn immediately leaned forward, while Emilia, switching places with Priscilla, fired an ice spear with speed that could not be gauged by human eyes.

Priscilla: “My turn.”

Once Madelyn shrugged off the spear, Priscilla followed it up with an icy sword dance.

The hem of her red dress fluttered, the twin sparkling blue swords of ice were swung gracefully, and Priscilla's sword's dance among the glaciated world of white pummeled Madelyn's entire body, forcing her back.

Madelyn: "—Why, whywhywhy, why, why the frig' is it like this?!"

So exclaimed Madelyn, while being forced to deal with Priscilla's twin swords, now on the defensive.

But Priscilla's onslaught did not slow down. And to make matters worse for Madelyn, once Priscilla ceased her swords dance,

Emilia: "This! And this! Hyaa!"

Making full use of extraordinary reaction speed, Emilia, leaping out without sparing Madelyn time to breathe, created ice weapon after ice weapon, to slam them down with all her might.

—Priscilla was the skill, Emilia was the brawn, and through them, Madelyn's offensive and defensive capabilities were shut down completely.

The Flying Winged Blade cleaved, smashed, swung, was thrown.

The innate physical abilities of a dragonkin were incomparable to those of a frail human. Even a demi-human, who was relatively more robust compared to a normal human, was as good as a dried-up twig before a dragonkin.

The same was true even for the oni race, which, abhorrent as it may seem, would be able to stand on the same ground beside the dragonkin.

Dragonkin and the oni, were sometimes spoken of alongside each other as the strongest of races, but that was something outrageous.

After all, the oni were merely a race superior among demi-humans. Dragonkin were fundamentally different from them.

Dragonkin were not demi-humans. They differed from those species related to the human race at a basic level.

Dragonkin did not belong to mankind. —But why was it playing out like this nevertheless?

Madelyn: “What the frig’ are you people… What the frig’ are you?!”

Leaving her offense to her anger and continuously failing to connect a blow, she had finally used up all her anger.

And so, after the dragon’s wrath was spent, all that remained was the dragon’s creaking wail. The Flying Winged Blade in her grasp was swung sideways, Emilia ducked, and Priscilla dodged it with a jump.

Then, from both above and below, the two sides answered Madelyn’s wail at the same time.

What are you, she had inquired—

Emilia: “—Emily!”

Priscilla: “I am mineself.”

An upraised greataxe of frost and two flashing blades of ice all scored a direct hit on Madelyn.

The sharp horns upon her head struck by blades of ice, and her torso slammed by a fierce blow from an axe of frost, Madelyn was sent flying, unable to stop those blows.

During her struggle, Madelyn’s body bounced once, then twice, high in the air above a thin layer of snow and without losing velocity she plummeted into a pile of debris, for a white plume of smoke to then rise accompanied by a loud crash.

Madelyn: “…”

Having left Madelyn’s hands, the Flying Winged Blade pierced the wall behind her, and thus, the wall’s role of protecting the Fortress City from threats to the south now came to an end.

With one last look at the walls collapsing with a loud thud, Emilia slowly rose to her feet, looking guardedly at the pile of rubble under which Madelyn had been buried.

Emilia: "…I suppose we did it."

Priscilla: "There was fitting recoil. Unfortunately, there was no bite to it."

Emilia: "Bite?"

Priscilla stepped forward next to Emilia, the latter tilting her head as she watched the twin swords in Priscilla's hands turn to dust. For some reason, she could not help but look at Priscilla's mouth, though she had not eaten anything.

Priscilla met Emilia's gaze with her crimson eyes, and spoke,

Priscilla: "Is this really all there is to someone that is not only a dragonkin, but one of the Nine Divine Generals, is what I am saying."

Emilia: "What are those, Nine Divinn Generals, and what's a dragonken, too? That's a demi-human, right?"

Priscilla: "A race stated to have died out long ago. They were said to possess the ability to communicate with Dragons, a race no longer to be found in this world, but I guess that is merely a superstitious myth."

Emilia: "Dragons… Does that mean they can talk to Volcanica as well? Volcanica's a bit out of it…"

At Emilia shyly attempting to break the ice, Priscilla raised her eyebrows. She then gently pressed a finger to her mouth,

Priscilla: "I never thought such a word would come out of your mouth. Are you perhaps mistaking something?"

Emilia: "—? Oh, you think I'm joking, perhaps? I'm not joking at all. I met with Volcanica a little while ago actually, but they were all out of it because they'd been alone for so long…"

Emilia hurriedly defended herself from Priscilla's reaction of disbelief. But Emilia quickly remembered her priorities, speaking "Now's not the time",

Emilia: "Now that we've beaten her, Madelyn needs to stop the flying dragons!"

Priscilla: "Considering this cold weather, all these slow-moving flying dragons shall be hunted down in due time."

Emilia: "And there'll be people in danger in the meantime, still! Even Subaru and Rem could be in danger…"

Priscilla: "—Hm."

Emilia leapt out from beside Priscilla, heading toward the rubble under which Madelyn had been buried. Behind Emilia's back, Priscilla furrowed her shapely brow at the exchange that had just transpired.

That reaction, however, went unnoticed by Emilia, whose long legs straddled the debris. Fashioning a shovel from ice, she thrust it into the rubble in an attempt to dig up the buried Madelyn.

Nevertheless, Priscilla let out a small exhale as she watched her back.

It was a good thing that the grand move that had arrived unexpectedly had resulted in lesser consequences. However, the enormous damage caused by Madelyn and the flying dragons was not something they could get rid of.

Worst-case scenario, they would have to consider relocating their base to the Demon City of Chaosflame and relying on her collaborator, High Countess Serena Dracroy, to aid them.

Priscilla: "In any case, we shall first have to make her fold up her wings."

Pausing to ponder about what laid ahead, Priscilla peered up to the white, cloudy sky.

With the immense quantity of Mana Emilia possessed, albeit it possibly had a limit as to its range, she still had enough power to alter the climate, meaning that she had a multitude of ways to make use of her power.

Of course, what was valued in Vollachia was not necessarily valued in Lugunica. Rather, if she did decide to live in Vollachia, it probably would not end up being a waste of time.

But, her nature aside, Emilia's personality was one that would not permit her to live in Vollachia—

Priscilla: "…"

So, as Priscilla drew thoughts in the sky, her eyes flickered dimly.

Those jewel-like crimson eyes flickered, as they had perceived a slight disturbance in the skies above.

Then, just as Priscilla understood the nature of that disturbance—

Emilia: "There you are! Madelyn, I'll get you out now. But please be a big girl, and tell us your story…"

Madelyn: "—Ah."

Emilia: "Huh?"

Having found the little girl buried in the rubble, Emilia utilized the ice shovel to dislodge the building's remains. The dragonkin girl was lying on her back, herself and her clothes covered in soot and snow, dirtied.

Emilia listened carefully, as the girl's lips moved and a faint voice escaped.

Hoping for words that accepted defeat, that would make the flying dragons retreat.

However, Emilia's hopes were dashed; what Madelyn's lips weaved was no declaration of defeat.

Only one word was muttered. A name.

Madelyn: “—Mezoreia.”

—The very next moment, the roar of a “Dragon”, its origin above the clouds, rained down destruction onto the land.

4

The instant the white beam of light was fired from the heavens, Emilia and Priscilla both sprang into action at the same time.

Without any sound or warning, a tower of ice sprung into being, growing from the ground; two beauties of silver and crimson jumped atop.

The tower had risen to be over ten meters tall in an instant. Standing on its summit, Emilia raised both of her hands up to the sky, conjuring forth a huge dome of ice which covered the area where the white beam was expected to impact.

And within the conjured dome, another, yet smaller dome was added, and then, yet another smaller dome was added, and so this went on, until six domes of ice covered the sky.

As Emilia set up their cover made from ice and snow, Priscilla stretched out her lustrous fingers into the sky and drew out the Yang Sword, which took the void as its sheath.

The treasured sword was adorned with many eye-catching jewels and had a bright-red radiance to it. However, the light brimming from inside remained feeble, nowhere near what it was at its peak.

Even so, Priscilla took up her treasured sword and looked up overhead.

The very next moment, the looming white beam of light crashed against the outermost dome, and in less than a second, it pierced through the first, second and third domes, racing towards the ground.

PRISCILLA'S SERVANT

However, it would be wrong to say that the domes that had been pierced and broken through had not fulfilled their purpose at all.

The moment the beam went through them, its angle changed slightly.

There were only slight changes with the first, second and third one, yet those became heftier with the fourth and fifth one. Finally, the instant the sixth one was broken through, the beam's manner of entry had certainly changed.

The white beam raced straight down towards the tower of ice, towards the two who stood at its pinnacle.

And so to meet it, came a deep crimson shimmer, which beautifully, vibrantly morphed into a flash of resistance, and thus, was it unleashed—

5

???: "…"

All sound completely disappeared; for the first time in his life, complete silence could be savored, for what seemed like ten seconds.

Perhaps it lasted for less than a second in actuality, but once that burst, the spreading shockwave, originating from the southern portion of the city, engulfed the Fortress City in all directions, and everything flipped over.

Ground rose from the surface, as buildings were ripped from their foundations. Those without shelter were blown away like dead leaves, and even the flock of flying dragons soaring in the heavens were assailed by the tempest.

Without mercy, without bias, the shockwave which engulfed everything bore down on everyone in the city.

Naturally, Flop, who was running around to treat the injured in the city's largest mansion, having been turned into a temporary treatment center containing those injured, was also rocked by the impact, being thrown back against the wall.

Flop: "—Huu."

As far as he could comprehend, it could have been a few seconds, or a dozen seconds, or even a few minutes.

He felt a powerful impact on his back that made it feel as if all of his internal organs were being turned inside out. He did not register much pain, but the possibility that the pain would come later, or he might have suffered from something so painful that he could not feel anything, also existed.

If that were actually the case, he would have liked to go on with his uneventful life, watch his little sister Medium lead a safe and happy life, savor the sense of accomplishment that he would have achieved in successfully taking revenge on the world, and stay unaware of it until he was old and on the verge of dying.

Once there, it should be impossible to distinguish whether he had died from his wounds or from old age.

Flop: "Let's see, maybe it isn't too serious…"

Being extra careful, he would raise his body after carefully assessing his own condition.

His arms and legs moved, and every single one of his fingers were still on his hands. He seemed fortunate enough to not be missing his ears or nose, and his eyes had not been crushed either. He could not let his guard down, but he should not be overly pessimistic either.

Shaking his head, Flop stood up, wiped his blurred eyes, and gazed at his surroundings.

The once-stately and magnificent decorations had been changed entirely from what they were before, and the inside of the mansion had become a hellscape dominated by the smell of blood and the sound of groans. Add to that the shockwave that had just hit, and the grim situation of the site became even grimmer.

Some of those who had been treated may have had their pain rekindled or made worse by the shockwave. They needed to ease their pain, to give them a helping hand.

Flop: “I wonder if Butler-kun and Miss Utakata are okay too…”

Leaving Priscilla to deal with Madelyn, whom they had encountered, Flop and the others joined up with Rem in the mansion and helped deal with the wounded as best they could.

He had also helped with that, while worrying about Priscilla and Schult, the latter’s eyes still ablaze even after he managed to calm himself down somehow.

Flop would not be able to rest in peace if it had all come to nothing due to that explosive impact.

???: “What in the world is…?”

As Flop looked around at the state of his surroundings, he heard a voice speak in a pain-filled tone.

Directing his eyes towards that voice, he saw Rem, peeking out from the depths of the hall. She was one of the people who had been attending to the seriously wounded who were in dire need of healing magic, and also one of the people who had been rendered astonished by the crash from just before.

Rem, grimacing as she held her cane, looked out the window to see what had occurred.

Flop, too, was alarmed, wondering if something more terrifying than a flock of flying dragons or one of the Nine Divine Generals going on a full-fledged rampage had happened.

And right after that—

Rem: “—How terrible.”

Rem’s eyes widened and her expression turned grim, panicking as she rushed towards the mansion’s door. Flop shouted “Wife-san!” at her back as she rushed out, wondering what she had seen outside.

Despite his aching sides and knees, Flop chased Rem as she rushed outside. As she reached the front garden of the mansion, she crouched beside a fallen figure.

It was yet another injured person, someone who had been flung outside by the earlier impact.

As he approached the crouching Rem, who was confirming the state of the figure, Flop now understood the dreadful effects of the impact from earlier, which he had not been able to see from within the mansion.

Flop: “This is…”

Flickering, white snowflakes were falling upon Guaral. The southern sky was covered with layers of thick clouds, through which the sun’s rays were pouring down.

Exhaling white breath, Flop shivered at the almost fantastical sight.

Suddenly, the temperature in the surrounding area had dropped dramatically, and to boot, a sight as spectacular as this currently unfolding. Even in a dream, such a scene would be hard to materialize.

Putting it a different way, he had the paradoxical thought that it was not a dream, to which Flop shook his head.

Rem: “Flop-san, please help me. We need to carry this girl inside…”

Flop: “Yes, of course. Even under this mysterious sky, we can only do what we’re able to get done. We’ve got to do the best we can—”

Turning around, Flop tried to help Rem. Then, halting his speech mid-sentence, Flop widened his blue eyes.

The reason was obvious, and it laid to Rem’s back, who was asking for his help.

The figure behind Rem, having been blown away by the earlier impact, and whom Rem had suggested they should take inside the mansion for medical attention, was a small one. It was small and dainty, possessing twin black horns on her head.

Then, perhaps dazed, the girl slowly raised herself up behind Rem; about to casually swing her arm adorned with sharp claws.

Flop: "…"

Once again, Flop experienced the sensation of sound fading away, of the flow of time becoming distorted.

As she was looking towards him, Rem was unaware of the threat that loomed behind her. That very threat, the girl, seemed to be acting out of defensive instinct rather than out of an actual intent to hurt Rem.

She must have gone through a terrible experience. He sympathized with her, but it was something unfortunate and unmanageable that would not change with sympathy.

Flop: "…"

Kuna and Holly, in charge of guarding the mansion, would probably take a while to recover from the impact from earlier. There was no sign of the girls within sight, he could not count on them to deal with this.

Schult, his eyes in a conflagration, Utakata, who had been assisting with medical treatment and supporting the fighters' morale, even Heinkel, who had fainted and would not wake up; none of them could be counted on to help them either.

When he closed his eyes, he could see his little sister, at the back of his eyelids, smiling.

He was proud of his sister, who had sworn to herself that she would become so strong that her brother would never be hurt. Multiple figures, that of his benefactor, and of his sworn brother, those who had given him and his sister the chance to go out into the world, passed through his mind.

—Treasure your life, Flop. Self-sacrifice's for morons.

Once before, his benefactor had laughed at Flop's reckless way of life.

At this moment, Flop would state the same thing he had back then.

Flop: "I don't mind being called a moron."

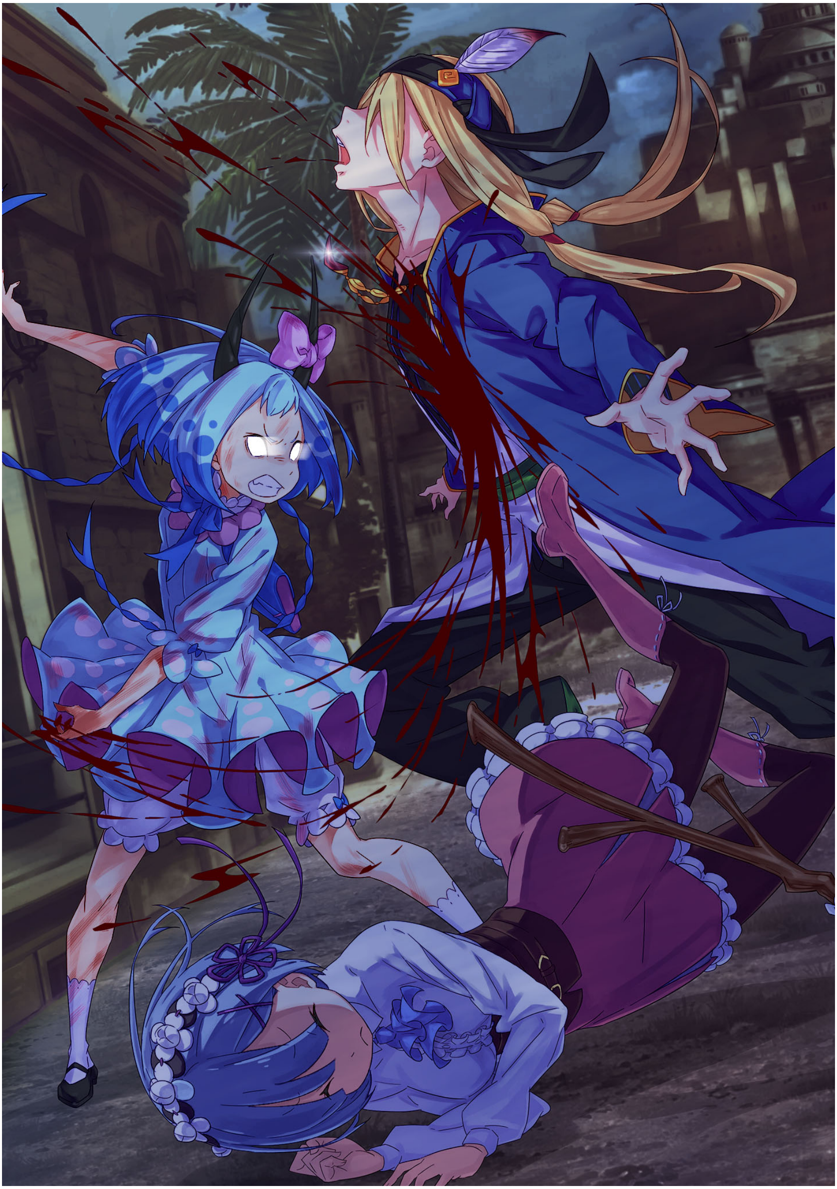
Because all those who loved him, had clapped their hands and laughed at his answer.

Rem: "Flop-sa—"

He stepped in, and with an outstretched hand, pushed on Rem's slender shoulders, putting her out of harm's way.

And, in the path of that swinging claw, that moron wedged himself instead.

—Blood sprayed, and Flop O'Connell fell to the cold ground.



Chapter 58B:
Those Who Have No Place to Turn To

1

—It was humiliating.

Her fangs creaked, gnashing together, her insides seethed with rage, her soul cracked in indignation.

What was she doing? She was being toyed around with by lowly humans, she was being driven into a corner without doing what needed to be done, she had been forced to play her trump card, knowing that such a deed should not have been performed.

???: “How friggin’ unsightly.”

It was a shameful display, she had exposed a state of herself which those who were dragonkin should never have shown so easily.

If any other dragonkin were present, they would have probably covered their faces because of this terrible situation. They would curse Madelyn for this predicament and for the shame she had brought to the dragonkin, before killing her; Madelyn was half about to die in a fit of anger anyways, directed at both herself and everyone else.

But, that would never happen.

There were no other dragonkin. Madelyn had always been alone. That was why—

—That was why, no matter what it took, she had to slay the person who had killed the one she desired as her mate.

???: “Flop-san, please help me. We need to carry this little girl inside…”

From the fringes of her bleary consciousness, she heard a voice that felt like it was coming from someone.

No, not from someone, that voice came from a human being. Given there were no other dragonkin, everyone who spoke the language of men was human, beings that differed fundamentally from herself.

And so, her head grew hot, faced with an all-too-familiar humiliation obtained at the hands of beings that differed from herself.

A woman of crimson, attired in a dress, and a woman of silver, who brought snow with her.

Those women had cooperated together with dreadfully high precision, searing Madelyn's consciousness white.

She raised her body, like someone was guiding her, and stretched her arm out towards where the voice was coming from.

She would tear apart the slender back before her eyes, and then—

???: "I don't mind being called a moron."

She heard a voice coming from someone else, and right after that, the silhouette before her eyes was replaced with another.

With that slender back pushed away, before her eyes, stood a slender someone. And that was whom she swung her claws at, which was followed by the feeling of recoil from a sharpness rending flesh not-so-shallowly in her hand.

???: "…"

Blood splattered everywhere; the slender figure collapsed helplessly, struck by the strength of a dragonkin.

I did it, was not what she was thinking. Ironically enough, the lack of response made her realize that the slender figure she had torn up, was not the object of her burning hatred.

Even so—

Madelyn: "So, who's the next one…?!"

That wants to be torn apart by my claws, or so she tried to bellow out, baring her fangs.

She kicked her now-felled opponent’s body, moving to surrender her body to the ferocity of looking for her next prey. And while doing so, she looked at the figure of her fallen enemy—

Madelyn: “…Huh?”

A man was lying on the ground, his long, golden hair furled out on the floor, his pale skin soaked with blood.

She did not know him. She could only roughly tell apart the particulars when it came to faces of those belonging to the human races, however, that man was not within the ones she could distinguish.

Therefore, what had grabbed her attention had not been the man himself, but rather, what he carried.

On the fallen man’s weak chest, which had been torn and laid bare, covered in blood, was an ornament which he wore from his neck, made from the fang of a beast.

—No, not from the fang of a beast.

It was from… It was from… Itwasfromitwasfromitwasfromitwasfromitwasfromitwasfrom—.

2

Rem: “…”

With Flop running towards her, shoving her by the shoulder, Rem fell onto the garden’s grass.

She had not expected that force. With no time to support herself, Rem’s body tumbled sideways onto the greenery.

However, to inquire Flop about what he had done all of a sudden, was unrequired.

For a far more telling answer was splayed out in front of Rem, in the form of bright vermillion.

Rem: “Flop-san!”

With her hands to the grass, Rem’s voice cracked because of that scene.

In front of her, lying on his back where Rem had just been a few seconds prior, was Flop, his body bearing deep gouges from the shoulder to the waist.

Four wounds, like those performed by sharp blades, sliced vividly through the front of Flop’s body.

And Rem immediately recognized that the wound was the result of his attempt to protect her.

And that it was the little girl Rem had run towards to give assistance, who had performed that deed.

Rem: “…”

A girl with sky-blue hair stood still, having swung her arm, blood dripping from the tips of her claws after she had gouged out Flop’s flesh.

Flop had been injured while protecting Rem from the little girl, who had attempted to murder her.

Immediately, Rem tried to pull herself up, as to check on his wounds,

Rem: “Let me through! Flop-san! Let me see your wounds… Kya!”

But as Rem attempted to approach Flop, she was interrupted by the little girl’s thin arms. The girl took a step toward Flop, standing in front of Rem, then grabbed Rem’s shoulder and pushed her down.

As Rem feared that she may even plan to finish Flop off, her blood raced through her whole body.

And just like that, the little girl’s arm grabbed Flop by the neck and, handling him roughly, forced him to stand up.

And—

Madelyn: “Why is a dragon’s fang… Why is Carillon’s fang friggin’ hanging from your neck?!”

With desperation and grief plastered in her profile, the girl posed that question in something akin to a shriek.

For a moment, Rem’s train of thought paused, unsure of the meaning of the question. But in the meantime, the girl was still repeatedly directing a question of “WHY THE FRIG?!” to Flop, the latter’s eyes closed.

No response came from Flop, whose consciousness remained plunged into darkness. There was absolutely zero doubt, however, that the lingering embers of life were fading, as the wounds on his body kept bleeding unceasingly.

Madelyn: “FRIGGIN’ ANSWER ME! ANSWER! IF YOU CAN’T DO THAT…!”

Rem: “P-please stop! He’s unconscious! He’ll die!”

Madelyn: “—Hk.”

Rem gripped onto the arm of the little girl who was rough-housing Flop, as if to cling onto her. The little girl’s golden eyes turned around in anger because of Rem’s interference, but she and her spirit withstood the intensity of her eyes.

With Flop’s life on the line, there was no way she could be intimidated.

Rem: “Let me treat him right away! Otherwise, Flop-san…”

Madelyn: “What’s the friggin’ point of treating him?! If he’s going to die anyway, before that happens…”

Rem: “Healing magic! I can perform healing magic!”

Rem’s desperate plea caused the little girl’s arms to relax slightly.

There was no way that Flop, gravely wounded as he was, would be saved with mere simple medical treatment. But healing magic was a different matter. The little girl’s golden eyes reflected Rem properly for the first time.

Madelyn: “…You can save him?”

Rem: “—. I will do it. No matter what it takes…!”

Madelyn: “Then, friggin’ do it quickly.”

Did she trust Rem’s words, or did she understand that there was no other alternative?

In a one-sided decision, the little girl pushed Flop’s body, causing him to fall onto Rem. But there was no room for Rem to protest against her attitude.

Rem: “This looks terrible…”

Assessing Flop’s wounds as he was handed over, Rem muttered so to herself at the gruesome sight.

As if performed by the claws of a beast, Flop’s white skin had been torn apart, leaving four gaping wounds. The wounds were deep and painful, similar to mud being gouged out by a tree branch.

The blood that flowed in a continuous stream was contained by the cloth that Flop had wrapped around his head, and healing magic was applied over the wound—immediately after, Rem’s entire body was overcome by a sense of fatigue.

Rem: “—Hk.”

This came after she had already performed healing magic on many people who had been injured in the flying dragons’ raid.

Although she had limited her healing techniques to patients who absolutely needed it, as to reduce exhaustion, they required so much energy that fatigue was inevitable.

Then came Flop's treatment, someone on the verge of death. The mental burden was heavy as well.

Rem: "Still, giving up isn't an option…"

Hence Rem told herself that no possibility of the sort existed, and focused her attention on Flop's wounds.

As Rem concentrated, Priscilla's words were revived in Rem's mind. They served as advice for Rem, as she pondered over her memories, her circumstances, her duties.

Words given to her during the days spent by Priscilla's side in the city after parting ways with Subaru and the others—

Priscilla: "Look not at the wound, but at life itself. For the body of a living creature is not solely blood, but also all kinds of unseen things that circulate within it. Beyond that, is what the healing arts must grasp."

Priscilla: "What it is, I am not able to reveal to you, as I do not utilize the healing arts. I call it life for the sake of convenience. You may call it whatever you prefer. However—"

Priscilla: "Remember, Rem, you are a pitiful girl who has lost her memory, who has lost her foundation. You have lost everything, but you possess the power to heal people. That is your essence."

Priscilla: "—No one can escape from who they are. Strive to remember my words, be diligent."

Rem: "—See, life."

The painful wounds themselves were not that which needed to be patched up; rather, life itself, the very thing flowing out of Flop and in need of being preserved, had to be contained. Or, possibly, it even had to be magnified in order to save his life.

Healing magic was not solely about filling gouged flesh, sealing wounds, or relieving pain.

Essentially, the healing arts were not magic that healed wounds, but magic that saved lives.

If she were to invoke that awareness and technique, of interfering with life—.

—It should also be possible for Flop to retain his shrinking life, saving him from the brink of death.

Rem: "…"

Seeking the optimal use of her limited remaining strength, Rem's healing techniques, refined to the utmost limit, were brought to their true potential.

Connecting the threads of life that needed to be connected, stemming the flow of life that needed to be stemmed, and restoring vitality to the fading light of life. —She would save Flop's very life.

Rem: "Flop-san…!"

His breathing, which had become shallow and weak, and the color of his cheeks, which had turned pale and bloodless.

As both of these gradually began to display signs of stability, Rem tried calling out to draw firm responses. At Rem's call, Flop's long eyelashes quivered and his blue eyes opened only slightly.

Flop's consciousness remained vacant still. However, if she continued to apply healing magic, he would survive.

With that, as Rem was about to breathe a sigh of relief, Flop's lips trembled.

Then, with a faint exhale, he spoke.

Flop: "…Don't, heal me fully."

Rem: "—Huh?"

Those unbelievable words assailed her eardrums, and Rem let out a muffled gasp.

So much was the shock that her concentration was disturbed, and even the usage of healing magic was hampered by it. Flop's eyelids fell closed again and his consciousness slipped away before Rem could hurry to focus on her healing magic.

This time, Flop was completely unconscious; Rem focused her healing magic on the wound, half-confused about the meaning of his earlier words.

Why did Flop say those things?

What exactly did he mean that I should not heal him?

Rem: "Did you say something that strange because you were disoriented?"

That was a possibility. Considering the amount of blood that he had spilled, that he regained consciousness, even for a single moment, was a miracle.

It was no wonder that, with his awareness mostly misty, Flop would speak things that made no sense. However, even though they were brief acquaintances, Rem's trust in Flop was high.

Flop was someone who would think over things carefully and present his honest opinion, always.

Suppose too, that Flop's words just now were the result of him wringing out all he had.

Perhaps it would be too disingenuous to dismiss them as mere rambling.

Rem: "…"

Why did he say that he should not be healed?

—No, in the first place, what did Flop say? It wasn't "don't heal me". It was "don't heal me fully".

Rem: "Do you… not want me to heal you all the way?"

The phrase “healed fully” was strange.

She was not about to stop healing, but rather stop healing all the way. However, if she did not heal him all the way, then Flop’s life would remain in jeopardy.

There were limits to Rem’s Mana as well. In the first place, she did not comprehend the meaning of doing such a thing. She would save Flop’s life properly, and only then—

Rem: “—Ah.”

Thinking up to that point, Rem realized that her perception of the situation was off.

She had been concentrating on Flop’s treatment so desperately to the point of being completely blind to her environs.

Rem: “…”

The girl who had done this deed was standing there behind Rem, who was healing Flop’s wounds. More to the point, a flock of flying dragons was still flying over the rapidly freezing city, and fierce battles continued to rage in various parts of the city.

Nothing would change for the better. Even if Flop’s wounds were healed.

And that appeal by Flop, reminded Rem of a possibility.

That would be—

Rem: “—Just, who are you?”

Without turning around, Rem asked this question to the girl behind her.

Although Rem had not been facing her as she talked, the girl would have understood that the subject of Rem’s question was herself. Immediately after, there was a sound of snapping fangs from the little girl.

Madelyn: “You, this isn’t the friggin’ time to be talking like that. If you have time to worry, then hurry up and friggin’ get that man healed!”

Rem: “I too want to heal him! But…”

Madelyn: “But, what?!”

Rem: “But! I can’t concentrate because I’m wondering just who you are. If this goes on, I may not be able to continue the magic.”

Unable to come up with an excuse, Rem made a terribly childish response. If this were to provoke an angry response from the other party, it would be no wonder that the claws that had ripped through Flop would now be pointed at Rem.

But in reply to Rem’s poor rebuttal, the girl let out a turbulent exhale, and,

Madelyn: “…Madelyn.”

Rem: “…What did you say?”

Madelyn: “Madelyn Eschart! A friggin’ General First-Class of the Empire!”

In a tone of voice that could neither be described as angry nor impatient, the girl—Madelyn, answered Rem’s question.

Part of the surprise came from the fact that she even replied, but even more shocking was Madelyn’s title. She had called herself a General First-Class of the Empire, and Rem knew the meaning that position held, in this land.

And that understanding coincided with the possible suspicions that had sprouted in Rem.

In other words—

Madelyn: “—? You, what the frig’ are you doing? What for…?”

Rem: “…”

Madelyn: “WHY DID YOU STOP FRIGGIN’ HEALING THAT MAN?!”

Taking a deep breath once, Rem withdrew the hand she held over Flop’s wound.

Naturally, the healing magic to heal Flop’s wounds was interrupted, a fact that caused Madelyn to snap; she grabbed Rem by the collar, forcing the latter to turn towards herself.

Overpowered by the force of her arm, Rem stared back at Madelyn, courageously.

And then—

Madelyn: “FRIGGIN’ ANSWER ME! WHAT THE FRIG’ ARE YOU PLAYING AT?!”

Rem: “—If you want me to continue healing Flop-san, I have a condition.”

Madelyn: “Condition…? What, are you suddenly rambling about…”

Rem: “—Please make the flock of flying dragons attacking the city leave. Unless you agree to that condition, it won’t be possible for me to continue healing.”

And so, negotiations were offered directly to the little girl who led the flock of flying dragons.

3

—She must not heal him all the way.

This was how Rem had interpreted Flop’s cryptic words.

For reasons unknown, Madelyn was greatly concerned with Flop’s survival. There had to be a reason behind her attachment to Flop, and currently only Rem could decide what happened to him.

With Flop’s life as a bargaining chip, she could put a stop to the attacks on the city.

This act, which perhaps could be profaned as inhuman, was something Rem was determined to carry through.

She would not concoct any excuses by saying that Flop himself had desired it. Her thoughts currently were that, by utilizing Flop's life, she would save the Fortress City from its current predicament.

Even if this differed from the true intentions behind Flop's words, Rem had already started to follow through.

Madelyn: "Wha…?"

Madelyn exclaimed in disbelief at the demand posed at her.

It was only natural. Rem had been just as confused the moment she heard Flop's words. She understood that the same was happening to Madelyn.

However, she held no sympathy towards her. That was not something Rem could afford to have.

Rem: "…"

The agitation from having paused Flop's healing, slowly burned Rem's chest.

Deep down, all she wanted was to resume the healing magic immediately and do anything to save his life. His life, close to vanishing as it was, was hanging on those fingertips of her; its restoration would be decided at this critical juncture.

With each passing moment, Flop's chances would diminish more and more.

Rem: "What will it be? Please decide quickly."

Trying not to let her impatience show on her face, Rem pressed Madelyn into making a decision.

She attempted to plant the idea in Madelyn that she was the one being pushed into a corner, not herself. By doing so, she hoped to preserve Flop's meager chances as much as possible

The white light that had shaken the entire city a while ago still left a great impression; Kuna and Holly, who had been guarding the mansion, were nowhere to be seen. It would take some time for them to recover.

To hope that this deadlock would be broken from the outside was not an option. The outcome rested entirely in Rem's hands.

Rem: "Madelyn-san, there's no ti—"

Madelyn: "—Don't friggin' look down on this dragon."

Rem: "Guh…!"

Any further attempts at forcing her hand, were interrupted by the force of Madelyn's palm on her throat.

Madelyn's tiny hand clamped down on Rem's neck, preventing her from saying another word. —No, Madelyn refused to entertain the notion of negotiating in the first place.

Her golden eyes aflame with rage, she was unable to tolerate Rem's audacity in imposing her own terms.

Frightening, mighty draconic energy that betrayed Madelyn's childish appearance overwhelmed Rem, making her very heart to cower in fear; forming inside her, was a wish to withdraw her reckless act immediately.

She felt the urge to go down on her knees, to beg forgiveness for her hubris.

However—

Rem: "…"

She was reminded of Subaru, who stood in front of Rem in an attempt to protect her against an enemy that was as powerful as this one.

Albeit dressed in a ridiculous woman's disguise, presenting an unsightly and shameful display, Subaru nevertheless stood there, risking his life to protect Rem. —No, it was not restricted to that single occurrence.

In Rem's eyes, Subaru was neither special, nor was he strong.

Despite being frightened of the danger before him, however, Subaru did not back down, ever.

Rem, envisioning Subaru, scolded herself for being so filled with fear as to be unable to move.

He had never cast his gaze downwards, nor had he thrown in the towel.

He had never displayed such naive notions, nor had he ever displayed such tenuous resolve.

Rem: "Even…"

Madelyn: "What the frig' is it?"

Rem: "Even if you kill me… You'll lose…"

Madelyn's eyes widened in surprise at the sentence Rem uttered through gasps, as she was strangled.

If Madelyn were to murder Rem in a fit of rage, she would miss her opportunity to talk with Flop.

So ultimately, the nature and substance of the choice Madelyn was being confronted with had not changed.

To destroy the city, or to let Flop live; those were the two options.

As a General First-Class of the Empire, it was Madelyn's duty to fulfill the role entrusted to her. However, within her attitude and in her words, Rem had found a miniscule possibility for success.

Madelyn truly wished to exchange words with Flop. There was something she wished to make certain. How important was it for Madelyn to confirm that something?

Within that, Rem had seen something valuable that could decide the outcome of this battle—

Rem: "—What, will you do?"

Madelyn: "…"

Rem: "—Please choose. Will you kill, or will you let live?"

4

—Her white-tinted consciousness gradually cleared, and the world around her slowly gained color.

???: "—Ugh."

Alongside the awakening of her consciousness, she felt a terribly heavy oppressive sensation throughout her whole body.

It was as if there were rubble on top of her body, a heavy sensation that pressed down upon her entire being, making it difficult to breathe. She moved her arms in order to push it away in any way she could, and,

???: "Hnn, ngahhh…"

Once she stretched her arms out from their cramped position, the pressure disappeared with a loud thud.

Only then did she come to realize that it had not been her imagination; she really had been underneath a pile of rubble, suddenly understanding the reason why it had been so difficult for her to breathe.

Becoming convinced of it, she began to try and remember why she had ended up trapped underneath the rubble—

Emilia: "—Right. I was with Priscilla, fighting Madelyn."

Recalling the events just prior, Emilia observed the surrounding landscape.

What was spread out before her, was the now-barren debris of the cityscape. Buildings had crumbled, their collapsed debris blown away, the very earth flattened.

At this sight, akin to fallen leaves having been scattered by a powerful wind, Emilia let out a small gasp.

The white snow falling here and there was the result of the space of glaciation created by Emilia—a special technique Subaru had dubbed “Ice Age”.

What had tinted Emilia’s consciousness white, however, was another white something that had fallen from the sky.

It was—

Emilia: “—Gives the same feeling as Volcanica.”

The white light that had descended from the heavens to the earth, had been an attack triggered by Madelyn’s will.

Even though she had not known what was due to arrive, Emilia took swift action and joined forces with Priscilla, putting up ice barriers to intercept that white light.

The layers of ice shielding were shattered, and finally, Priscilla’s treasured sword of red flashed—

Emilia: “After that, I got buried and… This isn’t good! What about Priscilla?!”

Recalling what had occurred, Emilia began to look for Priscilla, who was nowhere in sight.

Since Emilia had been under the rubble, it was not surprising that Priscilla, who had been right next to her, would have suffered the same. If so, there was a possibility that Priscilla would be buried, unable to get out as opposed to someone physically strong like Emilia.

She had to help her quickly. It would be sad if she were shivering with inconsolable fear.

Emilia: “Priscilla! Priscilla, where are you?! Answer me! I’ll get you out right away…!”

???: “—Cease your chirping, half-devil.”

Emilia: “Priscilla?!”

Pushing her body through the pain, Emilia turned over the debris near her. Once there was an answer to her enquiry, Emilia hurriedly ran towards the voice.

And there, on the ruins of the collapsed city walls, at the other side of a mountain of accumulated debris, she found Priscilla.

Sitting on the wreckage, Priscilla snorted at Emilia rushing over to her.

Priscilla: “What ugly stubbornness. I suppose you are alive.”

Emilia: “Yeah, thanks for worrying about me. You’re fine as well Priscilla… right? But it’s a relief that you seem alright.”

Priscilla: “Hmph.”

Faced with Emilia stroking her chest in relief, Priscilla sighed, looking a little more tired than usual. Her gorgeous red dress was torn here and there, her fair skin stained with dust and bruises.

Because Priscilla was always so immaculate, it seemed all the more painful to look at.

However, upon Emilia lowering her eyes out of sadness because of that fact, Priscilla looked up at her with displeasure, speaking, “Do not look down on me”,

Priscilla: “Do not make me laugh with your anxious ponderings. You and I are enemies competing for the throne, first and foremost. Your true desire should be to wish for my downfall.”

Emilia: “Hmph, there you go saying mean things again. I don’t want Priscilla to get hurt. Besides…”

Priscilla: “What?”

Emilia: “You seriously think of me as an enemy. It’s a bit surprising.”

Emilia had presumed that Priscilla took no interest in her for certain.

This assessment was surprising and gratifying for Emilia, who was aware that she was behind the other candidates for the Royal Selection, such as Crusch, Anastasia, and Felt.

To be placed alongside those amazing people, felt like a recognition of her efforts.

Priscilla: “…”

Emilia: “Oh, but if you’re safe, Priscilla, we have to move quickly, we don’t know where Madelyn went and we have to get the city out of danger…!”

She could only be happy that Priscilla was safe and sound, now that the crisis the city was undergoing had ended.

True, she wished that Madelyn would stop the assault of the flying dragons, but since she had not been able to locate Madelyn during her search for Priscilla, it was likely that she had escaped.

If Madelyn could not be relied upon, Emilia and the others would have to drive away the flying dragons on their own.

Therefore, to assist in battle, she thought of making haste to the place with the largest presence of flying dragons.

Priscillia: “—Halt, half-devil.”

Emilia: “I’d like to wait for you, but we can’t rest. We have to hurry…”

Priscilla: “No need. —The situation is moving.”

Stopping her hurried run, Emilia turned around and let out a

“Huh?” as she stared in wonderment.

Priscilla, having stopped Emilia, jerked her head up while sitting atop the rubble. Emilia’s attention was caught by her gesture, and she gazed upwards, at the cloud-filled sky from which white snow sprinkled.

Only then did she understand the meaning of what Priscilla had stated.

Emilia: “…The flying dragons, they’re going away?”

Emilia’s vision, as that sentence escaped her mouth, was filled with the flying dragons that had previously overrun the city’s skies, hunting down people indiscriminately. Spreading their wings, they were slowly growing distant in the skies.

For a moment, Emilia was unsure of what that signified, then considered, “Maybe…”,

Emilia: “Madelyn listened to our request…”

Priscilla: “Foolish nonsense.”

Emilia: “I guess not? But I think Madelyn is the only one who can order the flying dragons to leave…”

The most pleasant possibility was shot down by Priscilla, and Emilia pondered on it.

Of course, even a flying dragon who followed someone else’s orders would not be suicidal enough to throw away their own life for naught. They would retreat if faced with likely defeat, and it was possible they would even flee in a hurry if, for example, the leader of the flock were defeated.

However, would Madelyn’s defeat count as the flock’s leader having been defeated?

Even if Madelyn considered herself as having lost, the blow from above the clouds, the one which Emilia and Priscilla had been unable to stop with their combined efforts, was also a thing.

Rather, it was Emilia and the others who were in danger.

Madelyn could have protracted the bout for quite a bit longer, had she continued battling with the flying dragons alongside her.

And yet—

Priscilla: “Then, there must be a reason as to why they withdrew.”

Emilia: “A reason why they withdrew? What would that be?”

Priscilla: “Even I cannot discern everything. Perhaps, Madelyn received an order to withdraw due to the presence of the Cloud Dragon being discovered. Or…”

Emilia waited to see what Priscilla would say, her hand over her mouth as she pondered this.

After letting Emilia’s anticipation last for a few seconds, Priscilla directed her gaze towards the flying dragons moving away from them.

Priscilla: “—Did she find something that should take precedence over the orders of the Imperial Capital?”

5

—Priscilla’s reasoning would be revealed to be right or wrong, after the flock of flying dragons had made their absence.

The attack of the Flying Dragon General Madelyn Eschart, the leader of the flock of flying dragons, had left the city on the brink of ruin, with a large number of its inhabitants and defenders alike suffering injury.

Then came the arrival of the ice season, unprecedented within the Vollachian Empire, alongside the dreadful white light originating from the heavens that wrought destruction upon the entire city—amidst this despair that made everyone believe the city would not escape doom, however, these threats suddenly disappeared. The city was rocked by this unforeseen, narrow escape from demise.

Even if they wished to rebuild, they would first have to ascertain the extent of the damage they had suffered, and whether the wounds could be healed. It would be a daunting and arduous task, akin to counting the drops of blood that had been spilled.

Before the survivors of the Fortress City commenced that, there was one fact that should be added to the list.

Madelyn Eschart, the Flying Dragon General, had retreated together with her flock of flying dragons.

Concurrent with her flying away from the Fortress City, accompanied by the flying dragons, two people also vanished.

—The merchant known as Flop O'Connell, and the girl named Rem, had both abruptly vanished.

Chapter 59B:
Flop O'Connell

1

Miles: "—Treasure your life, Flop. Self-sacrifice's for morons."

That was the advice Miles, the benefactor who had taken Flop out of a squalid environment, had given him.

It appeared that the orphanage where Flop and Medium had spent their childhood was a much worse place than they could have even expected.

A habitual saying of the grownups at the orphanage was that it was a place for children who had no family, no place to go, and no one to rely on, which provided them with a roof over their heads.

Caretaker: "You're blessed compared to so many other children who've got nothing to eat and no work to do."

In fact, that was what he also thought.

For him and his younger sister Medium, having been abandoned by their family, it was a harsh life of going through hell and back. In regards to food, they would eat grass, insects, and the occasional rabbit, which would cause great furor upon being caught. Worst-case scenario, they would have to munch on soil and moss to stave off the hunger.

In comparison, life at the orphanage was much better.

They were given blankets, albeit thin and tattered ones, meals were provided, albeit consisting of tasteless soup with a piece of bread. They were assigned with menial jobs where numbers mattered, and although they were beaten up by adults on a whim, it was only on occasion.

There was some truth in the grownups' words of admonishment, that the outside world was much more painful. And so, the idea of running away did not even pop up.

Be that as it may, he could not bear to expose Medium and the other children to the punches and kicks of the adults. Thus, Flop learned to act as cheerfully as possible to draw the grownups' attention.

Flop made up his mind that, every day, he would be the one to get the most attention from the adults.

Flop's conspicuousness would make the adults soften their attitude toward the other children. Even on days the adults were in a bad mood, it was Flop who, standing out as he did, would be the first target of the abuse.

Standing out, was a weapon in its own right.

Loud voices and gestures, exaggerated facial expressions and mannerisms. Luckily, it was not difficult to establish a habit of doing these things. It seemed that he had a natural talent for drawing attention.

Flop had shifted the focus of their anger from the younger children towards himself, and had gone through terrible hardships that had left him half dead. It was there, on that night in which Medium had comforted Flop's wounds all throughout, that he became convinced.

This, was the role he had to play in that place.

Amidst the excruciating pain, that was what Flop told himself—

???: "Of course not, you dimwit."

Flop: "Huh…"

???: "First time I've shown my face in goodness knows how many years, and looking at it, it's still the same disgusting place, with the same stupid kids doing the same stupid things. When it comes to crazy kids, Lil' Balle's more than enough."

Having identified the role he himself should take on, Flop was prepared to shoulder the worst aspects of the orphanage.

However, one night, Flop's plans were shattered abruptly.

The person who had appeared mounted atop a flying dragon was not a person with a neat appearance, to say the least.

He did not hide his ill-bred and violent nature, and the way he was ruffling his gray hair with irritation made Flop, even as a child, believe that he was the kind of person he would rather not have anything to do with. His features, reminiscent of a subservient rat, also contributed to this impression. A being around whom one should normally keep one's head down to avoid being punched.

That person—Miles, languidly betrayed Flop's unkind impression of him.

Miles: "I come from this institution like y'all. Well, it was a horrible place even back then. That's why I got the hell outta here and survived by roughing it out."

At night, the door to the children's room would be secured with a heavy, metal lock to prevent the kids from sneaking out at a time they were supposed to be sleeping.

Having broken the heavy lock quite violently and peeking inside, upon seeing nearly two dozen children crammed into a small room, Miles clicked his tongue with great annoyance.

He then escorted the children, startled and frightened by the appearance of an unfamiliar adult, out of the room; leaving them with a single word, "Wait", he headed for the adults' room.

And then—

Miles: "I was straddling the line between life and death day-after-day, but eventually my fortunes started picking up. Then, years later, I remembered our house of abominations and found… this."

Rolling the tied-up adults on the floor of the room around, and kicking them in the face while he insulted them as ingrates, Miles smiled vulgarly and spat, saying "Serves you right".

These children must have had a very hard time with the adults. That said, Flop could not help but tilt his head and wonder if he should be going to such extremes.

Turning to Flop, Miles raised his thin eyebrows, and stated,

Miles: “What, you wanna join in as well? Then go ahead and get even. Get even, a hundred times over.”

Flop: “Oh, no, I’m not …”

Miles: “—Come on!!”

Miles’ fiendish whisper made Flop hesitate in his response.

Only for Medium to then jump out from behind Flop, and proceed to punch the head of a tied-up adult without hesitation, using a branch she had picked up. —No, it was not merely Medium.

All the children, except for a stunned Flop, became enraged renegades.

???: “You were always hurting us!”

???: “I hate you!”

Medium: “This is for big bro!”

Stop stop, so went the screams of the adults, bound and unable to resist, drowned by the children’s screams of rage.

They clawed at the grownups’ faces, slapped them on the cheeks, and finally urinated on them, their pent-up anger exploding.

Miles: “Bwahahaha! Look at their faces! What a masterpiece!”

Flop, dumbfounded, watched the mutiny of his little sister and the other children, while Miles laughed hysterically at the vulgarity of it all.

Flop really could not bring himself to laugh at it. He just kept darting his eyes about as the others made the adults go through all this, wondering what would happen to them now.

Miles: “Well then, now do as you like… Or that’s what I’d like to say, but I dunno if Countess Dracroy’s gonna flip her shit at me if I abandon y’all.”

Looking around at the children after the conclusion of their emotional rebellion, Miles addressed his young juniors, now outside the facility. Continuing with “And so”,

Miles: “For now, I’m gonna take you to the Countess. You can do whatever you wanna after that. You don’t really need to follow me tho’.”

Receiving Miles’s crude invitation, the children looked at one another.

Anxiety and perplexity emerged in their faces. Miles had stated that they were free to follow him or not, but that was a “choice” that neither Flop, nor the other children, had ever had before.

Never had they possessed the right to choose anything, having followed the instructions of adults their entire lives. Therefore, upon suddenly being gifted that right, they were thrown into a state of confusion.

Towards the children’s hesitation, Miles shrugged his shoulders with an “Oioi”,

Miles: “It’s a lil’ too late now, how pitiful. —You’ve already made them pay their dues. You guys can choose what you wanna do.”

Only once Miles stated so, did the children realize it for the first time.

Just as Miles had said, they had already chosen to rebel.

—When all was done and dusted, none of the children opted to stay in the orphanage.

Of course, although he had not been complicit, Flop could not say that he would stay in the orphanage that had wronged him as such.

To begin with, Medium was quick to accept Miles's invitation, saying, "I'll go!", urging Flop to join her as well, voicing out, "Let's go!".

There was no way Flop could refuse Medium's wish, or choose to part ways with his sister. For these reasons, a tad more passive compared to those of the other kids, Flop left the facility.

He had done something outrageous.

Or, perhaps, he had gotten himself involved in something quite outrageous; regret tormented his heart.

However—

Medium: "Good night, big bro."

On their way to Miles's master or whatever, the words hit him as he and his sister slept somewhere without a roof, wrapped in blankets brought from the facility.

The sight of his sister, who abandoned herself to her relief. The view outside, devoid of the prison called shelter.

He realized that no longer did he have to worry about being beaten or about his sister being brought to tears.

Flop: "—Sniff."

And on noticing that, Flop cried.

He cried and cried and cried, savoring the salty taste of his freedom.

—In the distance, wings flapping, flying dragons flew away, out into the gray cloud-covered sky.

Zikr remained watchful until the distant shadow was as small as a pea, lest it be a prelude to the next attack, and only then did he relax his body.

For reasons unknown, the flock of flying dragons had retreated. Since the City Hall had not completely fallen, there were two possible reasons for the retreat—either they had achieved the objective of their operation, or they had found themselves unable to accomplish it.

From Zikr's perspective, the former was preferable.

Taking the dramatic events that had taken place during the intense assault, lasting only an hour or so into account, objectively, it seemed that the former was more likely.

Zikr: "A sharp drop in temperature, and catastrophic damage to the southern part of the city…"

Running a hand through his own abundantly bushy hair, Zikr touched upon two anomalies that he could not put a finger on.

During the battle, the temperature within the Fortress City had dropped in the blink of an eye, and then, once white snow began floating down, he doubted his eyes. Apparently snow was sometimes seen atop high, very high mountains, but if one were to see snow in Vollachia, the occurrence would be expected to be accompanied by some sort of natural disaster.

In other words, the snowfall that had occurred during the battle was nothing short of a natural disaster.

But that in itself had worked out to be fortuitous, for Zikr and the others.

Sudden changes in temperature made flying dragons vulnerable, even more so when it became colder. Their troublesome ability to fly had been noticeably reduced. Without it, the damage would have been much greater and more profound.

However—

Zikr: "What in the world was that white light…?"

Uncontrollable destruction had obliterated the southern part of the city flat.

It was something of an end-of-the-world spectacle, even the term "natural disaster" was insufficient to describe it. Even though no further damage had followed, the city had been dealt a painful blow by that single blast.

The chain of command had been thrown into disarray, causing the evaluation of the battle status to be delayed. Had the flying dragons pressed on as they were, it was possible that the city would have gradually fallen.

For that reason, it was fortuitous and strange that the flock of flying dragons had retreated.

Consequently, Zikr speculated it may have had something to do with their enemies.

Had someone struck a crushing blow to the enemy in place of Zikr and his men, who were forced to defend the city? In that case, the most likely candidates would be Mizelda, the leader of the Shudraqians, or Priscilla, who had a proven record of defeating Arakiya, a General First-Class.

Whichever one of them had performed this deed—

Zikr: "After all, women are wonderful. However, I do not want to take entirely for granted the shame of being protected behind a woman's back."

The fact that women were superior, was no excuse for Zikr to be inferior.

While women's splendor should be revered and loved, one's own shortcomings should be admonished.

Anyway—

???: "I never thought I'd be exposed to such an onslaught, but I suppose the advance preparations have paid off."

Zikr: "…Flying dragons are standard practice for attempting to capture a fortified city. However, it should have been expected that the Flying Dragon General would be sent, rather than the Flying Dragon Squadron.”

Zikr shook his head at the words of his wounded Chief of Staff, the latter bleeding from his head.

The outlook was not good. The preparations for the flying dragons included placing most of the offensive weapons on the western wall, in anticipation of an attack originating from the Imperial Capital, yet the flying dragons had assaulted from all directions.

After the withdrawal of General First-Class Arakiya, they had assumed that it would take some time for the next General to be dispatched, but this had been a miscalculation—and given the circumstances, it was not surprising.

This was not just a rebellion restricted to one city, but the harbinger of a much larger political upheaval.

From the perspective of those schemers in the Imperial Capital, aware of the situation, it was to be expected that they would put all their efforts into extinguishing the flames of rebellion while they still remained small. They should have considered the possibility of the deployment of another General First-Class right after.

Zikr: “No, let us reflect on that later. Now that the city walls have been damaged, it will be easier to capture the city, even without flying dragons. Assess the damage. See if the walls can be repaired…”

???: “—Put your weapons down right now! That’s an order!”

???: “Pff.”

Swiftly identifying the aspects to reflect on, Zikr stored them in a corner of his mind.

Just as he was about to check on the damage and wrack his head over measures to be taken for the future, a sharp, tense voice shook the chilled air.

Looking over, a figure could be seen, surrounded by those who had repelled the flying dragons’ raid on the building used as the command post, that being the City Hall.

The weapons and attention that had been directed at the flying dragons until then, were now focused solely on the man glaring with a vicious attitude at those surrounding him. In both his hands were long swords, blood dripping from their tips.

However, that blood was not that of humans, but of flying dragons.

Zikr: “That is…”

Chief of Staff: “He’s one of the soldiers we sent out from the cellars to counter the flying dragons. Wielder of twin swords…”

Zikr: “Yeah, I was watching too. That was quite the mighty fight. — Hey, hold it!”

Zikr, nodding to the Chief of Staff’s point and extending his arms, commanded his men such. At Zikr’s command, one of his men raised his voice, “General Second-Class!”,

Soldier: “It’s dangerous! I let him out of jail because of the situation, but…”

Zikr: “So you want to just throw him back in jail as soon as the threat of the flying dragons is over? As if he would just meekly accept that. The sacrifices we would have to make him go back are the bigger problem.”

Responding to his tense subordinate, Zikr walked over to the man who had become encircled.

The twin-sword wielder’s ability was considerably higher than that of the average Imperial Soldier. In fact, without his inspiring performance, there was no certainty that they could have repelled the hordes of flying dragons that had raided the City Hall.

If that sword were to be pointed at them, it would cause more unnecessary damage.

Zikr: “Obviously, if you continue with such an outburst, your life will be forfeit as well. Which is why…”

Man: “Which is why, what?!”

Zikr: “…”

To a Zikr attempting to break the ice, the man responded with a sharp voice and demeanor. Instead, he pointed one of the two swords in his hands at Zikr, and let out a “Ha!” together with a fierce smile,

Man: “You want me to surrender so obediently? That’s no different from what the rest of those guys are saying, right, General Second-Class Womanizer.”

Soldier: “You! You dare taunt General Second-Class Zikr!”

Zikr was proud of his title, one which possibly sounded disgraceful; but there was a clear intent to ridicule it in the man’s statement from just now. This caused Zikr’s men to become irate and hostile as a result, but Zikr once again restrained them with one hand,

Zikr: “You are welcome to surrender, though that was not what I was attempting to suggest. Your work has been outstanding. Although we stand on different sides, the fact that you have contributed to the defense of the city is not diminished. Therefore, you will be released.”

Man: “—. You serious?”

Zikr: “Definite punishment or reward is a rule of Vollachia, and the wishes of His Excellency the Emperor.”

The Emperor of Vollachia, who evaluated people on the basis of their ability and achievements, was the foundation of the Empire’s meritocracy, a principle of loyalty that Zikr, too, respected.

However, as soon as the man heard Zikr’s answer, his attitude became blatantly prickly.

The ghastly aura overflowing from his entire body and his eye—As the right eye of the man was covered by an eye patch, he glared at Zikr with his left; all of his emotions were conveyed through it.

Man: “How can a rebel General who betrayed His Excellency the Emperor and the Empire, joining forces with the enemy, be so shameless as to say that…?! If it were me, I’d be so ashamed of myself that I’d just cut my guts out.”

Zikr: “…”

Staring fixedly at the man, Zikr only held his breath upon being faced with these words, the source of his intense hostility seemingly laying in his loyalty to the Empire.

This soldier, who had been put in the dungeon, was very likely one of the men who had resisted Vincent’s advice to surrender till the very end, as of the latter’s conquest of Guaral through his scheme. In other words, he was a man that adhered vehemently to the principles of the Empire.

Then—

Zikr: “If I were to inform you that I, like you, pledge unchanging loyalty to the Empire and to His Excellency the Emperor, would you be willing to listen to me?”

Man: “Ahhn?”

At Zikr’s question, the man opened his left eye wide and let out a boorish voice. He trained his eye on Zikr, seemingly unintimidated by the look in his eye, then after a brief pause, he tossed his swords to the floor.

The swords clattered upon the ground with a high-pitched sound, and the now-unarmed man raised both hands.

Zikr: “Can I take that to mean you are going to listen to me?”

Man: “For now, I’ll stop rampaging as I can die an honorable death. If I were to really try it tho’, I could at least chop the treacherous General’s head off…”

Looking around, the man gazed at Zikr’s subordinates in a provocative fashion. Their alarm was heightened by his gaze, but the man snickered, Man: “But I won’t. Tho’, if this talk you wanna have’s a boring one…”

Zikr: “I intend for this to be a reasonably interesting conversation. What is your name…?”

Having lowered his weapon so he could step closer, Zikr inquired the man as to his name. For a moment, the man hesitated to answer the question, but as there was no point in deception, scratching his own head, he,

Man: “—Jamal Aurélie. Private First-Class.”

Stated his name and rank.

In response to this attitude, Zikr also gave deep assent with a nod.

Zikr: “Jamal, is it? As you may know, I am Zikr Osman. Having been conferred with the rank of Imperial General Second-Class, I am also known as the Womanizer. Although…”

Jamal: “Ahn?”

Zikr: “I would feel much better if I were to be called the Coward now.”

That moniker, once considered a shame, now took on special prominence in Zikr.

Hearing Zikr’s answer, the man—Jamal, grimaced with incomprehension. It was evident that Jamal was skilled at arms, but not good at thinking or reasoning.

With that as the case, he may lend an ear if one preached righteousness.

And there—

???: “—Excuse me, you are the representative of this city, correct?”

Jamal had surrendered, and the City Hall was released from the tension about to burst. Following which, a voice slipped in, as if it had been waiting for the right moment to interrupt.

The quiet, soft tone of that voice struck the eardrums in a way that evoked a sense of relief in those who heard it.

Nevertheless, the unfamiliar voice made Zikr turn around and furrow his curly eyebrows.

The owner of the voice had made their appearance on the stairs connecting the top floor of the command center to the lower floor. Raising his hands as to display they held no hostility, a gray-haired man turned to look at him,

Grey-Haired Man: “Are you General Zikr Osman-san?”

He had not faltered in identifying Zikr as the General, among those wearing the same red uniforms.

Of course, considering the cloak he was donning, and the rank insignia on his shoulders, to spot Zikr as the highest-ranking individual in the room was an easy affair. —The problem was, the audacity to point that out.

The audacity, to show his face at a command post where there had been a battle just moments before, and name a commander they were unfamiliar with. Zikr wondered about the affiliation of this unassuming, yet unafraid man.

As they were not recognized as being part of the city’s inhabitants, it was likely that they had blended with them during the struggle.

The best answer, in that case, would be that they were—

Zikr: “A messenger from the Imperial Capital… Perhaps a messenger for us?”

Grey-Haired Man: “Huh? Oh, no no, not at all! It is more complicated for us to explain any more at the moment, but we are not related to the Imperial Capital or anything like that.”

Waving his raised hands in denial, the young man hurriedly denied Zikr’s suspicions. If he were to take his word for it, the young man’s position would become all the more incomprehensible.

So, in Zikr’s stead, as he furrowed his brow, Jamal yelled out a “Bastard!”, gnashing his teeth,

Jamal: “First dibs on him! You come in here after me… I’m gonna kick your ass!”

Grey-Haired Man: “I am very sorry about that. I do not expect that we will be able to have a calm conversation at this point in time. So, if you could just give me permission.”

Jamal: “Permission? Permission for what?”

Grey-Haired Man: “To assist in the treatment of the wounded and in the repair of the city afterwards… To assist with the aftermath of the battle, so to speak. I am certain my companions and I will be able to give a hand in some small way.”

In response to Jamal tensing his cheeks, the young man sighed, speaking “Although”. His own face, somewhat tired and somewhat exasperated, relaxed slightly, and,

Grey-Haired Man: “Since we have already started, approval would be retroactive, if only partially.”

Zikr: “—. I appreciate the offer itself, but it is…”

???: “It’s nothing so complicated, Zikr. There’s no lie in what the man said.”

Before Zikr could ask a litany of questions, a dignified voice that he could not help but listen to attentively interrupted him.

The sound of a cane on the floor echoed sharply, and a shadow approaching the stairs lined up with the young man. It was Mizelda, her valiant figure bathed in blood, which increased her ferocious beauty.

From the looks of it, the entirety of the blood that stained her beautiful body appeared to have been spilled by someone else, as there seemed to be no noticeable external injuries other than her leg, which had been injured previously. Zikr was relieved to see her back in one piece.

Having returned, Mizelda clapped the young man on his thin shoulder like she was familiar with him,

Mizelda: “This one’s companions have already started their work. I assure you.”

Zikr: “Miss Mizelda, I am so glad you are safe. And him?”

Mizelda: “I don’t know him. He’s not our enemy, he’s just a guy with a handsome face, so I let him through.”

Zikr: “Miss Mizelda…”

Mizelda’s aesthetic sense was somewhat different from Zikr’s, but she was certainly correct in saying that the young man’s features were pleasing, beautifully arranged.

The atmosphere he let off was somewhat neutral, but there was a strangely strong sense of purpose in his eyes.

That he was not a bad person, was what Zikr believed. But, he also had a gut feeling.

Zikr: “I do not believe that there would be anyone willing to help with this situation and not want something in return. Who are you?”

Grey-Haired Man: “As I said before, the situation is a complicated one to explain. However, I do not intend to be hostile towards you. —There are people who we are looking for, just that.”

Zikr: “Looking for people…”

Towards Zikr, repeating his words, the young man nodded, followed with a “Yes”.

Then, he removed the green hat he was wearing and placed it on his chest as he bowed, a polite gesture that displayed respect, but not in the way someone from the Empire would do such deed.

Grey-Haired Man: “My name is Otto Suwen. —I am looking for my friend, as well as my friend’s younger sister.”

Thus, with eyes like those of a cunning hyena, he stated his purpose.

3

—Miles's mistress, Serena Dracroy, was a High Countess and a woman of fierce character.

As a young woman she had fought hard against the upper echelons of the Empire's aristocracy, and, in accordance with the code of blood and iron that was the embodiment of the Empire, placed great emphasis on meritocracy, favoring the talented.

On the other hand, she also possessed integrity that did not allow the strong to humiliate the weak as they pleased. For that reason, the children brought home by Miles were not mistreated.

Serena: "I've heard about it. Miles, who avoids trouble, has even brought you to this house. He must've taken pity on your situation. You're free to do as you please in my territory."

Serena smiled broadly, as she welcomed Flop and the other children.

Flop was overwhelmed by the intimidating feeling of being in front of an entity more massive than him in height, which made him want to grovel in his childish heart; also, by the interior of the house, as he had never seen anything so ornate and spacious before.

Miles: "People such as the Countess ain't got a reason to go out of their way to bully those below them, even if they've got the leeway. After all, the adults who beat children were beaten by adults when they were children as well."

Miles responded as such with his usual coarseness to Flop and the children, who had been bathed in hot water, devoured a belly-filling meal, and changed into clean, good-smelling clothes.

Unlike Medium and the others, whose eyes were turned towards a world where everything they saw and touched was fresh and new, Flop was impressed by a world and way of thinking he was unfamiliar with.

In particular, he was greatly influenced by the philosophies that Miles spoke of so casually.

Without Miles, Flop would never have known that there were ways of seeing and understanding things that he had never known existed in the world.

Above all—

???: “Oh, we’re the same, aren’t we? Did Big Bro Miles pick you up too?”

Flop, following the back of his sister who had been given freedom to run around the mansion, stopped at a beautiful garden in the vast grounds.

At a time in which he was overwhelmed by the sight of large flowers in full bloom, an oh-so-soft voice called out to his back.

Albeit he was startled, looking around for the source of the voice, he could not find the other person in the garden. As Flop tilted his head at this,

???: “Over here. Sorry about that, I’m down here.”

Flop: “Whoa!”

???: “Oof, what a fall.”

As a head suddenly appeared right in front of him, poking out from just beyond the fence against which he had been leaning to peek into the garden, Flop involuntarily fell backward.

Flop blinked as he was laughed at for falling on his rear.

The person who laughed at Flop’s fall was an older boy, though he still looked somewhat young. He was around twelve or thirteen years old, with a charming face and brown hair.

Flop: “…You’re laughing quite a lot, aren’t you?”

Boy: “Oh, sorry sorry. But that just now was something worth seeing. I'd help you up, but I can't move right now."

Flop: "Can't move, you say…"

Standing up, and then patting off his backside, Flop walked around the fence towards the youth. Doing so, he happened upon the boy, sitting cross-legged on the ground with a round mass in his lap.

Upon seeing that, Flop opened his eyes wider in wonder.

Flop: "Is that an egg?"

Boy: "Yes, yes, it's a big egg, right? It's actually the egg of a flying dragon."

Flop: "What are you going to do with the egg of a flying dragon?"

Boy: "I'm going to hatch it, of course."

The size of the white egg required the boy to hold it with both arms, and as such, he held it close to his body as he gave Flop a broad smile.

—That was the first encounter between the sibling pair of Flop and Medium O'Connell, and Balleroy Temeglyph, the man who would become their sworn brother for the rest of their lives.

4

—It could be said that they had gained more than just knowledge on the threat of the flying dragons.

The threat of their claws and fangs, the breadth of strategies they could employ with their wings, the ferociousness with which they did not hesitate to harm their enemies; all those were more than keenly felt by the sight of the destroyed city, and of those who had been attacked, respectively.

Frankly, it was difficult to understand how anyone could think that such a dangerous creature could be tamed and used so effectively. It seemed like an irreconcilable adversary—one that was just as dangerous as the giant serpent they had encountered in the Jungle.

However—

???: "…"

Rem quietly squinted at the sight outside her window, watching the assortment present in the landscape.

In the garden of the mansion, a flying dragon was resting its wings, and a soldier was feeding it. The flying dragon, counter to the idea of it being supposedly terrifying and ferocious, had a soft look in its eyes and emanated a sweet tone, as it was fed by said soldier.

From Rem's perspective, having been told that flying dragons were ferocious and vicious, on top of having witnessed their danger firsthand, the appearance of a flying dragon being so friendly towards people was surprising.

She had been told by a girl who was apparently very familiar with dragons that they, proud as they were, were not fond of people. One would not blame them for thinking otherwise.

???: "You seem to be quite gloomy."

Suddenly, as Rem gazed at the garden, she heard a voice behind her.

However, Rem was not surprised; she was aware that someone was making their way, as the other party made footsteps in their approach.

However, hearing the voice of a stranger, and feeling somewhat tensed given the place she was in,

Rem: "I don't know if I'm being gloomy, but I do have some thoughts. It's not a place I wanted to go to, but I was brought here anyway."

???: "Hm, you are more straightforward than I expected. What a pleasant person."

Rem: "…You would be…"

In the room to which she had been assigned, in a building where even the rooms given to prisoners of war were opulent, Rem asked the identity of the old man who had made his appearance, all while the chair she was on, too luxurious to be comfortable, creaked.

He was an old man with white hair, a white mustache, and eyes as thin as a thread.

His attire was far from that of a warrior, and one could only assume that he was a person of high ranking.

His behavior and age, as well as the fact that the soldiers guarding Rem straightened their postures and bowed their heads, all suggested that he was in a particularly high position.

At Rem's unreserved stare, the old man gave a light wave of his hand, gesturing for the soldiers on guard to leave the room. The soldiers immediately obeyed, and bowing, they left the room.

And so, once the old man was alone with Rem in the room, with his hand he indicated the seat opposite the one in which Rem was sitting, and,

Old Man: "May I sit down?"

Rem: "…Go ahead."

The old man took his seat right in front of Rem in a lax manner, the latter having assented with a nod.

Facing Rem directly, he stroked his chin with his finger, and spoke,

Old Man: "Have you heard anything from her about me?"

Rem: "No, nothing. I've heard nothing but "heal him" and "rest", and "if you try anything funny, I'll kill you"."

Ruminating on the instructions of the master of the house—Madelyn, who would not listen to her, Rem shook her head.

Rem was under house arrest, guards posted on her. She had been given strict orders to not attempt an escape; while she had no intention of running away, it was true that it was not a very pleasant situation.

The old man then nodded his head, responding with “I understand”,

Old Man: “I possess a few issues regarding her attitude towards a guest. I shall give General First-Class Madelyn a word of caution.”

Rem: “…You can caution her?”

Rem was taken aback by the words of the unfamiliar old man.

Having spent neither a long nor a short time with Madelyn between the events at the Fortress City and being brought to this mansion, Rem was annoyed at her lack of communication.

Madelyn was obstinate and headstrong, although her having a persuadable candor had been her saving grace.

Rem: “I believed she was someone who didn’t like to be told what to do by others. That if someone were to tell her something, she would become angry and violent immediately…”

And having conveyed her own feelings to such an extent, Rem put a hand of hers on top of the other.

Now that she mulled over it calmly, she felt ashamed of herself, wondering what kind of face she was making as she declared that, as a person who had once broken another person’s finger because she had not harkened to what they had to say.

However, the old man broke a slight smile at Rem’s self-reflection with a “Hmm”,

Old Man: “Contrary to your expectations, you are not mistaken in that. Even if it pains me to hear it. In fact, she failed to follow my instructions correctly this time as well. However—”

Rem: “…”

Old Man: “This time, though, another factor was seemingly more important than the whims of General First-Class Madelyn.”

The old man maintained his lips relaxed, but the hint of a smile had disappeared from the tone of his voice.

Rem held her breath for a moment as she was shot by his gaze, something beyond those narrow, penetrating eyes seemingly assessing her. The gaze had eloquently regarded Rem as “another factor”.

And that factor, had brought undesirable consequences for the old man before her.

Rem: “…Who, are you?”

Old Man: “I apologize for the late introduction. I am the Prime Minister of the Sacred Vollachian Empire, Berstetz Fondalfon.”

Rem: “Prime Minister, Berstetz…”

The old man—Berstetz, reverently bent at the waist in response to the question.

As soon as Rem heard his name and position, her cheeks became even stiffer, and she tensed her shoulders even more.

She remembered hearing both the name and the position.

Rem: “So, you are…”

Berstetz: “Yes. —I am the enemy of His Excellency the Emperor Vincent Abellux.”

Rem: “…”

He asserted such without hesitation, and once again Rem was left unable to carry on speaking.

It was an affirmation of what she already knew, but she had not expected it to be spoken in such a straight-forward fashion. Additionally, at the same time, this was a major problem which she had gotten roped up in, regardless of whether she liked it or not. The fact that she had ended up being brought to the place closest to this maelstrom was something she could not help but conceive as being terribly out-of-place and ironic.

It should be Abel, Priscilla, and Subaru here, and not herself, to begin with.

With that point in mind, Rem was glad that Subaru was not at this place.

Rem: “Had he been here by himself, he would’ve been reckless, definitely…”

There was no room for doubt about the black-haired boy’s quick thinking and his ability to stretch the boundaries of one’s imagination. Even in this situation, he would cause outlandish events beyond Rem’s imagination.

In that sense, it was a good thing he had not been in the city at the time of the flying dragons’ raid. It was unlikely that he would have been able to do anything about it, and would only obtain even more injuries.

However—

Rem: “…”

However, I wonder, when he learns that I was taken away by Madelyn, how he will feel.

So terrible was it, that Rem’s chest was tormented by the pain of the sharp blade that was her imagination.

Rem: “—. So you know that Abel-san is the real Emperor, correct?”

Forcing herself to ignore the pain of the deep cut remaining in her heart, Rem asked Berstetz a question. To that, he responded with a curt “Yes”,

Berstetz: “Of course. Allowing him to escape was a blunder, but after that, things have been proceeding according to plan. Or should I say, they were. As, in fact, the destruction of Guaral was left unfinished.”

Rem: “Why did you do that to Abel-san? I can’t imagine what it must be like to come up with the resolution to do something like rebel… Is it because of Abel-san’s personality?”

Berstetz: "We do not seek individual personality in the Emperor, the pinnacle of the nation. Personal feelings and attachments are trivial, from the perspective of running a nation. If there is anything to look for, that would only be competence, and the trust and performance of a person able to fulfill their responsibilities."

Shaking his head leisurely, Berstetz responded with an emotionless voice and expression.

The tone of his voice never wavered, the expression on his face never changed in the slightest. Rem's lack of life experience, coupled with Berstetz's superior communication skills, made it impossible for her to read his inner thoughts.

He was emotionless and therefore lying, or he was being truthful; which was it?

However, it was her opinion that she wanted to believe what she was told, that Abel's character had not been the reason for raising a rebellion.

Rem had witnessed the blood and death of so many in the Fortress City. Not only those who had died, but also Rem herself, would not be convinced that Abel's bad character was the reason for it.

Therefore—

Rem: "Are you saying that you ousted Abel-san because he's unfit to be Emperor?"

Berstetz: "Ousting, was not my intention. That is merely hindsight."

Rem: "What about Abel-san was lacking? I don't know the burden that the position of Emperor carries, nor the abilities required, but I believe… he's an excellent person."

Rem wondered to herself why she felt compelled to defend Abel, but Rem chose her words to convince the nagging feeling inside of her.

In fact, his capability to fight aside, Abel stood out for his wit and his stores of wisdom.

The fact that Mizelda, Zikr, and even Subaru were willing to follow his reasoning, was evidence that he also possessed the leadership skills to convince others of such opinions.

Although she did not understand the particulars, Rem believed that was a quality of those standing at the pinnacle, as well.

And that would be something necessary for the one at the highest seat in the nation.

That—

Berstetz: “I have yet to hear your name, Healer-dono.”

Rem: “…Rem, it seems.”

Berstetz: “Hmm.”

Partly because of animosity toward Berstetz, she informed it as some sort of hearsay.

Rem had already accepted that her name was “Rem”, understandably so. Ever since she had identified herself to Priscilla with poise—or from the time she allowed Subaru to call her that.

Anyhow, familiarizing his tongue with Rem’s name, Berstetz let out a small exhale, and then,

Berstetz: “Rem-dono, how many successors do you believe His Excellency the Emperor has at present?”

Rem: “Succe… ssors… Uhh, you mean children, is that it?”

Berstetz: “Yes.”

As Berstetz nodded serenely, Rem pictured Abel in her mind.

Rem had no memories, but that did not signify she had lost all the knowledge acquired before she lost them. Rem had also kept the knowledge of how human beings reproduced.

However, it was doubtful that Abel would be able to establish a relationship as proper as that with another person. In the first place, Rem could not imagine a woman who would be able to stand on the same level as Abel.

Rem: “I can’t imagine it. I guess there aren’t any?”

Berstetz: “—. You understand very well. You are correct, none exist.”

Rem: “Oh, of course it’s like that. Though I guess that’s doing Abel-san—”

A discourtesy, Rem was about to continue, only for her to interrupt her words there.

Not that Berstetz had stated anything towards Rem, nor that she had been told to be silent; it was, however, that the narrowed eyes of the silent old man opened slightly. His expression, eyes visible behind it, came right up close to Rem’s face. Rem’s voice was silenced by an aura so ghastly that it was unfathomable.

Quietly, Berstetz placed his hand on the table between them. Silently overflowing from his entire body, was unimaginable, intense rage.

Berstetz: “There are no successors, you see. —Therein lies the problem.”

Rem: “—Ah.”

Berstetz: “The Empire must be strong. Otherwise, this nation will…”

As Rem before him let out a hoarse breath, Berstetz cut off her speech, opened his fist placed atop the table, and exhaled.

Then, once again hiding his eyes behind his eyelids, the old man looked at Rem.

Berstetz: “I beg your pardon. This is the first time I have been a rebel, and I must say that I have become slightly agitated.”

Rem: “…Why, are you saying this now, to me?”

Berstetz: "…"

Rem: "Telling me all this wasn't necessary."

Berstetz's words were loaded not with emotion, but with something much weightier and clearer.

Rem did not feel that it had been a lie, but that was exactly why she was questioning him. Why had he allowed Rem to hear such things?

Rem did not consider herself to be in such an important position, and in fact, she certainly was not in one.

There were times when Rem happened to be in a position close to Abel and Priscilla, but that was merely because of how things had come to pass, not because Rem was special.

Rem: "So why?"

Berstetz: "…You are a healer, and belong to the oni race. I would like to bring you in if possible. You are a precious existence."

Rem: "…"

Albeit not a lie, that answer was not entirely true.

However, Berstetz seemed to have resolved not to dedicate any more time to Rem, who was in search of further answers. Slowly, the old man rose from the chair in which he had been sitting.

Berstetz: "I would like to converse with you a little longer, but a man like me has things he must do. Excuse me for inconveniencing you for a while now, but I will offer to make things as accommodating as possible for those in the mansion, so please, be at ease."

Rem: "…Berstetz-san, what are you, in regards to Madelyn-san?"

Berstetz: "Calling me a collaborator would be most appropriate. Of course, there is the impression that, in her point of view, she is utilizing a wise human being. This mansion is also my mansion."

Unexpectedly shrugging his burly shoulders, Berstetz answered that, which prompted Rem to look around the room and towards the garden.

Since Madelyn spent her time there as if she owned the place, one would assume that it was her mansion, but it seemed that even that turned out to be wrong. However, the elegance of the building and its interiors convinced Rem.

Rem: “But I don’t think I can spend my time lounging around, nor do I want to.”

Berstetz: “A candid manner of speech, quite delightful. So, once again, good health to you, Rem-dono.”

Donning a minute smile, Berstetz once again bent at the waist and left the room.

She considered attempting to stop him, but unable to find the right words to say, and judging herself to perhaps be unable to stop him, Rem went without saying anything.

Replacing Berstetz who had left the room, the guards who had been sent outside returned.

Their stern stares directed at her, Rem once again looked out.

The flying dragon had just finished its meal, and was now slowly flapping its wings to take to the skies, on its back the man who had fed it.

Rem: “…”

Though it was a ferocious, fearsome flying dragon, to be carried atop its back in flight was exhilarating.

She had not had the leisure to enjoy it given the circumstances, of course; they had been transported from Guaral to their destination in less than a day, making her wonder just what had their journey so far been.

While Rem treated the wounded Flop, Madelyn had brought them here—

Rem: “—The Imperial Capital, Lupugana.”

The city where Abel aspired to reclaim his throne, after having been ousted from it.

With the Crystal Palace at the heart of the city in the distance, Rem was being held captive. Touching the unopenable window, and ascertaining the feel of the glass on her fingertips, she had a sudden thought.

Rem: “…Him.”

Would pain run through his heart when he learned Rem was gone?

A pain in his heart, just like Rem’s own, which felt like a blade piercing deep into her heart.

From where these sort of thoughts in her mind originated, Rem did not know.

5

—Flop slowly opened his eyes, and gazed upon the ceiling of an unfamiliar room.

Flop: “…”

He spent a moment organizing his thoughts, quickly observing his surroundings to assess the situation.

It was his habit as a peddler who often camped out in the wild. Of course, his sister, who possessed a sense of intuition sharper than his, would be in charge of staying vigilant, but that was no reason for him to slacken.

It was possible that his poor reactions could make the difference between life and death. So, getting out of bed as quickly as possible was a skill that he had learned as a matter-of-course in order to survive—

Flop: “This place… Ugh!”

The moment he tried to look around while being careful, he raised a scream as his chest spasmed from a terrible pain.

If this were outside in the middle of the night, he would have been very foolish to let beasts know of his whereabouts. Nevertheless, what had already been done, had been done.

So that he would recover, with labored breaths, Flop attempted to upright himself, and,

Flop: “Wh-What the… I can’t move at all…!”

Not only was he unable to put strength into his arms, but the soft bed sucked his weight in. His whole body sank softly, yet if he were told that it was acting as more of a cage than a bed, he would have believed it.

Nevertheless, he squirmed and struggled in a desperate attempt to somehow make it out,

Flop: “This, this…! This is really tough!”

???: “—. You’re quite the strange person.”

Flop: “Wha?! Who’s there?!”

Behind Flop as he struggled with the bed, a high-pitched voice was heard, hence he tried to turn around. But his efforts were in vain, his impaired body would not even turn around properly.

As Flop struggled like a fish on land, a deep sigh was heard,

???: “It is I, the dragon. Your wounds are in the process of healing, so stop getting worked up for nothing.”

The other party stepping towards the bedside as they spoke, Flop exhaled faintly.

A girl with sky-blue hair, golden eyes, and two black horns on her head—Madelyn. An Imperial General First-Class who had attacked the Fortress City, the existence known as the Flying Dragon General.

And, from what Flop last remembered—

Flop: “If I remember correctly, your claws ripped into me and it hurt quite a lot…”

Madelyn: “Correct. This dragon’s claws tore the life out of you… That girl friggin’ healed you.”

Flop: “That girl… Oh right.”

Averting her gaze, Madelyn muttered that with an uncomfortable expression on her face. Her words brought a visage to Flop’s mind, causing him to comprehend the event that had befallen him.

At the same time he remembered that, in his fading consciousness, he had asked her—he had asked Rem to do something horrible.

Flop: “Miss Madelyn, is that correct? I’ve got to ask, what happened to Guaral? That city went through an awfully large explosion, plus an attack by your friends.”

Madelyn: “…”

Flop: “So, seeing as I barely escaped with my life, I think Wife-san and I survived. But that result’s the second worst one in my opinion. Of course, the worst outcome would’ve been the one in which Wife-san and I both died.”

Holding up a finger, Flop kept talking and directed this question at Madelyn.

Madelyn maintained her uncomfortable expression as she looked sideways at his finger. Thinking this was a sign this was leading down a reluctant topic for her, Flop pressed on.

Flop: “I don’t know, Miss Madelyn. Your face makes it look like you’re unhappy or sulking. My little sister used to fidget like that too when sulking. The fact that she doesn’t look low-key at all when doing so, given her body’s so big, is cute; but I guess you’re like that as well?”

Madelyn: “…fe.”

Flop: “Yes? What is it?”

Madelyn: “The city’s friggin’ safe! I wasn’t able to friggin’ destroy it completely! Is that what you friggin’ want?!”

Displaying her sharp fangs, Madelyn roared back at Flop’s words. Flop breathed a long sigh of relief, feeling the illusion of a furious breath of air run over his body.

“Safe”, was not a very appropriate answer considering what Flop remembered of Guaral’s state, but Madelyn did state she was unable to destroy the city.

If that was the case, then—

Flop: “Wife-san used my life well, didn’t she…”

Flop thought back on his deed right before he lost consciousness, when his awareness was vague, his ears filled with a ringing sound.

Madelyn had been so greatly upset by the sight of Flop bleeding and on the verge of losing his life, that he had caught sight of it in the corner of his eye. She seemed to have been questioning Flop about something, as if clinging onto it.

So the thought that his life could be made useful had come to him. An agreement could be made, where, in exchange for saving Flop’s life, Madelyn could be granted the answer that she desired, meaning that the possibility of Guaral escaping its predicament did exist.

That the pacifist Rem would be capable of making such a cold-hearted decision was unthinkable to him. It must have put a tremendous burden on her, even though, considering the current situation, it appeared she had been successful.

Flop: “Where’s Wife-san, the one who healed my wounds?”

Madelyn: “…She was friggin’ brought along as well. That was the condition I, the dragon, proposed, and she accepted it. This dragon keeps her promises. I’ll make sure she friggin’ keeps her promise to this dragon, too.”

Flop: “Promise…”

Madelyn: “This.”

Flop was relieved to hear that Rem was safe. But then an ornament bearing the fang of a beast—or rather, the fang of a dragon painted red, was pushed into his view.

A precious item that Flop usually wore around his neck, and carried with him without letting it part from his skin.

It was held against the tip of Flop’s nose, as he laid prone on the bed.

Flop: “Oh, you picked that up for me? Thank you so much for that. It’s a very, very precious thing. I’d be incapable of living on just fine and make myself look happy. That’s why…”

Madelyn: “—Carillon.”

Flop: “…”

Reaching out, Flop attempted to retrieve the fang. But Madelyn easily dodged Flop’s hand and, instead of returning the object, she uttered a name.

The name caused Flop to hold his breath, and Madelyn continued.

Madelyn: “This is Carillon’s fang. Why the frig’ do you have it?”

Twice Madelyn voiced Carillon, he had unmistakably heard that name.

It would be impossible for him to mishear it. Because that name was—

Madelyn: “Friggin’ answer! Why do you have Carillon’s…”

Flop: “I was there when Carillon was born. I thought up its name together with them. With Big Bro Miles and Balleroy.”

Madelyn: “—Hk.”

Flop: “When its fangs were replaced by new ones, we received one as a commemoration. It was proof of the bond with my sworn brother… my family. That’s why my sister and I have Carillon’s fangs.”

Quietly, Flop replied, as if lifting the lid on a precious treasure chest deep inside his heart.

He responded to the questions about the origin of the flying dragon fang swinging in Madelyn’s hand. Their precious family members—their benefactor and their sworn brother, a memento of two people no longer in the world.

Upon hearing the answer, Madelyn was rendered speechless, her lips quivering, her eyes widened.

Based on her reaction, and on the fact that she was familiar with Carillon’s name, Flop also made some assumptions, and, prefacing with “May I?”,

Flop: “Where did you get Carillon’s name? You even recognized its fangs at a single glance. I don’t think that the relationship you had was a fleeting one. Besides, you…”

Madelyn: “—Hk.”

Flop: “You’re the girl who took Balleroy’s place as Ninth. Perhaps you’d known Balleroy and Carillon for some time?”

Her reaction expressed her pain; hounding the young-looking Madelyn like this made his chest hurt

However, Flop’s chest had once suffered a pain more intense compared to that of seeing Madelyn in pain, and because of that very same topic. Nothing in the world was more devastating than the face of his sobbing sister, for him.

So he did not hesitate in cornering Madelyn, to get to the bottom of what laid within her heart.

—Balleroy Temeglyph.

One of the Nine Divine Generals of the Vollachian Empire, a sworn brother to Flop and Medium, a rebel who had lost his life in a revolt against the Emperor. A kind and beloved man, who deeply loved his dear dragon Carillon and his benefactor Miles.

What was the relationship between him and Madelyn?

And—

Flop: "Why did you become a Divine General?"

Madelyn: "—For revenge."

There was a beat of hesitation before she gave her answer, but the words that came out were transparent.

Madelyn's lips quivered, her eyes widened; slowly, her expression changed as her golden eyes were filled by the fury that had wrought the distortion of her face—a radiant rage.

The violent rage of the little girl accompanied by dragons, scorched Flop's entire body as he lay down on the bed.

Madelyn's rage was of such violence as to make him hallucinate that.

Madelyn revealed that she had taken up the position of Divine General to seek revenge.

The word "revenge" was something Flop also had thoughts about. —For Flop, it was his life's goal. However, his target for revenge was not a single person, but rather the world.

Revenge against the world itself, a world in which people were forced to make decisions against their will.

The anger in Madelyn's eyes, however, was wholly different.

As for the violent emotion that burned in her golden eyes, he knew who it should be directed at.

Flop: “For whose sake do you want to exact revenge?”

Madelyn: “…For Balleroy, revenge for the man who was to be this dragon’s mate.”

Flop: “…”

Madelyn: “I, the dragon, will never forgive the one who killed this dragon’s darling. For that reason—”

She would exact revenge for Balleroy’s death; Madelyn’s small frame overflowed with rage as she replied.

Flop did not know how Balleroy and Madelyn had met, what experiences they had gone through, or what form their bond had taken.

However, he did understand that Madelyn lamented and mourned his death from the bottom of her heart.

And so, therefore, that was why—

Flop: “—Who is Balleroy’s killer? How can your revenge be fulfilled?”

If Medium were the one present here, she would certainly have embraced Madelyn out-right.

If it were Medium, who had shed a waterfall of tears and wailed loudly at the deaths of Balleroy and Miles, she would certainly have taught Madelyn how to cry.

Someone dear to her had been killed. And at that fact, Madelyn was furious.

She did not know how to grieve. As a being of tremendous power with black horns, a being to whom flying dragons obeyed, she could only think of a single way to grieve. Rage.

And it was the same with Flop, who had forgotten how to cry.

And so—

Madelyn: “The one who caused Balleroy’s death was—”

Flop’s question was answered by Madelyn, as she squeezed her small hands.

Her darling stolen from her, and having been dispossessed of a place to pour her love in, keeping it within her petite body, Madelyn allowed the embers of her anger to burn in place of shedding tears, resolving to exact vengeance.

Flop: “…”

And Flop, upon hearing that name woven by Madelyn’s mouth, closed his eyes.

He closed his eyes, kept his silence. For once, he forgot the ache of the still-healing wound which Madelyn had torn into his chest, and surrendered himself to the darkness behind his eyelids.

On closing his eyes, he could still recall the faces of those dear to him.

Miles: “You and Medium ain’t thinking straight. Those who should stay at the Countess’s place, I won’t be able to take care of y’all, good grief.”

Balleroy: “This is Big Bro Miles’s way of showing his concern. Though, if you were to stay here, he’d end up takin’ care of you forever. He ain’t very up-front, now is he?”

Miles: “Shut your trap, Lil’ Balle! Those who get ahead in life shouldn’t come back so often!!”

Balleroy: “Nah, that wouldn’t be like me. Spending time here with Big Bro Miles, Flop, Medi and the others, that’s far more suited to me. Ain’t that right?”

This brought back fond memories of Balleroy, who had gone out of his way to come from afar and stop by on the day of departure, and Miles, as well as those two's late-night exchange.

With a big wave of his hand, he and Medium both left the place that had taken care of them for so long, and then—

And then, having finally arrived at the Imperial Capital, Flop O'Connell's blue eyes were alight.

With those eyes of his lit up, his lips weaved words.

They were—

Flop: "—Balleroy's killer would be… Village Chief-kun. —No, the Emperor, Vincent Vollachia."

Interlude:
The Frenzied Overture of the Empire

1

He felt himself stretching out a hand from the dark space he was confined to towards white light.

In this deep, dark place, which he couldn't free himself from, he yet sought freedom. He yet sought for help to somehow do something about that which remained hopeless.

However, right at the very end, a girl had jumped in with a look of determination. He'd stretched out his hand towards her not because he was seeking salvation from her, but because he felt he needed to save her.

And so, to silence the selfish insisting shadows, he reached out his hand…

He reached out his hand and…

???: "…It's so small."

Subaru took a look at his own hand as he muttered that. He could just barely see it in his blurred vision.

He raised it in front of him, palm facing outward. It was his hand, extending from his shoulder. It opened and closed exactly as he willed it to. Without a doubt, it was his.

However, it was a size smaller than Subaru had expected, the hand of a child.

Meaning…

Subaru: "I didn't turn back to normal…"

That had been his chance to get out of this hopeless situation, he should have gotten it after going through untold hardship. He'd literally put his life on the line for this, and yet, the result had slipped out from under these hands of his.

Just how many sacrifices had he made for what he'd relinquished?

Just how many had it been…

Subaru: "…?! That's right, what the hell am I doing?!"

Suddenly, a jolt ran through Subaru's bleary consciousness, making him put his hand - the one he'd been staring at - on his face.

The memories that came streaming back to him were those of the fierce game of tag he had with Olbart in the Demon City's Crimson Lapis Castle, as well as the Great Disaster after.

Then, something happened just after Olbart touched Subaru's chest to try and undo his infantilization.

It somehow felt like someone had whispered the very soul language of love into his ears, but…

Subaru: "I passed out after that, Then I… And then?"

Subaru tried to search his vague memories for what had happened. However, even when he pushed and pulled, the door that held his memories sealed within did not yield an inch.

Seeing how stubborn this door was caused Subaru to firmly clench his back teeth together.

???: "…Now, now, let's take it easy, no need to get flustered. Luckily, y'all made it out with your lives; so, you can take your time to do stuff after the lil' missy that came with you wakes up."

Subaru: "…Huh?"

Subaru suddenly heard a voice coming from right next to him. He turned to look at it, dumbfounded. There, as he lay on a makeshift bed, his eyes met with someone who was resting his chin in his hands.

This someone was grinning from ear to ear, peering right into his face.

Subaru: “WHAA?!”

???: “Whoa there. Love the reaction, but it’s best you keep things on the downlow. If we’re too loud, the management will have their eye on us and put together a bothersome fight to the death. But then again…”

Subaru: “…”

???: “Though it may be in bad taste, I don’t dislike that sort of idea, rather, I quite like it.”

Subaru jumped to his feet without thinking. Gazing at him as he did so, was a blue haired individual boasting that ever so nonchalantly.

He had his long hair tied up into a ponytail and was wearing Japanese-style garb, the likes of which were seldom seen here. Subaru was left astonished by how unfamiliar he looked; he took a deep gulp before he chose his words, and his question.

Subaru: “…Who are you? Where are we?”

???: “…Oh, how splendid! What a great question! I’d been expecting that!”

Subaru: “Bweh?”

Subaru carefully asked his questions, the tone of his voice hushed as the individual’s eyes twinkled happily. He then quickly stretched out his hand and took Subaru’s, causing the latter to dart his eyes about in surprise.

He spun around once on the spot, right in front of Subaru, and said,

???: “You, who have crossed the black lake and reached this Island □ The Gladiator Island Ginunhive □ You, with that unpleasant look to your eyes, swirling with such wonderful premonitions! I shall indeed answer you!”

Both his tone and gestures were theatrical, and for someone he'd just met, he was rather discourteous. However, he paid no heed to Subaru's impression, and instead brazenly stuck to his attitude, his theatrics.

Almost like he was an actor in a stage performance, basking himself in a round of thunderous applause…

???: "…Cecilus Segmunt."

He placed a hand on his chest, took a bow before giving his name.

It felt vaguely familiar to Subaru. He tried to remember where he'd heard it before, and as soon as he did, a frown appeared on his face.

He'd heard it from Abel. If he wasn't mistaken, his name belonged to one of the Nine Divine Generals…

Cecilus: "I am Vollachia's Blue Lightning. —The lead actor of this world."

Subaru gulped as he heard him grandiosely declare that.

Both his name and title were consistent with what Subaru remembered, however, there was just one thing that stood as a huge issue.

Subaru: "…Vollachia's strongest, is a child?"

…Smiling right before him, the fact of the matter was: Cecilus Segmunt was a child, around the same age as the shrunken Subaru, one that really had the same vibe as an obnoxious brat.

2

—At the same time, in a room of a certain mansion.

???: "You liar, you good for nothing liar! I wish you would just die!"

In a high-pitched, ear-splitting shriek, the woman wept and screamed.

In addition to her shouting, her anger took form in further ways. A vase was thrown and shattered with a resounding crash on the carpet. The man sighs quietly, with shards raining upon his feet.

???: “Katya, I feel bad too. This was really beyond my expectations.”

Katya: “Shut up! Like I care about your expectations! None of that matters to me!”

Shaking her head in disgust, the woman with her hair tied back in two, throws a violent temper tantrum, a habit inherited from her older brother.

Katya, a crippled woman sitting in a wheeled chair, stares at him with tears in her blue eyes, a look that defies her scarce vitality.

Sensing love in the sharpness of her gaze, the man —Todd closed one eye and stepped closer.

Katya: “Stay away!”

Todd: “I can't. Because I want to be with you every second, and as close as possible, even if it's just for one step.”

The answer to Katya's rejection was Todd's true feelings, without any exaggeration.

Katya bites her thin lip as Todd advances, ignoring her refusal. But she couldn’t resist in any other way than to reach out her hands, apathetically trying to push him away.

She is crippled, frail, and vulnerable to being loved. That is Todd's beloved fiancée.

It's hard to believe that I am related to Jamal, someone who is so insensitive and always manages to get into all sorts of trouble.

Todd: “Gotcha.”

Katya: “—hk.”

Katya's cheeks contorted as Todd gently grasped her outstretched hand and touched her. As if to offer some resistance, she spun her chair around, forcing Todd around to face her back.

Shrugging his shoulders at her stubborn attitude, Todd hugs his beloved woman from behind.

Katya: "…Don't touch me, you liar. You were always full of it. You didn't even bring… Nii-san home, and after that, you said you weren't going to leave."

Todd: "I'm not going to make any excuses. You know, I'm a huge liar and a promise-breaker."

While she turns away from Todd, he brushes his cheek against Katya's hair as she curses him.

She was right, and Todd piled lie upon lie on top of lie. He promised to bring Jamal back safely, but he let him die in the fortress city, and when he got back to the capital, he couldn't keep his promise not to leave.

However, Todd would like to make the excuse that both of these events were beyond his control.

Without Jamal as a decoy, Todd would not have made it out alive. The irony is taking her with him —the woman he saved, instead of Jamal, backfired on him.

Todd: "First General Arakiya has expectations for me. It seems like she is letting me avenge Jamal's death."

Katya: "—Nii-san's."

Todd: "But, only if I can prove to her that I'm useful, that is."

In response to Katya's hushed whispering, Todd's cheeks twisted inwardly in disgust.

To be honest, he really didn't care about avenging Jamal's death. It was a miscalculation on his part that the story he had made up for her comfort resonated with Arakiya more than he had expected.

Thanks to that, she apparently made a direct proposal to the prime minister to add Todd, having lost his best friend, to her ranks.

As a result, Todd becomes her sole subordinate and must leave the imperial capital because of it. In order to prove whether he is competent for the position, he has been given.

As a test for that, he will be accompanying Arakiya from now on—

Todd: “—Gladiator Island, Ginunhive.”

Katya: “…promise me one thing.”

Katya says this in a trembling voice as Todd holds her from behind.

Todd silently nodded to Katya, still demanding a promise, even though he had broken his promise so many times before.

Katya: “Please, I beg of, you… you to come back to me safely.”

Squeezing her from behind, Todd's arms hold her tightly, and Katya's fragile hand lays on top of his.

Todd kissed his beloved's hair as if to confirm the sensation.

Then, he decided,

—I will return to this woman no matter the sacrifice.

Bonus Short Stories

The Land of Wolves:
Death Unto the Weak, No Mercy V

1

Katya Aurélie was stunned by the news of her brother Jamal Aurélie's death.

"My brother…is dead…"

Lying on top of her bed, she immediately regretted opening her mouth in front of her maid.

She wasn't supposed to hear about it. Even though she spent all of her time alone in her quarters, it was inevitable that she would eventually catch wind of it.

"…Leave me be."

"But my lady…"

"I said, leave me alone!"

Yelling at the maid for her superficial sympathy, Katya threw her pillow at her. Missing its target, the pillow rolled on the floor.

The maid tried to pick the pillow up, but Katya barked, "Get out!"

With a solemn nod, the maid curtsied and quickly made herself scarce.

Katya was left alone in the quiet room. After hearing the door close, she buried her face in her hands.

"Brother…"

She always believed that even if he was cut down in battle, he wouldn't die.

In fact, Jamal himself insisted that he wouldn't die even if he was killed, and although he was a crass and uncaring older brother, they had an unspoken trust.

And that trust was broken with Jamal's death.

It was a mistake to place her trust and hopes in such a fragile thing as unfounded faith.

Nothing in life goes as one wants it to.

"Bu…Buarghhh!"

Rising from deep within her, wasn't the sound of crying, but rather the broken cries of pain and disappointment crushing her lungs down.

Coughing miserably, Katya folded herself over her frail body.

Her hands searched for her familiar pillow, wanting to hold it tight before her chest, but remembered how she had thrown it across the room. She hated herself for not having the maid pick it up.

—Katya hated herself. She despised herself.

So she couldn't understand people who were kind to her, who helped her, who were friendly to her. She was afraid of them.

"Wh-Why…Why were you like that?!"

Why did he show me such kindness?

Jamal usually didn't feel a shred of concern for others, but he was always kind to her. Katya could not understand it at all.

"Why…?"

—Why did I speak so hatefully in my last conversation with him?

Filled with regret, Katya continued to cough as tears streamed down her cheeks.

House Aurélie was a low-ranking noble house of the Vollachian Empire that would likely die out in their lifetime.

This was Katya's understanding, as she was too weak to marry into another family or to fulfill a woman's duty of giving birth to strong children.

Since she could not be of any help to her family, they had placed all their hopes in her sibling. Unfortunately, the eldest son passed away, leaving their last hope with Jamal, the second and more problematic son.

Words could not describe the grief and anguish felt by the family when their eldest passed away.

Although he wasn't Katya's favorite brother, Picard Aurélie was an outstanding young man with a bright future ahead of him. Though he was gifted with extraordinary abilities, he was not blessed with luck, meeting his demise in a rockfall accident while riding in a dragon carriage.

The feeling of sorrow to those closest to him was further compounded by the fact that Jamal and Katya were also riding in said carriage.

They said, "Those two should've died instead of Picard."

"That would have been better."

Katya's heart broke into a million pieces when she heard the malicious gossip.

You could think whatever you want, however, the least you could do was not let others hear such sickening thoughts. It was cruel to place the blame on the two younger siblings. They weren't worthy as heirs to the empire.

Unlike Katya, who had given in to the gossip, Jamal had challenged all of the silent relatives to a duel and in accordance with the rules of the empire, he had beheaded them all.

"Now that Picard is dead, House Aurélie is ours. Wait and see, Katya. I'll make sure that you never have a reason to scowl again," radiated Jamal with a smile, drenched in the blood of a decapitated relative.

In spite of Katya's scowl in response, seeing the head roll away was almost enough to alleviate the cries of resentment that had wrapped hold of itself deep in her for so long.

Anyway…

"From this day forward, House Aurélie will begin its rapid march forward!"

She was no prophet, but as Katya watched Jamal's enthusiastic cries, she was convinced that the family line would die out.

3

With the death of their eldest and the rebellious new heir, their father, the head of House Aurélie, became desperate following the disappearance of the sibling's mother.

Both parents had little interest in their own daughter, who was born with poor health.

Even though they were traumatized by their eldest's death, Katya felt nothing. On the surface, he was good to others, but he was always cold to Katya and hated her.

Of course, Katya disliked him in return. Although she didn't wish for his death, she also didn't feel any remorse or sadness when he met his maker.

Jamal is the only one in the family who cares for me.

He was a hopeless brother, but Jamal was the only family she had. If Jamal wished it, Katya would willingly help him reach his rash ambitions.

She wasn't a great beauty and was of little use as a woman due to her poor health. But if Jamal thought she could be of use politically and wanted to marry her off, Katya was more than willing to help him.

And so…

“Meet Todd Fang. My colleague.”

Deep in her heart, Katya knew that Jamal lacked the charm of a nobleman when he returned from a war zone, bringing back with him someone he wanted to introduce her to.

Katya had never discussed the future of the family with him.

Jamal had no idea that Katya had resigned her future away, but it didn’t matter. He remained confident in his plan, even though it wasn’t a very good one.

Even if it wasn’t an impossible plan…

“Mr. Todd, may I ask what position you hold?”

“Sorry? Oh, you mean the social standing of my family or my army title? Well, I wasn’t born into a great family, and I’m the lowest ranking soldier. But, I suppose this promotion would make me a Private First-Class, don’t you agree?

“I suppose so…”

“Damn right he is!” butted in Jamal. “Listen to this, Katya. He was awarded for his distinguished service in the army. He was the one that, well…beheaded the rebel leader.”

Jamal patted Todd on the shoulder with a look of pride on his face.

Introducing such a man to Katya felt like a cruel joke. There were still so many unanswered questions that demanded an explanation.

Such as what had happened to his right eye or why he burst into his sister’s—who was nonetheless a lady—private quarters without permission. And why he would introduce her to a stranger who was neither of an acceptable social rank nor held a high position in the army.

Katya’s mind was filled with such questions, but Jamal, with an open and unruffled expression, said to Katya, “I like this guy. How about it, Katya? How would you like to have him as your husband?”

House Aurélie might very well die out in our own lifetime, she thought.

4

“I don’t know much about the world of nobility,” Todd began, “but I understand that you and Jamal are in a bad position.”

“I don’t need you to tell me that,” snapped back Katya.

“You have every right to think that way, but Jamal doesn’t see it that way. That’s the problem, isn’t it? I’m not sure how he feels about it.”

Katya sighed as Todd leaned his head against her bed.

Katya made a strange noise with a mixture of emotions upon hearing Jamal’s gory introduction to Todd, provoking a fit of madness where she drove them away when she smashed a nearby vase with a pillow.

If a man was to see such eccentric behavior from a woman on their first meeting, he would be disillusioned, regardless of what he had been told beforehand. Katya doubted her brother had any of the charm required to make his friends and colleagues want to see her again.

But despite Katya’s attempts to drive Todd away with her sour attitude, he continued to drop by the Aurélie house to see her.

“…”

“Hmm? What’s up? Is there something on my face?”

“…Your face has shady weirdo written all over it.”

“Ha-Ha-ha-ha, what the heck? Saying I look like a shady weirdo is an awful thing to say."

Even when she gave him snide remarks, Todd would laugh them off.

Katya felt puzzled by the ordeal. Her attitude was not very ladylike, and yet he wouldn't even leave her room.

Katya didn't like to be exposed to the sun, so all of the windows in the room were covered with thick curtains and she rarely got out of bed except to use the bathroom.

"Are you feeling self-conscious because you can't go outside with me?" asked Todd "If that's the case, I'd appreciate it if you made use of my gift."

With a friendly smile on his face, Todd pointed to the chair with wheels in a corner of the room—a product of Kararagi origin. Apparently, it could be used to seat a person with a limp and push them around from behind.

"A chair on wheels is crazy. I'll fall."

"I've made it so that you won't fall out of it. It'll be tough to move around by yourself, but I won't leave you alone. That won't be an inconvenience to you, will it?

He had gone to the trouble of setting it up for Katya, and had given it to her as a gift.

I don't know, I don't know, I don't know. —I don't know what to do…why would Todd do that for me?

"…Do you like my brother, by any chance?" asked Katya.

"Oh, come on, that's a terrible misunderstanding. Don't tell me you think I'm trying to get Jamal to like me through you? That would just piss him off, don't you think?"

"…Yeah. I suppose so. You're kind of a weird guy. Odd and creepy."

That's why I haven't even laid a finger on that wheelchair. But I still don't get what he's after.

"I can't walk, I can't have children, there's not a single womanly thing about me, and I have a twisted personality. And on top of that, there's my troublesome brother."

"You're right, I can't love you for that last flaw."

"!!!"

Her breath stopped. This went against everything she knew. She had been ridiculed endlessly by others her entire life. She cursed herself for her inability to have children and here stood a man before her who claimed he loved her.

It was all a lie. It had to be. Todd was crazy to love a cursed woman like her. But what was the point of deceiving Katya like this? Was he after the Aurélie family fortune? They may have looked wealthy to a commoner, but this home wasn't worth ransacking.

"Todd, I don't understand you."

"I don't really mind, Katya. Even if you don't understand me, I don't give a single damn. But I want you to remember just one thing."

"…What's that?"

Todd reached for Katya, who sat up on her bed, her back resting on a pillow. He stood up, pulling her hands close to him. Katya's eyes widened and her shoulders tensed in response.

Todd gently stroked her pale cheeks and said, "I love you with every fiber of my being," before he went on. "This is no exaggeration. I love you, no questions asked."

"Oh…"

I'm not good enough to be loved. Jamal has always showered me with kindness, but that's because he's my brother. I had another brother who didn't care for me, Picard. But Jamal was the exception.

But what would that make Todd? I don't know. I don't know, and I'm afraid of not knowing.

"I want to make the world an easier place for you and Jamal to live in."

Katya could not say anything to Todd's gentle smile or the touch of his unusually cold hand.

After some time, their relatives disappeared without an explanation. They had often interfered in Katya's life and in Jamal's post as an imperial soldier. So, Katya was more than happy to stay in the dark about such reasons.

She accepted the fact that Todd Fang was a curious man, and when he asked for her hand in marriage, she accepted, entrusting their futures to one another.

—And so, the countdown had begun for the downfall of House Aurélie, or so she thought.

5

—Turning forward to the present, as Katya learns of the news of her brother's death.

Hearing the coughing Katya fall out from her bed, the maid rushed to the scene to help her. The strong scent of incense filled the room and Katya recalled the morning of her brother's departure for his next expedition.

Wearing the now-familiar eyepatch, Jamal was headed to the eastern territories with Todd. For some reason, when he returned from his mission, Jamal was more excited to talk about the wedding plans than the engaged couple themselves.

Even when he was alone with Todd, he would still bring the topic of the upcoming marriage up. It bothered her that he thought so highly of their partnership.

That's why Katya said those awful, childish things. There was always a chance that he might die on a mission, so she didn't want to make a big deal out of the ceremony.

I sent my brother off without even conveying a word of good luck and safety in arms. As a result, Jamal died. He promised me that he would come home safely, but he broke his word. But how could I blame him when it was me who was in the wrong in the first place?

So, you see…

“Lady Katya, Master Todd is here to see you.”

Katya gave a curt reply and went to her wheelchair. It was a gift from Todd, and one that she had been using for some time without any resistance. The wheels were hard to turn with her hands, but it allowed her to move freely around the room.

With some difficulty, Katya managed to turn the wheelchair towards the door.

“My brother…is dead…”

Why did this pathetic man who claimed he loved me come back?

I don’t know what to make of any of this. My entire life is filled with misfortune. —Oh, how I despise myself so.

“Katya, it’s me. I’m coming in.”

There was a knock at the door and a man’s voice lingered in her ears. Katya grabbed the vase on the table. The door slowly opened, and aiming at the man on the other side, she threw the heavy vase with all her might.

“You complete pest!” she cried, lashing out at her fiancé and cursing her misfortune.

Provisional Rem's Paranoia: Laundry While the Oni are Away

"—Soul Sisters, is it?"

Hearing a word she was not familiar with, Rem returned that question with a puzzled look.

This was the garden of the biggest mansion within the Fortified City of Guaral. Near a well in the rear garden, they were doing laundry on clothes and bandages at a watering hole.

Recently, there was a commotion which, while small in number, left several wounded. As such, there was no harm in having as many spare bandages as possible. —Furthermore, it served the purpose of preparing for the future.

Of course, to Rem, it would be better if these did not have to be used in the first place.

In either case—

"That's right, yees~ Kuna and I are that Soul Sisters thing, yeees~"

Laughing with a wide grin, standing beside Rem as she did laundry, Holly was hanging the clothes that just finished washing up on a string. This girl who was a full head taller than Rem, contrary to her carefree way of talking, was hanging the laundry at a brisk pace.

Although she had grown used to handling her cane to a certain degree, comparing Rem, whose legs could not be described as flawless, to Holly would yield a night and day difference.

With the tips of her hair dyed yellow, donning healthy brown colored skin, was Holly. Rem also found herself thinking of their time together as quite long within her own subjective life.

That said, there were still many things about her that she still did not know.

“Holly-san, you seem quite versed in doing laundry.”

“Ehehe, you’re gonna make me blush, yees~. In truth, I originally didn’t have the role of Hunter, but of Guardian instead, which is why I’m good at this, yees~”

“Guardian, is it?”

While she understood the meaning of that word, she had not the faintest idea what specific duties it entailed from her answer.

From the flow of conversation, she understood that Guardians and Hunters were a set of words, but within Rem’s meager, unreliable knowledge, she did not have a big impression of those two going together.

In that manner, Rem furrowed her brow,

“What are you doing…Rem’s head is in shambles, ain’t it?”

“Ah, it’s Kuna~”

With nary a sound, a thin shadow appeared as it stepped into the garden’s field. Holly’s eyes glinted as she spotted her entrance, swinging a big hand as she called her name.

Giving an apathetic shrug to that call, the tips of her hair dyed green, was Kuna.

In contrast to the wide-eyed Holly, the sharp slit-eyed Kuna gazed at Rem doing laundry, and then at Holly who was hanging it respectively,

“Rem, titles like Guardian and Hunter, are actually the way we Shudrak operate. As such, you ain’t gonna come up with the answer no matter how much you wreck your head”

“I see, so that’s how it is… What do they mean?”

“…The fact that you ain’t got any hesitation there is another good trait of yours, Rem”

“… ? ”

Eyes narrowed, Rem tilted her head at Kuna who was scratching her cheek. Behind her, Holly tilted her head in much the same way, grumbling, “You say such difficult things Kuna, yeees~”

Sighing in disappointment at their reaction, Kuna raised a finger and said, “Listen ok?”

“Ain’t like it matters to me, but traditions are something that are directly connected to someone’s pride. Even if trying to learn while ignorant is something good, there seem to be people who consider direct questioning to be rude”

“For that…I’m sorry; I did not think far enough”

Hearing the warning from Kuna who had slightly lowered the tone of her voice, Rem meekly lowered her head.

It would be a simple matter to dismiss Kuna’s words as an exaggeration. However, for Rem, who, to a certain extent, knew as little of the world as a baby, what basis did she have to declare something an Exaggeration?

Holding those given words close to her chest, Rem deeply scolded herself.

“So then, what does it mean?”

“…Did you listen to what I just said?”

“Of course. However, if I had already asked once…”

As if asking to leave the reflection for later, she positioned herself to continue her questioning right here.

Kuna raised both hands at Rem’s curiosity, saying, “Fine, fine” in defeat.

“Ain’t no point in hiding it so I’ll talk… A Guardian is, someone with the role of protecting the village and raising the children while the hunters are away”

“Protecting the village, and raising the children…is it? That is a splendid job”

“A job for the leftovers is what it is”

Rem had been very satisfied hearing the explanation for the Guardians; however, Kuna’s answer was bitter. Averting her eyes, Kuna pursed her lips. In response to her trying to make Rem see things in black and white then,

“Geez~, Kuna, if you keep talking like that, you’re gonna trouble Rem~”

“Ah, no, if it was me who asked something inappropriate then…”

“No, not at all~ There’s nothing for you to apologize for~ It’s just, Kuna admires the job of a Hunter very much, so she doesn’t like the duty of Guardian~ “

Laughing at the bewildered Rem, Holly grabbed Kuna by the shoulders and jostled her. With the difference in physiques, Kuna was being handled like trees swaying in a gale.

And then, while Holly was swinging Kuna around—

“Kuna and I, we ended up switching roles to Hunter partway~. Because we came up with us doing the duty with Kuna as the eyes, and with me drawing the bow~”

“Eyes and Bow… Now that you mention it, you two had gone hunting together”

Previously, when they had traveled from the Shudrak settlement to Guaral, the two of them accompanied Rem as her bodyguards. En route, they were the ones who hunted prey, and procured ingredients.

At the time as well, while they seemed like an odd pair, their excellency in archery had moved her.

“And then we both became Hunters~ That and this as well, represent our bond as Soul Sisters~”

"…I'm telling you it ain't that crazy of a thing"

Kuna's cheeks lightly colored in embarrassment at the frank Holly's smile. Looking at that, Rem preambled with a "By the way"

"I missed my chance to ask this before, but umm, what are Soul Sisters?"

Souls and Sisters were not like Hunters and Guardians, but they were also a meaningful combination. Though she could guess that this was used to describe Kuna and Holly both from their tone,

"I believe it's both a very precious word and relationship, but what is the actual meaning?"

"You, how come you made such a meek face a moment ago…"

"—Was it, wrong of me?"

Glared at by Kuna with reproachful eyes, Rem sought answers hesitantly.

As she said, it was true that she was reflecting just a moment ago, but she could not stop this intellectual curiosity of hers. Kuna making a sour face at Rem's pleading look, but—

"Soul Sisters are, Shudrak babies who were born on the same day~"

"Ah! Holly, what the hell!"

"Geez~, this isn't something to hide and bully her over~; I'm telling you it's fine to tell her about it~"

Puffing up her round cheeks, Holly, who answered for Kuna, threw out her chest. However, Kuna poking those puffed-up cheeks of Holly、

"Don't be stupid. If it's around us then I don't mind, but what happens when Rem does the same thing with somebody who isn't us? They might get angry won't they?"

"Then when the time comes, we just have to protect Rem from that angry person~!”

“We ain’t always gonna be with her!”

“P-Please don’t fight over me!”

In the panic of the two having begun to quarrel, Rem jumped in to intercede. Standing up using her cane, she, literally, broke in between the two.

“Holly’s care and Kuna’s concern both make me glad. But, I do not wish for you to fight. You’re Soul Sisters, are you not?”

“Muh…”

“That’s right~”

It seems her eye is quite discerning, as the both of them calmed down when she referenced Soul Sisters. Whether it was to the Shudrak or to the two of them, it might carry the same meaning, but it seemed that phrase was deemed quite important, and something to be used with much care.

Seeing the relationship between the two, suddenly made Rem come to a conclusion.

“I’m envious of your relationship”

“What now?”

“Soul Sisters…Surely, it refers to sisters who don’t need a blood-relation right? And you two get along so well, and even hunt together “

Supporting each other, the two constructed an indispensable relationship.

For Rem who had nothing to lean on, she thought of that as something bright, something to be very envious of. Especially so, since she harbored an immense sentiment towards the sound of “Soul Sisters”.

“It seems I also, have an older sister. An older twin sister, as I’ve heard”

“Rem’s onee-san~?”

“Yes. That person said it though, and I don’t remember it, so I only half believe it…”

While she kept prefacing it that way, as expected she did not actually doubt the existence of her sister. That said, the unconfirmed existence of her sister was, after all, something that had an impression called an emotionally complex burden on Rem.

However, the one with the vague existence was the current Rem herself. In her current state where she was being manipulated by Subaru’s every action and his every word, what if she happened to meet her true sister?

“My current self, couldn’t face even my blood sister with a clear heart. That’s why, I’m envious of you two who are connected by an unseen bond”

“Rem…”

With Rem having verbally expressed her complicated state of mind, Holly flapped her hands up and down in panic. Her response meant that she did not really know what she wanted to say, nor what would be acceptable to say.

Realizing she had troubled the kind hearted Holly, Rem tried to say something to her when—

“—I think, ya ain’t gotta be so pessimistic about it”

Rem blinked her eyes with an “eh…” at Kuna who made that statement with one eye shut.

“You’re sisters, and also twins right? Whether it be twins or triplets, the connection between sisters born from the same belly is quite strong as it seems. From what I’ve heard, the Shudrakian term Soul Sisters, is taken from that bond I hear”

“Eeeh, was that so~?! I had no idea at all~!”

Kuna reminded such to Holly, who had placed a hand over her mouth in surprise.

Originally, whenever twins or more were born in the Shudrak, it was confirmed that there laid a special connection between them. Warped by the flow of time, the tale that was passed down was that of the special bond between 『Twins of the soul』 for children born on the same day.

“In short, Soul Sisters is all just make believe”

“Geez~! Kuna, you’re back at it with that wording again~! Kuna I’m really going to start believing that you hate being Soul Sisters with me~!”

“I ain’t saying that…but, it’s just that’s how I think. We can’t keep holding onto these old ass customs; we gotta advance or else the Shudrak’ll fall to ruin”

“Geez~! Don’t let the Chief…I mean, Mizelda hear you~!”

Kuna did nothing but shrug her shoulders at Holly who displayed her dissatisfaction while shaking both hands.

Watching those two, Rem looked down at her chest at their previous words. From the bottom of her quietly beating heart within her chest, there was a very faint twinge-like sensation.

What was that, the discomfort and sense of foreignness that she was reminded of, she had always wondered.

“My connection, with my flesh-and-blood sister….”

“Supposing perhaps, you prayed, tried to wish for it, then you might be able to feel it. If you wanna remember what you forgot, that may also be a way to go about it”

As if she guessed Rem’s confusion, Kuna said that in anticipation.

A temporary hesitation. However, she wished for that discomfort's true form after all, and so Rem surrendered herself to that probing feeling. She closed her eyes, seeking the answer from that warmth in the darkness.

"—ah"

—She felt like she could feel a faint, light pink warmth in a near faraway place.

"Did you feel something~? If so then that's amazing~!"

"I can't feel it super clearly…But I could feel like it was there. Is this, a connection?"

She once again felt like she had touched a part of her connection with that unseen someone, her yet to be known sister, so Rem mumbled.

As unreliable as that feeling was, and while it certainly made her feel like it was there, it also made her fully realize the huge gap which she was unable to pull that closer from.

That the current Rem, could not possibly close that enormous gap.

However—

"I very, very much felt it. Something which feels much more reliable than that person …"

"…Man, Subaru just ain't catching a break"

"And he's working so hard for Rem too; Subaru is so pitiful~"

Hearing Rem's words as she lightly complained, Kuna and Holly's stances leaned more towards Subaru.

Certainly there was no need to cite him as an example, so Rem reflected on that point as well. However, the one who gave information about her sister to the mentally unstable Rem was Subaru in the first place.

He himself did not have any bad intentions, and he even prefaced it with”Sorry”before telling her, but even then, Rem’s turmoil was very difficult for others to perceive.

His lack of attention to those things is what makes Subaru a Subaru.

“That’s enough about that person. We’re digressing”

“You were the one who brought Subaru into the conversation in the first place…”

“That is not true…It is not, right?”

After replying reflexively, she then lost confidence in her own statement. That said, if that were to be the truth, she would be a bit uncomfortable about Subaru always residing in some corner of her mind.

She had remained in Guaral away from him, for the sake of Subaru’s own independence as he had tried to remain next to her. And also because she is being roundaboutly told to reexamine herself by Priscilla.

“…Understood. Let us do laundry with a clear mind”

“The moment you say to have a clear mind, ain’t it like you’re no longer with a clear mind?”

“Geez~! Don’t speak out of turn~!”

Respecting Rem who wanted to renew her feelings, Holly, who had puffed up her cheeks, held Kuna tight. Buried under her chest due to the size difference, Kuna let out a “Mugyu”

Doing that and holding the wriggling Kuna tight, Holly smirked,

“I’m also going to continue helping Rem~! We’re doing some nice laundry after so long; it’s quite fun so join us Kuna~!”

“Wha-, why do I gotta join you guys…!”

“But Kuna, I joined you when you said you wanted to go hunting together~!”

“Ugh…hh”

As if that was in fact her sore point, Holly’s counter made Kuna stiffen.

Somehow, she felt like she had seen an unexpected power balance between the two, and Rem let out a small giggle. And here she had thought Kuna had seized leadership, while Holly merely followed her.

“Seems like Holly is the one who is actually more like an elder sister than Kuna.”

“Yeah yeah, Rem gets it~! I was the one who was born first~”

“Ain’t that like some tens of seconds difference or something?! No way we’re deciding it from that!”

Baring her fangs, Kuna escaped from Holly’s arms, and then turned towards Rem’s back. Glaring at the laundry being washed with well water that they’re holding, she sighed.

Kuna held dissatisfaction towards the role of Guardian, and decided to become a hunter together with her Soul Sister. There was no mistaking that this was a reluctant job for her—

“Alrght whatever, I’ll help out”

Perhaps because of consideration for Rem who was in a rush to finish her job, or because her Soul Sister had asked her with a cheerful smile, Kuna proposed so curtly.

Rem laughed in response to her attitude,

“Yes, your help is most welcome; we have to clear this job, lest helping Priscilla with her bath be delayed, and I incur her words of displeasure.”

“…You, seems like you have it tough.”

“We really have to help you with this after all~!”

Perhaps because Priscilla’s tyranny was quite well known, she keenly felt Kuna and Holly’s kindness.

Laughing bitterly at that truth, Rem got to work on finishing the remaining laundry, while being helped by the cooperation of sisters who, while having no blood relation, are truly linked through the soul.

Doing so, she poured her thoughts but for a moment, onto the perturbation she felt even now within the depths of her chest.

That was—

“I wonder just what kind of sister I was?”

She lunged such a question, which would not receive an answer, to her yet unseen older sister.

The Dragon Kingdom:
Missing Child Search Chronicle V

1

Diadora Regundra was the daughter of a wealthy, distinguished family of merchants from Piqtat.

Born into a rich household and blessed with good looks, the girl grew in age as she did in selfishness.

Whatever she wanted, she obtained, for nobody dared oppose one designated with her family's surname. Since she was a child, the circumstances gave leeway for her arrogance to thrive, supported by her house's power, which she, in her naivety, mistook for her own.

Hence, Diadora went on without ever meeting any lack, until one day, past her thirteenth birthday, she experienced failure for the first time.

She reached the stage where she began to acquire the features of a woman, along with a deep yearning for romance that she would aim to satisfy by using her beauty and status as weapons to conquer the opposite sex.

For some time, it was almost regarded as a show to see her parading around the city, accompanied by the men that she had caught.

Diadora was at her peak, no doubt… until she tumbled in the most unexpected way.

"Sorry, Diadora. I have some work to do at home. I'm thankful for the offer, but maybe next time."

Displaying a gentle yet mirthless smile, that man declined Diadora's invitation.

She could not believe it. To Diadora, the fact that she lost to a man's rejection was like a bomb dropped from the sky.

She continued to ask him time after time, under the assumption that he had made a mistake, but the answer never changed.

Eventually, the shame from those accumulated defeats opened a crack in Diadora's once perfect life. Desperate to fill up that crack, she committed herself to obscure her defeats with victories.

Or rather, to obscure her obsession with the one who rejected her, with the presence of a hundred who adored her.

But while she repeated that cycle, sometimes she would come to her senses. Was this going to fill up the crack in her heart in the end? Or was it just worsening it?

Since she could not have what she wished for in earnest, she questioned the value of what she did have in hand.

Diadora ignored, defied, dismissed those laments from her inner voice, and so she kept walking down this strenuous, thorny path…

"Looks like you're the eighth guy she's been with!"

And then came her second failure, wreaked by the younger brother of that same man who had jilted her.

2

"So that man is back in the city…?"

A manservant entered the mansion and gave a report that sullied Diadora's gorgeous profile with sourness.

Several years had passed since that disgraceful ice season, so she thought that the damage was repaired. However, the moment she heard his name, she felt blood gushing from the same wound that she thought healed.

The blood's vivid color and smell forced her to remember that nothing had ended yet.

"Well, it's been six years since that."

Putting a hand on her chamber's window, Diadora reminisced upon that dreadful day from the past.

During that one ice season, an unusual cold wave had assailed the south of the kingdom, and thereby Piqtat. Thanks to the gelid atmosphere, she had more time than usual to revel in interaction with the opposite sex.

Diadora longed for affection, but a certain man had misjudged that as the manifestation of a vile desire.

That man's futile, pointless diligence had resulted in a quite indiscreet disclosure of Diadora's relationships, and thus many people being hurt, including the aforementioned.

Therefore, she had decided to eliminate the cause itself. He was lucky to have escaped just before she could complete the task.

"If only he had never come back, I'd have turned a blind eye… What a stupid man."

Had he absconded and accepted that he would be forbidden to set foot in his hometown again, she would have exonerated him. But instead, the man had returned to Piqtat, almost as if he believed that he was welcome.

In doing so, he had reestablished their unsettled debt. And she was determined to collect her payment.

"Listen here. Call the mercenaries of this city. Get in contact with anyone who's interested in earning my favor or the Regundra family's. Now, at last, that man will…!"

"E-Excuse me, milady, that'll have to wait."

"What? We don't have all day. That man can get away any moment now. Seriously, he's as repulsive as those zodda bugs he…"

The opportunity for revenge had appeared, and Diadora was very eager to seize it. Her reprimand towards the manservant clarified that she would tolerate no hindrances.

However…

"Goaaah!"

"…?! Wh-What was that?! Who screamed?!"

All of a sudden, a hoarse scream blared outside the room, from downstairs, and astonished Diadora. To complement her surprise, the manservant at her side jerked his shoulders up, his countenance tense as well.

"Please listen! We have trouble, milady! There are some visitors claiming to be allied with the one you despise…"

"Allies of that man? What does that have to do with…? Agh, out of my way!"

Irked at the manservant's incoherence, Diadora pushed the scrawny man's chest away and exited the room in a hurry. When she espied the entrance hall on the ground floor, her eyes widened.

There she found the Regundra family's sturdy security guard facing a visitor…

"Ah, gh! Ugogogogo!"

"Quit kickin' up such a fuss! I'm tellin' ya, we ain't here ta pick a fight!"

And there she saw him shaking his legs midair as he struggled, with all his might, to release his chin from his opponent's grip.

The perpetrator was a boorish, golden-haired man, almost two heads shorter than the hefty guard. Said man's companion, a woman who was holding her own elbows, took a glance upstairs.

The woman, characterized by a maid uniform and pink hair, met Diadora's eyes with her own.

"You have guests."

That greeting, straightforward and impolite to the fullest, marked the start of their affair.

3

"Is this an attack against the Regundra family? Aren't you aware of how big our household is?"

"If there's something big here, it's your attitude. You're standing so firm now, you could almost fool me into thinking your knees weren't trembling when you saw Garf strike earlier."

"Silence!"

Shout as she may at her, the pink-haired woman, named Ram, would still not cease her supercilious stance.

Certainly, the scene in the hall had come as a shock. It was hard to believe that Gomuz, a guard with no merit other than his brawn, had been overpowered by somebody brawnier.

And on top of it…

"Sorry for what I did ta that guy. I cast some healin' magic on him, so let's just forget it happened, a'ight?"

"Garf, it's no use apologizing after you've done it. I'd feel bad asking for a favor that way…"

"Grrr…"

That somebody was the same youngster who now drooped his shoulders at a sermon from an even younger girl.

"… What a strange combination you make."

Diadora furrowed her brow at the odd visitors that had somehow ended up in her parlor.

Two maids and one man, a peculiar trio, had forced their way through the security and into the Regundra house.

Nevertheless, she could not afford to let the awe take the lead away from her.

“According to my manservant, you are all here to talk about a certain man.”

“That’s right. It’s a rather useless man we’re dealing with, but since his little problem might turn into a bigger thorn in our sides, we can’t ignore it.”

Ram nodded serenely when the manservant’s report was mentioned. From her unaffected affirmation, it could be presumed that they were acquainted with the man in question, and perhaps had helped him return too.

And while Diadora tried to pinpoint the motive behind their visit…

“Uh, sorry to interrupt. We’re looking for someone important to us.”

A lovely girl, the youngest of the group, took Diadora out of her thoughts. Her name was Petra, and her round eyes shone with seriousness as she pleaded to Diadora.

“And to find him, we have no choice but to go through Piqtat…”

“What she said. So, ma’am, we’re gonna need yer family… or rather, ya, ta cancel that one weird request ya sent.”

“Please!”

The youngster, nicknamed Garf, complemented Petra’s plead. Diadora watched Petra bow her head lower, then turned to look at Ram.

There, on the sofa, sat the woman, no humility whatsoever in her posture.

“What?” she narrowed her pink eyes, “Ram won’t say a word, no matter what face you make at her. At most, I can provide you with an insult.”

“Sister Ram! Don’t be like that. Let’s ask her together. I know you care about Subaru and Rem as much as we do.”

“Of course Rem has a place in my heart, but it’s not big enough to fit Barusu in.”

“Sister Ram…!”

Blushing, Petra urged Ram, who, in response, sighed and faced Diadora again.

“I take it back. Ram will ask as well. Withdraw it, please.”

“…”

“Withdraw the assassination order you placed against Otto Suwen.”

The moment that name came out of Ram’s lips, Diadora’s slanted eyes became sharper. That name belonged to the one who had cracked Diadora’s life for the second time.

No matter how much she tried to forget it, she could never.

“Must I? He’d be completely safe if he hadn’t come here in the first place.”

“Believe me, even he was reluctant. But necessity called, so he answered. That’s the kind of man he is at heart.”

“Necessity… Is that so?”

Every single part of Ram’s reply got under Diadora’s skin. If that man did act out of necessity, then, did that imply that shaming her had been necessary, too?

He and his brother had done nothing but humiliate her, disgrace her…

“I deny it.”

“Miss Diadora, don’t say that…”

“Oh, no, I sure will! I couldn’t care less what kind of life that man had outside this city. So he’s grown into such a wonderful person? Well, good for him!”

“Miss Diadora…”

“I will never, ever, forget what he did to me.”

With the aftertaste of disgrace in her mouth, Diadora glared at the visitors and spoke up.

That was her true intent, independent of the manservant, Gomuz, or the Regundra family.

When Ram heard those words, she lowered her gaze a little.

“Excuse us.”

“Huuuh? Hey, Ram, not yet. What’re we gonna do about Otto-bro?”

“We’ve tried everything. Ram doesn’t want to give up, either. However, I’ve concluded that, this time, the problem is only Otto’s. If we have to risk having him killed by an assassin, then we’d better leave him behind.”

“What tha hell are ya talkin’ about?! Ain’t that like ‘Giyugri’s Spinning Plates’?!”

Ram shrugged and prepared to retreat from the place, despite Garf’s insistence. Diadora, while dumbfounded, did not disagree with him.

If they were going to retire so early, why had they even bothered visiting?

At least, Diadora was relieved to see that Ram did not disregard her opinion.

“… We’re employees of Margrave Roswaal L. Mathers.”

"Huh…"

"Mister Otto works at his mansion along with us."

Looking askance at Ram and Garf, Petra presented a shocking testimony.

Diadora was struck with amazement and confusion, and at a loss for words, when she found out about their unlikely job.

"Petra," Ram intervened, narrowing her eyes, "this is a wealthy household from Piqtat. Lord Roswaal's name shouldn't be used in such a…"

"Sister Ram, you go way too easy on Master. Besides, I think that he asked me to go with you, precisely, so that I could do this."

"…"

Ram endured Petra's rebuttal with uneasy silence. Once she blocked Ram's opposition, Petra continued talking to Diadora, whose mouth was also shut.

"Miss Diadora, I won't pretend I understand how you feel. But I do understand that Mister Otto did something wrong. So, how about this?"

"… About what?"

"I'll make myself responsible for bringing Mister Otto here, so that he apologizes. You may do whatever you want to him… as long as it's not too harsh, but still, that'd help you get back at him."

Diadora listened, wide-eyed, as Petra raised a finger and elaborated without hesitation. Who would have thought that a girl with a face and mannerisms so cute could say something so frightening?

But the scariest thing was her proposal itself.

Because one would not think about broaching that unless they were aware of the cracks in Diadora's heart.

“Mister Otto hurt you. And as a fellow woman, I get it.”

“…”

“Since I’ve already mentioned our Master’s name, we could go over your head and solve this. But, honestly, I don’t want to do that.”

She was searching for common ground, to satisfy her own worries and Diadora’s feelings alike.

In the end, Diadora would be obliged to withdraw the assassination order against Otto, regardless of her choice. And yet, she was being offered a chance to fill that crack.

“What do you think?” Petra inquired with innocent eyes.

The girl’s prospects seemed bright to an eerie degree.

“…Can you really do that?”

“You bet I can. People at the mansion always listen to me,” Petra boasted as she flexed her thin arm, a quite comforting gesture.

Behind her, Garf could be seen with a grievous expression, proof of the disquiet surging inside his mind.

Diadora placed a hand on her chest and thought about the invisible crack.

“May I ask just one question?”

“Yes?”

After accepting her defeat, Diadora spoke in a mild tone, to which Petra tilted her head. Ram and Garf stayed at the back, waiting for Diadora to continue.

In front of three different spectators, Diadora paused for a second, then opened her mouth:

“What’s so good about that zoddabuggerer, anyway?”

As soon as she said that, Ram and Petra’s visages twisted into displeased looks, much to Diadora’s amusement.

4

Petra kept her promise to the very end. And very firmly at that.

“I am sincerely sorry for what I did that day. I was very immature at the time, but I have reflected a lot since then.”

Watching the man bow his head and apologize for that past humiliation, Diadora breathed out a long sigh.

To hold a grudge against somebody for eternity would take its toil on her. Thus, it would be wiser to redirect that zeal and apply it in the search for her own happiness. Petra had taught her that.

It was enviable that, when asked why she had come, the girl could answer, ‘for someone important,’ with confidence. Just as enviable as being somebody whom that girl could cherish that way.

As the second crack closed, Diadora mustered her courage once more…

“If you’re really sorry, do me a little favor. Now, can you tell me what your brother… what Mister Oslo likes?”

The same man who, years ago, had scurried away while on the brink of death was now before Diadora, eyes full of a lively blaze that incited her to tackle the first crack anew.

Chapters 61-75

Chapter 61:
Welcome, to the Gladiator Island!

1

—He felt like he had been left behind in a cold, dark place.

The place was dark as if he had closed his eyes, cold as if he had pressed his cheeks against a discarded clump of iron. He desperately sought salvation, feeling his entire body bound by chains of captivity.

That was also why he kept stretching out his hand, as if in a trance, looking for anything he could find.

However, that was not why he had stretched out his hand towards the looming white light at the very end.

The light—rather, its identity was that of a girl, with a tragic look of determination hidden on her face. He had stretched out his hand towards her, not because he was seeking salvation from her, but because he felt he needed to save her.

And so, bending the chains that prevented him from moving his body even an inch, he reached out a hand, his own hand.

He reached out his hand and—.

???: "—It's so small."

As he muttered that, Natsuki Subaru stared at his own hand, now reflected in his blurred vision.

The hand being held up to the ceiling, palm facing out, was his own one, extending out from his shoulder. It clenched and closed, moving just as he willed. Without a doubt, it was his.

However, it was the hand of a child, a size smaller than Subaru had expected.

Meaning—

Subaru: “I didn’t turn back to normal…”

That had been his chance to get out of his hopeless situation, he should have attained it after going through untold hardship. He had literally put his life on the line over and over again for this, or so it seemed, and yet, the result had slipped from his hands.

Just how many sacrifices had he made for what had left his hands?

Just. How many. Sacrifices—

Subaru: “—?! That’s right, the hell am I doing?!”

A jolt suddenly running through his bleary consciousness, Subaru brought the hand he had been staring at to his face.

The memories that came streaming back to him were those of the strange situation he had encountered at the Demon City, as well as the dangerous game of tag with Olbart, where he had been put through the wringer; so much so, that that had been worse than the former.

Subaru had managed to seize victory after accumulating countless “deaths”. He should have succeeded in getting his victor’s dues—namely, in getting rid of his infantilization.

Subaru also recalled Olbart touching his chest to try and undo his infantilization.

And immediately after that, he felt like someone had whispered the soul language of love into his ears, and—

Subaru: “I passed out after that, and then… And then?”

Subaru attempted to search his fuzzy memories for what had happened. However, even when he pushed and pulled, the door that held his interrupted memories within refused to open.

Firmly clenching his back teeth together, Subaru grew more and more impatient, as he felt how stubborn this door was—

???: “—Now, now, let’s take it easy, no need to get flustered. Luckily, y’all made it out with your lives, so you can take your time to do stuff after the lil’ missy that came with you wakes up.”

Subaru: “—Huh?”

Suddenly, Subaru heard a voice coming from right beside him, turning to look at it in dumbfoundment. As he lay on a hard bed, his eyes met with someone resting their chin on their hands there.

This someone was grinning from ear-to-ear, peering right up close into his face.

Subaru: “UWAHHH?!”

???: “Whoa there. Love the reaction, but it’s best you keep things on the downlow. If we’re too noisy, we’ll catch the Island Chief’s eye, and they’ll put together a bothersome fight to the death. But then again…”

Subaru: “Uh, ah, uh…”

???: “Though it may be in bad taste, I don’t dislike it, rather, I quite like it.”

In front of Subaru, who jumped to his feet without thinking and darted his eyes about in bewilderment, was a blue-haired individual, boasting ever so nonchalantly.

He had his long hair tied up into a ponytail, and was donning something reminiscent of Japanese-style garb, the likes of which were seldom seen here. Left astonished by how unfamiliar he looked, Subaru took a deep gulp before he chose his words, and his questions.

Not only the other party was unfamiliar, but also the place, the environment, the atmosphere—

Subaru: “…Who are you? Where are we?”

???: “—Oh, how splendid! What great questions! Just as I’d expected… No, it surpasses even my expectations!!”

Subaru: “Bweh?”

Subaru carefully tried to gauge his attitude; however, the other person, his eyes sparkling, quickly took Subaru’s hand, shaking it up and down with such force that the latter thought his shoulder might be torn off.

It was not like Subaru had been keeping his guard down. Yet, despite that, it felt like he could not react at all.

Before the flabbergasted Subaru, the individual let go of his arm with a “Whew”, and spun around once on the spot, as if dancing, and said,

???: “You, who have crossed the black lake and reached this island —the Gladiator Island Ginunhive! You, with that unpleasant look to your eyes, swirling with such wonderful premonitions! I shall indeed answer you!”

Both his tone and gestures were theatrical, and for someone he’d just met, he was rather ill-mannered. However, he showed no signs of knowing what Subaru was thinking, and instead brazenly stuck to his attitude, his theatrics.

Almost like he was an actor on a stage, basking himself in a round of thunderous applause like it was natural—.

???: “—Cecilus Segmunt.”

The way he stretched out his arms to the left and right as he voiced his name, made it look like he was doing a pose straight out of a kabuki.

Naturally, kabuki should not exist in this world, so he probably was not imitating an actual one. Even so, the pose he had struck had such a punch to it, that it robbed Subaru of his breath.

Then again, what had taken Subaru’s breath away was not merely his powerful pose, but also how familiar his name sounded. Where had he heard it before? As soon as he recalled, he frowned.

He had heard it straight from Abel.

If he was not mistaken, his name belonged to one of the Nine Divine Generals—.

Cecilus: “I am Vollachia’s Blue Lightning. —The lead actor of this world.”

Subaru gawked as he heard him grandiosely declare that before him.

Both his name and title were consistent with what Subaru recalled. —However, there was just one thing that stood as a huge issue.

Namely—

Subaru: “—Vollachia’s strongest, is a child?”

—Cecilus Segmunt, smiling right before him, was a child around the same age as the shrunken Subaru, with the very vibe of an obnoxious brat.

2

—The severe impact of “infantilization” was taking a toll on Natsuki Subaru’s mind and body alike.

The physical effects were easy to understand. As one would expect from Subaru’s current outward appearance, what he possessed amounted only to the physical capabilities of a kid roughly ten years of age. His arm and leg strength, and, naturally, his stamina and explosive strength, all had been reverted to a prepubescent state.

However, there were doubts as to just how useful Subaru’s original physical abilities were to begin with, by the standards of this other world. So it was probably safe to say that the difference was small, as much as he would hate to admit it.

Far more serious, however, was the impact to his interior, rather than his exterior.

Subaru: “Maybe my head’s all messed up…”

It was a misleading way of putting it, but it was a simple way of expressing the bad situation Subaru was in.

His ability to conceive, think, and draw on knowledge, was weakening. Although he was using the same desk as before, his ability to open drawers was weaker and he was unable to reach the drawers that were higher-up.

—At the tower of the Crimson Lapis Castle, the infernal game of tag unfolded, from Olbart’s authorship.

The abnormally high number of attempts he had taken to implement a countermeasure had very much been influenced by the regression in his ability to think. He was sure that before the shrinkage, he would have found the solution a little faster.

Probably, he would have come up with that idea, and put an end to that ordeal faster, to the point he would not have felt any pain.

Fortunately, at that time, it was not Subaru himself, but everyone who was important to Subaru that saved him.

He had felt everyone's voices, their support, echoing in his head, and—

Subaru: "No, no, that's not it…"

Suddenly, something slowly welled up within his heart, and Subaru hurriedly got rid of it with his hand.

The mixed feelings of relief and melancholy were probably a feeling more akin to homesickness. Before the infantilization, he would have been able to bear those feelings considering the chaos and his sense of responsibility, but it seemed that his childish body had even lowered the bulwark that protected against him tearing up. If he was not careful, he would likely break down crying.

Subaru: "… Don't cry, don't cry. Am I an idiot? No, I am definitely an idiot."

No matter how much he may mourn, he could not borrow strength from those not present.

Letting friction evaporate the tears, Subaru tried his utmost to get back to the main point. He had to, as it would be the only way he would ever get a chance to reunite with everyone.

What was important now, was neither his own weak mind nor his budding sense of nostalgia. Rather, what he needed to focus on most was the essence of his predicament.

Namely—.

Subaru: "Did I ever hear from Abel or Zikr-san about the age of the First…?"

Sniffling, Subaru searched his memory for the answer to his question.

Cecilus Segmunt—he had heard that he was the strongest amongst the Nine Divine Generals of Vollachia. That meant he was the most powerful person in the Empire.

The reason why they had gone to the Demon City of Chaosflame in the first place was to get Yorna, one of the Nine Divine Generals, to become their ally. In order to regain the throne, their side needed to attain as many Nine Divine Generals as possible.

Then, of course, it should have been natural to properly discuss the topic of the person who was ranked First.

So, he pried open that stiff drawer, searching for some answer, but —

Subaru: “The only things I can recall are that he’s unpopular, and therefore, not very reliable…”

He was not sure whether that was because that part had bore the greatest impact on him, or because that was all he had actually been told, but that was all the information Subaru possessed regarding the First.

Unfortunately, he was unable to find any information about his appearance, his age or anything of the like, which were what he wished to know at this moment.

Subaru: “But if it’s about being unpopular because he’s a child, then I can see why without a hitch.”

In the Empire, where the strongest were esteemed, it would be strange for the one most powerful to be unpopular.

If this were because the strongest person was a child, it would make sense. Many adults would be reluctant to follow a child, no matter how strong they were.

So, as Subaru came to terms with this prior information and his new knowledge,

Cecilus: “—It seems you’ve come to some kinda conclusion.”

To this statement, Subaru looked up to see a blue-haired boy—Cecilus, standing in front of him, donning the same grandiose pose he had adopted earlier.

Having left him standing there, Subaru, who had been lost in thought, blinked his eyes and said,

Subaru: “S-sorry, I left you there for a while.”

Cecilus: “Ah, no, not at all, don’t worry about me. I’m often left out of discussions, after all! I’m used to being left alone and not talked to, hahaha!”

Subaru: “I-is that so…”

Cecilus flashed his white teeth, blithely laying bare his sad situation.

Although he was taken aback by this attitude, he felt glad that his rude response had not spoiled his mood. After all, he had a lot of questions that he wanted to ask him.

He wanted to tilt his head in puzzlement, not knowing which of the many questions to start with.

Subaru: “Sorry for being rude, again, I apologize. I…”

Cecilus: “Like. I. Said! There’s no problem. Of course, that doesn’t mean that rudeness, disrespect, and acting without consideration for others are acceptable, but I’ve got the openness to tolerate those to some extent. If you’re intolerant, small, and superficial, then isn’t it just like playing a minor role and getting the short end of the stick?”

Subaru: “Y-yeah, you’re right. Thank you, that helps. On that note, I…”

Cecilus: “That reminds me! I didn’t ask you this because you were absorbed in your thinking, but how did you feel about that pose? Since I put my all into this pose, I’d gladly like to hear your reaction. I was thinking if adding this to my introduction would give it the last push it needed!”

Subaru: “W-wait a second, please, I was talking…”

Cecilus: “Oh yeah! There’s some other things I want to ask, I’m pretty interested in those! What do you think?! If you could tell me something about that in great detail, I’d—”

Subaru: “—Listen to me!”

Even though he attempted to speak calmly, all of his attempts were interrupted by the lightning-fast speech of the other party.

Fearing that he would be swept away by the momentum of the conversation, Subaru involuntarily let out a loud yell. After doing so, Subaru felt shock, as Cecilus’s almond-shaped eyes widened,

Cecilus: “Oh, by any chance, did I do it again?”

Subaru: “Nowadays you practically never hear that kind of level of a template response…”

Cecilus: “Lebel? Tenprate?”

Subaru: “Uhmm, it’s a phrase from my hometown, meaning something like standard or cliché.”

Cecilus: “Hoho, your hometown’s! That’s very interesting! Ah, I guess this one was no good.”

With a twinkle in his eye, the Blue Lightning was quick to pounce on the object of his curiosity.

Perhaps that nickname of his also symbolized his personality, which was too honest in regards to his desires, as if he were lightning searching for a high place to fall on. He was a completely restless character.

—But perhaps, he was rather concealing his true character with an act.

Cecilus: “Now now, what will you talk about? I can’t stop the throbbing in my chest, getting to hear what you have to say next! Haaa~, I feel so aliiive!”

Subaru: “…It doesn’t look like a performance, at all.”

With sparkling eyes, the boy desired that words from Subaru's mouth formed a story.

His attitude, seemingly entirely divorced from any deception or conspiracy, made Subaru wonder if Cecilus could even tell a lie. In the first place, what would be the point of setting such a trap for Subaru now?

Had he not been with Abel, Subaru would not have drawn any attention whatsoever in the Empire. —Of course, there were exceptions who had attempted to aim at Subaru's life without relent.

Subaru: "But those are exceptions, and I don't want to see them again if possible."

Cecilus: "—? What's wrong?"

Subaru: "Ah, I was just talking to myself. Also, I'm Natsuki Subaru… Gah."

With Cecilus tilting his head in confusion, Subaru voiced his name in order to dodge his doubt, but realized his carelessness in revealing his true identity.

At the time he had been cross-dressing, Subaru had assumed the name of Natsumi Schwartz, with prudence as to not spread his name in the Empire carelessly, but his childish thoughtlessness had ruined that.

If by some chance, by some small possibility, Cecilus, someone with the position of General First-Class of the Empire, were aware of the Royal Selection of the neighboring country of the Kingdom of Lugunica, and of the people involved in it, then—

Cecilus: "Natsuki Subaru, is it? It's got a curious sound to it, but somehow, it rolls off the tongue quite smoothly. By the way, which is the family name, Natsuki or Subaru?"

Subaru: "—. M-my family name's Natsuki, and given name's Subaru."

Cecilus: “Hahaaa, noted. Then I’ll call you Subaru-san! But if I find a better way to call you, I’ll just change it depending on my mood, so don’t be taken aback.”

Waving his hand in the air, Cecilus replied with a face that betrayed any hint of recognition.

Subaru was relieved to hear this, but at the same time, a slight doubt grew in his mind. —Was this child really Cecilus Segmunt?

Subaru: “…”

On second thought, anyone could just assert a potential identity. Of course the boy in front of him could do that, just like how Subaru identified himself as Natsuki Subaru.

Of course, the name and alias of the Blue Lightning, the strongest in Vollachia, were renowned.

It would be too much to expect to run into the strongest man in Vollachia in some unfamiliar, dodgy place like this one. Furthermore, it was more likely that this could just be some kid posing as the Blue Lightning because they admired the name and title. That would be a much more natural thought.

Cecilus: “Deary me. What’s with the suspicious look in your eyes? Is it something about me?”

Subaru: “…Are you, the real Blue Lightning?”

Cecilus: “There it is! They said it again! Just like every time!”

Since probing someone out was not his strength, he threw a fastball at Cecilus, who immediately let out uproarious laughter.

He wondered if he could continue to call this boy Cecilus, but it seemed that people other than Subaru also harbored doubts about the authenticity of his identity.

However—

Cecilus: “My words are genuine! Though exclaiming that is easy, it doesn't really prove anything, does it? On the other hand, about any hidden information that can be of use to prove my identity… Even if I told you anything of the sort, would you be able to tell what's genuine from what's not? Subaru-san, you don't know me that well, do you?"

Subaru: "That's… Yeah, you're right."

Cecilus: "Then, it's a waste of time to argue about the authenticity of my identity. Let's just cut out the useless stuff and move onto the next topic! That's way more constructive, even though I'm a specialist in destroying things!"

He felt like he was being cajoled by his momentum and eloquence, but with Cecilus advancing his arguments so ferociously and without pause, there was no opening for Subaru to object. Besides, what he had spoken was true, albeit extreme.

Within Subaru, there laid no method to tell if this truly was the Blue Lightning or not. Nor did he have a clue he could use. Then, even if he were to suspect this tentative Cecilus, he would never find the answer.

If that was the case—

Subaru: "…"

Once he set aside Cecilus as the target of his interest, the next question to rise to the fore would concern his situation.

As Subaru was about to let Olbart undo his "infantilization", his consciousness was engulfed by a void—no, something much darker engulfed him, and his consciousness vanished.

However, it was clear that he did not simply pass out, and that was that.

Case in point: Subaru was lying on a shabby bed, facing Cecilus.

Even with the limited resources of the village of Shudraq, efforts had been made to make the beds comfortable by using soft grass and wood. However, this bed showed no such consideration at all.

The only thing present there was a stand that was just good enough to lie down on.

Adding to this bleak impression was the room's empty, bare interior, devoid of anything but the bed.

The gray walls were dry and cracked, and the floor was stained with dirt that could not be removed. The damp, leaden air assaulted his lungs, and the environment was anything but comfortable.

It felt as if he were in a prison cell.

Subaru: "Um, Ceci, can I ask you something?"

Cecilus: "Ceci! What's that? Is that me, by any chance?"

Subaru: "I'm not sure if I can call you Cecilus when I don't know if you're real or fake…"

It was not like he was readying himself in case he met the real Cecilus, but rather it was the compromise Subaru had reached regarding the boy whose authenticity could not be ascertained.

Calling him "tentative Cecilus" would be rude and troublesome to begin with. Apart from being way too chummy to the point of being suspicious, his demeanor was very friendly and he wished to avoid being disliked.

Subaru: "Rather, he may be the friendliest person in the Empire… No, he can't compare to Flop and Medium. But I think he can put up a good fight."

However, he could not bet on that, as there were examples of people who had been friendly at first before changing their ways.

Then again, that Subaru had happened to meet the O'Connell siblings when he was with Rem had been a glimpse of uncharacteristically good fortune. Possibly, it was the most fortunate he had ever been his whole life.

Why had Flop called out to him back then, he wondered. Perhaps he had been unable to continue seeing Subaru and Rem like that.

Cecilus: "Ceci, Ceci, is it… What a special sensation! Exquisite sound! Now that I think back on it, I've never experienced being called a nickname. It's got a rich, fresh taste to it, doesn't iiit?"

Cecilus, on the other hand, was excited by his first nickname.

Subaru had picked a somewhat cheap name for him, but if he was so happy with it, hampering the latter's excitement would be undesirable, and he deemed it unnecessary to come up with an alternative. He really did not have any other ideas.

Subaru: "So, back to the subject… This isn't Chaosflame, is it?"

Cecilus: "Chaosflame… the Demon City, you mean? Yes, not at all. Rather, it's just on the opposite side of the Empire, from east to west! Like I said, this is the Gladiator Island Ginunhive."

Subaru: "Gladeator Islan…"

Subaru's lips curled as he felt the sound of that unfamiliar word, Ginunhive, escape from his tongue.

The name did not ring a bell, but the place's title gave him an unsettling feeling. If Chaosflame was called the Demon City because of the large number of demi-humans living there, then there had to be a reason as to why Ginunhive had that title, as well.

Gladeator Islan, that meant—

Subaru: "—Gladiator, Island?"

The word "gladiator" brought forth a certain image in his mind, as he remembered hearing it somewhere before.

If he remembered correctly, it was a word that Al would blurt out from time to time indeed. He had spent ten years and then some as a gladiator somewhere, always thinking that he was going to die.

Even though he had lost his left arm, he had managed to survive and escape that place.

Then, this place was—

Subaru: “No way, these are death game grounds…?”

Cecilus: “Deth gamu? Is that a phrase from your hometown too? What does it mean?”

Subaru: “…Something like a colosseum, a place where people kill each other.”

Cecilus: “Oh I see! Then you understood quickly! Exactly, these here are the “deth gamu grounds”!”

Subaru: “—Hk.”

Cecilus laughed at Subaru, the latter overcome by a chill of horror after having mentioned this terrifying possibility.

The fact that he clapped his hands in front of his chest and spoke casually made Subaru suspect that he had misheard something. But no matter how long he waited, the words he wished to hear did not leak from Cecilus’s mouth.

—No, words leaked out, but they were not the words Subaru wished to hear.

Cecilus: “Once again, welcome to the Gladiator Island. It’s rare that people as young as me and Subaru-san come in, and even if we do, we don’t live long, so I wish you the best.”

Subaru: “Tha… Hk!”

Cecilus: “Tha?”

Subaru: “That’s ridiculous! There’s… There’s gotta be some kind of mistake!”

His face contorting, Subaru’s voice cracked at Cecilus in front of him.

It was too much to take in. To find himself in such a place, it had to be some kind of mistake.

Subaru: “Because I was in Chaosflame until I woke up, and…”

Cecilus: “Nono, you were on this bed while you slept as well. You were groaning as you slept. I understand groaning from the lack of comfort of sleeping here, but back when I was in Chaosflame…”

Subaru: “That’s not what I mean! Don’t you get it?!”

Cecilus: “Hmm.”

Irritated by the inscrutable Cecilus, Subaru’s spit went flying as he snapped at him.

Closing one eye at his complaint, Cecilus showed readiness to listen and did not interject. That demeanor of his made Subaru avert his eyes from him, instead looking around the room.

Subaru: “I… was in Chaosflame. Me being here must be some kind of mistake. I was doing stuff with other people too.”

Cecilus: “Even if you say it’s a mistake, you’re actually here, you know. If I accept that argument, that means I’d have to be the one sent flying, from the Island to the Demon City.”

Subaru: “Shouldn’t that be possible then, if I’m on the Gladiator Island?!”

Cecilus: “Beats me. —But if you want an answer to that, then I can present it to you very quickly.”

Shrugging his shoulders at Subaru’s tantrum because he would not listen, Cecilus calmly extended his hand. A slender finger of his pointed to a wall at the back of the room.

—No, it was not a wall. He pointed to a window with iron bars.

The window positioned high-up led the way outside the room, a damp breeze flowing through it.

Subaru: “No, no no no…!”

His lips quivering, Subaru jumped off the bed in a panic.

As soon as he stood barefoot on the cold floor, his head jerked and he felt weak, but he managed to suppress it, sprinting towards the window. He then jumped and grabbed the bars, forcibly hoisting himself up, placing his chin on the window frame as he wriggled awkwardly.

Then, somehow managing to lay his eyes on the view outside—

Subaru: "—Se… a?"

Cecilus: "Yeah, it's a lake."

Looking out the windows, Subaru muttered so in dismay.

Cecilus attempted to affirm what Subaru had said, having picked up on that mutter. However, Cecilus was wrong to affirm it, as Subaru had said "sea", not "lake".

Indeed, Cecilus had made a mistake. If he had indeed made a mistake, the scenery outside was possibly a mistake as well.

Or at least, Subaru understood that that was merely what he hoped to believe.

Subaru: "As far as I can see, it's a completely black lake…"

Cecilus: "The whole island's surrounded by a lake. The only way to get to and from the other shore's to "raise" the only drawbridge. Truly, a natural fortification, or rather, a prison!"

Unable to lift himself up, Subaru slid away from the window. Cecilus's mouth was in high gear as Subaru kneeled on the floor, drooping to his knees.

Why was he in such a good mood in such a hopeless place?

Subaru: "Why…"

Cecilus: "Hm?"

Subaru: "Why do you look so entertained?"

An adult Subaru would have probably hesitated to ask, rather than asking it straight-out.

Being a child with no self-control, the question just popped out, overflowing from his mouth. Cecilus turned to Subaru's way-too-straightforward question with a childish look in his eyes, speaking,

Cecilus: "That is, because I feel the end of the first act!"

Subaru: "First act…"

Cecilus: "Alas, though I don't really get it, I was thrown into these "deth gamu grounds", and I had to fight to the death in a whirlwind of blood! A new wind blew to me with a different scent of blood and a different premonition! With that being the case, it's only logical that the story will transition to its next phase."

He did not understand Cecilus's story at all as the latter spoke in a profound manner, his fingers raised. —No, it was not that he did not understand. It was that he wished not to understand.

Because if he were to try to fully understand what Cecilus was saying, that would mean—

Cecilus: "It wouldn't be interesting otherwise. You can't keep the star actor off-stage; that'd be a sacrilege in a proper story!"

—Vollachia's strongest, The Blue Lightning, was a drama geek.

3

Cecilus Segmunt, the drama geek, was a person of many words.

To the point of making one suspect, that if left to his own devices, he would continue to chatter on and on.

Cecilus: "So, I was just kinda moseying around outside, and there you were, just crawling up to shore. Amazing, isn't it? That doesn't happen very often. It was fated to be, absolutely! Or should I say, it was like something out of a story."

Subaru: "…"

Cecilus: “You probably don’t know this, but I’ve always had a good sense of intuition. Today as well, I found you when walking around because I felt as if the wind was calling me. So, I’m so favored by the world it scares me.”

Subaru: “…”

Cecilus: “Of course, you survived that situation, so you’ve got a good chance of being favored by the world too! Let’s show it our best, Suba… Baru… Hmmm~?”

Cocking his head, Cecilus pondered over something, accompanied by a mutter.

As he listened to the nonsensical and insubstantial words of conversation spilling from the boy’s lips, Subaru’s bare feet moved over the cold stone floor.

It would be reckless to go out and walk like this outside the room in which he had woken up, as this location was unknown.

Still, there was something he needed to confirm.

Subaru: “It’s as you said, right? That I wasn’t alone?”

Cecilus: “Eh? Ahh, yep, it’s true. I’d like to commend you for that as well. Not only did you come out of that situation with your life, but you also saved your companion’s life, which really is a feat of luck and courage… Something of a talent!”

Subaru: “Yeah yeah, sure, talent and guts and all that, right. So, that other person…”

Cecilus: “Was a little girl. More or less like you, Basu… Ah! Has a pretty nice ring to it, doesn’t it?”

The conversation had derailed without effort, but he had been able to have the questions he wanted to ask answered.

Perhaps what Cecilus was struggling with, was what to call Subaru in response to the nickname of “Ceci” the latter had given him. As long as the nickname was not a terrible one, it did not matter to him what he was called.

What was most important, was the info he had been able to get from him—

Subaru: "—Louis."

Someone about the same age as himself—when it came to someone as old as Subaru was right now, the person who naturally came to mind was Louis. The situation right now was that Medium had also been reduced to about the same age, but since she had not been present at that tower, she was not a candidate.

Frankly, though, Subaru's mental impression of Louis was a jumbled mess.

Subaru: "I'm not going to ditch you before I have an answer to that question. Besides, maybe, with your power…"

If they could make use of Louis's teleport, they might be able to get off this dangerous island.

He did not yet know the whole island, and although Cecilus was the only other person he had met at this place, from what the latter had told him, it no doubt had to be the absolute worst possible environment for a child to spend time in.

So—

Subaru: "We've got to get off this island as soon as possible."

Cecilus: "That's quite the aspiration, but I think there'll be a lotta obstacles. From what I've heard, only one person's ever managed to escape from this place, and it's for that very reason that the "curse rule" was created."

Subaru: "Then I'll be the second person. No, you and my companion make three."

Subaru's determination interjected, replying out of reflex. And Cecilus, hearing this, looked over him as if he were something trivial, then gave a high-pitched whistle.

It seemed to somehow put him in a good mood, but there was no time to care about that.

And—

Cecilus: “Basu, here.”

After a short walk down a dimly-lit passageway filled with damp, cold air, Cecilus stopped abruptly. With his hands clasped behind his head, he jerked his chin towards a room with a dingy wooden door.

Looking up at the door, Subaru asked, “Here is?”,

Cecilus: “This is a healing room. It’s also called the corpse room. Many people become corpses here after failing to die in the arena.”

Subaru: “H-healing room, is it? And the healer is?”

Cecilus: “Healer, ha! There are some healers, sorta, but there’s no precious magic user of the sort here. There’d be fewer deaths if they were assigned here, but that’s not the policy of the Island Chief.”

Subaru: “…”

Receiving that frivolous reply, Subaru involuntarily shut himself up.

It’d slipped his mind completely, but in the Vollachian Empire, there were very few people able to wield healing magic. That was why Rem’s healing magic was treated as valuable.

But the fact remained that Louis had been put into a healing room devoid of a healer.

Cecilus: “The girl you brought along was very weak, that’s why. The purpose of this room is, at least in name, to treat the wounded, so there are some blankets and things to patch people up, at least. We gladiators are treated just as you saw earlier, and the sleeping conditions were terrible, weren’t they?”

Subaru: “…You’re the only gladiator here.”

Cecilus: “Ahhahaha, you’re right! Here, have an emotional meeting.”

Seemingly reading Subaru’s inner heart for the second time, Cecilus patted Subaru on the shoulder.

Pressured by his momentum, Subaru swallowed his saliva, steeled himself, and headed for the door. Pushing it open, he frowned at the unpleasant smell emanating from inside.

What flowed out of it, was the odor of a mixture of blood and decaying flesh, akin to the pinnacle of unsanitary conditions.

Was their sense of hygiene dead and gone, perhaps? Within that not-so-spacious room, worn-out tools and sloppily washed bandages could be seen, having been left hanging out to dry.

And in that not-so-great environment—

Cecilus: “That’s your companion sleeping over yonder.”

Subaru: “—Hk, Louis!”

Cecilus pointed to a bed in the back as Subaru looked around.

It seemed to be a room that served as an infirmary, with two beds that were a smidgen better than the one Subaru had been lying on, and a small bulging blanket at the far end of the bed.

Subaru rushed toward it, hurried by his stray feelings. He was in a hurry to get to Louis, but could not decide what he should tell her.

However—

Subaru: “—Huh?”

Having rushed over, and attempted to shake the little girl’s shoulder, Subaru froze in surprise.

Not because he was incapable of finding the right words to say. — But because he could not find anyone to whom he could say them.

The girl who had been said to be brought ashore along with Subaru, and laid to sleep there was not Louis, who stirred up mixed feelings in Subaru's heart.

She possessed a small head, two protruding horns, and flaxen hair that gathered at her shoulders. The girl had been stripped of the ornate kimono that wrapped her petite body, revealing only simple undergarments.

It was not Louis, nor was it his companion Medium, who had accompanied him to the Demon City of Chaosflame, who too had been made small by that technique of Olbart's.

The one there, was—

Subaru: "…T-Tanza?"

There was no response from the sleeping little girl to his trembling call.

But even if she did not answer, after laying eyes on her, he knew. He knew that she was neither Louis nor Medium, but Tanza the deergirl, the attendant of Yorna Mishigure, the Mistress of the Demon City.

Subaru: "Why… Why is this girl here…?"

Cecilus: "Uh-oh? Did I do something again?"

Behind Subaru, who was surprised to see a sleeping face different from the one he had imagined, Cecilus voiced something silly.

Of course, it was not that he was to blame. He was not to blame, but—

Subaru: "That's not what I was told! You told me Louis was here."

Cecilus: "Nahhh, I wonder about that. I believe I explained that there was a girl who came ashore on the Island with you, Basu. I'm as surprised as you are, that it's not the girl you thought it was."

Subaru: "Uh, kuh…"

Subaru was at a loss for words, unable to say anything in response to Cecilus's reasonable answer.

Indeed, it was Subaru himself who assumed that he had meant Louis by "the girl with him". Subaru could only apologize to Cecilus for that.

But this was odd. Why would Tanza be with Subaru?

For starters, if Tanza was the one with them right here, right now, then—

Subaru: "What about Louis…"

Putting his hand on his head, Subaru was anxious about Louis's wellbeing, someone nowhere to be found.

Having been told of who she was, Abel, Al, and Medium now saw Louis as a threat. Yorna could perhaps protect Louis, but only because she was unaware of her real identity.

Were she to find out that Louis was a Sin Archbishop, even she would change her mind, just like Medium had.

And he could not find any reason for Abel and the others to keep Louis's identity a secret.

Subaru: "I've got to get her back to Rem."

Louis's existence was very much like a thin and feeble thread connecting the amnesiac Rem and Subaru.

Even though Louis had followed him without permission, Subaru had a reason as to why he could not afford not to bring her back. Above all, Subaru had yet to decide what to do with Louis, deep inside.

And despite that, Louis's whereabouts were unknown to him, and Subaru was on this Island, for some damn reason.

Subaru: "I shouldn't be wasting time like this…!"

Subaru's thoughts would not settle at all, they were a muddled arrangement of many things.

Still, he knew he had to get off this island and return to Chaosflame immediately.

Subaru: "If possible, I'll take this child with me…"

Cecilus: "Oh, you sure? Wasn't this girl not the one you were expecting, Basu?"

Subaru: "No. She isn't, but there's no reason to leave her behind, right? Besides, Yorna-san has to be looking for her."

Yorna was so affectionate as to not hesitate to give of herself even for the sake of a young child she had just met.

Without her, he would have been unable to pick up a win in the game of tag against Olbart, or to get the monstrous old man on-board with the original bet, in the first place.

Therefore, returning Tanza to Yorna was the natural way to return the favor.

Cecilus: "I think your enthusiasm and consideration are admirable, but as I said before, I think it'll be difficult."

However, Cecilus's opinion rained on Subaru's parade.

Even though the way he spoke and behaved had remained the same since the outset, Cecilus's relayed circumstances were grave at their root. Yet, Subaru could not help but be frustrated by the harshness of his reality.

Subaru: "I heard you. You say it's hard to leave, right? But, if we look for a boat, or if we bring down the drawbridge you were talking about earlier, then…"

Cecilus: "You "raise" the drawbridge. That'd be a challenge I guess, but the problem lies elsewhere. The biggest problem's the curse rule, you know? The curse rule."

Subaru: “Curce… roule…?”

That word was an unfamiliar one, but it was impossible to ignore it, given it had been stated to be the biggest problem.

To Subaru, his eyebrows forming a frown, Cecilus let out a “Yes”, then tucked his hands into the sleeves of his kimono,

Cecilus: “The curse’s rules, or “curse rule”. A very troublesome and powerful rule laid down by the Island Chief who lords over this Gladiator Island. Break it, and you die! Disobey it, and you die! Resist it, and you die! —A curse of death!”

Subaru: “…Ah.”

Cecilus: “It covers the whole island. Do you understand?”

As he proclaimed so, Cecilus spun around in place, waving his sleeves in the air.

It was said in a light-hearted manner, without a hint of seriousness, but the existence of a death curse of this kind was far too aligned with Subaru’s image of the Empire for him to laugh it off as a lie.

Subaru: “S-so no one can leave here?”

Cecilus: “Yes, that’s right. If it weren’t for that, I’d be out of here by now. The Witchbeasts in the lake might be a formidable opponent, but I can run on the water if such is my wish. Do you know? How to run on water, I mean. You put your left foot out before your right foot sinks…”

Cecilus began relaying that ill-used and fanciful idea to a stunned Subaru.

It seemed to be the way ninjas ran on water, and it appeared that many of the superhumans in this world were actually able to do it. Nah, this was not the time to run away from reality like this.

Subaru: “Th-That Island Chief, are they the person putting a curse on the island? If so, how about having that person lift the curse? Because, I’m here by mistake…”

Cecilus: "Hahaha, that's a fascinating joke! Be it mistake, mishap or blunder, by the point you've come up on this Island and had the curse mark engraved on you, you're already one of the gladiators. Though you could say that the fact that the disposition of a gladiator won't sink in's proof you've got a bigger role to play."

Subaru: "—Hk."

The words he was clinging on to were denied, and Subaru swallowed his breath.

The word "curse" brought up nothing but bad memories for Subaru. And as one would expect, it was as if it had been decided that the bad memories would layer atop one another, to become seemingly even worse.

Subaru: "This isn't, a joke… Hk."

Before he even knew it, he'd been flung off to a place unknown to him, with a girl pretty much unknown to him. Not only that, but he had been told by someone almost unknown to him that, if he tried to leave the unknown place on his own, he might die because of a curse placed on him by yet another unknown person.

What on earth should he believe in, and what should he even do, in this situation—

Subaru: "…That's it. Yes, that's right! Ceci, you're one of the Nine Divine Generals, aren't you?"

Cecilus: "Oh?"

Subaru: "Then maybe you could contact the outside world or something? Let's see, like with this sleeping girl, she's from Yorna-san's place in Chaosflame…"

Eyes bloodshot at the thought, Subaru grabbed both of Cecilus's shoulders.

As Cecilus shut one eye in response to being touched, Subaru forgot his own shamelessness.

After having treated Cecilus as a boy-who-cried-wolf earlier, Subaru now expected him to be the Blue Lightning as he claimed himself to be.

Since he was one of the Vollachian Empire's Divine Generals, and the strongest in the Empire, and someone who was very approachable at that, he might listen to what Subaru had to say.

That was truly nothing more than a notion from a childish, self-centered way of thinking.

Hence, Subaru's speculations would end up as a fruitless effort as per usual.

Or, perhaps, had his thinking not been dulled by the "infantilization", Subaru might have come up with the obvious question on his own.

That was—

Cecilus: "Say, Basu."

Subaru: "Oh, yeah, what is it?"

Cecilus: "What are these Nine Divinn Generals you're talking about?"

Subaru: "Eh…?"

With Subaru holding both of his shoulders, Cecilus cocked his head in curiosity.

Subaru was astonished, not understanding what he was being told. Yet Cecilus resumed with "I mean, you know",

Cecilus: "In seriousness, I really don't know why I'm here. I think that there's some kinda development that'll move the story along, and I'm wondering if that's you, Basu."

What a bombshell it was, jamming even more confusion into the mind of the young Subaru.

Chapter 62:
The Island's Order

1

—The reason he was here, and the Nine Divine Generals, both were unknown to Cecilus.

Subaru's mind was engulfed in confusion as he failed to process that sudden bombshell announcement.

The impact was much more striking than being splashed with cold water, and he couldn't help but blink a few times.

Subaru: "Wh-What do you mean? Saying you don't know why you're here…"

Cecilus: "What I mean is just as I said. I found myself thrown onto this Gladiator Island, with a brand new environment and outlook for the future which had me in quite the pickle. Well, this is a rather comfy place for me to live, so it's not too much of a pickle, but let's just put it that way."

Subaru: "…"

Cecilus: "Oh? Are you perhaps thinking again? Maaan, Basu sure likes to think, huh. I mean, I think that's fine; I'm on the side that doesn't like to think too much, you see. I don't make fun of people deep in thought, nor do I wish to interrupt them, so I'll keep my mouth shut then!"

It took a long time for Cecilus to shut his mouth, but then he pretty much went quiet. That being said, during the time his mouth was shut, his legs were pitter-pattering and his eyes were darting about incessantly.

Although he may not have been fooling around, it was more than enough of a distraction.

But Subaru did not have the composure to deal with such things. If he was going to deal with something, then it should at least be something meaningful.

For example—

Subaru: “How come you don’t know anything about the Nine Divine Generals, but you know you’re called The Blue Lightning? That’s strange isn’t it?”

Cecilus: “Ah, the answer to that question is easy. It was none other than myself who came up with this shocking alias! Cecilus Segmunt, the Blue Lightning of Vollachia! What do you think? It’s a nickname that gives a very striking and elegant impression, don’t you think? One day, my name’s going to be so famous that everyone in the whole wide world will be dazzled by me as the lead actor! It’s a manifestation of my passion.”

Subaru: “A nickname, that you came up with…”

Hearing that proud response, Subaru’s shoulders sank in disappointment.

Puzzled by Subaru’s demeanor, Cecilus asked, “Huhh? What’s wrong~?” as he peered at Subaru’s expression nonchalantly. But Subaru had lost the willpower to answer that.

Whether the boy before his eyes was the real Cecilus Segmunt or a fake, he had reached a conclusion.

The theory that there were many adults who had no respect for children, as expected, lacked the power to overturn his outrageous statement that he had never heard of the Nine Divine Generals.

No matter how you look at it, there was no way a real General First-Class could have followed up on the statement that they had never heard of the Nine Divine Generals.

Subaru: “Not knowing that you’re a General of the Empire, you’ve got to be joking…”

It was completely pointless trying to sensibly proceed through such hole-filled logic.

Therefore, in Subaru's mind, any possibility that the boy in front of him was the real Cecilus had vanished. He was just a prankster, a boy-who-cried-wolf—a fake Cecilus.

And so, the thin thread of hope that sprouted at this dead-end had snapped.

If only one seed of hope still remained, it was that the fake Cecilus was just a liar, and perhaps that his earlier story about the very scary island was just another of his lies—

???: "—So this is where you have been at, Segmunt."

Subaru: "Uwaa?!"

The next moment, Subaru jumped as a man's deep voice hit him from behind while he was thinking.

A voice that was not that of the fake Cecilus, nor of Tanza, who was, of course, sleeping in bed. Subaru looked back at the entrance of the healing room, where he had heard it from, his surprise accumulating further.

—For the figure standing at the entrance of the healing room, was an unthinkably large man.

Subaru: "H-huge…!"

The man was so large that one could not help but marvel at his stature.

No, not only was he tall, but he also had a thickness to him both vertically and horizontally, his entire body fitting the description of being thick and large. His neck and limbs were as hefty as logs, and the black clothes he wore, similar to that of a police or soldier's, were so taut and tight that they looked as if they were about to burst.

Regardless of the fact that Subaru had shrunk, this was a man so giant that looking up at him would hurt your neck.

He was easily over two meters tall and possibly the tallest human Subaru has seen in this parallel world. Features like his colossal body, which carried a very stern face, his fangs protruding even when his mouth was closed, and his skin being blue in color were just way too numerous.

However, the most prominent feature had yet to be described.

That most prominent feature was—

Cecilus: “Yo, what’s up, Gustav-san! You’re looking splendidly prim and proper this morning! Your attention to every detail of your appearance’s the basis of a gentleman, I believe that’s a truly exemplary attitude!”

Gustav: “No need for compliments, I am glad to see that you are as excessively healthy as ever. A being such as you should be put to use in the gladiatorial arena, as I, as the official, in all fairness, have strictly judged.”

Saying that, the huge man—the one called Gustav, exasperatedly sighing in response to the wry words of the fake Cecilus, replied with his four thick arms crossed.

That’s right, four arms.

A large man with a face like that of a demon, whose large body was wrapped in a mass of muscles, had the feature of having four arms, with two arms sprouting from each shoulder. As he recalled, there was a race of demi-humans called the Multi-Arm Tribe that possessed such a trait; He’d heard of them from an old man that he knew.

An old man, that he knew—

Subaru: “Uhh… that’s right, it was Wilhelm-san.”

Even recalling the names of his acquaintances was difficult for Subaru.

Outside of Subaru’s hard struggle, the fake Cecilus laughed at Gustav’s words saying “Nahh”, Cecilus: “Your concern is much appreciated! I understand what you’re saying Gustav-san! On the off chance I die, it should be on the battlefield. I’m so grateful to have a sensible person as Island Chief, I really am a lucky guy!”

Gustav: “The mixing of public and private affairs is a hindrance to order. There is no sense in me, as the official, carrying out such a foolish practice.”

Cecilus: “Yes, yes, I understand! A big thank you to Governor Gustav for your consideration~!”

Gustav narrowed his intellectual eyes at the fake Cecilus when he donned a goofy smile and put his hands together.

In a subtle way, the “don’t mix public and private affairs” statement sounded to Subaru as if he personally disliked the fake Cecilus, but there was no point in delving into that.

Other than the fake Cecilus, there was finally someone Subaru could talk to.

Gustav: “So, Segmunt, about that boy over there.”

And right on cue, Gustav also turned his attention to Subaru.

SETOWI

Being looked down upon from such staggering height, just being gazed at was suffocating, it felt as if his whole body was enveloped in an air of intimidation. Those four crossed arms, the fists at the ends of them all around the size of a child's head, Subaru would probably die if he were to be hit by them.

Reflexively, Subaru gulped down his spit, while the fake Cecilus clapped his hands beside him.

Cecilus: "Oh yes, he finally woke up. And, since he was worried about his companion, the young lady, I brought him here. But it seems that the sleeping little lady was not the one he expected, and it seems a lotta discrepancies have arisen. The shock from that is now dissipating, so from now onwards, the story will unfold."

Gustav: "Thanks for the explanation. However, I remember ordering that if he had woken up, the first thing for you to do was to bring him before me, as the official. That would have been the condition for me, in my capacity, to give permission for this boy and girl to be allowed ashore on the island."

Cecilus: "Was it? Sorry, I'm forgetful."

Gustav: "…"

At Cecilus's blank response, Gustav silently rubbed his finger between his brows.

Doing so, the man who was much closer to the sky than Subaru and the others glared at the ceiling, grumbling to himself, "As the official, I am a guardian of order; I will not mix public and private affairs…"

Subaru was not sure what Gustav's relationship with the fake Cecilus was, but the latter probably gave him a very hard time.

Realizing that, though he felt sorry for Gustav, he was a bit relieved.

Subaru: "I'm not the only one who gets pushed around by Ceci."

Cecilus: “It’s outrageous to think that I’d push people around. I think I’ve given a proper explanation of what you wanted to know and accompanied you where you wanted to go, to see who you wanted to see.”

Subaru: “Yeah, you’re right, I misspoke. The explanation had a lot of detours, and the person I was allowed to meet wasn’t who I wanted to meet, and I was told I couldn’t go to the places I wanted to go, and that made me depressed.”

It seemed there was no malice in the fake Cecilus, so there was no point in saying so.

When Subaru told him so, the fake Cecilus let out a “Tch”, pursing his lip in dissatisfaction. With that, Gustav turned toward Subaru again, as if his frustration with Cecilus had been successfully dealt with.

And then—

Gustav: “Boy, if you have woken up, let us start our talk anew.”

Subaru: “I’d be happy to do so. I had also wanted to hear from someone else. If it’s with a person of high standing on this island, that’s even better.”

Gustav: “I see”

While Subaru was being careful with the words he was speaking, Gustav touched his chin with his two right hands.

At first glance, he had a stern outward appearance, but his speech and atmosphere were very quiet and calm, and there was an intelligent glint in his eyes, giving an impression quite close to that of the bushy-headed Zikr.

In other words, a representation of a sensible adult.

As if to confirm Subaru’s expectations, Gustav gave a deep and dignified nod,

Gustav: “As the official, my name is Gustav Morello, and I have been entrusted with the management of this island by His Excellency the Emperor, Vincent Vollachia, the seventy-seventh Emperor of the Sacred Vollachian Empire. Can you tell me your name and affiliation?"

Politely giving his position and name, he addressed Subaru directly.

Subaru was slightly astonished by this fact, then put his hand on his chest and bowed his head.

Subaru: "Th-Thank you for introducing yourself. My name is Natsuki… Natsuki Schwartz."

Gustav: "I see. Schwartz."

Subaru, though pressured, announced his name in reply to Gustav.

For a moment, after wondering whether to use his real name or a pseudonym, he gave a somewhat mixed answer, but at this point, it should be considered a success.

Honestly, he wasn't sure if lying to Gustav was the right or wrong thing to do.

However, it would not be good for Subaru's real name to spread. It may not have been a big deal to the fake Cecilus since he was a fake General First-Class, but you never know who might be knowledgeable on the Kingdom's affairs.

What can be hidden should be hidden. Even if Cecilus, upon hearing Subaru's current alias, had tilted his head grandly with a "Huh~?"

Gustav: "But if you are Natsuki Schwartz, then why did Segmunt call you Basu?"

Subaru: "I think Ceci's got his own reasoning for himself. Would you like to confirm it?"

Gustav: "—. No, let us not. Considering the duties entrusted to me as the official, I have no time to spend on pointless endeavors. I may not be a wise man in my capacity, but I do try to be wise."

Shaking his head, Gustav made a wise Subaru-like decision.

It was somewhat annoying to think that was due to the fake Cecilus's usual behavior, so it was better to consider this the result of Subaru's behavior.

In any case—

Gustav: "You are able to answer to your name and, from your appearance, you seem to not possess any physical impairments. According to the healer, your strength has been considerably depleted, do you feel that as well?"

Subaru: "My strength… I may have been feeling a little bit tired. But, thanks for everything you've done to help me."

Gustav: "Allow me to correct one thing, Schwartz. It was Segmunt there who helped you, not me. As far as I, in my capacity, am concerned, I have only agreed to accept you conditionally."

Subaru: "I-I see."

Gustav's well-reasoned responses almost made Subaru falter.

The way he spoke and the content of his words were not particularly welcoming towards Subaru, and the tone of his voice was somewhere between cold and emotionless, but his easy-to-understand explanations were genuinely helpful.

Compared to the fake Cecilus, how much he spoke, and the amount of information in his words, were much, much more balanced.

Even the question he had just asked seemed to be born out of concern for Subaru's condition after he'd woken up, and if things continued like this, it was possible that he would listen if Subaru just talked with him.

Subaru, and Tanza as well, had arrived at this Gladiator Island by mistake.

Subaru: "Gustav-san, me and this girl… Her name's Tanza, but is this girl some sort of blunder? We seem to have come here by some kind of mistake.”

Gustav: “The mistake, being?”

Subaru: “—! That is, I don’t know the reason. It’s just, we were so far away… You know of Chaosflame, right? We’re supposed to be in that city!”

According to the fake Cecilus, this Island and the Demon City were apparently quite far from each other.

That alone should be enough to make everyone, Subaru included, realize that what had befallen them was a severe predicament. Being sent from the Demon City to this Island, was far from being an everyday event.

Subaru: “I know it’s selfish of me to say this after all the help we’ve gotten, but we can’t stay here much longer. I’m sure our people are out there looking for us! If possible I want to let them know we’re safe and join them as soon as we can.”

Ideally, he would leave this place with Tanza if circumstances permitted.

Subaru did not know why he and Tanza were both on the Island, but he was certain that Yorna was worried about Tanza. Since the original goal was to get Yorna on his side, Abel would not get mad if he did something that made her happy.

Besides, Subaru was rather fond of Yorna.

If he could make that gentle woman happy, then all the better, so he thought.

Subaru: “So, I gotta get out of here as soon as—”

Gustav: “—Enough. That is enough, Schwartz.”

Subaru leaned forward, about to raise his voice, but a gargantuan palm stopped him. Two right hands were thrust in front of his face; silenced by those, Subaru cut off his words with an “Uhh”.

Crossing over his right hand, Gustav used his left hands to simultaneously stroke his chin and head.

Gustav: “I understand your point. I may say that I have a rough understanding of your situation. In addition, you must listen to what I, in my capacity, have to say. That would be only fair.”

Subaru: “Fair…”

Gustav: “Indeed, fair. It is just, it is strict, it is unbiased, it is absolute truth… it is essential to building what is called order, definite reason.”

Subaru was interrupted, and frowned at being assaulted by the litany of words spoken slowly.

Things like fairness or justice, they sounded quite easygoing from the perspective of someone in a rush. But Subaru nodded anyway, knowing that going against Gustav here would not help him.

At Subaru’s reaction, Gustav closed a single eye, letting out a “Very well”,

Gustav: “You remember what I spoke earlier, do you not? That it was Segmunt who saved you, and that the fact that I, as the official, allowed you and that girl to land here had conditions attached to it.”

Subaru: “That’s… Yes, I remember, but…”

His attention had been directed to the part about them being helped, not so much on the part about it having been conditional. But Gustav had indeed told that to Subaru, in an oppressive tone.

But just what were those conditions? What were the conditions under which Subaru and Tanza had been allowed to enter the Island?

Gustav: “Schwartz, the fact is you hold sound judgment, you are not so impoverished in knowledge as to not know how to answer my questions, you make use of your education to address me, as the official, by honorifics, you are in good health based on the healer’s diagnosis, and there is the fact that you yourself have not suffered from any self-reported physical ailments. Any objections?”

Subaru: “You saying it all at once makes me dizzy… I have no objections, I think.”

Gustav: “You think, that is a somewhat unconvincing opinion. Do you hold any objections or do you not?”

Subaru: “—. I have no objections.”

Gustav’s gaze did not allow Subaru to give a half-assed answer.

Overwhelmed by this, Subaru looked over at his opponent. His gaze was returned to Gustav’s frightening, statue-like face, the hue of his eyes and his expression unchanged.

The conversation was rather one-sided, and proceeded with Gustav having seized the initiative.

This was making Subaru feel a growing sense of dread, but he was unable to come up with a quick solution. As usual, he had no information. In other words, there were no options for him.

And in Subaru’s stead—

Cecilus: “See, I told you, didn’t I? Basu meets your standards in proper fashion, Gustav-san. It’s also just in time for today’s schedule, so you can’t complain, right?”

Gustav: “However, the girl is yet to wake.”

Cecilus: “As for that, uhh, there are ways to adapt and manipulate things under a Governor’s jurisdiction, right?”

Gustav: “Yes. Provided the girl does not wake up, we shall begin with one person fewer than stated by the regulations.”

Cecilus: “Well well, we’ve really stirred up the hornet’s nest, huh?!”

While Subaru was left perplexed, the one parlaying with Gustav was the fake Cecilus.

Although he could not perceive the main subject of that conversation, he could understand that it regarded him and Tanza. Also, he could understand that this fake Cecilus was incapable of conducting a conversation properly.

Moreover, Subaru had a feeling that the one to pay the bill for that failure, was not the fake Cecilus himself.

Cecilus: "I'm sorry, Basu. It seems that my assistance is only possible up to this point. You'll have to do the rest on your own. I'm sure you can do it!"

Subaru: "W-waitwaitwait! This whole conversation's just too ominous! What the hell was that exchange just now? Gustav-san! What were the terms of our stay on this island…"

Gustav: "—You must participate in Sparka."

Subaru: "Spaa… ?"

Subaru frowned at the unfamiliar word, dropped from on high.

If Gustav said they would be participating, then this Sparka had to be an event of some kind. Any kind of event held here, on the Gladiator Island—he could not help but get a nasty feeling about it.

Before, Al had said that life on Gladiator Island had been difficult and painful for him.

Events there were bound to be scary or painful.

Subaru: "Hold on, Gustav-san! Why do we need to participate in Sparka?! We didn't come to this island on purpose!"

Gustav: "Prisoners of war, slaves, criminals… The circumstances of those that land on this Gladiator Island may vary, but few come willingly. And the only role I, as the official, possess, is to perform my duty, as per the wishes of His Excellency, to my utmost, and bring order to the Gladiator Island, which holds all these outlaws."

Subaru: "His Excellency… The Emperor's wishes would be…"

Gustav: "—To transform this Gladiator Island into the most meaningful bloodbath in the Empire."

That declaration was so awfully emotionless, that Subaru's blood ran cold just after he snapped at him.

The hue of Gustav's eyes, the way he spoke, they seemed cold and unwavering, but that would be mistaken. There were more appropriate words to describe Gustav.

It was as if, indeed, as if he were robotic, inorganic and cold.

As Subaru sucked in his breath, stiffening at the alteration in his impression of Gustav, the latter addressed him with "Schwartz".

He then looked down at Subaru, who was much smaller than himself,

Gustav: "You shall call him His Excellency the Emperor. The first time a caution, the second time a warning, there will be no third time."

Subaru: "…Ah."

Gustav: "Also, I want to reiterate that I shall not allow you to refuse Sparka. If you refuse to take part in Sparka, you and the girl shall suffer your original fate."

Subaru: "Our original fate, what do you mean…?"

Gustav: "Segmunt's plea is rejected, and you are not permitted to make land. —Meaning that you would fall prey to the aquatic Witchbeasts that live in the waters of the lake."

Flatly, devoid of any vacillation, Gustav presented Subaru's future options.

This giant of a man would tell a child that refusal meant death. This was what it meant to be cold-blooded, and it also made Subaru desire to curse his own poor luck for facing nothing but painful experiences while he was shrunk.

Weren't people usually kinder to children?

Or was it acceptable in the Vollachian Empire, where the strong were revered, for children to be killed without pause for the sole reason that they were weak?

Subaru: "If that's the case, a nation like this has got to be destroyed…"

Gustav: "I know not what you mean, but I shall allow your cursing. If all speech is silenced, discontent shall build up. The seeds of great folly grow in the seedbed of discontent, watered by animosity."

Slowly shaking his head, Gustav grabbed Subaru's shoulders as the latter gritted his teeth.

Caught in a palm that could easily grasp his head, Subaru could do nothing to resist. Rather, Subaru thought about forcibly resisting and escaping from this place, but—

Cecilus: "I don't recommend that approach, Basu. You'll probably end up having an awfully bad time. This isn't outta kindness or anything, more like I just feel like that would be boring, so I'm strongly requesting this of you."

Subaru: "Thanks for speaking your heart. Go to hell, Ceci."

Cecilus: "Wow, I genuinely saved you, and you say those terrible things to me. Though, it's not that I don't understand what feelings made you say them, so I won't be angry with you."

With the fake Cecilus casually blocking the entrance, Subaru was robbed of his last bit of resistance.

In the end, even though he had attempted to express his indignation regarding the situation through swearing hurled towards the fake Cecilus, whose status as a friend or foe was unclear, reacting to his response was a waste of effort to Subaru.

At any rate, Subaru was forced to participate in this good-for-nothing event, Sparka.

If he refused, he would be fed to the fish, and if he did what they told him to—

Gustav: “Prove your qualifications and I, as Governor, shall take responsibility and welcome you as a gladiator.”

Subaru: “…Super.”

If he did well, he would become a slave, and if he did not, he would be fed to the fish.

Subaru had thought that nothing good had happened to him ever since he had been made smaller, but he had to correct that.

—Not a single good thing had happened ever since he arrived at the Vollachian Empire.

Subaru: “…I really hate the Vollachian Empire.”

Subaru’s hateful complaint, as if in consideration for Tanza who continued to sleep, was low, quiet, and minute.

And then—

2

—He felt the heat that enveloped the venue all over his body.

The eerie thing was, however, that despite the number of gazes pouring down on them, there was a little commotion.

It was a strange sensation of a deafening silence, rather than any muted excitement or fervor.

However, Subaru did not have the luxury of getting angry or complaining about it.

???: “Shit, shit… Ya gotta be kiddin’ me, this is the worst…!”

???: “I’m gonna do it, I’m gonna be the one to fucking do it…”

???: “Silence! Follow my orders obediently, all of you! Do so and you’ll make it out alive!”

Cutting through the noisy silence, were three men in Subaru's immediate vicinity.

A scaly-skinned lizardman with skin akin to rock, a bald-headed man with many tattoos engraved on his body, and a young man with a pleasant face donning long, rust-colored hair.

They all hailed from different backgrounds and races, but they all had one thing in common.

That was, that they disregarded Subaru when it came to manpower, and that the tension of this life-or-death situation dwelled within their eyes.

As it stood, although their dates of birth were different, their dates of death would be the same.

Gustav: "—Gentlemen, first of all, congratulations on landing upon this Island. His Excellency the Emperor Vincent Vollachia in the Imperial Capital shall be very pleased. As the Governor who has been personally entrusted by His Excellency the Emperor with the management of this Gladiator Island, I am pleased to present you with an honorable trial."

So he, Gustav Morello, Governor of the Gladiator Island Ginunhive, and the director of this local entertainment, spoke loudly from a special seat atop the high wall overlooking the gladiatorial arena.

And then, beneath Gustav's feet—as the gate of the passageway that brought the warriors to the gladiatorial arena opened, a horrifying apparition slowly, slowly emerged from the darkness.

A face of a lion with eyes colored red, four hoofed legs like those of a deer. With twisted horns and fangs, and a frighteningly long tail, its huge body made even Gustav, tall as he was, appear small.

With drool and growls spilling from its mouth, the fearsome enemy, a Witchbeast—no, here it would be called a Gladiator Beast, arrived with hefty steps.

That, was precisely what Subaru and the other three must confront —

Gustav: “—As is desired by His Excellency the Emperor, prove your prestige as strong citizens of the Empire!”

—That was the examiner of Sparka, the barbaric trial to become a gladiator.

Chapter 63:
Sparka

1

—Let us rewind the clock a little.

Gustav: "—From now on, you gentlemen shall be tested to ascertain if you are qualified to be gladiators on this Island."

Subaru was taken out of the healing room and forced into another room, and Gustav crossed his four powerful arms, eyeing around the sight before him.

That mechanical, frigid stare was directed at a total of four people, Subaru included.

A lizardman with gray scales in filthy rags, a skinny man with tattoos all over his naked upper body and bald-shaved head, and a fearless-looking young man with rust-colored hair.

All of them had been crammed into the same room as Subaru had.

From what they had just been told, Subaru and the men were probably in the same situation, as far as Gustav was concerned.

However, there seemed to be some disagreement with that idea among those who had been pushed into the room.

???: "Wait, Governor Gustav! Are you going to start Sparka now? With this child in our ranks? We aren't playing around here!"

Seeing Subaru, whose back was pushed into the room, the young man with rust-colored hair cried that out.

He had a reasonably good-looking face, but his stubble and exhausted expression, along with the frustration on his face showing his dissatisfaction, cut down its quality considerably.

However, his appearance was irrelevant here. Proving this, two more people also lashed out at Gustav, as if caught up in the heat of the moment.

Lizardman: “Yeah, man! How’s a brat gonna help us?! My damn life’s on the line here!”

Tattooed Man: “Not making gladiatorial combat a cruel spectacle. That was the Governor’s policy, or so I’d heard, but…?”

Rust-Haired Man: “It’s exactly as they say. We’re going to need a good explanation. In the first place, even if we were to add the child to the group, we wouldn’t have enough people. Five people per group, that’s what you said!”

The lizardman, the tattooed man, and the rust-haired man all raised their voices in unison, their anger directed at Gustav.

Not fully understanding what Sparka consisted of, nor how it involved them, Subaru was in a situation where he could not easily butt in. However, somehow or the other, he had been able to grasp some stuff.

Apparently, Subaru had seemingly betrayed their expectations, and they were directing their dissatisfaction to Gustav because of that.

Subaru: “…Gustav-san, this is what everyone has to say, and yet…”

Gustav: “I heard them, Schwartz. In my capacity, I only have two ears like you, unlike the number of arms I have, but I intend on performing my duties to the fullest. Including this only head of mine.”

Rust-Haired Man: “If that’s—”

Gustav: “—Silence. If you interrupt me in my capacity, it is tantamount to obstructing the will of His Excellency the Emperor.”

With just those few words, any further remarks from the rust-haired man were shut down.

Gustav did not change his expression, nor the tone of his voice. Even so, the meaning carried in his words was much heavier than before.

The rust-haired man, as well as the other two, shut their mouths. Seeing this, Gustav nodded.

Gustav: “Very well, I shall continue. As I have declared, I shall now begin your Sparka. The audience is already set to be composed of the Island’s resident gladiators, with no visitors from the outside. This is a litmus test, to ascertain if you are capable of entertaining such important visitors.”

Subaru: “Audience…”

Quietly, with a sense of displeasure, Subaru muttered.

The fake Cecilus, who had been with Subaru up until he was pushed into the room, had told him “Good luck! I’ll be watching from up there!” as of their parting.

He did not confirm what sort of significance it held, but this gave him a rough idea.

Subaru: “Don’t tell me, you’re going to make us fight each other…”

Lizardman: “Ha! Ya really dunno anythin’, do ya, brat? If that were the case, surely, we’d be oh-so-happy to have someone like ya in the mix!”

Subaru: “Uh…”

As soon as he put his thoughts to words, the lizardman ridiculed him, letting out his long tongue.

But they had a point. If Sparka was to be conducted by the members present here, then a child would have been welcome amidst them.

Rather, what they were worried about, was that Subaru would not be a capable fighter—

Subaru: “Rather, all of us are going to fight something?”

Tattooed Man: “Yer pretty clever, kid. Me, I’ve got a short temper. So shut yer trap for a sec…”

Rather than gently praising him for being correct, with bloodshot eyes, the tattooed man gave him a warning.

For now, it felt like their teamplay had definitely started off in the dumps. Though this was no situation for him to speak casually like that.

Rust-Haired Man: “Just what in the world do you intend on having us fight?”

Gustav: “It will not be trained gladiators. You would not stand a chance against them. In my capacity, that is all I can tell you. — Because this enemy never appears in the light of day.”

Rust-Haired Man: “—? A riddle? That’s in poor taste.”

The corners of his mouth twisting into a grimace, the rust-haired man responded to Gustav’s words.

Then he took a small breath and continued, “So then”,

Rust-Haired Man: “Although you press me to be silent, let me at least ask you this. If that child is the fourth person, then what about the fifth person? Our Unit is…”

Gustav: “Your Unit, its fifth person is still asleep in the healing room. As long as that one does not awaken, only these people will undergo the challenge of Sparka.”

Rust-Haired Man: “Are you insane, Governor…!”

Gustav: “If necessary to abide as per His Excellency the Emperor’s will, I shall utilize either sanity or insanity.”

Faced with Gustav’s cold-hearted answer, the rust-haired man looked away, having gotten nowhere. Then, turning his gaze towards Subaru, he called out with a “You”.

Due to that threatening attitude earlier and being beckoned suddenly, Subaru's cheeks stiffened,

Subaru: "Wh-What is it…?"

Rust-Haired Man: "From the looks of it, you're just some poor kid, but what can you do? Any special skills? Any magic? Perhaps you'd have something strong and useful?"

Subaru: "U-useful special skills…"

Subaru's eyes darted around in a panic as he was asked a series of questions.

Unfortunately, after shrinking, he did not feel like he could handle the whip properly, and he was helpless when it came to magic without the adorable Beatrice. Other than that, even his various little tricks could not be used properly while he was shrunken down.

Subaru, unable to respond, kept silent. The rust-haired man put his hand to his forehead,

Rust-Haired Man: "Really, he's just a child… What a mess."

And muttered in a voice terribly laden with disappointment.

Lizardman: "He, hehe, we've got a brat, and we're lackin' in people. It's over. Over! OOOVEEER!"

Tattooed Man: "Don't raise yer damn voice, scaly bastard. Ya wanna die 'cause ya pissed me off…?"

Lizardman: "Ahhn? Can't hear ya, yer voice's way too quiet!"

The interaction between Subaru and the rust-haired man not to their liking, a big row began between the lizardman and the tattooed man. The two glared at each other, making it seem like a fight was only a few moments away from breaking out. Then, the rust-haired man broke in between the two, shouting "Wait!",

Rust-Haired Man: "Why are we fighting?! I know you're feeling sorry for yourselves, but listen to me! I used to be a warrior serving someone highly esteemed before I came here! If you follow my instructions, you'll…"

Lizardman: "Shut up! Ya were a warrior? Then why the hell are ya here? Because ya were beaten and taken prisoner, yeah?! That's not a good sign!"

Tattooed Man: "There's nothing more idiotic than to put one's life in someone else's hands. I won't let anyone control my fate."

Rust-Haired Man: "Y-you bastards…!"

However, both the lizardman and the tattooed man did not listen at all to the words of the rust-haired man that stood in between them.

To make matters worse, with the two talking back, the rust-haired man turned red and started getting angry. Given that what lay ahead was unknown, this definitely was not a good situation.

Subaru: "G-Gustav-san…"

Gustav: "Schwartz, there is nothing in my capacity left to be said. I, as the official, have already told you my intentions. Even a single drop of blood that is shed within the Gladiator Island shall be utilized for the prosperity of the Empire. Even a single drop."

Subaru: "Even if you state it once more, I still don't get it…"

The three had their scuffle, and the one remaining, Subaru, was unable to pick up on the meaning of Gustav's words.

As he gazed down at the four of them in their immensely desperate situation, Gustav would not speak anything further.

2

—The relationship between the four of them remained at its worst, and thus Sparka, the problem at hand, commenced.

Subaru: "…"

A circular field surrounded by high walls, that was the stage for gladiators called the gladiatorial arena.

On the other side of the wall, there was staircase-like seating for the audience. The seats were gradually filling up with the figures of people sitting down, and one could tell that a quiet enthusiasm enshrouded the whole venue.

What was eerie, however, was that those who overlooked the gladiatorial arena—the so-called gladiators if Gustav's explanation were to be followed, were doing so without complaint.

The way Subaru had imagined it, the audience in a place like this was expected to be a vulgar and boisterous bunch.

However, such a large difference from what he imagined was perhaps inevitable.

After all, it was Gustav the one who managed and controlled this island. —It was unthinkable that the big, unbending man would tolerate any vulgar attitude from the gladiators.

Subaru: "Just running down the hallway would probably have severe punishments."

Hence, Subaru was doing his best to put on a brave front while averting his eyes from reality.

Otherwise, he would have to force his trembling knees to run away at any moment.

—Slowly, from behind the opening iron gate, the glint of a Witchbeast's eyes emerged.

Gladiator Beast: "…"

The Witchbeast stepping out wore a lion's face, and Subaru recognized its garish body.

It was the large Witchbeast that had been brought into the mansion by a girl wearing braids in the past, and it was also the monumental opponent that had become the material for Subaru's whip.

Although, its name did not come to him immediately.

Subaru: “L-lion…?”

Gladiator Beast: “—AROOOOOO!!!”

As if answering Subaru’s call, the Witchbeast, or rather, the lion Gladiator Beast, roared. The roar echoed throughout the gladiatorial arena, and Subaru could feel the sound reverberating within his body.

A Gladiator Beast larger than Gustav, even just seeing something of the sort at a distance was unbearably terrifying.

Rust-Haired Man: “If we don’t kill that thing, we’re not going to make it.”

Glaring at the lion, the rust-haired man spoke with an unpleasant voice.

Indeed, that was correct. That was the condition to end this Sparka, a challenge that Subaru and the three others had to work together to accomplish.

It was a dreadful challenge with no chance of victory in sight.

Lizardman: “Shit, damn it, why am I in this mess…?!”

Rust-Haired Man: “Enough with the whining! We need to do everything we can to survive! Look over there!”

Lizardman: “Huh?”

Covering his face with both hands, the lizardman lamented as if it were the end of the world. Tapping him on the shoulder, the rust-haired man pointed to what appeared to be the edges of the gladiatorial arena—to be more precise, to something affixed to the left and right edges of the venue, as seen by Subaru’s group located on the corner opposite to the lion.

There, they could see something stick at each of those corners—

Tattooed Man: "—Are those, swords?"

Subaru: "Oh, it looks that way to me too…!"

Upon agreeing with the tattooed man's words, what Subaru received was a cold stare. But even if his allies did not agree with him, it was not like what he saw disappeared like smoke.

There were indeed two swords lodged in the ground over there.

Rust-Haired Man: "They wouldn't simply feed us to that Gladiator Beast without weapons. So our first priority is to secure weapons. However, only the sword on the right is viable."

Tattooed Man: "…Yeah."

The tattooed man nodded in agreement to the rust-haired man's words. Subaru was of the same opinion, though he remained silent, as he thought he would be stared at if he spoke out.

After all, the sword on the right was small, while the one on the left was too large.

The sword on the left was so large, its blade so thick, not to mention how unwieldy it was, that it made him wonder if that sword was possibly for Gustav's use.

Even if Subaru had not been shrunk, it was so huge that it seemed impossible to lift.

Perhaps the rust-haired man and the tattooed man were also unable to use a sword that large.

Therefore, only the smaller sword could be used as a weapon. If they had a member who could use that large sword, it sure would have been reassuring.

Rust-Haired Man: "It's too large. There's no other way but to get a weapon, and aim for that Gladiator Beast's eyes. We stir up the insides of its head, and finish it off. That's our only way to win."

Tattooed Man: "…Can ya use a sword?"

Rust-Haired Man: “I told you. I used to be a warrior. I can use it better than you can.”

The rust-haired man answered confidently, and the tattooed man closed one eye and pondered. Coercively judging that silence as an affirmative from what it seemed, the rust-haired man turned back to Subaru and the lizardman,

Rust-Haired Man: “When he announces the start, I’ll go and secure that sword. In the meantime, as I’ll be defenseless, keep the Gladiator Beast away from me.”

Subaru: “H-how am I gonna keep it away?”

Rust-Haired Man: “You can draw attention by shouting or making sounds. At least figure that out on your own!”

Subaru: “G-Got it…”

At the rust-haired man’s powerful retort, Subaru nodded meekly.

It was a pretty reckless and scary strategy, but it was not like he could think of any other method. And if the rust-haired man’s swordsmanship was as good as his confidence suggested, they could take down the lion.

He needed to get this dreaded Sparka over with so he could figure out his next course of action.

Therefore—

Gustav: “—Well then, LET SPARKA COMMENCE!!”

With that bold, stark proclamation from Gustav, the unleashed lion poised itself to pounce.

Pressured by its intimidating presence, Subaru took a breath in preparation to get the Gladiator Beast’s attention, so he could buy time for the rust-haired man to secure his weapon.

Rust-Haired Man: “Guaa?!”

Subaru: “—Hk?!”

Faster than he could shout, he immediately became speechless as he saw the rust-haired man collapse to the ground right next to him.

The rust-haired man, who had planned to start running right after Gustav’s declaration, collapsed onto the ground. That alone was a surprise, but what was even more surprising was that a kick struck him in the face.

The one who did that, was the tattooed man, who was supposedly his comrade.

He had swept the rust-haired man off his feet as the latter was about to sprint, and launched a kick as the latter fell. Then, after ascertaining that the rust-haired man had tumbled over and laid sprawled out,

Tattooed Man: “I told’cha. I ain’t putting my life in someone else’s hands…”

With that said, the tattooed man ran off at a brisk pace, heading toward the small sword.

Subaru’s eyes widened at the suddenness of the situation, and panicking over what he should do,

Lizardman: “N-not me! I-I ain’t gonna die!”

Subaru: “Hey?!”

The lizardman screamed in a quavering voice and fled with his back to the lion. Like that, he stuck to the wall of the gladiatorial arena and slowly began to change the color of his scales.

His gray-colored scales blended in with the color of the wall, making his large body surprisingly difficult to see.

One person outmaneuvered his comrade, one person clung onto the wall, one person got beat up by his comrade, and the last person just widened his eyes in panic, completely confused by the situation.

—This was the worst possible start.

Subaru: “Wh-What can I…”

Possibly do, and as Subaru’s face went pale in shock, he looked towards the lion.

Looking at this group with zero sense of unity, just what kind of impression did the Gladiator Beast have? Or rather, Subaru was frightened that its fangs would pierce him the moment he turned around.

However—

Gladiator Beast: “…”

Subaru: “Huh?”

The start had been declared, and he thought that surely the Gladiator Beast would toy with them, foolish as they were. But the lion remained in the same poised posture it had made at the beginning, without even the slightest movement.

It was as if the beginning had not even been declared.

And, while thinking about that, Subaru realized it. —That things were progressing just as it felt it would.

Subaru: “I-It’s no good—!”

Reaching his hand out, he tried to speak right away, but he could not continue beyond that point.

After all, Subaru did not know his name. He could not call out the name of someone he did not know, so even if he called out to them, just how much impact would it have?

Because of that, Subaru’s voice was lost of strength, nor could it stop what was to come.

Tattooed Man: “Now that I have this, I can…”

Outmaneuvering his companions, the tattooed man, who had run so vigorously, reached the sword lodged in the ground of the gladiatorial arena.

Chuckling to himself, he pulled the sword out from the ground and felt it in his hands. Just how much courage did the feeling and weight of the cold metal give him, who had been unarmed?

Jauntily, he turned his head, his face was as though there were no enemies.

Gladiator Beast: "—AROOOO!!"

The tattooed man's face was blown off without mercy by the lion, with a swipe of its front paws.

Its sharp claws sent everything upwards from the man's neck flying, and with his body not yet recognizing its own demise, it took a little bit before blood violently spurt out.

Subaru: "Eek…"

At the sight of this horrific scene, Subaru's throat hitched.

At the same time, he cursed himself from the bottom of his heart for his stupidity in not realizing things sooner.

The lion had gotten up at the very moment the tattooed man gripped the hilt of the sword.

For the lion, that had been the true declaration that the event had begun. Up till then, Subaru and his team certainly still had time to refine their strategy.

However, through impatience, and through anxiety, Subaru's squad had ruined it all.

Gladiator Beast: "—AROOOO!!!"

Along with the high-pitched clang that rang out when the sword hit the ground, the tattooed man's headless body toppled over backwards. Indifferent to the death of its prey, the lion howled loudly, commencing a ferocious sprint using its four large legs. — Straight toward the wall of the gladiatorial arena.

Lizardman: “Stop, stopstopstop, getawaygetawayGETAWAAAAAAAAY!!”

He did not know what method the lion had utilized to find the whereabouts of the lizardman camouflaged against the wall. Although he did not know that, what he did know for certain, was that the lizardman’s inability to bear the lion’s approach, as he let out a scream and ran away, was undoubtedly what caused the decisive blow.

Gladiator Beast: “—AROOOO!”

The lion plunged headfirst into the wall, its powerful headbutt crushing the lower half of the lizardman before the latter could escape, causing the contents of his body to spill out like a frog ran over by a car.

Lizardman: “Gueh.”

Although he had taken the color of the wall, the organs ejected from his squashed mouth took on a vibrant red and pink color, and Subaru absentmindedly thought about how his innards remained the same.

With those thoughts, Subaru also understood, without a shadow of a doubt, that the crushed lizardman in front of him was dead.

And then—

Rust-Haired Man: “What… What, a stupid thing to do…”

Shaking his head, the rust-haired man feebly grumbled at the sight of these two deaths.

He had been desperately trying to get through this situation and to get everyone to join forces in his own way. But one of his companions had outwitted him, the other had tried to run away, thus completely nullifying that possibility.

The rust-haired man did not expect Subaru to be capable of doing what he had expected from the tattooed man and the lizardman, as well.

Even if he had indeed expected something of him, Subaru himself did not feel that he could meet those demands.

Perhaps having understood Subaru's inner thoughts, the man looked into Subaru's eyes.

Rust-Haired Man: "…Stay behind me."

Upon comprehending just how hopeless their situation was, how many humans could put on such a brave front and face their demise head-on?

The rust-haired man, devoid of weapons, devoid of comrades, could only hope to at least face his last moments with integrity.

With the child Subaru sheltered behind him, he glared at the lion who had turned around.

In response to his stare, the lion let out a short roar, then rushed toward Subaru and the man, lifting a cloud of dust as its four powerful limbs kicked off the ground.

Subaru: "Uh, uhh…!"

He could not wrap his head around the events that had occurred in that split second.

If only one of his reliable friends were here, would he somehow find a way?

If Louis, Medium, Flop, Taritta, Al, Abel, Mizelda, Holly, Kuna, Utakata, Rem—.

If any one of his friends were here, then could he somehow do it?

Subaru: "In a place like this…"

Am I gonna, and Subaru tried to wring the rest out of his trembling voice.

However, he was unable to. Because before he could do so, the lion had caught up to Subaru and the man—but not quite.

That was because Subaru's shoulders had been grabbed, and forcibly thrusted forward.

Rust-Haired Man: "No, I don't, I don't want to die—hk!!"

Screaming, the man with rust-colored hair pushed Subaru in front of the lion.

Staring in astonishment, he had no time to curse him out. Only, Subaru's body flew as light as a leaf from a tree as the lion rammed straight into him.

Subaru: "…"

What a frail body he had.

Subaru's body was quickly shredded by the Gladiator Beast's ramming attack. This did not mean he had been dismembered, but rather that his insides had been scattered into tiny pieces.

Bones, internal organs, all broke and crumpled, as if he had been hit by a truck.

Rust-Haired Man: "Save me! I made a mistake! I lied! Me being a warrior was a lie! I was just trying to make myself seem important! Let me out! LET ME OOOUT!!"

Below Subaru as he whirled around in midair, the rust-haired man screamed and shouted as he jumped against the wall. Desperately, he appealed to Gustav, high above the wall.

And yet Gustav, upon observing the man crying, snot dripping from his nose, stood with a nonchalant face, with nary a movement of his eyebrows.

Perchance, he was already aware of the rust-haired man's lie.

Perhaps, he was not at all interested in whether it was true or false.

Whichever it was, it mattered not.

Rust-Haired Man: “Save—”

As the rust-haired man pleaded and clung to the wall, he was struck by one of the lion’s paws, thrust from right behind him, and he was squashed like a tomato thrown at a wall.

The tattooed man, the lizardman, and the rust-haired man, all had fallen before the Gladiator Beast.

???: “—su, Basu, can you hear me?”

Suddenly hearing a voice amongst the loud ringing in his ears, Subaru limply shifted his head.

Only then did he realize that he had been blown away and that, before he knew it, he had fallen to the ground, tumbling about. Even if he had realized it, he was powerless to stop it anyway.

In addition, the voice he had heard was coming from atop the wall, where a figure was watching Subaru tumbling on the ground.

A boy with tied-up blue hair, and a somewhat detestable face.

Cecilus: “My bad, it seems like I was wrong in my expectations! I thought I’d be able to, but it seems like I’m not as good as my dad. It appears that I’m not a good judge of character!”

Subaru: “Ah, ah…”

Cecilus: “In the meantime, is there anything you want to tell your companion once she wakes up? I thought how story-like it’d be to pass a message, so why don’t I seize this opportunity!”

While he observed Subaru’s groans, the fake Cecilus’s demeanor seemed completely steadfast.

Thinking back on it, his attitude had never changed. Not when Subaru woke up, not when he and Subaru talked in the healing room, and not when Subaru was like this, on the verge of dying.

He felt that this insane view of life and death was an element that made the fake Cecilus, though he was supposedly just a boy-who-cried-wolf, seem a tad more authentic.

If that much were to be assumed, then he truly would be the most powerful General of the Vollachian Empire.

Subaru: "—It."

Cecilus: "Huh? What? Basu, please speak louder, as these are your last words! If I get the message wrong, I think I'll regret it forever."

Subaru: "I hate, it…"

Cecilus: "…"

So he declared towards the fake Cecilus, who had cupped his hands around his ears to try and hear Subaru's voice.

The fake Cecilus raised his eyebrows at these words. He would speak a bit louder, from the depths of his throat.

Subaru: "The Empire, I, really hate it."

Cecilus: "—Yes, yes, for sure. I'll remember that well and pass it on, Basu."

Holding tightly onto his resentment, he cursed the fake Cecilus, whose face looked like he was dealing with someone else's problem.

But whether that curse would destroy the Empire, Subaru could not be sure.

After all—

Gladiator Beast: "—AROOOO!"

Of the four that had been fighting against it, only Subaru remained; and so, the Gladiator Beast approached him, opened its gigantic maw, and mercilessly swallowed Subaru whole head-first.

Subaru: “—Hk!”

Though all the bones of his body were in pieces by now, the lion’s fangs tore every aspect of his body into ribbons.

The little mercy he received was that his body had become unable to feel pain due to how crumpled it had become, and so, he was incapable of feeling anything more than a slight displeasure at being devoured into nothing.

Then, he tried his best to raise hell and get stuck in the lion’s throat, but he was unable to do that either.

Because with one final bite, that sly head of his attempting revenge was crushed—.

3

???: “If we don’t kill that thing, we’re not going to make it.”

It was just after a few moments of being crushed by the writhing reddish-black flesh surrounding him.

Seemingly caught off-guard upon hearing that voice, Subaru was brought back to reality. However, it was a reality that was so hopeless that it was tempting to mistake it for a nightmare upon waking up.

The noisy sensation of that silent heat, and the dry sands were spread out the grounds of the gladiatorial arena.

The worst-case scenario had arrived right before his eyes, and his comrades—or rather, those who had simply wound up in the same situation as him, were each plotting various ways to protect their own lives as their number one priority.

Were he not to think of them as that, everything that had just happened would have been very hard for him to accept.

Subaru: “Uah, ahh, ahhh…!”

Though he had no need to, he still thought about it.

Because of that, Subaru's whole body remembered the Gladiator Beast's ramming attack, the fear of being chewed up, and his reckless anger towards reality.

As these thoughts surged, he could hardly stand up straight.

???: "Damn, he's just a child after all… Well, I've had enough! You guys, look over there!"

???: "Ahh?"

To the crouching Subaru's side, the rust-haired man directed the tattooed man and the lizardman to look at the large and small swords that had been prepared for them.

However, their attention had naturally focused to the side of the smaller sword. Disregarding the larger, unusable sword, their strategy was set on securing the other, and defeating the Gladiator Beast.

Tattooed Man: "…Can ya use a sword?"

Rust-Haired Man: "I told you. I used to be a warrior. I can use it better than you can."

The same things he had heard earlier continued unabated, and anxiety began to simmer within Subaru.

But, even in a state of being seized by fear and anxiety, that was a remark he could not let slide.

Subaru: "—That's a lie."

Rust-Haired Man: "…What?"

Suddenly, the men's strategy meeting was interrupted by Subaru's voice.

The moment he heard that, the tone of the rust-haired man's voice changed. The man turned around, and looked down towards Subaru as the latter crouched. Kneeling, Subaru fixedly stared at the man's face.

And so, he repeated himself once more.

Subaru: “That you used to be a warrior, it’s a lie. You’re just downright lying!”

Rust-Haired Man: “O-on what grounds…! You bastard, are you intending to insult me just because I called you a child?!”

Subaru: “Who’s the one insulting here?! Lying and trying to make yourself look like a big shot is a much greater insult! In a situation like this, what’s the point of playing the tough guy??!!”

Rust-Haired Man: “Gh, gh…!”

Perhaps he had thought that he could silence the child by yelling in a loud voice, but, instead, the rust-haired man was visibly flustered at Subaru snapping back in opposition.

The tattooed man who had spoke earlier had probably perceived his shaken manner as well.

Tattooed Man: “…Oi, is what that kid said true? That’cha weren’t a warrior for real, and that ya were trying to deceive me?”

Rust-Haired Man: “W-wait, that’s just a child’s ramblings! You can’t just go spouting such nonsensical things in a place where our lives are at stake…”

Tattooed Man: “Exactly, since our lives are at stake, why don’t’cha try and explain yerself…”

The tattooed man grabbed the rust-haired man by the collar, the skeleton-like tattoo on his face contorting with anger. The rust-haired man gulped down his spit at that threatening attitude, lowly panting as if suffocating.

Because he had thoughtlessly interjected, such a fight had broken out. The lizardman, not involved in the fight, was visibly stepping back slowly and beginning preparations to escape.

Although Subaru’s interruption had been the impetus, this team was once again in a state of disarray and fragmentation.

Moreover, whether Subaru and his team were in such a state or not —

Gustav: "—Well then, LET SPARKA COMMENCE!!"

Gustav would not procrastinate in his pronouncement of the battle's beginning.

Tattooed Man: "Care to explain, ya—Uh, AAHHHHHH—!!"

A deep voice boisterously declared the start of the battle, and immediately after, the cracking voice of a man cut through the gladiatorial arena.

Anyone looking over would see that the one who had cried out was the tattooed man, pressing the rust-haired man for an answer. Somehow, the rust-haired man had bitten the hands that were grabbing his collar, and he seemed to have bitten those fingers off.

While the rust-haired man's mouth was stained with blood, he pushed off the screaming tattooed man's chest and sprinted for the sword.

Lizardman: "N-not me! I-I ain't gonna die!"

And so, in contrast to the rust-haired man running towards the sword, the lizardman did as he did before and stuck to the wall of the gladiatorial arena, then started to change the color of his scales for camouflage.

Having lost two fingers, the tattooed man was crouched down clutching his right hand, and Subaru's knees were trembling in fear at the situation before his eyes, which was even worse than last time.

Rust-Haired Man: "Mind, your own…! If only you'd just done as I said obediently!"

Without care for Subaru or the others, the rust-haired man with bloodshot eyes had arrived at the smaller sword.

Cursing that his lie had been discovered and that the tattooed man had grabbed him, he reached out his hand and pulled the sword out of the ground, readying it like a warrior would.

Gladiator Beast: “—AROOOO!”

Then, having received the “start” signal, the lion pounced ferociously.

The resulting incident was practically identical to what had happened just before once the tattooed man had taken the sword. The rust-haired man did not even have the time to swing the sword he had readied, and both his arms were completely blown off as he was hit by the paws of the Gladiator Beast.

With a firm grip on the sword, the rust-haired man’s arms were torn off from the elbows down; and just as he stared in astonishment and let out a thin cry of “Ah”, the lion forcefully hurled itself at the man’s armless body and sent him flying, throwing him against the wall head-first.

The rust-haired man became a stain on the wall, and the roaring Gladiator Beast, ignoring Subaru and the tattooed man, ferociously sprinted straight for the rear wall of the gladiatorial arena.

Lizardman: “Stop, stopstopstop, getawaygetawayGETAWAAAAAAAAY!!”

The lizardman, having disguised himself as a wall, shrieked at the intimidating air of the lion running toward him.

Having given away his position by yelling, the lizardman hurried to change positions, but he did not have enough time. The lion’s charge crushed the lower half of his body, mortally wounding him as he vomited out his own internal organs.

Then, the lion that had murdered the two men in a blink of an eye slowly turned to Subaru and the tattooed man, and let out a bloody roar.

Subaru: “Eek…”

Tattooed Man: “Shit, it just keeps getting worse…”

His brain numb, his paralyzed thoughts slowly began flowing anew. Because of that, Subaru's body remembered the fear, his teeth clattered, and his internal organs tightened.

As the tattooed man grinding his teeth had stated, the worst kept piling on top of the worst, and as a result, it had become an even worse and hopeless situation.

There had been no significance in calling the rust-haired man a liar.

Although nothing good would have come from exposing the rust-haired man's lie there, Subaru had still done it without thinking. Because of that, everything was a mess.

Tattooed Man: "…Still wanna live, kid?"

Subaru: "Huh…"

Tattooed Man: "If ya wanna live, pick up the sword."

The man with the tattoos spoke this to Subaru, the latter's vision blurry, looking as if he was about to break down crying at any moment.

Gazing towards him, the tattooed man pounded the ground with his bleeding right hand, and stood up while breaking into a greasy sweat. As he did so, he jerked his chin to the sword lying on the ground—indicating what had fallen to the ground together with the rust-haired man's severed arm.

Tattooed Man: "I'll draw that monster's attention… Ya grab that sword, and throw it to me."

Subaru: "B-but…"

Tattooed Man: "Even if I'm missing two fingers, I can use it better than ya, kid…"

Having been told so clearly, Subaru was at a loss for words.

There were two swords, one large and one small, and although he had been referring to the smaller one, it was still a sword too long and large for a child's body to use. Just as the tattooed man had stated, even if Subaru were to wield it with both hands, the only outcome would be that he would tumble due to its length and weight.

However, when the tattooed man declared that he would take the sword and defeat the lion, Subaru thought of it as impossible, remembering his death last time.

And yet—

Subaru: "I don't… want to give up, either…"

Tattooed Man: "…Yer better than that fraud and that scaredy-cat."

Bearing the pain, the tattooed man contorted his lips, welcoming Subaru's determination.

And with that, the tattooed man glared at the lion who was carefully observing them, and, bit-by-bit, widened the distance between him and Subaru,

Tattooed Man: "It's Weitz…"

Subaru: "…Huh?"

Weitz: "That's my name, Schwartz."

Being called Schwartz, Subaru's eyes widened in astonishment.

Subaru wondered where the man had heard that name, but Gustav was the only one who had referred to Subaru as Schwartz. That was why the tattooed man—Weitz, remembered the name he had been called during their first meeting.

Of course, that did not really amount to anything, and he knew that last time, Weitz had been a coward as he tried to outmaneuver the rust-haired man.

He knew that, but—

Weitz: "—Go!"

Weitz's shout just then became his reason to rely on him and run without hesitating.

Subaru: "…"

Firmly enduring his urge to scream, Subaru ran along the ground of the gladiatorial arena with all his might.

Naturally, he was slow. His childlike body had short limbs, and his internal organs, contracted by fear and tension, were in terrible pain. Even though he already often suffered from a lack of strength under normal circumstances, this body was a far-too-lacking one.

Still, he ran, desperately. He ran, and ran, and ran, until he reached the sword.

Subaru: "Uh, kuh…!"

Both of the rust-haired man's hands still clung to the sword, and just looking at them made him want to retch. However, this was no time to throw up.

Peeling off the firm, rigid fingers one at a time, he forcibly detached the sword from the rust-haired man's hands.

Then, while breathing heavily, Subaru lifted the sword.

Subaru: "Yes, I got it out!"

Taking a large breath, Subaru hoisted the sword he had picked up. Then he turned around and was about to throw the sword over to Weitz's direction, when—

Weitz: "Schwartz!!"

Weitz's frantic voice made all the hairs on Subaru's entire body stand on end.

Subaru turned around, and filling his field of vision was a lion, its mouth gaping wide, barreling toward him. At that moment, he felt like a deer about to be eaten, and the lion's movements seemed to be in slow motion.

Subaru: "…"

Slowly, the scary-looking lion was drawing near.

It seemed as if he could dodge it, but since his own movements were in slow motion much like his vision, he would be unable to escape at all. Only, he continued to throw the sword that he brandished.

At the very least, he wanted to finish throwing the sword before the lion's attack hit him.

—Hurry, hurry, hurryhurryhurryhurryhurry!!

Within the frustrating slowness, the voice in Subaru's head cried out desperately, wishing upon his arms and fingers.

Would it reach him? The sword finally left Subaru's hand, whirling around and spinning vertically as it flew past the dashing lion and toward Weitz.

Weitz, his hand outstretched with missing fingers, was shouting something to Subaru, who was being hunted down by the lion. However, he did not understand the true form of that shout. Even though he did not understand, it was okay.

Anyway, he just needed to put the sword that had been thrown to good use.

Subaru: "Uh, WAHHHH—!!"

Right when he thought he had completed his part, the once-slowed world returned to normal.

The howling lion dived at him, and Subaru, screaming and expecting to be torn apart by the Gladiator Beast's claws or fangs, fell onto his butt. Tears and snot streaming down his face, Subaru accepted that he was going to make an incredibly pathetic dying face.

And yet—

Subaru: “—Huh?”

The lion’s attack, that which should have killed Subaru, did not reach him.

Because, the lion had stuck its front paws into the ground right in front of Subaru, dispelling its own momentum, then fired off its hind legs into Weitz directly behind it.

Weitz: “Buh.”

Having received the sword thrown by Subaru, Weitz slashed at the lion from behind. Weitz’s face, riddled with tattoos, was smashed to bits by the hooves of the lion’s hind legs.

Exactly as before, Weitz died having had everything above his neck exploded. The sword he had brandished fell out of his hand and rolled on the ground into the distance, fruitless.

Gladiator Beast: “—AROOOO!”

Then, the lion that had just killed Weitz slowly turned its attention back to Subaru.

There was no lenience there to let him off the hook, only a ferocious intent to kill.

???: “Basu! Basu! Excuse me, but do you think you can still recover from that?”

Behind him, calling out to him from the audience in the gladiatorial arena, was the fake Cecilus, who had been watching this pitiful fight. And as he looked down at Subaru, who had fallen on his buttocks,

Cecilus: “Like some awakening of a hidden power, or the release of some sealed technique triggered by the brutal death of a fellow comrade! Is it likely? Is it unlikely?”

Subaru: “…I don’t have anything like that.”

Cecilus: “Yeaaah~, seems about right. My bad, looks like I was wrong in my expectations! Do you have a message for the girl who was with you, or something? I wonder how story-like would doing something like that be!”

Unchanged from the time he had died earlier, being spoken to in such a relaxed tone, Subaru let out a “Ha”, exhaling. What was different from before was that the bones of Subaru’s body were not yet in pieces.

Even though he might be ripped to pieces after this, and even though he was scared to death, he had yet to die still.

Subaru: “Ceci, just one question.”

Cecilus: “Not a message, but a question? A so-called memento for the afterlife? Whether or not my answer would fulfill Basu’s question will be a test of an actor’s blossoming brilliance—”

Subaru: “That lion, why didn’t it kill me earlier?”

Cecilus: “—Hmm.”

Pointing to the Gladiator Beast in front of him, Subaru asked the fake Cecilus perched on the wall.

Subaru was not sure if he, the boy-who-cried-wolf that he was, would give the straight answer that he desired. He just comforted himself with the thought that it was not-so-bad for a useless struggle.

To Subaru’s question, the fake Cecilus spoke as he stroked his slender chin,

Cecilus: “That’s easy, Basu. —Even if it’s ferocious, a beast is a beast. In that case, a beast only hunts by instinct. Instinct is the power to live.”

Subaru: “…What do you mean?”

Cecilus: “If you were that beast, Basu, who’d you aim for?”

The riddle-like phrasing did not give Subaru that simple question-and-answer sequence.

Irritated, Subaru pondered the meaning of the fake Cecilus's words. If Subaru were to be that lion, just who would he target?

If he were to aim for someone, what would be his reason—.

Subaru: "—Ah."

Suddenly, it dawned on him. So that was what the reason was, he understood.

And—

Cecilus: "When she wakes up, I'll tell her that Basu was brave. I suck at lying, so thank heavens you were brave!"

Hearing such an insensitive voice, he did not have any time to respond.

Having reached an understanding, Subaru widened his eyes, and the lion standing in front of him swung its paw towards him.

For the first time, Subaru truly heard the sound of his own body being crushed.

4

???: "If we don't kill that thing, we're not going to make it."

His skull had been crushed, his shoulders had been crushed, his body had been crushed, his hips had been crushed, every part of him had been crushed.

Slowly, Subaru experienced just that, a human body being dealt a blow of such unbearable power and speed that it would be brought to ruin in that manner, as if it were from someone else's perspective.

Of course, it really was not someone else's problem.

If possible, he would meet the end with the least amount of suffering. With the minimum amount of pain and fear. Still, Subaru's way of thinking was only possible due to how much experience he'd had at Chaosflame.

—Those ten seconds of hell.

Since that had happened, Subaru deeply understood the importance of a mere few seconds.

And because that understanding permeated his body—

???: "Shit, damn it, why am I in this mess…?!"

???: "Enough with the whining! We need to do everything we can to survive! Look over—"

Right beside him, the lizardman and the rust-haired man became desperate as they accepted the situation before them.

While listening to this already familiar conversation, Subaru called out.

Subaru: "Weitz! Hold that guy down!"

Weitz: "What…?"

The moment Subaru shouted that, the tattooed man—Weitz, had his facial tattoo distort in confusion.

That was natural. Although he had never once mentioned it, Subaru knew his name. But even if he had been called out by his name, he had no intentions of doing as he was told by some creepy kid.

But neither the bewildered Weitz, nor the rust-haired man, nor the lizardman, startled by Subaru's sudden loud voice, had time to stop his sudden action.

And then—

Subaru: "—Lion! Who are you aiming for?!"

Subaru's tiny hand grabbed the sword lodged in the ground with force as he shouted.

At that moment, without waiting for Gustav’s command, the Gladiator Beast howled, kicked its feet upon the ground, and ferociously barreled forward toward Subaru—.

Cecilus: “If Basu were that beast, who would you aim for?”

The words of the fake Cecilus, like a riddle, had been painfully seared into Subaru’s brain.

Indeed, that was it. If Subaru were the lion, he would go for the “dangerous ones” first. For instance, in this place, that would be the one wielding a weapon.

Gladiator Beast: “—AROOOO!”

Subaru gritted his molars, and faced the howling lion lunging at him. He had a visceral shudder of fear, but he would not be defeated, he would not run away, and he would not cry.

He had already been killed twice, and no matter how many more times he had to face this scary experience.

Subaru: “Don’t think that just because I’m a kid, I’m gonna cry and give up right away!!”

Cooperating with a coward, a scaredy-cat, and a fraud, with all his might, with all his power, with all his body and soul, he would fight through this Sparka to the bitter end.

—In that decisive moment, the lion’s powerful paw ferociously reaped the life of Natsuki Subaru, along with his third attempt.

Chapter 64: Magic Words

1

—An abominable technique left behind by the Vicious Old Man, Olbart Dunkelkenn.

By meddling with the Od of others, the shinobi's secret infantilization technique could remarkably reverse the growth of one's body.

All living beings were naught more than containers for that which came into existence from nothingness, the Od. Depending on the shape of the Od, the size and form of the container would vary accordingly.

Therefore, all living creatures would don different appearances, and establish themselves as unique life forms.

If this theory was correct, that the body only served as a container for the Od, then by altering the shape of one's Od, the form of its container could be altered freely.

By compressing one's Od, then the body, serving as the container, could also be shrunk—.

???: "Well, ta tell ya the truth, I'm not sure how the shinobi ancestors came up with those ideas. In the first place, not knowin' the methods ta train yer body ta the brink of death, nor how ta ascertain that limit, must've been scary, huh?"

???: "And so, that's what a shinobi is. When the time of tryin' to become one arrives, you're on the path of Shura, not ta mention that the tale becomes one of constantly walkin' over a mountain of corpses, ya see."

???: "There are lotsa techniques, but if ya don't test them with yer own life, ya can't leave them behind in a book of secrets, ya know?

My secret technique's… just one among several dozen, but even so, it's no exception to that."

???: "But, it's amusin' that the actual result and the effects deviate so much, ya know. I was sure they'd just shrink someone, ya know, but it goes as far as ta completely restore the brain ta its youthful state."

???: "Unfortunately, I really don't understand why either. Well, it's 'cause the Od's forcibly tampered with. Just as yer body shrinks ta fit yer Od, yer mind'd prolly shrink ta fit yer Od as well, yeah?"

???: "Well, it's a technique I don't use very often, 'cause I usually hafta kill the person I'm usin' it on, so I've never bothered ta find out the reason why. In fact, it's easier ta kill someone if not only their body but also the contents of their head shrink, so it's a perfect solution, ya know?"

???: "Altho', you'll sometimes get guys who've already got some serious resolve in them, from the time they were kids! Ya can't expect that trick ta work on those kinda guys, even if the stuff in their head's shrunk. —Ah, and…"

???: "…"

???: "…Oh, it's nothing. Anyway, I'm fond of it since it's one of the more amusin' shinobi techniques, ya know? It's easier to deal with a weak enemy, isn't it?"

2

—Anger, anger simmered up in Subaru, scorching his soul.

There was fear. There was also tension. Furthermore, there was also unease.

He thought that of all the negative emotions one could think of, he probably possessed them all.

But, all those negative emotions blazed, burning though every carefully folded and wrapped thing until naught, without exception, remained, his raging anger surged up.

Lizardman: “Shit, damn it, why am I in this mess…?!”

Shut up, idiot. No one’ll listen to your whining.

Rust-Haired Man: “I told you. I used to be a warrior. I can use it better than you can.”

Shut up, idiot. That’s a lie, you’re just trying to show off, it’s been obvious for a long time already.

Weitz: “I told’cha. I ain’t putting my life in someone else’s hands…”

Shut up, idiot. Like hell you can survive this alone. Look around yourself a little more.

—Yes, look around you, do so properly, at everything that you can put to use.

Subaru: “Weitz, take this! It’ll aim for the one who has the sword!”

The moment he grabbed the sword, a roar reverberated through the gladiatorial arena as the black lion broke out into a ferocious charge.

He already knew that it was aiming for him—No, at the prey that wielded the sword. So, grasping the sword he had pulled out, he tossed it towards Weitz, who was standing still.

When Subaru ran ahead, breaking out into a sprint at the outset, the three members of his team froze in surprise.

Among those three people stuck in place, the one to receive the sword that Subaru had thrown over proper was the tattooed man—Weitz, the only one to come to their senses in their last moments.

Weitz: “K-kid…!”

Witnessing the spinning sword lodge itself underneath his foot, Weitz immediately grabbed it by the hilt.

However, he had given a proper listen to Subaru’s voice, so he quickly understood that rather than being the key to defeat the lion, the sword was more of a flag to change its target.

The problem was—

Rust-Haired Man: “G-Give me that sword! I’ll take that Gladiator Beast and…!”

Subsequently coming to his senses, at Weitz’s side, the rust-haired man tried to snatch the sword the former had secured.

His mind riddled by tension and fear, the rust-haired man’s judgement was beyond repair. If this continued and became a scuffle over the sword, the two of them would both fall prey to the lion’s paws.

For that reason, he had to prevent that before it could happen.

Subaru: “Hiain! Behind you!”

Hiain: “B-behind me…?!”

Just before the rust-haired man grabbed onto Weitz, Subaru called out the name of the unaware lizardman—Hiain, convincing him that he was cornered by the imminent danger behind him.

Being the most cowardly among the three, he turned around in panic at Subaru’s voice to ascertain what was about to attack him.

But, there was nothing there. Subaru merely wished for him to turn around.

With his body stiffening in fear, Hiain turned around and—

Rust-Haired Man: “Guh!”

Instinctively extending his tail, Hiain struck the rust-haired man’s flank from the side. The latter was sent rolling at the unexpected obstruction, allowing Weitz to snatch away the sword.

Then, the lion came flying towards Weitz, who was properly standing on-guard, having changed its target from Subaru to him.

Subaru: “Get down!”

Weitz: “Tch!”

Hearing Subaru’s voice, Weitz crouched as the lion’s fangs bore down on the air right above him. Weitz’s tattooed face contorted into a grimace as he dove underneath the lion’s belly, releasing the sword before the next attack could come.

With a plop, the sword, thrown without force, settled itself atop Hiain’s chest, who instinctively grabbed it.

Hiain: “Huh?”

Gladiator Beast: “—AROOOO!”

Hiain: “H-hyaaaaaaaaah—!!”

Naturally, the lion’s focus turned toward Hiain, who reacted poorly.

As if he did not fully understand the situation, Hiain turned his back to the lion with the sword held in his arms, and with his surprisingly fast sprinting speed, he immediately distanced himself from the lion.

The lion relentlessly chased him down, and proceeded to unleash an onslaught.

Subaru: “While that’s happening, I’ll…!”

While Weitz and Hiain were somehow managing, Subaru ran alongside the wall of the gladiatorial arena. What lay ahead of his gaze was a small handle installed in the wall—something akin to a lever.

At first glance, his eyes had been drawn to the two swords, one large and one small, lodged in the ground of the gladiatorial arena, but upon closer inspection, he noticed that a lever of sorts had been inconspicuously installed on the wall.

Subaru: “If I pull this, what’ll happen?!”

The lever was a little too high for the child Subaru, so he jumped up and pulled down the handle. Putting his weight on it, he forcibly lowered the lever, and a heavy sound reverberated.

Gears were interlocking, and the sensation of something beginning to rattle and move sent a tremor from under his feet. It was the sensation of something mechanical being put into operation directly beneath the gladiatorial arena.

With this, the situation had changed, and Subaru looked back at the circumstances of the gladiatorial arena,

Subaru: “U-uwaaah—!”

The next moment, making a sound as it split the gladiatorial arena in two, an iron fence rose from the ground.

It was a wall that had been raised to divide the circular gladiatorial arena into two semicircles; if utilized properly, it was possible to force the lion into the other side.

However—

Gladiator Beast: “—AROOOO!”

This time, he had failed, he had corralled it on the wrong side.

The lion was on his side of the raised fence, so the fence only narrowed Subaru’s room to escape. With its hunting ground having become smaller, it felt as if the lion’s body had doubled in size, and the remains of what used to be Hiain were caught in its blood-stained mouth.

Rust-Haired Man: “GUAAAHK!”

Furthermore, at the lion’s feet was the rust-haired man, crying out in pain as he laid down.

It seemed that he had been right above the fence when it was raised. Because of that, he had been sent flying, and in a stroke of bad luck, had fallen on the side where the lion and Subaru were.

In contrast, an uninjured Weitz was dumbfounded on the other side of the fence.

Rust-Haired Man: “S-sto…!”

Raising its paw overhead, it then trampled on the rust-haired man collapsed on the ground, mercilessly fracturing his head.

A sound similar to that of ice being smashed rang out, and the rust-haired man’s screams were cut off there. The lion, unable to climb over the fence behind it, turned its gaze towards Subaru.

The way it stooped down ever-so-slightly made his skin crawl as it charged at him.

The sword was on the other side of the fence with Weitz, but it seemed that if the attack were unable to reach it, the lion would not consider it as dangerous.

That was why, it then ferociously charged at Subaru.

Weitz: “Schwartz!!”

Weitz called out. At these critical moments, Weitz called Subaru’s name every time.

Of course, only when he did not die before Subaru.

While also keeping that at the back of his memories—

Subaru: “—Next!”

As he howled that out, the Gladiator Beast’s sharp claws pierced Subaru’s chest.

In less than a second, together with the impact that felt like being struck by lightning, Subaru’s body was split in twain, and his consciousness went white—.

3

Subaru: “Idra! The fence won’t hold any longer! How’s the sword over there?”

Idra: “I can’t pull it out! It’s too heavy! There’s no way I can move it!”

Suffering the powerful ramming attacks, the iron fence was being tremendously warped, and the lion was thrusting its body over to their side.

He had heard that even humans would be able to pass through most narrow spaces, provided their heads could pass through. Even though its form was considerably different, given the Gladiator Beast’s face gave off the feeling of a feline’s, it was probably able to get through even more easily.

Behind Subaru, who was gnawing his molars in alarm, the rust-haired man—Idra, was desperately trying to pull out the large sword lodged in the ground, but it would not budge an inch.

The lever to raise the fence, and the two swords of large and small. What he had found after thoroughly searching, were just those two types of gimmicks. The rest would be a genuine contest of ability.

Idra: “Boy! What should we do?!”

Subaru: “Don’t be frightened! You’re the heir of your noble father, aren’t you?!”

Idra: “—Hk, th-that’s right! I’m… not going to chicken out!”

Panic ran through Idra’s voice, but Subaru’s words brought strength back into his eyes.

Idra was no warrior, nothing of the sort. He had drifted onto the Gladiator Island like this because he had become unable to repay his debts and was thus reduced to the status of a slave.

But, the reason behind his debt, was that he had taken it on to protect the family business he had inherited from his father.

Even though Idra was not a warrior, he wished not to be a man who would bring shame to his father; those were the true feelings on his mind.

Idra: “RAHHHHHHHH!!”

The untalented son of a miller, applying his weight, leaned to uproot the large sword. Subaru too, rushed to Idra’s side, and applied his weight to the large sword in a similar way.

The lion was coming at them from the other side of the fence, and behind it lay the corpses of Weitz and Hiain, both of whom had already been killed.

Now, there was hardly a chance of anything like winning. —Even so, Idra did not abandon Subaru and run away. This, was the first occurrence of that.

Gladiator Beast: “—AROOOO!!”

Subaru: “Idra, it’s coming!”

Idra: “I know!”

There was a violent sound of the iron fence creaking, followed by the lion finally coming over to their side.

Even if the broken fence had wounded the lion’s skin covered in black fur, it did not display the least bit of pain. Rather, blaming the pain on them, its motivation ignited as it charged at them.

Idra: “Ughk…!!”

Idra had somehow managed to get the tip of the large sword out of the ground, and through sheer force carried it on his shoulder. Subaru put his hands on the tip of the sword from below, and used the principle of leverage to help Idra to try and swing the sword, even if only a bit.

If Subaru pushed up the tip of the sword from below, the sword should be a little lighter to swing.

If that sword were to score a decent hit on the lion—

Subaru: “GOOOOOO—!!”

Idra: “RAHHHHHH—!!!!”

Subaru and Idra joined forces to swing the sword at the lion’s face as it lunged at them.

The large sword, swung with the force of a shoulder throw above Idra’s shoulder, aimed true at the lion’s head with miraculous timing.

Idra: “—Oh.”

The obvious strike was repelled by the Gladiator Beast’s claws without a hitch, and Subaru and Idra were hit with the force of that ramming attack, blown away simultaneously.

Then, the two struggled midair as they slammed into the walls of the gladiatorial arena together, becoming one.

Idra: “Buh.”

Indistinguishable from each other, the blood from the two was spread out and stained the walls—.

4

—Anger, anger simmered up in Subaru, scorching his soul.

Weitz: “I was desperate for food, so I stole… If I let ’em think I was a dangerous person, surprisingly, I could avoid deadly situations.”

Weitz said this as he stroked his skin, which was so filled with tattoos that there was no spot left uncovered.

It seemed like he was apologizing for giving a false impression, but Subaru thought it was proof that Weitz had opened up to him in his final moments.

Hiain: "Y'all are gonna use me as bait to escape as well anyway! I'm… I'm not gonna be used anymore! Like hell I'm gonna be used!"

While abjectly avoiding eye contact, Hiain had said this as if wailing.

He had the ability to run and hide by changing the color of his scales, seemingly well-known among his own people. He had stated that he had always been given the most dangerous roles, and in the end, he willfully became the decoy and was made into a slave.

That timidity had been instilled in him by his surroundings. Hiain was not at fault.

Idra: "People I trusted deceived me, stole my family's business away from me, and in the end, I became a slave. If living honestly only makes me look like a fool, at least I'll be the last one standing…!"

Biting his lip in frustration and embarrassment, Idra sobbed those words out.

Unaccustomed to telling lies, he was unable to stick to them to the very end. In the first place, ever since he was brought to the Gladiator Island, he had been introducing himself as a warrior; that had been a lie, not much thought put into the consequences.

It would be exposed later, anyway. Sure enough, Subaru found out right away. Though it was the result of having cheated.

—Cooperating with a coward, a scaredy-cat, and a fraud, he would survive this Sparka.

Subaru: "Next…!" / "Next time!" / "Next!!" / "Next time for sure!" / "I'll do it next… Hk!" / "Next is…!" / "I can do it next…!" / "Next!" / "Next is…" / "—Definitely next" / "Neeext—!!"

The contradiction of accumulating Deaths in order to survive amassed more and more.

It hurts, it's difficult, it's scary, it's tough, I want to stop, I want to cry, I want to shout, I want to howl, I want to grieve, I want to scream, I want to resign, I want to refuse, I want to lament, I want to give up, I won’t give up.

He was nipping off the possibilities.

Out of those endless possibilities, crushing the paths which lead to dead ends, crushing them, crushing them crushing them crushing them.

He would twist his small body into that path unknown, laying ahead of the ones he was crushing.

Weitz, Hiain, Idra would die.

Of course, Subaru would die just as many times, and yet he raised his head still, and proceed forward.

Cecilus: “Basu, is there anything you want me to tell your sleeping companion?”

Subaru: “—Next!!”

Natsuki Subaru yelled back at the inconsiderate voice, and though his entire body was bathed in Death from the assailing claws, Natsuki Subaru still refused to desist.

Because, because, because—

Subaru: “I won’t lose.”

—Because he did not feel like losing in the slightest.

5

???: “Oh? Just now, were ya hesitatin’ ta say somethin’? Jeez, you’re a clever fella, aren’t’cha?”

???: “Oh that, I told’cha ’bout the guy who was troublesome even when he got shrunk, didn’t I? Even if the mind shrinks, the effect’ll only be half as powerful on whose resolve was unchanged from before. Of course, guys like that’ll also get their body shrunk, so they’ll also become seriously easier ta kill, ya know.”

???: “—Altho’, let’s imagine here. Supposin’ there was a guy whose body and mind were instead both perfect since they were little, what do ya think’d happen if ya were ta apply this technique onta that guy?”

???: “Ahh, I know, I know. I also don’t think there’s a guy like that in the slightest, ya see. But ya know, I’m an incredibly pessimistic ol’ man. I’ve always imagined the worst, so I can harass my opponents in the worst possible ways. Right?”

???: “That’s what I think’s the worst possible scenario against this technique. When the guy gets more dangerous when shrunk, that’s really darn frightenin’.”

???: “It isn’t limited ta just me, but gettin’ older means ya gotta give things up and compromise, ya see. What if those things were ta disappear from a guy like that?”

???: “—Scary as can be, right?”

6

Subaru: “Next!”

—That outcome, it was way too ironic.

The Vicious Old Man Olbart Dunkelkenn’s technique, and the harm of the “infantilization” it brought about, had transformed Natsuki Subaru’s body into that of a child, regressed what little intelligence he already possessed.

Gradually losing both his knowledge and memories, Subaru was reshaped into a weak and frail young boy.

Taking away threats both physical and mental, was the purpose of that technique.

For the shinobi, who would utilize all means possible to accomplish their objective, it could be said that secret art was a rather fitting secret technique.

The truth was, as his memories faded as if flaking away from him, the faces of those important to Subaru grew distant.

Thus, befitting of Natsuki Subaru's outward appearance, he had returned to being a young child of around ten years old.

Around ten years old—before, to the times Natsuki Subaru had been a child prodigy.

Subaru: "Next!"

Before, Natsuki Subaru had been a child prodigy.

Actually, that he was an existence overflowing with talent to the point of being called a child prodigy, was not that important. The important thing was, it was none other than Subaru himself who possessed that level of self-esteem.

As a young child, Natsuki Subaru had been overflowing with confidence, and held no doubt in his belief that he could accomplish anything.

Drawing in the children around him, his belief that he could reach that starry sky was unceasing.

Subaru: "Next!"

In accordance with his growth, his self-esteem wore down in the face of reality, and ended up being lost altogether.

His number one truth had been erased in spite of whatever he would do, and what remained in Subaru's possession were not feelings of almightiness, but rather feelings of uneasiness and powerlessness. Those shining stars were concealed by an overcast sky.

Together with the growth of his stature, Natsuki Subaru had lost his confidence.

Subaru: "Next!"

The moment in which Subaru's self-esteem reached its lowest, that had definitely been the day he was sent to another world.

After that, his encounters, his experiences, his conversations, and his actions, gradually wrapped Natsuki Subaru with new desires, and had also led him to the assessment that his own perseverance was not a bad thing.

And yet, he was still insufficient, his heart still lamented so.

Subaru: “Next!”

The things that Natsuki Subaru had gained through growth, the things he had lost with growth, had all vanished.

Together with their body turning younger, people would also regress mentally, so the person was supposed to become weaker. Physically, that was the case for Subaru. He had become weak. —However, what about mentally?

Subaru: “Next!”

Before, Natsuki Subaru had been a child prodigy.

Never knowing defeat, never knowing how to give up even when his dreams did not come true, even when he did his best but could not reach, even when he mourned his own inadequacy, even when he lamented a dead end, even when he sulkily withdrew, he had never known those.

From just being insensitive, to being flat out reckless, he firmly believed he could accomplish anything.

He recklessly believed he was the ruler at the center of the world, that was the kind of boy he had been.

Then, the magic words that sustained Natsuki Subaru’s sense of self —

???: “—He’s that guy’s child, after all.”

The unlimited power pouring from those words freed the heart of the young Natsuki Subaru from its shackles.

More than it was scary, it was revolting. More than it was painful, it was vexing. More than he wanted to cry, he wanted to smile.

In a country he hated, joining forces with comrades he had little emotional attachment to, in order to return to the place where the girl he liked and his friends should be waiting for him, just what point was there in hesitating?

Therefore, this time, because he had been summoned to another world—

Subaru: “—Next!”

—As the strongest existence, Natsuki Subaru would trample upon Ginunhive.

7

Everyone: “…”

Everyone was left speechless.

From the get-go, the gladiators had been under strict orders from the Island’s Governor, Gustav Morello, to witness the battle of Sparka quietly.

That was why, it could be said that it was inevitable that some sort of odd silence would envelop the gladiatorial arena.

However, this time the silence and stillness were not simply because Gustav had proclaimed it.

Even if Gustav had not given those instructions, no one would have been able to say anything. That bloodcurdling scene had overwhelmed them to such an extent.

Subaru: “Weitz! Idra! Scatter to the left and right! Hiain, I know you’re scared, but don’t run! Pick up the sword, draw its attention, then throw it!”

Ferociously roaring, the Guiltilaw, the Gladiator Beast, fiercely leapt around the gladiatorial arena.

The beast had been trained for use in Sparka, its horns broken off, now lost of its bestial obstinacy; in its place, the level of threat the humans known as gladiators posed had been thoroughly drilled into it.

That was why, it took the initiative to target opponents with weapons and eliminate them, since they were dangerous existences.

Only, since it had the bad habit of relentlessly following this devotion, one could imagine that the members of a Unit would be able to scatter its attention by passing the weapon between each other.

Although, it was not uncommon for Units to fail to recognize this at first sight, and consequently suffer total annihilation.

It could be said that once someone was able to recognize this, a certain level of excellence was guaranteed.

But even so, the scene this time was extraordinary.

???: “Hahaha! Amazing, amazing! You’re really doing your best, aren’t you, Basu!”

Among everyone who had lost their voice, welcoming the sight before him with a warm reception was only one boy, clapping his hands.

His long blue hair tied behind his head, he was a person whose charming face was adorned with a smile. Apparently showing indifference to Gustav’s commands, the boy cheered on the Unit fighting bravely in the gladiatorial arena.

Whether that cheering had any effect was unclear, but while dodging the Gladiator Beast’s onslaught by a hair’s breadth, the four men challenging the Sparka continued to fight desperately.

With no decisive blows, the progress of the deathmatch was, to a certain extent, boring.

However, one point was that even if it seemed like they were going to die, they would not forfeit their lives, and the other point was they were being supported by the continuous voice of the young boy; these two points made it unthinkable that the deathmatch was boring.

Following the boy's directions, the three men that continued to move too were desperate.

That was only natural, but they had the freedom to ignore the boy's instructions. However, the boy's instructions had now saved their lives from the Gladiator Beast many times; hence, that freedom had been closed off.

Like that, with the young boy at their center, it was as if their Unit was a single living being with perfect coordination.

That which had become a solely defensive battle, was it caused by their hopeless gap in fighting power, or perhaps—.

???: "—Just what, are you aiming for?"

In the hearts of all the gladiators overlooking the battle, the same burning anticipation began to dwell.

8

—Anger, anger simmered up in Subaru, scorching his soul.

With deaths piling up, and the pain and fear compounding with it, his arms, legs, and internal organs were all shriveling up. If he shut his eyes, on the back of his eyelids, the face, the fangs, and the inside of the mouth of the lion he had seen up close so many times would come to mind.

Unfathomable fear manifested. Though, while seething, together with it came something. —Anger.

Those vexing thoughts, invigorating his cowering viscera and limbs, Natsuki Subaru opened his eyes.

Those attempts which he had already gotten sick of counting, were all for the sake of snatching even just one step closer to victory.

That he had not the slightest intention of losing, for the sake of proving that to himself.

Subaru: “Hiain! Throw the sword to Weitz, then head to Idra!”

Hiain: “Shit! I ain’t got a clue on what’s happenin’!”

Furiously running on all fours over the ground, Hiain tossed the sword he was holding over to Weitz. Like that, he accelerated as to come to Idra’s side by the large sword.

Weitz narrowly caught the sword whirling around and spinning in the air, and as Subaru tried to direct their next course of escape, his eyes widened in astonishment.

Gladiator Beast: “—AROOOO!”

The roaring lion, having chased the fleeing Hiain until just a moment ago, had its legs halted at the other half of the circular gladiatorial arena.

Meanwhile, rather than being positioned in the other half of the circle, they were all right before him.

Everyone was still alive, and on top of that, this was the first time they had gotten to such an ideal position.

Subaru: “Weitz, get ready! Idra and Hiain too!”

With vigor akin to blood hurling out of his throat, Subaru cast roles at the three of them.

Though that may not have been enough to get everything across, Weitz readied his sword and faced the lion, and Idra and Hiain hurriedly jumped to the large sword.

Then Subaru, too, clumsily ran with all his might, heading towards the wall.

Gladiator Beast: “—AROOOO!!”

One step, two steps; during his frustratingly slow-feeling speed, the lion howled from behind them.

And with that, the lion kicked off the ground with an explosion-like force and charged toward Weitz, who had his sword at the ready.

Straight at him, with no pause, Weitz was holding his sword at the ready, but if he were to collide with that force, nothing would be able to stop it. One hit and he would die. He was well-aware of this.

However, it was certain that only Weitz possessed the courage to square off against the lion until the very last moment.

Weitz: “Uu, RAHHHHH—!!”

The foul-reeking mouth letting breaths escape, the mouth embellished with sword-like fangs, the mouth that had masticated Subaru and the other three countless times, was charging right at the one brandishing a sword, Weitz.

And right before it could dispossess Weitz of his life—

Subaru: “—GOOO!!”

The moment his fingertips were on it, Subaru used the entirety of his minute body weight to pull down the lever.

Immediately after, the sound of gears turning came from beneath their feet, and the iron fence that thrust upwards struck the lion’s head from directly below. Crashing into its jaw, the lion’s gaping mouth was forcibly shut.

The force of its charge slamming into the iron fence, Weitz, who had drawn the enemy until the very last second, with a “Woah?!” exclaimed his surprise at the shockwave and was blown away.

The iron fence was squashed by the impact, and the lion’s head emerged from the bent part of the fence. The lion, which had received a severe blow to the face, scraped the ground with its front paws, and after having stood back up somehow, seemed to be trying to break through the fence.

—But, it would not be permitted to do that.

Subaru: “Idra! Hiain!”

Hiain: “Uu, UAHHHHHH—!”

Idra: “RAHHHHHH!!”

In Weitz’s stead, who had just been blown away, Idra and Hiain rushed over to the iron fence. Clasped in the hands of the two, was a very unwieldy large sword.

It was a weapon that not a single one of them could utilize properly, however, there was no rule that they must use it alone.

There was also no rule that they could not use two people to lift it up and swing it down on an opponent unable to move.

Gladiator Beast: “—AROOOO!”

With all their might, the large sword swung by the two men fell from directly overhead onto the lion’s neck, which was protruding from the iron fence. As the large sword pierced the beast’s thick neck, the lion’s shrieks echoed into the sky.

Blood spurted out, and as if rejecting death, the lion violently struggled.

Hiain: “Die, diediedieDIEEEEEEEEEE!!”

Idra: “Please let it end—!!”

Hiain and Idra applied their weight onto the large sword as they bawled, and the blade was buried deeper in its neck. If they continued and beheaded the lion, the moment of their long-awaited victory would come.

Over and over again, those claws and fangs had killed them and killed them and killed them—.

Gladiator Beast: “—AROOOO!”

Hiain: “Gah?!”

Subaru: “Guys?!”

They had been just one step away, however, just like them, the lion did not want to die.

With the large sword lodged in its neck, the lion forcefully twisted its body and pulled his right paw to their side of the fence. That paw swept away the bodies of the two men grasping the large sword.

He was able to witness Hiain and Idra violently tumbling along the ground, raising cries of pain.

There was no telling just how deep the wounds that they had sustained were.

However, more so than rushing over to the two who had collapsed, jumping to that large sword was important.

Subaru: “As if I’d let you go!”

Not wanting to let it get away after coming this far, Subaru jumped to the hilt of the large sword. But he was too light. Taking the place of both Hiain and Idra’s body weight, the current Subaru was far too light.

The large sword dug a little deeper, but as if returning the favor, a paw swung back at him.

Just like the two before him, Subaru was also struck by its paw—

Weitz: “Don’t think… I’ll just let’cha, ya beast… Hk!”

Its front paw was skewered to the ground by the downward swing of a sword.

The one who had thrust the sword was the one who had supposedly been blown away by the charge, Weitz. With all of his might, teeth clenched and facial tattoos distorted, he had used the sword to pin the lion’s paw.

And then—

Idra: “Lying down here, just how can I call myself a warrior!”

Hiain: “Just die already, you shithead!”

Having gotten back up, Hiain and Idra leapt onto the large sword Subaru was dangling from.

With the strength of three—or rather, of two and a half men, the large sword bore deeper into the lion’s neck. With Weitz also keeping the front paw firmly pinned down, the four members of the Unit joined forces to lop off the lion’s head.

Howling, the lion greatly writhed in pain, and the iron fence violently creaked.

No more chances would come around. He could not lose, he did not want to lose, he must not lose, gritting his teeth, Subaru desperately clung to the large sword.

And yet—

Gladiator Beast: “—AROOOO!”

Subaru: “UAHHHH—hk!!”

Shaking its head with all its strength, the lion’s huge body swept Subaru and his comrades away.

Tearing away the bodies clinging to the large sword, the three of them—No, including Weitz, all four of them sluggishly tumbled to the ground.

Due to quite literally exhausting his desperate efforts, he had no strength left in his limbs.

Subaru: “I-I have to get…”

He had to get up, he had to jump to that large sword once again and lop off its head.

Despite these thoughts, his body did not listen to what he was saying. It seemed that not only Subaru, but the other three were also in the same situation.

Even after all this, the lion was still the most vigorous of them.

Gladiator Beast: “—AROOOO!”

With the sword lodged about halfway into its neck, the lion groaned in a low voice.

Rather than weak, it was a voice that sounded like its stockpiled rage had reached its limit. Of course, it probably had bore effect, but its strength had not been depleted.

Subaru: “Darn it… Hk.”

Even after trying, and trying and trying, and finally being just one step away from reaching it.

Still, he could not reach it. Even though he had utilized everything he could think of, and reached this far.

That is why, next time, I won’t lose.

Subaru: “Next, time…”

He would definitely arrive at this same place and scene more quickly, Subaru firmly vowed so.

Oblivious to his vow, the lion slipped through the iron fence, raising its unharmed paw towards Subaru, and—

???: “—Excuse me.”

The next moment, the lion’s thick neck was chopped in one swift motion.

Subaru: “Huh?”

Facing death, Subaru stared in wonder at the death of not him, but his opponent.

Its decapitated head falling to the ground with a thud, the lion’s body slowly fell sideways. The one responsible for that was the large sword that had been deeply lodged in the lion's neck.

Like a surprise attack, a small figure had fallen from the sky, and, stepping on the large sword, pushed it in.

Thus, the lion had been decapitated.

And, the one to perform that deed was—

???: "…Um, why am I in such a place?"

And the girl—Tanza, had a visible expression of worry on her usually emotionless face.

At the girl whose kimono had been removed, clad only in hadajuban, Subaru let out a soft breath.

He was unable to respond in any way. However, when Subaru turned his head and looked back, the three others also seemed to have survived by a hair.

In other words—

Gustav: "—That is enough! You have done well to survive Sparka! By my jurisdiction as the official, I accept you all as members of the Gladiator Island!"

A loud, booming voice resounded from high above, and Gustav's declaration marked the end of the fight.

Immediately, having quietly watched over the battle until now, the spectators—no, the gladiators stood up and, all at once, in praise of Subaru and his comrades' victory, raised their voices.

???: "Well done!"

???: "That was a huge feat!"

???: "Ya sure got it in ya, lil' one!"

As the voices of the excited men rained down, Gustav crossed his four arms and said nothing.

Hearing the cheers of the crowd, Subaru threw himself to the ground with a thud. Tanza, approaching with trepidation, peeked down at Subaru’s face.

Tanza: “Pardon me, you are…”

Subaru: “Natsuki Schwartz.”

Tanza: “Huh?”

Seeing the round eyes on Tanza’s surprised face become even more rounded as he laid down, Subaru let out a long, long breath, and continued.

Subaru: “First of all, I’m Natsuki Schwartz, so it’s nice to meet you. There’s a lot I wanna talk about, but…”

Tanza: “Yes, but?”

Subaru: “…I want you to let me rest, just for a bit.”

He felt bad for Tanza, who tilted her head, but Subaru had reached his limit.

The strained thread of tension was severed, the heat that had been seething in his soul also fizzled out. Of course, his hate for this situation was still left smoldering within him.

Nevertheless, he had somehow managed to survive Sparka.

Subaru: “So please… Let me sleep for a bit.”

With that, as if falling straight down into a pit, Subaru’s consciousness slipped away.

9

Gustav: “…”

Looking down, Gustav narrowed his eyes at the boy who had lost consciousness while sprawled out on the gladiatorial arena below.

That it was an incredible battle, with an unexpected outcome, that he could say.

He would have never thought that the boy possessed such talents.

???: “Weeell~, that was amazing, wasn’t it, Gustav-san. Picking Basu was bang on the money. It’s great that you kept him instead of throwing him away! Isn’t this a glorious achievement for me?!”

Gustav: “…Segmunt.”

As Gustav was lost in his thoughts, Cecilus came over and relaxedly spoke towards him.

At the boy’s words, whose hands were crossed behind his head, Gustav rubbed his forehead and brow with his two right arms,

Gustav: “There was some truth in your proclamation. Is this what you had been anticipating?”

Cecilus: “I had my expectations, you know? I thought it’d be nice if this happened, and it did. It’s exactly the feeling where what you believe in is what saves you!”

Gustav: “…Such a frail possibility, and you would stake your own life on that.”

Cecilus: “—? Yes, I did, so what?”

Tilting his head, Cecilus made a puzzled face.

It was an attitude as though he was wondering if he had spoken something strange.

If the two people who he had pulled up—Schwartz and Tanza, could not be put to use, he would take responsibility for their lives, and pay with his own; he acted as if he had never even asserted that.

Cecilus: “Nothing really happened in the end, did it? It was a very generous offer from my perspective. I’m not the kinda person who’d succumb to idleness in a place like this!”

Gustav: “I, in my capacity, am unable to comprehend your logic. And aside from that, what did you do in that final moment?”

Gustav questioned Cecilus, who had puffed up his thin chest in pride while smiling.

In that final moment, in the midst of the Sparka that he had even staked his life on, only once, and only for a short amount of time, had Cecilus disappeared.

Given what happened after that, one could roughly imagine that—

Gustav: “Did you go to wake the girl?”

Cecilus: “Oh dear, if you know the answer you don’t have to ask me. In the first place, since there are five people per Unit, if that girl didn’t wake up, they’d have to do it while lacking in people, it was Gustav-san who said that, you know. That means she could join in anytime after she woke up, right?”

With one eye closed, Cecilus looked up at Gustav, their heights not level, and gave an “Or”, Cecilus: “Do you want to withdraw that now? Saying that this Sparka is found to be unjust.”

Gustav: “—. It is not unjust. His Excellency the Emperor shall be pleased with the birth of a magnificent gladiator as well.”

Cecilus: “Hahaa, it’s just my opinion, but it sounds like His Excellency the Emperor isn’t a decent person!”

Gustav: “Insults toward His Excellency the Emperor will not be tolerated. There shall be no second time.”

So Gustav commanded in a stern voice, as Cecilus shrugged his shoulders and backed down somewhat. Exhaling through his nose in that state, Gustav looked again at the gladiatorial arena.

Schwartz, the most meritorious, and three men were being carried out by the guards under Gustav’s command. In the healing room, they would receive treatment from a healer.

The young girl, seemingly aloof, also accompanied them for now.

Gustav: “Did everyone in the Unit survive, due to just one person?”

It was a conclusion that could not have been reached without everyone’s help, but it went without saying who had shown the greatest strength.

By not overlooking the weapons and mechanisms the gladiatorial arena had been prepared with, keeping an eye on his comrades in the same circumstances, and even observing the enemy’s movements whenever possible; they had crossed a fine thread.

As someone who had seen that final resolution—

Cecilus: “You see? Don’t you just get the feeling that a grand tale’s going to begin?”

Like that, Cecilus proudly asked for approval; while keeping his face stern, feeling that answering in any way would be annoying, Gustav silently crossed his four thick arms.

Chapter 65:
The School Food Fighter

1

???: “Chaosflame has been destroyed by a big, a very big disaster. The evacuation of the residents should have been completed by Yorna-sama, but as for anything beyond that…”

The ends of her gentle eyebrows lowered; with downcast eyes, the girl’s voice was filled with sadness.

He had always thought of her as a child who did not reveal many emotions; in fact, even now her expression could not quite be called one of sadness. However, he believed that anyone who did not consider this as sadness was an idiot.

Subaru was not very smart, but he did not want to continue being an idiot. Therefore, he decided to seriously accept what she—what Tanza had said, and sympathize with her pain.

However—

???: “Hahaaa, a disaster that’d destroy the Demon City’d be quite the big deal, wouldn’t it? While I’m like this, locked up on an island, the world’s going through loads of crazy developments. Goodness, I’ll need to keep this in mind so that I don’t get a late start, it’d be totally uncalled for!”

Subaru: “Ceci, can you shut up for a second?”

Cecilus: “Huh? Did I do something wrong again?”

The personage who completely disregarded Subaru’s inner feelings and Tanza’s heartache as he proceeded to talk, the fake Cecilus, received a stare as he tilted his head to the side, a confused look on his face.

Subaru was amazed and astonished and amazed by that attitude which never changed no matter what, both before and after the Sparka.

This was compounded upon thinking of the dozens of times Cecilus had tried to cold-heartedly listen to Subaru's final request.

Subaru: "…And despite that, it'd all been for nothing had Ceci not woken up Tanza at the end."

Cecilus: "Ah, there's no need to feel indebted over that. The moment you cornered it that far, it was Basu's victory, the final push was something like a bonus. Besides, whether this girl would wake up or not was a gamble!"

Tanza: "I apologize for worrying you."

The fake Cecilus was immodestly humble to the bitter-looking Subaru. Hearing that, Tanza slightly bowed her head, and beside her, the one she had saved, Subaru, was at a loss for words.

—Subaru had been able to surmount Sparka, the dangerous welcoming ceremony of the Gladiator Island.

After repeating that challenge that now felt distant over and over again, somehow or another, Subaru and his team had attained victory by cutting off the lion's head. Yet, he was obliged to say that it would have been difficult without the cooperation from Tanza and the fake Cecilus.

Had the fake Cecilus not woken up Tanza at the end, and had Tanza not lopped off the lion's head with the sword stuck in its neck—

Subaru: "I don't know how many more times we would've failed."

Of course, the option to give up did not exist, because that had been a constant struggle that could not be stopped until they were successful. Even so, whether they had the willpower to do so or not, would have greatly influenced the outcome.

And it was quite possible that, if the situation arose, they would not have survived in their entirety.

Had it turned out that way, he would have regretted it forever.

Subaru: “Weitz, Hiain and Idra, we all persevered together.”

Cooperating as one had been extremely difficult, but they would not have survived had even one of them not participated.

The fact that all of them had survived was the best-case scenario for Subaru. It was a great confidence boost for him, to have been able to do something typical of a leader.

With this, he had the confidence to say he was the son of Natsuki Kenichi with pride.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama?”

Subaru: “Oh, sorry, sorry, I got lost in my thoughts for a bit. So well, um, about Chaosflame…”

Tanza: “—. Yes. I wish to get back as soon as possible to help with the reconstruction.”

Subaru: “…Yeah, that’s right. I want to get back and reunite with everyone as well.”

Returning to the original topic, with her face downcast, Tanza looked very pitiful.

It was only natural that she would worry about her family and hometown, and Subaru too, held those very feelings. Even more so having heard about the turmoil Chaosflame had gone through without him knowing.

He was worried about whether or not everyone he was separated from—Louis in particular, had been found by the unkind Abel.

He thought that if Yorna was with her, she would surely protect Louis.

Tanza: “…”

The forlorn Tanza was now back in the kimono outfit that he had seen in the Demon City as well.

Subaru had slept for a whole day after the Sparka was over, according to what he was told. At the time he woke up in the healing room, he was told by a toothless old man who claimed to be a healer that there was nothing wrong with his physical health, but he would feel drained and heavy mentally.

However, he could not afford to calmly be at a loss.

Subaru: “What about the other three… Weitz and the others? Has everyone already woken up?”

Tanza: “As far as those three go, they have already woken up and returned to their room. It seems that they are all sharing a room. Schwartz-sama and I are also sharing a room, as well as…”

Cecilus: “Yes, yes, that’d be me. You see, it’s the room Basu first woke up in, but that’s where our bedroom is going to be. I’m also glad that people that can share a room with me finally came. Well, rather than saying that you came here, it’s more like I pulled you up here by myself!”

Tanza: “Pulled up…?”

Subaru: “Don’t worry about it too much. It’s just a tale of me and Tanza falling in the lake after all.”

Come to think of it, he had a faint memory of swimming frantically and trying not to drown.

Whether he had swam through in just one go or drowned several times was quite vague, but it was not that important, so thinking about it would be futile.

Either way, he was relieved after hearing that the other three were also safe. Although it was unavoidable, he had learned a lot about their various circumstances in the midst of the Sparka event.

A coward, a scaredy-cat and a fraud. Though not very commendable personalities, they too had their reasons for being cowardly, timid, and fraudulent.

Subaru: “Yes, it’s just like I’m Superman, eh?”

Cecilus: “Oh my, your face sure is overflowing with an abundance of confidence. I think it even raises your level of manliness and gives it a pleasant feeling. To be so swept up in the situation that you worry about this and that, that’s the behavior of a minor actor or a member of the masses! Basu needs to stand tall!”

Subaru: “I don’t plan on going along with Ceci’s drama-geek mind, but I think so too.”

In the first place, it was not good to dwell on things too much.

Though for some reason, Subaru up to now had been far too passive regarding many things.

No matter what, taking a passive response would just cause the opponent to get overconfident. Whether it be a hated opponent, or fate itself, it was the same. And recently, fate had been getting a little too cocky.

Subaru: “From now on, I’ll be more proactive in moving towards achieving my goals with avarice.”

For now, Subaru’s goal was to escape the island.

Escape the Gladiator Island, and return to Chaosflame together with Tanza. Of course, the ultimate goal was to leave the Empire and return to everyone in the Kingdom, however—

Subaru: “You’ll fall if you’re preoccupied with big goals, after all. Even for summer homework, you’ve got to finish them one at a time. You can’t write a whole diary all at once.”

Despite what he seemed, Subaru was the type of person who did his homework diligently during summer and winter vacations.

Sometimes there were classmates who would come to school after the vacations without having done their homework, but he never fully understood the nerve they had, nor what they were thinking in pulling that off.

Though somehow, feeling like he had lost in terms of the idea and courage was a bit frustrating.

Subaru: “But I did the homework, so I’m the superior one…”

Tanza: “—Then, Schwartz-sama, may I have a moment?”

Subaru: “Yeah?”

Tanza timidly called out to Subaru, who had placed his hand on his chin, watering himself with self-esteem.

Directing Subaru’s gaze to herself, she indicated the fake Cecilus beside her with her hand. And, sitting on the bed, watching as he dangled his legs with a carefree look on his face,

Tanza: “This one here is an ally, but… Um, Cecilus Segmunt-sama is…”

Subaru: “Hmm, yeah, he’s a boy-who-cried-wolf, he keeps insisting on that.”

Cecilus: “A-ha-ha, they do say I am insistent, y’know! And what do you mean by boy-who-cried-wolf? If it means I’m a werewolf, could you please stop with that bad-mouthing? Sure, I may say some incomprehensible things, but it’s only enough to make me dangerously attractive, right?”

Subaru: “Sorry, I’ve got no idea what you’re talking about.”

Showered by questions, Subaru spontaneously let that slip, and clutched his own chest.

When he closed his eyes, he could recall the face of a lovely young girl, and along with that, the faces of everyone who was precious to him. Still, he was certainly aware that the drawer of those recollections was becoming harder to pull out.

This situation could not be allowed to continue for much longer.

Subaru: “Aside from Ceci’s flippant comments, what has gotten you so worried, Tanza? A General of the Empire and a celebrity, is it any wonder that there might be a kid with the nerve to pose as him?"

Tanza: "That may be so, but… Well, I saw Cecilus-sama once before, and I was thinking he looked a lot like him…"

Subaru: "You've seen him before? Ceci?"

Tanza: "I have seen Cecilus Segmunt-sama. He was once sent in to assassinate Yorna-sama."

Tanza explained that she had only seen the real Cecilus.

Hearing this recollection, Subaru also remembered the story he had heard before. As he recalled it, Yorna would every-so-often raise a rebellion against the Emperor, and so time and time again a suppression force would be sent in.

However, now that he knew about Yorna's personality, from Subaru's perspective, that became quite an unexpected impression.

Subaru: "To try to kill Yorna-san, he must've been a really terrible guy…"

Tanza: "That is correct. Cecilus-sama is an atrocious fiend… No, that is not what is important; I am just curious about the fact that, although this Cecilus-sama here and that Cecilus-sama have an age difference, they are like two peas in a pod."

Subaru: "Exactly alike, just with an age difference?"

Tanza: "Yes. —Perhaps he is a sibling of Cecilus-sama."

Hearing what Tanza, who had seen both Ceciluses, spoke of that Cecilus and this fake Cecilus, Subaru fixedly stared at the latter.

He had not considered that possibility. Or rather, it was natural that he had not considered it. Subaru did not know the real Cecilus, so he could not judge whether they were similar or not.

However, it was fortunate that he had a partner who knew the real one. Giving up, the lying fake Cecilus submissively admitted to the lies he himself had told—

Cecilus: “Nono, that’s not correct. I’m an only child, so I don’t have a sibling that looks exactly like me! Of course, it’s possible that my dad made me a younger brother after we separated, but if we’re going by the current flow of the conversation, then he’d be my older brother, wouldn’t he?”

Subaru: “That’s right, but you don’t know when to give up, do you…”

Cecilus: “How very upsetting! But there’s a basis for it, y’know! My basis is that both of those, having an older brother or a younger brother, would be odd.”

He crossed his arms and leaned back as Subaru and Tanza fixedly stared at him. The basis for the fake Cecilus’s offended face, just how persuasive could it be?

For now, in response to Subaru and Tanza, who were eager to listen, prompting him with their eyes,

Cecilus: “The basis is simple. My existence.”

Subaru: “What do you mean?”

Cecilus: “If I had an older brother, then my dad would’ve gotten him killed when he had me! And if I had a younger brother, then it’d be strange if my father hadn’t gotten me killed! In other words, considering I’m alive, there’s no way that an older or younger brother of mine could exist! How’s that?”

Subaru: “…What do you mean?”

It was a theory that did not make sense to him at all, even though he said it with vigor as though it was self-evident.

By his description, it sounded like the fake Cecilus’s father was under some kind of curse to not have more than one child. Whether that was true or false, he felt like a guy who would rather abide by the curse.

As for Subaru, he would like to think that the liar fake Cecilus had piled more lies upon lies.

However—

Subaru: “With him being so brazen about it until now, I’m starting to feel like it’s true. What do you think, Tanza?”

Tanza: “…I would… like to be in accordance with Schwartz-sama’s notion.”

Subaru: “Hmm, that’s a serious responsibility.”

Being relied upon by the reserved Tanza, Subaru put a slender finger to his small chin and pondered.

The fake Cecilus tilted his head as if wondering why they were unable understand him; and yet even if they were to ask him about his family environment, it seemed that no answer would be obtained.

The only thing that mattered here was whether they believed the fake Cecilus or not.

If they did not believe him, it would be the same as it had been thus far; they would just treat the fake Cecilus as a mere boy-who-cried-wolf.

But if they were to believe the fake Cecilus in that he had no siblings, that only left Tanza’s testimony on how very much alike the fake Cecilus and the real Cecilus she spoke of were.

And if he were to fully believe her testimony and the fake Cecilus’s own awareness—

Subaru: “I’m afraid to ask this, Ceci, but perhaps your body has been shrunk?”

It was a prospect he wished to deny if possible, but it was a prospect he could not afford to ignore.

If it had been a pre-shrunken, grown-up Subaru that was here, he might have hesitated to ask so many questions after having put on airs. However, since the Subaru here was a post-shrunken, underdeveloped Subaru, harboring doubts for a long time did not suit him.

Sometimes he would carelessly ask questions with the intention of apologizing were he to offend them by asking.

At that specific question, the fake Cecilus slightly widened his eyes in surprise,

Cecilus: “Are you saying I’ve shrunken? A-ha-ha, you sure say some interesting things, Basu! If there was such an interesting thing as the human body shrinking, wouldn’t that be super fun?!”

Laughing hysterically, the fake Cecilus pat Subaru on the shoulder in a good mood as he spoke those words.

Subaru was very much lost in his remarks as he frowned.

Subaru: “Just, what is it then…?”

Was he playing dumb or not? And if he was playing dumb, was he doing it consciously or unconsciously?

Subaru himself felt that his memories were falling out in large drops due to effects of the infantilization, so it was possible that the fake Cecilus had forgotten all sorts of things for that very reason.

But when compared to Subaru, who still remembered many things, the fake Cecilus had even forgotten that he had been shrunken.

Was such a thing even possible?

If the fake Cecilus had been infantilized the same way Subaru had, was this fake Cecilus’s state of mind how Subaru would end up?

Subaru: “Th-That shitty old man… ! I mean, did Ceci also get smaller because of Olbart-san…?!”

If that were the case, then that would be a major incident—it would become a major incident among the Nine Divine Generals.

The fact that this was also the work of Olbart was a situation that he did not want to think about. But then again, he also did not want to think that anyone other than Olbart was capable of utilizing such an absurd technique.

Naturally, he was tempted to think that Olbart was also the one who had shrunken this fake Cecilus.

Subaru: "Wait wait, in other words, Ceci isn't a fake, but the real deal, so Olbart-san was the one who made the real Ceci smaller, and Ceci's, like, the ruins of what I'll become in the end?"

Tanza: "S-Schwartz-sama, are you alright? You seem to be quite confused…"

Subaru: "…I'm fine. I'm incredibly confused, but it's all coming together incredibly nicely."

The situation was narrowed down to approximately two possibilities in Subaru's mind, although hearing only the thoughts that leaked out of his mouth would sound rather disorganized.

One was that the fake Cecilus was an infantilized version of the real Cecilus Segmunt, dubbed "The Shitty Old Man Olbart" theory.

And the other was that, taking advantage of resembling the real Cecilus, he was true to his nature as a boy-who-cried-wolf and sublimated a lie, dubbed "The Shitty Brat Fake Cecilus" theory.

Subaru: "The shitty brat one and the shitty old man one, let's keep both of them in the back of our minds as we strategize."

Cecilus: "Hoho, that sounds somewhat interesting. May I ask you to tell me more about it?"

Subaru: "No dice. I don't think it'd make sense to talk to you about it, Ceci."

Cecilus: "A-ha-ha! What a cold attitude! That's a rather self-centered thought, but I don't dislike that way of going about things, rather, I quite like it."

Rather than being angry at the cruelty, the fake Cecilus—provisionally, but still the fake Cecilus, that reaction of his was helpful in many ways.

There were already so many things to worry about, so it was valuable to have someone that he did not have to worry about.

Subaru: "For the time being, Tanza, you should also shelve everything about Ceci. Because whether he's real or fake, the fact that he's unreliable won't change."

Tanza: "…Yes, that is correct. Since he is the one who tried to cause harm to Yorna-sama, I personally hold no favorable impressions towards him."

Subaru: "Thank you for being straightforward and honest. Now…"

Having thus reached some sort of conclusion, Subaru switched gears.

Now that they were awake, they were also done occupying the beds in the healing room. They would be heading to the room Tanza had been talking about earlier, the room that had been assigned to these three.

But, before that—

Subaru: "I'd like to feed my very empty stomach. You see, my stomach's been whining miserably for a while now."

So, rubbing his belly, Subaru made a shameless demand of the island he was imprisoned on.

2

—There was a saying that went, "You can't fight a war on an empty stomach".

Beyond this point, the obstacles which Subaru and his Unit would face would all be in the vein of battles. In order to fight them, Subaru's group must be in perfect physical and mental condition, otherwise, in case they were unable to act when push comes to shove, they would be in trouble.

To operate without sparing time for sleep, one should avoid making such a decision so rashly.

Subaru: “Seems to me that before I shrank, since I had more physical strength than I do now, I used to do those kinds of rash things often. I’ll likely get my due desserts if I misunderstand that.”

Such being the case, they wanted to treasure all the eating and sleeping time they could get.

Somehow, it seemed that due to fatigue from the Sparka, he had slept for a whole day; he accepted that as a sufficient rest, and now intended to find a chance to regain his physical strength.

Hence, now that it was time to eat, the fake Cecilus guided them to where they would receive their meals—

???: “…Eat, Schwartz, yer share’s this.”

With a thud, a large platter was placed before his eyes, and Subaru stared in wonder at the sight of the meat on the bone served on that platter.

When Subaru looked up to see what was going on, the brows on the man’s tattoo-riddled face scrunched as if to say “What?”. Though he was making that face, Subaru was actually the one who wanted to say “What?”.

What exactly was he supposed to do when something of this sort was done to him without any explanation?

???: “Weitz, say what you like, but I don’t think that’s going to happen. Look, Schwartz is frozen stiff.”

???: “Ha, are ya tryna say that we ain’t got anythin’ to worry about, huh? To begin with, there’s no need to pile up a mountain of meat for this midget. We’ll split it between us… Owww!”

Weitz: “It’s the portion we’d discussed and settled on for him… And if yer gonna ignore that, why don’t’cha try and convince me…”

As he said this, the tattooed man prodded the lizardman on his side with the fork in his hand. Screaming, the lizardman fled to the other side of the table.

Sighing at that sight, the rust-haired man looked at Subaru with a shrug of his shoulders.

???: “Sorry for all the racket, Schwartz. How’s your body?”

Subaru: “…It feels okay. Same there?”

???: “We’re not badly hurt either. Thanks to… you.”

After rephrasing this, the rust-haired man—Idra, bowed his head slightly toward Subaru.

It was not just Idra. The squabbling tattooed man and lizardman, Weitz and Hiain, raising their hands in surrender, both agreed with Idra by nodding their heads in Subaru’s direction.

Currently, Subaru was in a corner of one of the island’s areas that were open to gladiators, a large hall with tables and chairs, generally used as a dining space.

As soon as he appeared in the hall, Subaru had been immediately grabbed by three people who had come into his sight, and was suddenly brought to one of the tables, being presented with the platter in front of him.

Frankly, it was a dizzying, bizarre situation, and yet,

Subaru: “By any chance, did you save this for me?”

Hiain: “Ahh? What else could it be? Ungrateful brat… Owww!”

Weitz: “Don’t say that like yer taking credit for it, I’ll beat’cha up…”

Hiain: “I didn’t say that, and I’m grateful for what you did, damn it!”

Pointing to the pile of meat on the bone, Subaru had asked a question, resulting in the ensuing altercation.

This could not be called a very smart way to show it, but it seemed to be a sign of appreciation. For a feast like this to be served, Subaru became quite unsure about the way the gladiators were treated.

Subaru: “It’s like, even though you make them kill each other, you let them have their fill of food…?”

???: “Technically, it’s not killing each other, it’s a deathmatch, y’know. Also, Gustav-san’s policy is that should a gladiator die, it should only happen in the gladiatorial arena. Letting them die anywhere other than there’d only prove the incompetence of the management. So you can relax and enjoy your time here.”

Next to Subaru, who tilted his head, sat the fake Cecilus, who had pulled out a chair with great enthusiasm.

Subaru thought he would reach for his plate, given his brazenness, but surprisingly, he did not. Instead, he filled a chipped cup from a jug and took a sip of water.

Tanza: “Everyone believes that Schwartz-sama has done service of utmost greatness. Therefore, we have decided to prepare a treat.”

Subaru: “Tanza… Everyone, is that right?”

Tanza sat in the chair opposite the fake Cecilus, with Subaru in between. While in surprise at Tanza’s words, Subaru looked at the group of three of which Idra was a part of.

Idra nodded deeply at that gaze and said, “Yeah”,

Idra: “As I said before, it’s thanks to you that all of us are safe still. The night we survived the first Sparka, we were treated to a feast for the Unit, and I thought it’d be strange if you didn’t get your share of it.”

Weitz: “For the record, I’m the one who suggested it…”

Hiain: “Heh, tho’ I wasn’t gonna leave any for the brat!”

In turn, they told him why the platter of food had been saved for him. But at the words left behind by Hiain, Tanza next to him tilted her head,

Tanza: “I wonder if that is so. As I recall, I believe it was Hiain-sama who first said that he was uncomfortable eating with only those present.”

Hiain: “Huuuh?! I didn’t say that tho’! I dunno anythin’ ‘bout that tho’! Hey, you lil’ bitch, I won’t tolerate ya sayin’ unreliable shit like that!”

Idra: “Cut that out, Hiain. You can’t beat Tanza. That girl beheaded the Guiltilaw.”

Tanza: “I did indeed behead it.”

As Idra stopped him with a hand, Tanza bowed, and Hiain, unable to retort, concluded it with a “Guh”, and gave up his assault by turning his reptilian face away.

So this was a token of appreciation from all of them, including the not-so-honest lizardman.

Subaru: “I’m grateful, I won’t be shy at all about taking this meal then!”

Cecilus: “Oh, you’re a really gluttonous eater! The way you show your generous acceptance’s also terribly excellent, y’know.”

Weitz: “Don’t overdo it and get a stomachache…”

Subaru: “Don’t worry. I may look like this, but I used to be a famous school food fighter who ate up all the school lunches of those who were absent.”

Getting milk from the kids who would not drink it was a piece of cake, and he also brushed his teeth before breakfast; that was Natsuki Subaru’s school food fighter battle style.

The meat was cold and tough, but its generous seasoning was not that bad, so he couldn’t complain. Above all, it was a treat that everyone had saved for Subaru, and that was the best spice of all.

Yet, as he watched Subaru bite the meat off the bone like that, Weitz turned his pattern-covered face to the side and said, “No…”,

Weitz: “Don’t get any creepy misunderstandings… Not like I’m worried ’bout’cha…”

Subaru: “—? So you’re regretting the piece of meat you gave me now, or something?”

Weitz: “That’s not it either… It’s the deathmatchs…”

Subaru: “…”

Weitz’s words were low and hushed, but the words resonated very profoundly with Subaru.

That very instant, Subaru almost dropped the meat from his hand, but fingers from the fake Cecilus caught it from the side and quickly stuck it in Subaru’s mouth.

Subaru: “Ugguggu…!”

Cecilus: “Relaxrelaxrelax you’re going to choke. Besides, Tattoo-san over there was a little lacking in his words just now. Don’t worry, there won’t be a deathmatch anytime soon.”

Subaru: “Uggu… Is… that right?”

Tanza: “Indeed. Currently, we have not received any notice of that so far. However, we do not know at what time we will be informed of a deathmatch, it seems.”

After finishing off all the meat, leaving only the bone, and pecking the remnants on his plate, he looked at Weitz. Listening to what the fake Cecilus and Tanza had to add, Weitz nodded.

Weitz: “That’s what I said…”

Subaru: “No you didn’t! I thought they were going to make us kill each other soon!”

Idra: “It’s not that harsh a place, indeed. I heard it used to be handled in the way Schwartz was concerned about, until the Island Chief was replaced and the policy changed."

Subaru: "Before the changeover… So since Gustav-san took over?"

Idra nodded in response to the question, as Subaru reached for the next piece of meat.

In his mind, as he was reminded of Gustav's intense face, which did not reveal any emotion at all, Subaru puzzled over what kind of person he was.

He was ruthless enough to suddenly throw Subaru into Sparka as soon as he took a look at the latter after waking up.

He had thought he would be very much something like the violent rules of the cruel Vollachian Empire in person, but from the extent of what he heard, it was not like the gladiators were being forced into seemingly deadly battles straight away.

Subaru: "Or maybe they just like to do it slowly rather than all at once?"

Cecilus: "You can see that I'm not just a "do on a whim" kind of person. In fact, if Basu hadn't woken up, probably only these three here would be in the Unit facing the Sparka. If that'd happened, you'd probably have a much darker look on your face at this dinner party!"

Hiain: "Th-That ain't funny, you know! In the first place, why the hell are you even here?!"

The fake Cecilus laughed at Subaru's words, followed by Hiain pointing and barking back in his face.

Indeed, if one were to ask, it was true. The fake Cecilus was the one who had helped Subaru and Tanza get ashore on the island, but that was the only connection between them.

Idra: "I've heard that every Gladiator here joins a Unit for Sparka at some point or another. After that, depending on their success, they may break up the Unit depending on their performance, but your Unit is…”

Cecilus: “Ah, if you’re worried about my Unit, don’t. Everyone except for me has died, and fortunately I’m already a gladiator who gets allocated solo deathmatches.”

Subaru: “What…?”

Cecilus: “I mean, I’m the strongest! No one can beat me, so you don’t have to worry about me at all, a-ha-ha!”

Subaru and everyone else clammed up as the fake Cecilus slapped his knee.

However, Subaru and Tanza’s reasons for keeping quiet were surely different from the reasons for the other three men. For that matter, both Subaru and Tanza’s were also a bit different at the core.

Idra and others would probably consider the words of the fake Cecilus as a huge lie, while Tanza was suspecting that the fake Cecilus was actually related to the real Cecilus Segmunt.

Then there was Subaru; who was thinking that he may be the shrunken Cecilus Segmunt, which, if true, then the fake Cecilus may still be the strongest even in this state.

If so, it would be very advantageous to have the fake Cecilus on their side—

Cecilus: “—You shouldn’t do that, Basu. Looking at your opponent with such greedy eyes’ll have you be scorned.”

Subaru: “Hahn?”

Cecilus: “A person with the attributes to stand on top and in front, they shouldn’t have that sorta avaricious, pleading look in their eyes. It’s not smart in any way, shape, or form, so you should stop it! If you want to impress me, don’t use words. Use actions, resolve, and a treasured signature catchphrase.”

Saying this, the fake Cecilus advised Subaru, by taking two of the bones from his plate and crossing them in front of his face, forming them into an X symbol.

Having been told something so astute that it was as if the fake Cecilus had read his mind, Subaru gulped down his saliva.

And then—

Subaru: "…You said it wasn't about words, but if a signature catchphrase is needed, then you need words too, right."

Cecilus: "Heyyy, that's true! That was quite sloppy! Just what has struck me, out of all people?!"

With wide-open eyes, the fake Cecilus leaned heavily against the back of his chair and then leaned forward as if being pushed forward. Subaru stiffened as his face suddenly got close to him; seeing that, the fake Cecilus shaped his whole face into a massive grin.

Cecilus: "Well then, sorry for interrupting you. I've also got a lotta matters to attend to, people to talk to, and ways to pass the time, so I'll leave you here for now. Don't worry, I'll be in the other room next to you, so if there's anything you still need to talk about, you'll have to go there!"

Subaru: "Ah, um, roger that."

Cecilus: "Rawjur? I don't know what that is, but it sounds rather gallant! Well then, roger that!"

While making a slight misinterpretation, the fake Cecilus raised his hand and ran off before there was time to stop him.

Although there had been no reason to stop him, Subaru was shocked at the lightning-fast speed with which he had left.

In actuality, he wasn't so much of a hindrance that he could be called an obstacle; as he just wanted to have someone around who knew the ins and outs of the Gladiator Island.

Subaru: "Well, it gets tiring hearing him speak roughly five times the amount of information I actually want."

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama, please continue your meal.”

Subaru: “Ah, yeah, that’s right. I’ve got to get my strength back.”

No matter what Gustav was thinking, he had no intention of staying quiet until the next deathmatch was assigned.

In the first place, he had no intention of staying here as a gladiator for very long. His goal was to take Tanza and get off the island today or tomorrow.

Worst-case scenario, they could become hostile to Gustav.

However, if they did that—

Hiain: “What’s up, Schwartz?”

Subaru: “Umm, I was just wondering if you guys were worried. Can you do this without me?”

Hiain: “Ah? The hell ya talkin’ ’bout? Ya’re not thinkin’ of runnin’ away, are ya? If that’s the case then return the meat, the meat!”

Hiain opened his big mouth to yell at the anxious-looking Subaru.

Although they had every right to be angry, Subaru had people who were more important to him than they were. Should he consider leaving with not only Tanza, but also the other three together?

Subaru: “…Rather, maybe everyone on the Island could escape?”

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama?”

Subaru: “Ah, sorrysorry, I was just talking to myself. As you’d expect, that was just some rambling.”

It was a troubling idea that he couldn’t let other people hear carelessly, even if he was just talking to himself under his breath.

However, Weitz, Idra, Hiain, and of course Subaru and Tanza had been forced to come to the Gladiator Island despite the fact that they did not want to participate in the deathmatches here.

If that was the case for the other people as well, then surprisingly, perhaps Subaru's idea was not as ridiculous as one might think.

And, just as Subaru was thinking that.

???: "So you've finally woken up, kid."

???: "That Sparka the other day, that was a helluva big deal, ya know!"

???: "I screwed up by not goin' to watch it. I only got to hear rumors about this and that afterwards, man."

People gathered around Subaru as he reached for the meat on his plate.

The men who spoke to Subaru in such a friendly manner were all men who looked like they had a reason for being there—even without a detailed explanation, he was sure they were all gladiators.

Newcomers to the great hall and those who had been watching Subaru and his comrades from a distance both gathered there, creating a bit of a buzz around Subaru.

Subaru: "Uhm, you all are?"

???: "Can't you tell just by lookin'? We're your precursors on this island. You guys had quite the hectic and not-at-all borin' Sparka!!"

The men started laughing around Subaru, whose eyes widened in surprise.

Only, they didn't say it in a mocking tone, but in a genuinely complimentary way. Incidentally, while being surrounded by them, Idra had a forced smile, Hiain looked uncomfortable, and Weitz sulked silently.

Gladiator: "That girl's entrance at the end was a sight to behold. She's a lot stronger than she looks."

Tanza: "Thank you very much. It is all thanks to the grace of those who love me."

Gladiator: "Oh? I see. I don't quite get it, but that was a good deathmatch!"

Not getting too deep into what the bowing Tanza said, were the perfectly open-minded large men. While they talked about how Subaru and his team fought in Sparka with their every gesture,

Gladiator: "However, it's a big deal. That Gladiator Beast… That shadow lion's taken out a lot of Units."

Another Gladiator: "If you guys'd been taken out, I think the total number of Units knocked out by that thing would've been ten. The recent Sparkas continue to be rough."

Gladiator: "That's surely what Governor Gustav wants. Once you're welcomed as a Gladiator, you're gonna be treated well, as the entrance's the toughest part… The next shows're gonna be scary."

There was no shortage of topics to discuss as they raucously talked about the situation on Ginunhive. Subaru nodded along, urging each of them to continue while he collected information on the island.

It seemed that ever since Gustav had become the Island Chief, the policy had also become much different from before after all. Also, that lion seemed to be rather strong, and Subaru and the others who won were now rated highly.

Subaru: "I see, so it was worth all the hard work on our part… Shows, you say?"

Gladiator: "Yeah, we have regular shows here where nobles from all over the Empire get together and make a spectacle out of our deathmatches. Sparka and daily deathmatches are all trainin' for the real deal!"

Subaru: "Training…"

Gladiator: "Dyin' during practice won't be any good. The Governor knows that. If you work hard, you won't get any reprimands… Ah, there's an exception."

Subaru: "An exception?"

Subaru tilted his head at the sight of the strong, muscular man with a fierce look stroking his nose as if he'd had trouble saying that.

He was silent for a moment, then sighed deeply and continued,

Strong Gladiator: "I hate to tell you this 'cause you get along so well with him, but don't associate with that guy."

Subaru: "And that guy, would be…?"

Thinking of the strong man's phrasing and the one absent, there was only one person who fell under this category.

Subaru continued with a "Could it be..?",

Subaru: "You don't mean Ceci? If anything, he's following me…"

Strong Gladiator: "Yeah, he seems to have taken a likin' to you, but how much can you count on that? —He came here only twenty days ago."

Subaru: "Mhm."

Strong Gladiator: "At his first Sparka, he did nothing and watched as his Unit was annihilated, and once his allies were gone, he killed the Gladiator Beast with his bare hands, effortlessly!"

Subaru: "…"

Strong Gladiator: "After that, every time he was assigned a deathmatch, he had the nerve to cheer his opponent on 'til all others were dead. And, for some reason, he calls himself by the name of General First-Class Cecilus Segmunt."

As he spoke, the strong man looked at the entrance to the hall with a mixture of heartfelt suspicion on his face and in his voice. The entrance that the fake Cecilus—Cecilus Segmunt, had exited through just a moment before.

And it was not just the strong face speaking directly to Subaru that possessed such eyes.

Save for Subaru’s Unit comrades, who did not know of him, the same held true for everyone present.

He was a man who was friendly to Subaru, who had displayed his incomprehensibly narrative-driven brain to the point of having him fed up, who had tried asking Subaru, when he was dying, about his final will and testament, and who was fiercely disliked by the Gladiators, who were living side-by-side with death.

That was—

Strong Gladiator: “—Governor Gustav and that Death God are the central figures in the current Gladiator Island’s irregularities.”

Chapter 66:
Hiain Yatz

1

—Life on Gladiator Island Ginunhive, was not that bad for Subaru.

Subaru's performance during the Sparka event had been well received by the gladiators competing on the Gladiator Island, apparently. And so, where he went, he would receive the same reception he had gotten in that large hall.

Even in an environment where one would be forced to fight, the way of the Vollachian Empire remained unchanged.

Therefore, it seemed that the principle of the strong being valued was valid all the same, and the Sparka performed by Subaru and the others of the Unit suited said principle well.

???: "Even though he's just a scrawny brat, he's got grit."

That seemed to be the common assessment of Subaru.

It must have been quite amusing to them that Subaru, a child who could be throttled with one hand if such was one's wish, had put up a good fight against the lion Gladiator Beast.

The fact that Subaru seemed to be just an ordinary child for his age, in opposition to the fake Cecilus, his age the same as Subaru's, was perhaps helping this impression. Conversely, the fake Cecilus's reputation was just that bad.

Cecilus: "I guess what I really want to say is that I'm just living my life as myself, so I really don't care what everyone around me thinks of me. After all, none of you will be able to complain once you see the results. Oh, I don't mean physical results, but emotional ones."

Give or take, that had been his reaction at the time he overheard his reputation from the people around him.

He had already sensed that was the case in some way, but the fake Cecilus had no desire to change his way of being, nor did he care to live in accordance with the people around him.

He possessed a strong will to stick to his beliefs, and the strength to carry that through—both of which affirmed the fake Cecilus's outlandish ego.

And, as per the rules of the Gladiator Island and the Empire both, that was acceptable.

Idra: "But, being loathed for it isn't really beneficial. We cannot survive on the Island alone, because we are a Unit."

Weitz: "So yer saying that in there lies the power to survive, that so… Guessing from that brat's uncontrollable behavior, he seems to be confident in his way too…"

Hiain: "Tch, what a weirdo, it ain't any of our business. I mean, dealin' with these two creepy lil' brats is plenty enough."

That was the impression the Unit's members had of the fake Cecilus.

It might have sounded harsh, but it was an entirely natural thought. To begin with, unless they were very strong and in a safe place, all gladiators would struggle so they could survive day-in and day-out.

That was the norm, hence why they were left them with little time to care about the people around them.

Subaru: "Well, I do have a problem with Hiain treating us like creepy little brats, but what do you think, Tanza? About Ceci."

Tanza: "To me, it matters not. More importantly, Schwartz-sama…"

Subaru: "Yeah?"

Tanza: "—Schwartz-sama, do you really intend to leave this place?"

Having been asked this all of a sudden, her voice sounding half-exasperated and half-reproachful, Subaru's eyes widened as he turned around and mindlessly let out a "Huh?".

In the communal room given to the gladiators—a space that could be called a shared cell, Tanza, Subaru's roommate, furrowed her smooth eyebrows and took in a breath in a way that was almost dramatic.

Tanza: "This is not the moment for huh'ing. I see that Schwartz-sama has been having a good time with all of the gladiators over the past few days, but do you remember the plan you had at the beginning?"

Subaru: "The plan at the beginning…?"

Tanza: "—Hk, you were thinking of leaving the Island and returning to Chaosflame."

For a moment, Tanza's voice became voice towards Subaru's words that were as if he had no clue as to what she was alluding to.

And with that, the girl took her eyes off Subaru and prefaced with "My apologies", before continuing,

Tanza: "I was intending to follow Schwartz-sama's plan if possible. But if Schwartz-sama is not working proactively, then everything changes. I must rendezvous with Yorna-sama."

Subaru: "…"

Tanza: "Even now, I still do not know anything on what happened after Chaosflame, only that Yorna-sama is safe and sound, as evidenced by her continued love for me…"

As she stated this, Tanza touched her own right eye.

What this gesture meant was the change Subaru had witnessed in the residents of the Demon City—the same blaze within the eyes of those under the effect of Yorna's Soul Marriage Technique.

Beheading the lion in a single stroke was certainly not something Tanza could do naturally. It meant that the power given by Yorna's favor towards her, was still in play.

Subaru: "That means Yorna-san is well, doesn't it?"

Tanza: "…Physically. But, I do not know if she is well in heart."

Subaru: "That's… Well, yeah. Because Yorna-san treasured everyone in the city…"

Because she was too kind, she had been treated as a traitor on multiple occasions for failing to follow the policies of the Empire.

Subaru believed he somewhat grasped Yorna's circumstances and the feelings of Tanza and everyone else protected by Yorna's ideals.

So, it was understandable why Tanza wished to go back to Yorna right away.

Subaru: "But, you can't rush that. You can't get what you want by scrambling in the dark."

Tanza: "But! I cannot afford to be as leisurely as you, Schwartz-sama!"

Subaru: "L-leisurely…"

Tanza: "Correct. I thought you were walking around the Island looking for a way to escape for the past two days, but it turns out you were chatting with your Unit and with other gladiators…"

Using her fingers to count, Tanza criticized Subaru's behavior over the prior couple of days.

Indeed, for two days, all Subaru had been doing was talking to people. Not looking for a way to escape or figuring out how to work the only drawbridge that connected to the outside world.

Sometimes he would spend time with Weitz and the other people in his Unit, but he gave precedence to learning the rules of the Gladiator Island, as well as other interesting tidbits of information from those who had been on the Island for a longer time.

Those were very leisurely actions in Tanza's eyes, and perhaps it looked as if Subaru had been preparing to make the Island his home until his death.

But if that were the case—

Subaru: “That’s absolutely wrong, Tanza. I also have someone I want to see as much as Tanza wants to see Yorna-san. I absolutely have to get out of here.”

Tanza: “…Say, are those the people who were with you?”

Subaru: “That’s true with the exception of Abel, and there are others… In a big walled city. And also in the country next door to the Empire. I’ve been very busy, y’know.”

Tanza: “…”

Once Subaru replied that he had others he wanted to meet both there and elsewhere, Tanza fell silent.

Perhaps she was thinking that her singular love for Yorna was greater than Subaru’s love for multiple people, but she did not state that out loud.

That alone was enough to understand how earnest she was. One could only admire Yorna’s dedication to her education, had she been the one to teach her so many things.

Subaru: “Still, I probably can use my head better than you.”

Tanza: “—? What is that supposed to mean…?”

And something happened right when Tanza tilted her head at Subaru’s words.

???: “—Basu! The drawbridge’s going up! New people have just arrived!”

As he raised a boisterous shout, the fake Cecilus came running down the corridor and appeared before them. Tanza’s shoulders jumped at the intensity and loudness of his voice, but Subaru’s reaction was the exact opposite.

Exclaiming “Here they are!” as he leapt up on the spot, he continued, Subaru: “That’s a lot faster than I’ve heard it is, is this the usual pace?”

Cecilus: “Nah, like I told you, the latest Sparka, your group’s, was an exception. All but the three members in Basu’s Unit failed in their escape and ended up at the bottom of the lake… So, Basu and his team made up for the lack of manpower in a hurry.”

Subaru: “Ah, I see.”

As the fake Cecilus had said with a shrug of his shoulder, the previous Sparka had been held with irregularities.

The gladiator candidates who were originally supposed to enter the Gladiator Island with Weitz and the others, had attempted to escape en masse before arriving onto the Island proper. However this had ended up failing miserably, resulting in their carriage overturning. All of those who had escaped from the drawbridge into the lake then became food for aquatic Witchbeasts.

As a result, the Sparka had not been held for Weitz and the others as there were not enough members, and was going to be postponed until the number necessary to form a Unit was replenished, but—.

Subaru: “So back then, when Tanza and I came in, Weitz and the others must have been really down, huh.”

New recruits meant that they had to undergo Sparka, and not only that, Subaru and Tanza were the ones joining—and Tanza was unconscious.

Essentially, with the inclusion of one child with nasty eyes, it was a four-man Sparka.

All three must have thought it was the unluckiest day of their lives.

Subaru: “However, it was actually the luckiest day of their lives.”

Cecilus: “Oh, you have a very nice, confident look on your face. So, Basu, what do you want to do now?”

Subaru: “Yeah, I’m going to check out the drawbridge. I’d like to talk to some of the people from outside as well.”

Cecilus: “That might be a lil’ difficult. I think this Sparka’ll start rather early in comparison to last time, so you may not get a chance to meet them.”

Subaru: “I see… It’s tricky, but if that’s the case, there are ways to make it work.”

With Subaru answer that while putting his hand on his chin, the fake Cecilus raised his eyebrows in response.

His interest, or perhaps his favorable impression of Subaru’s reply, was easily understandable from his reaction. His personality was the type of having trouble keeping secrets, but still someone they had to keep their guard up against.

There were few people in this world who could kill a person regardless of how much they liked them.

The rumored personality of the fake Cecilus on the Island was enough to make Subaru treat him as if he were a ticking bomb.

Of course, too much apprehension would only shorten the fuse, so finding the right balance was a good idea.

Anyhow—

Subaru: “Finally, there seems to be some progress. Tanza, what do you think?”

Tanza: “No, well, what do you mean? Are you and Segmunt-sama plotting something?”

Cecilus: “It’s nothing of that kind! I wasn’t told anything of Basu’s thoughts, and even if I was, it wasn’t anything big. He simply told me to inform him when the drawbridge was about to be raised. Everything planned afterwards, is inside Basu’s head, y’know!”

Tanza: “…Schwartz-sama?”

Seeing that there was no information to be gained from a Cecilus displaying himself as having not the slightest clue, Tanza's gaze turned to Subaru, as if to accuse him of hiding something from her. Although, Subaru had no intention of hiding anything from her.

Though, it was his intention to move rather cautiously.

Subaru: "For now, let's talk while we go check out the drawbridge. We'd all be stupid to miss it."

With Tanza looking as if she wanted to say something and the amused fake Cecilus in tow, Subaru left the common room and headed for the upper level of the Island, from where he could see the drawbridge. Atop the Island, gladiators were allowed a great deal of freedom in their activities, and except for those whose behavior was abhorrent on a daily basis, they were not restricted in any way aside for when they would go to bed or had their deathmatches.

There were certain rules when to bath or eat, which apparently needed to be followed, but it was a far cry from what he had imagined, which had been the life of a slave or an inmate in a prison.

The Gladiator Island had a gladiatorial arena at the center of the Island, which became the stage where grand events were held for the likes of spectators from outside the Island. As such, and because the gladiatorial arena and its surroundings were what the outsiders would be seeing, it was decorated in a rather flashy and stand-out style.

On the other hand, the rest of the gladiator's free-living spaces were simple, so, with the exception of the bare minimum facilities essential for living, the Island felt "gray" as a whole.

Subaru: "But there's also the healing room, and there's also a library, isn't it?"

Tanza: "It is said that they began taking in books ever since Governor Gustav became the Island Chief. Surprisingly, I hear that it has become the place where everyone spends their relaxation time together."

Subaru: “Yeah, there were a lot of books. Though it’d be nice if I could also read them.”

Whilst nodding at Tanza’s description, Subaru scratched his temple with his finger.

The letters of this world, which Subaru had supposedly studied, seemed to have been kicked out of his brain right after it was shrunk, so he could only read and understand them falteringly.

He remembered some bits vaguely, so it was not impossible to decipher them were he to try hard enough, but he had to use his mind like he was on a treasure hunt just to read a single page.

Subaru: “If nee-sama knew about this, she’d be extremely upset with me…”

The person who had given Subaru the most help in studying the letters was nee-sama—Ram. And so, were she to become aware of Subaru’s current predicament, she would be very angry.

Even discounting that, he had left Rem by herself. He was sure that Ram would be angry upon learning that. As for that, Subaru too wanted her to get mad at him.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama?”

Subaru: “—In order for us to get off this Island, there are two things which will become our obstacles. One of them is the drawbridge that connects the Island to the other side of the river.”

Tanza: “…Yes, I am aware of it.”

The stage was for the purpose of running the gladiatorial arena, which was built on the Island in the center of the lake.

As half of it came from the Island side, and the other half from the riverbank side, the drawbridge could not be crossed unless it was suspended from both sides. It was problematic, because it was usually raised so that it could not be crossed.

Cecilus: “That’s why it’s usually lowered. It’s raised only when needed.”

Subaru: “That still doesn’t make sense to me, no matter how many times you tell me. That’s why I want to see the real thing.”

Although the tone of Cecilus’s voice was as if he was speaking to someone who just did not want to listen, at any rate, within Subaru the image of the drawbridge was without a doubt that of one bridge divided into two from the middle, with each side causing the bridge to withdraw.

Naturally, according to that image the drawbridge would be “lowered”.

Tanza: “Then, Schwartz-sama, the second obstacle is…”

Sweeping away the conceptual image in Subaru’s mind, Tanza inquired as to the direction of the conversation. At those words, Subaru let out an “Uh huh” and took a short breath, then,

Subaru: “Needless to say, it’s the curse rule. The one Gustav says is placed on all the gladiators.”

Tanza: “…”

As the ends of her gentle eyebrows lowered, Tanza made a complicated face.

Naturally, she would have understood the issue without even being told—it was the curse rule.

A curse mark was bestowed upon all the gladiators on the Gladiator Island, and it was activated on those who broke the curse rule, dispossessing them of their lives. That was the main reason why Gustav continued to reign as the absolute ruler of the Gladiator Island, as Governor.

No one could defy Gustav; defying him would cost one of their life.

Even if one did not defy him, as long as the curse mark was not removed, one did not know when their life would be terminated for violating the curse rule.

How to remove it, and the details of the curse rule, nobody except Gustav himself knew.

Subaru: “If you ask me what I’m scared of, that’d be that I don’t know the detailed rules. I could just be spending my time normally, and then inadvertently violate them and die without realizing it.”

Cecilus: “Well, from what I know there was that sorta unease when Gustav first became Governor, but lately, that unease seems to have faded away for the most part. That said, it seems like Gustav doesn’t want to reduce the number of gladiators all silly-nilly, so it’s a relief that he’s declared what should never be done.”

Subaru: “Declared… So that’d be stuff like, “Do not defy the guards” and “Fighting amongst fellow gladiators outside of deathmatches is prohibited” and “Do not flee from this Island without permission”, and so on.”

Cecilus: “Yupyup.”

Subaru: “—As I thought, the last one there is the problem.”

For maintaining the rules for living on the Island, Gustav had imposed the curse rule.

Nevertheless, it was true that this was in direct conflict with Subaru’s and Tanza’s objectives.

Subaru: “Aside from less-than-upright methods, there are other ways to break the curse rule and quit being a gladiator, right?”

Cecilus: “Yeah, there certainly are. That specific case’d be the large-scale show that they hold once a year. His Excellency the Emperor is invited, and it’s the famous reward for the deathmatch they hold in his presence. There’s also other ways, such as someone in the audience spending lots of money to take you out. Therefore, the gladiators also need to look good, meaning a necessity to charm them with magnificent beauty emerges.”

Subaru: “…For some reason or another, my mental image is that of gladiators.”

That was something that resembled the so-called gladiators from the Roman Empire.

He did not know much about the details, but it had a nuance along the lines of a slave that was made to fight with a sword, which could be said to be literally the same position as the gladiators of the Island.

He had heard that there was a person, seemingly a famous gladiator of old, who had brought about a rebellion alongside the other gladiators, but—

Subaru: “What I want to do is escape, not rebel, so I’m thinking more like a great prison escape.”

What could become a hint, would be the patterns of those who have escaped from prison.

However, knowledge of such movies and manga was also rather hazy within Subaru. It seemed that they would not be able to utilize that with things as they were, so Subaru still had to find the right answer.

Subaru: “Whatever the case, for the sake of getting off of the Island we have to do something about these two things, the drawbridge and the curse rule. For that reason as well, it is absolutely essential that we go observe the drawbridge, got it?”

Tanza: “…I concur. Still, that does not explain why Schwartz-sama was taking his time relaxedly up until the drawbridge moved.”

Subaru: “You sure are holding that against me…”

Responding to Tanza’s intent gaze, Subaru scratched his head as he made a troubled face.

While they were talking like that, the three of them headed to the vantage point they sought. Halfway up the mountain that got taller as it approached the center of the Island, a balcony had been built in a position that overlooked half of the lake.

Rather than a balcony, it was more accurate to call it an observation deck, but there were a few other people in attendance besides Subaru and the other two. The other gladiators seemed to have come here as curious onlookers.

Amongst the ranks of the onlookers, a figure suddenly turned and waved to Subaru and the others.

???: “That’s Schwartz, ain’t it? What’re ya doin’ here?”

Subaru: “Oh, Hiain, you’re here as well. Just looking at the goods?”

Hiain: “As if I could be doin’ somethin’ like that…! I’d heard the next sacrifices were on their way, that’s why.”

Averting his eyes, the lizardman Hiain was unable to continue with the rest of the words.

As a member of the same Unit as Subaru, contrary to his cocksure attitude, he was quite timid. He was not a bad person, but on the other hand his character was not something to be openly praised.

Even that excuse just now had not fully dispelled any part of that purpose of “looking at goods”.

Tanza: “Hiain-sama, did you want to take a look at the people who are coming next?”

Hiain: “Urgh…”

Tanza: “If you do not want to tell me, it does not particularly bother me, however.”

At the reserved Tanza’s question, Hiain curled his big mouth and hesitated to answer. But with the silence immediately becoming unbearable, Hiain said “That’s right!” with a trembling voice.

Resting his elbows on the railing, while scowled at the lake below, he spoke,

Hiain: “I wanted to see the faces of the guys comin’ here next. Is that wrong?”

Subaru: “That’s not wrong, but for what reason? Since you survived the Sparka, it’d be inconsiderate to come here to check if the next group of incomers can survive Sparka, or something of the sort.”

Hiain: “Like I’d do somethin’ that evil…! I ain’t sayin’ there aren’t guys like that tho’.”

I am different, and with that, Hiain denied Subaru’s suspicions.

He had decided to trust that answer for the moment. Subaru also earnestly understood that Hiain was not a bad guy, he was just a scaredy-cat. He also was the one that seemed to be the least accustomed to the rules of this Gladiator Island.

Hiain: “…So, why’d you guys come?”

Subaru: “We aren’t just looking at the goods, nor are we curious onlookers. Of course, we’re interested in the people they’re bringing this time around, but we want to see the drawbridge.”

Hiain: “Ya wanna see the bridge? What are ya, a brat…? Wait, ya really are a brat, ain’t’cha?!”

Subaru: “No, that’s right, and you sure talk loud.”

Subaru’s lips curved due to Hiain recklessly speaking very loudly, perhaps to cover up his own feelings. As he then stood alongside him, they looked over the lake below.

Albeit the sun was still high in the sky, the area around the Gladiator Island was faintly darkened by an overcast sky.

For some reason, it seemed the clouds in the area never seemed to clear up, and he had heard that the overcast sky was present all year round. Based on how the sky looked, this was a place that darkened people’s spirits.

Cecilus: “Well, there are a considerable number of people who enjoy that kinda environment, I rather like it.”

Subaru: “That’s surprising. I thought Ceci’d be a big fan of sunny days… But, you do call yourself “lightning”, so it’s possible you don’t care if it’s cloudy.”

Cecilus: “I see, it’s not something I ever cared much about, but now that you mention it…”

Shrugging his shoulders at the fake Cecilus, who put his hand over his mouth as his eyes gleamed at the surprising revelation, Subaru and the others lined up in front of the railing, waiting for the drawbridge in question to be raised.

Then, not too long after—

Subaru: “Oh, ohhh—!”

At first, the rattling sound of gears and mechanical parts moving could be heard from somewhere.

His thought was that it had to utilize the same mechanism the iron fence at the gladiatorial arena used to spring up, but the drawbridge’s was on a scale a world apart. After all, not constructing a bridge of tremendous length would not do, so, from what it seemed, they’d had to balance that with turning either large gears, or a large number of gears.

Before Subaru’s eyes, slowly, the drawbridge “rose”—.

Subaru: “…”

What had appeared so, so slowly, was the drawbridge that had been submerged deep within the lake.

Just like how the fake Cecilus had corrected him about it many times, moving in conjunction with the mechanism of rotating gears, it “rose” out of the lake to reveal itself.

Rather than lowering a drawbridge that had been raised, they “raised” a drawbridge that had been submerged.

In precise terms, it was not one singular bridge that was brought up, but multiple connected bridges that emerged from the bottom of the lake, apparently structured to form a single bridge. Once the bridge, divided into multiple sections, was lifted to the same level, it was then connected together to become one, which was completed while a large quantity of water was drained from it.

That very mechanism was also in operation on the river bank side, and so the drawbridge would also rise on the opposite bank. The two drawbridges raised in that way would then become one, releasing the Gladiator Island from its isolation for a limited time.

Subaru: “The thing that’s moving that bridge is…”

Cecilus: “There’s a tower that controls the drawbridge, so it’s pretty much operated in that tower, y’know. I’ve never actually been inside, so I don’t know what to expect.”

Subaru: “—Inside the control tower.”

As far as a bridge of that scale went, it would probably be difficult to raise and lower it covertly.

That said, crossing the lake in something like a small boat was also impeded by the presence of the Witchbeasts in the water. It seemed that his thinking was still insufficient to provide a realistic means of escape.

Tanza: “…Likely, that is the carriage carrying the next people.”

Beside the pondering Subaru, Tanza muttered that while looking towards the opposite shore.

Pulling a single carriage, a large sable Galewind Horse slowly crossed the drawbridge. The Galewind Horse appeared to be an army horse equipped with armor, and it seemed quite tough at a glance.

Guarding that carriage, positioned around it, were soldiers, riding something smaller than the Galewind Horse. It seemed that they were worried about the carriage overturning like last time, so their vigilance was increased.

Cecilus: “Oh, it’s Gustav-san. Looks like he’s coming in person.”

On the other side of the drawbridge, a group was waiting for the carriage to arrive. Among the guards in their black uniforms, Gustav stood, his extraordinarily large chest puffed out.

Was this also a precaution against the last time the carriage overturned? Or, considering it was Gustav, he would have been present regardless.

Subaru: “It’s a little over a kilometer to the other side of the river, maybe no more than two kilometers…?”

It was hard to tell because it was quite a distance away, although the distance of the drawbridge appeared to be more or less what he had guessed.

Even with the mechanism that allowed them to divvy up the weight of the bridge, a drawbridge of such length was unimaginable. Even if magic or some other special magical tool had been used as a basis, it was still quite a feat.

And so, as he was checking the state of his target, the drawbridge—

Hiain: “Ah—?!”

Hiain, who like Subaru and the others had been looking at the drawbridge, exclaimed, his voice cracking.

—No, he was not looking at the drawbridge, but at the carriage coming across. The carriage pulled by a huge Galewind Horse had finished crossing the drawbridge, the people inside exiting.

These were the people who would be handed over to Gustav as gladiators, or, more correctly, as candidates to be gladiators. Hiain’s eyes widened at the sight of these faces.

Hiain: “Those idiots… Ya ended up gettin’ caught…!”

With both hands covering his face, Hiain stared down below him through the gaps between his large, webbed fingers.

Upon laying eyes on the new faces, Subaru understood the meaning of his words. The people brought in were all much like Hiain—lizardmen. Although the color of their scales suggested that they were possibly of a different ethnic group, they could still be broadly categorized as such.

And Hiain's reaction was in response to knowing who they were.

Hiain: "…Even tho' ya went as far as to use me as bait to get away."

Subaru narrowed his eyes at Hiain, who muttered to himself bitterly.

During Sparka, when he had tried again and again to get to know Hiain and the others who had participated alongside him, he had been told the circumstances that had brought Hiain to the Gladiator Island.

He had told Subaru that he had been made to play a decoy with his ability to change the color of his scales and blend in, and that he had been used as a sacrificial pawn to buy time for his friends to escape from slavers.

That said, from Hiain's response, it was clear that they—

Subaru: "They're the ones who used you as bait, huh."

Hiain: "Guh…"

Tanza: "Hiain-sama…"

Hiain's expression changed once Subaru spoke his words, which made Tanza look at him with concern. Although Tanza was probably not fond of him, she probably held sympathy for a person with whom she had exchanged words.

But, once he saw that boy and that girl gazing at him Hiain sniffled "He", and.

Hiain: "S-serves 'em right! Endin' up makin' fools out of yerselves 'cause ya took advantage of me! After all the pain they caused me… Ridiculous!"

Cecilus: "Hmmm."

Hiain: “Wh-What, ya got a problem or somethin’?!”

The fake Cecilus closed one eye at Hiain’s words, the latter lashing out angrily, his mouth distorted, at the former. When Hiain recklessly snapped at him in response, the fake Cecilus shook his head, “No, no”,

Cecilus: “I’m not criticizing you. I was just surprised and impressed at the same time, because it was just a mediocre statement by a mediocre character who exists just to be beaten.”

Hiain: “I’m a character who exists just to be beaten…?”

Cecilus: “What else can I say? This is something I’ve been thinking about for quite a bit, but why do all these people who are supposed to be side characters always blurt out things that make them sound like they are side characters? Why don’t they just read one of those picture books, and understand how foolish it all sounds?”

In front of Hiain, whose voice trembled, the fake Cecilus clasped his hands up high together.

With a dry sound, the fake Cecilus drew the attention of those around him to himself,

Cecilus: “Look around and see for yourselves. I haven’t read every story I can find of the past and the present and of every location, but if you read ones that catch your eye from cover to cover, you’ll find that that there are many members to their cast. The famous ones say and do things worthy of their renown, and those who aren’t say and do things that are worthy of their stupidity. And this applies to reality outside pictures book more than you might think.”

Hiain: “Wh-What the fuck are ya talkin’ ‘bout…?”

Cecilus: “Weak people say things that seem weak! Strong people say things that seem strong! The leading actors say the coolest things, and the minor characters whisper in a voice that’s hard to hear! Oh, it’s all so bizarre and strange, don’t you think?”

Hiain: “…”

Cecilus: “Why are y’all so eager to play the smallest roles out of your own will? We’re all actors who need to live out our own lives. Of course, the lead actor can only be me.”

Keeping their gazes focused on him, the fake Cecilus lightly tapped on the ground under his zori, focusing not only their gazes but also their hearing all towards himself.

And—

Cecilus: “Why don’t you think things over before you say anything? That statement makes you sound kinda like a small fry who’s about to die.”

Hiain: “—Hk.”

Hiain swallowed as the fake Cecilus brought his face closer to him, staring at him from below.

With a smile on his face despite Hiain’s reaction, the fake Cecilus swiftly backed away. But Hiain seemed to be afraid of the fake Cecilus’s eyes, and found himself panting.

And with that, Hiain turned his back to run away from the fake Cecilus, and—

Subaru: “Hiain.”

Hiain: “What?! Leave me alone! The only time I’m getting involved with’cha is when we’re together as a Unit, and…”

Subaru: “What about those people down there? I thought they were your companions.”

Subaru stopped Hiain as he was about to leave, asking him a question. Hearing Subaru’s words, Hiain exhaled with a “Ha!”,

Hiain: “It’s as I said! They used me as bait and after that, they fucked up! I don’t give a shit ‘bout those idiots!”

Subaru: “—But, when you dropped that bag down the cliff, they shared their food with you, didn’t they?”

Hearing Subaru's words, Hiain's eyes widened with an "Ah".

To Hiain's astonishment, Subaru continued with "More than that",

Subaru: "They helped you get away from bandits, and when you couldn't start a fire, they did it for you… The last thing you remember about them might be a bad memory, but…"

Hiain: "…"

Subaru: "It's too lonely to think that the last thing you saw of them makes up everything about those people."

There was the saying that a person would show their true colors in extreme circumstances.

How ridiculous, Subaru wanted to say as to tell him to discard that logic.

It was ridiculous to assume that, when a person was placed in an extraordinary, uncontrollable situation, the actions they took there would determine everything about them.

Then, would what Hiain, Weitz, and Idra had done during Sparka be their true colors?

Would Subaru think they were a scaredy-cat, a coward, and a fraud… And that all that was all there was to them?

There were moments they would cooperate with Subaru without running away, without outsmarting them, without deceiving them, and that was why they were all here together like this, having narrowly escaped from death.

That was why—

Subaru: "If you talk to them, you might get a different story."

Even Subaru had been unable to love the people who he now loved from the get-go.

He had also seen the less pleasant sides of those people. Still, Subaru wanted to like everyone. And Subaru believed himself to not be the sole unique person in this regard.

Hiain: "…Ya're a creepy lil' brat. Always talkin' like ya know it all."

At Subaru's appeal, Hiain muttered something that sounded spiteful.

From his point of view, it had to be quite sickening, to be told a story that he did not remember telling Subaru. And yet, with a face portraying a thought that preceded the eeriness he felt,

Hiain: "They'll never get past Sparka. So, it's impossible."

With that, Hiain walked away from his perch, this time without stopping.

But did he realize it? Hiain's answer did not come from his feelings at that moment, but was merely an excuse as to why he could not do those things. Because the situation would become even more suffocating.

Did he realize that, if the circumstances changed, that excuse would no longer be tenable—?

Tanza: "Schwartz-sama, I am sorry to hear about Hiain-sama and his acquaintances, but…"

As Hiain turned away, Tanza gently touched Subaru's sleeve. Her round eyes were shimmering with impatience, accompanied with sympathy.

Out of the obstacles they had to overcome, one of them was the drawbridge. Because she had seen the bridge with her own two eyes, it must have strengthened her resolve to escape the Island.

Naturally, for Tanza, getting off this Island was much, much more important to her than Hiain's feelings. Of course, it was the same for Subaru.

Subaru also had things that were important to him, and things that he wanted to prioritize.

There was no need to compare Hiain with what Subaru had encountered in the past.

Yet—

Cecilus: "—Basu, that's what's called a thorny path."

Subaru: "Ceci…"

As Subaru fought the boiling, burning sensation in depths of his chest, the fake Cecilus told him that.

When Subaru turned to look at him, the fake Cecilus let out a "Hup", then stood nimbly atop the railing in front of him. It was a sight that made him feel a tad uneasy, but the fake Cecilus dexterously balanced himself on the narrow railing.

Cecilus: "It's rare that we get everything to be the way we want them, no matter how many of the best choices we make under the circumstances we find ourselves in. There's a precondition for those beings who obtain everything. The qualification of being the chosen leading actor. If you do not possess it, and you want something you're undeserving of—"

Subaru: "What if I do?"

Cecilus: "Only death awaits, isn't that so?"

As the fake Cecilus stated so, his body leaned heavily toward the other side of the railing. Seeing this, Tanza's eyes widened and she quickly tried to reach out her hand.

But faster than she could do so, the fake Cecilus, bending at the knees, killed the momentum of his fall. Then crouching, he came face-to-face with Subaru in front of the railing, and,

Cecilus: "So it's much easier to have things move along if you think of them as what needs to be done, whether you like it or not."

Subaru: "…What needs to be done?"

Cecilus: "Yes, that's right. Accepting what is in front of you as supremely natural, coming to the conclusion you can't change destiny. Those who cannot overcome obstacles with their own strength will inevitably stagnate on the road ahead. You've got no choice but to carve open your own path… That's what needs to be done, regardless of what you think about it."

The fake Cecilus said this while squatting down, skillfully maintaining his posture without moving a single muscle. As Subaru was bombarded directly by those words, the rumors about the fake Cecilus resurfaced in Subaru's mind.

It had been said that, in the Sparka which the fake Cecilus had participated in, he had not acted until all of his allies had been wiped out.

Then, as soon as he had been left alone, he had killed the Gladiator Beast by his lonesome, and since then, he had been fighting to the death without the members of his Unit at his side, taking the lives of everyone he came to face.

Subaru: "Is that why you don't help others, Ceci?"

Cecilus: "You must be able to clear your way through any obstacle by yourself. If you accomplish things by borrowing the strength of others, you won't be able to overcome the same thing the next time you encounter it. You can't borrow power forever. People'll eventually die. Even I, am not immortal."

His intentions were understandable. His logic, too, was not impossible to comprehend.

But that was a type of logic that only the fake Cecilus could declare because he was strong, someone who could cut through problems. It was very harsh, and unkind.

Subaru: "You say that, Ceci, but sometimes encounters can change a person, you know. Then, that changed person might overcome the next obstacle. Besides…"

Cecilus: "Besides?"

Standing on one foot on the railing, the fake Cecilus rested his elbow on his bent knee and rested his hand on his chin. Scowling at that face holding back a grin, Subaru bared his teeth.

As an ordinary person who was unable to live alone, to this superhuman who could get through anything on his own.

Subaru: "Ceci, you say to treat it as what needs to be done regardless of my feelings, but it's important to keep this feeling of not being able to do that."

Cecilus: "…"

Subaru: "This feeling of not being able to throw away my personal feelings to do something, is the driving force to save someone else. Even if I'm told this is the selfishness of a naive brat, because that's what it is."

Indeed, that was what Subaru would like to believe.

The size of one's body did not matter. This was something that Natsuki Subaru thought, no matter how big or small he was.

A belief. A naive logic that could not be disregarded by cleverness posed as mature.

Cecilus: "Aha!"

Hearing Subaru's declaration, the fake Cecilus's expression changed.

From a thin smile to a big, satisfied grin.

Seeing that out of the corner of his eye, Subaru decided what he needed to do and walked away.

Tanza: "Schwartz-sama! Segmunt-sama, what are…"

Cecilus: "Oh, that's great, Basu! That fits my logic as well. Cool people say cool things, strong people say things that seem strong. Both casts start by saying things that are worthy of their standing. That's the very spirit of someone who rebels against fate!"

Tanza: "Segmunt-sama!"

Tanza turned on the fake Cecilus, who was cackling on the railing. However, Subaru had no time to spend on these two people.

There were two places that he needed to go to, and although he could just stop by the first, he needed to have a little discussion, persuasion, or perhaps a somewhat baseless accusation for the other one.

That was something he would have to get ready for later, and—

Subaru: “Old Man Null!”

Quickly heading back inside the Island, Subaru rushed to the healing room. As he flung the door open, he saw the back of a panicked figure that had been secretly dozing off inside.

The old man with a thin body, an untended long beard, and the impression of a cotton swab was Old Man Null, the healer cooped up in the healing room.

Null shook his head and blinked at the visitor who had rushed into the room, Subaru. The latter prefaced his question with, “Sorry, sorry”, and then,

Subaru: “—The thing I asked for, is it ready?”

2

???: “Looks like they’re having the next Sparka… We should have a reason to go watch…”

Hiain loathed Weitz, who, unable to read the situation, had made such an invitation.

Since they had been assembled as members of the same Unit, they frequently had no choice but to be together, however, from the beginning, Hiain had never gotten along with Weitz.

In addition to that, he knew that this was where he himself, who would impulsively flare up at people, and who had poor chemistry with Weitz, who was genuinely courageous—he, who could not back down, would be the first to spew inflammatory words.

Even though he knew this, he had never been able to fix it.

Because of that, he had been through utterly terrible experiences up to this point. He had been sent to Ginunhive as a gladiator, that mess, too, had been caused by the disaster his mouth had made.

It was true that the people he had been working with had used him as a sacrificial pawn in order to get away from slavers. But, in the first place, it had been Hiain's own slip of the tongue which had drawn the slavers' attention to them.

Though frustrated for being incapable of even finding a decent job for merely a day, he had gotten into a bar room fight with a group of clearly dangerous people, and was held accountable for it.

After days and days of being on the receiving end of a harried pursuit, it finally reached the point of turning to direct violence. And, for his comrades to save themselves, a decision was made.

Hiain: "Damnit, I know that…"

Though he was a scaredy-cat, he was short-tempered and would flare up at people; that was the reason he had incurred problems, and yet, until the very end, his comrades did not abandon him.

Reluctant to keep relying on others, and trying to look good, he had told them, "If it becomes hopeless, please just abandon me". Despite having said this however, on his mind had been the thought that they did not have the courage to abandon him.

At the very end of the end, convinced that they were scaredy-cats just like him, that they would not have the courage to abandon one of their comrades, he had been taking advantage of them.

Hiain: "I know that I'm the most hopeless of 'em all, damnit…"

Being abandoned, being used as bait, being used as a sacrificial pawn; it had been foolish of him to make a big fuss about it.

That it had been a very foolish thing, Hiain himself understood that.

But, were he to go on without saying that, he would be unable to protect his own heart. He was not at fault, and yet his comrades had been the ones in the wrong that had made him suffer; he firmly wished to believe that.

At the very least, by cursing his comrades in that manner, cursing them, who had escaped harm, he wanted to justify himself.

Hiain: “Despite that, why the hell did y’all get caught, too…!”

After all the trouble he had gone through, getting himself caught like this, and thrown into such a hopeless situation, why had they gotten themselves caught as well? With his justification to curse them snatched away, Hiain was nothing more than an asshole.

Degraded to being merely an asshole, he had no choice but to watch his friends die helplessly, here.

???: “It appears a Unit’s been established with the people that were brought in this time. Unlike how it was with us back then, they’re being thrown in as soon as they arrive…”

With his arms crossed, with his voice trembling, Idra looked down upon the gladiatorial arena from his seat among the spectators.

Idra attempted to hide his trembling voice, but to no avail. Idra may be strong, but deep down, he was not very different from the scaredy-cat Hiain.

Even then, Idra had the determination to put on a guise of strength. Hiain did not. He was miserable.

Gustav: “—From here-on out, the Sparka commences!!”

As the seating crowded with gladiators, the heavy voice of Gustav, the Governor, reverberated through the crowd.

Although they’d had no leisure for noticing it during their own Sparka, in one corner of the gladiatorial arena, there was a stage from which Gustav could look out over the audience—or rather, a place where dignitaries would be seated during the shows.

From there, Gustav looked down upon the venue with his four arms spread aloft.

At that moment, directly beneath Gustav, a passageway leading to the back of the gladiatorial arena opened, and, from its interior closed off with an iron fence, a Gladiator Beast slowly emerged.

It was a Witchbeast different from the one Hiain and the others had fought, a very, very large rat with soft-looking fur wrapped around its entire body, and bird wings growing out of both of its arms.

However, the differences between the two amounted to only their appearance, and there was no sizeable distinctions in their ferocity or danger, that was what Hiain's instinctive alarm bells conveyed to him.

In other words, it would not be the case in which, just because it was a different Gladiator Beast, the difficulty of Sparka would be reduced.

Weitz: "So, looks like these are the participants this time…"

As he heard the low roar of the gladiator Beast, as Weitz had stated, the fence of the passageway in front of them opened, and from there the participants of this Sparka—the five lizardmen, emerged.

The scales of each and every single one of them shook with anxiety and tension, all of their faces were familiar to Hiain.

That final hope of having mistaken them because he had viewed them from a distance, had been crushed.

Suddenly turning his face downward, Hiain realized that there was nowhere for him to run.

Just what had caused this? The scaredy-cat Hiain had survived the Sparka.

Being brought to the same place as Hiain, his comrades would be unable to survive the Sparka, would end up losing their lives—just what in the world was this curse?

That they had to suffer through this, had it been a result of his cursing?

If so, the effect of Hiain’s cursing had to be a considerable one. Then, he would curse everyone on this Island with the exception of himself—no, he would rather curse everyone within this Empire, curse them until he ran out of curses, and yet.

Idra: “Idiot.”

Hiain: “—Ah?”

To begin with, if he were to curse anyone, he would start with the slavers who had left him and his comrades here.

Hiain, having been engaged with such fanciful and unhelpful retreats from reality, was brought back to his senses by Idra’s dumbfounded mutterings.

What had occurred? With his eyes wide open in astonishment, Idra stared at the gladiatorial arena. And, doing that was not just Idra, but was also Weitz next to him—no, was not just the two of them.

—The multitude of gladiators in the audience of the venue were all staring in amazement.

The reason for that was clear, and looking down at the gladiatorial arena, Hiain’s expression became the same as those of the others.

Because, beside the five lizardmen, was the figure of a sixth person who was not supposed to be—.

Hiain: “Wh-Wh-Wh-What the hell’re you doing, Schwartz—?!”

His throat trembling, Hiain called out the name of the one who should not be there, the name of the black-haired boy.

The boy from whom he had just parted at that vantage point, the boy who had spoken to him so cheekily, turned around upon hearing Hiain’s pitiful exclamation.

Then, present in the midst of the lizardmen trembling at the life-threatening Sparka before, with a snap he pointed at the face of Hiain in the audience, and declared.

He had been asked what he was doing, and so—.

Subaru: “—The strongest reinforcement.”

So he declared.

Chapter 67:
Hidden Behind the Molar

1

At first, when Old Man Null heard Subaru's request, his mouth, with several missing teeth, distorted in a grandiose manner.

From what he'd heard, Old Man Null was a healer on the Island—in name only, as he had never done anything like treating others, hence he was acting as an imitation doctor.

Old Man Null had been at the Island before Gustav had taken over as Island Chief and Governor. In a period during which the Island had been much harsher and deadly, he had happened to obtain the role of a healer.

It had all started when he did nothing more but to apply a dirty cloth on an open wound of a gladiator who had lost their arm.

With that as the genesis of him treating people, the number of times he was being called upon increased, and before long, he was excused from having to stand in the gladiatorial arena as a gladiator, being ordered to work as a healer in the healing room.

From there-on out, he spent a long time as a healer, and befitting his position, came across plenty of bloody scenes.

Thanks to that, he became able to at least do stuff like stitching up wounds or mixing simple drugs. With the belief he would live peacefully as a healer until he died, he gave a smile with his yellow teeth.

Subaru also felt guilty for having caused Old Man Null's face to have distorted in such a grandiose manner.

However, if Subaru were to try and actualize the things that he wished to do upon the Island, the things that he had to do, then no matter what, that was an indispensable thing.

That was why Subaru had made a request to Old Man Null, who was doing a praiseworthy job of saving people.

Subaru: “—Can you prepare a poison that can instantly kill a person, just by biting or licking it?”

V!c.ll2o

2

He felt terrible for Old Man Null.

But, this was necessary. It would be a bigger problem for Subaru to pass out in the middle of a fight or survive some half-assed way—there had to be a way for him to start over.

And, once he obtained the means to do so, Subaru would be absolutely perfect.

Subaru: “Well, it’d help if my legs were a little longer.”

Such complaints were the opinion of those who came across a situation in battle where a single big step was not enough.

Of course, that one step was forcefully solved by rushing two steps ahead, even faster, to the next opportunity. By repeating trial and error to find the best action, he could grasp the desired future.

That was why—

Gustav: “—That is enough! You have done well to survive Sparka! By my jurisdiction as the official, I accept you all as members of the Gladiator Island!”

The resounding declaration conveyed in a baritone, commended the end of a fierce battle waged in the gladiatorial arena.

In the middle of the gladiatorial arena was the corpse of a Gladiator Beast, lying on its back with two swords, one large and one small, pierced into its body. Its two wings and long tail had been severed, leaving it in a pitiful state.

But, the way it had utilized its wings to move and its attacks used its sharp tail had truly, truly been troublesome.

Since conquering those two problems had been absolutely necessary to damage its body, he just wished to put it out there that they had not hurt it needlessly.

And—

Subaru: “Gustav-san, seriously?”

Breathing heavily, his shoulders heaving, Subaru looked up at Gustav standing at the seats positioned closest to the arena.

The Governor of the Island, with his four burly arms crossed, had overseen the Sparka’s conclusion. He seemed like an obstinate, inflexible man, but Subaru had not expected even his declaration of its terminus to be the same word-for-word.

It was hard to imagine that he had coincidentally used the same words for both this battle and for Subaru’s group’s, which made it seem that Gustav’s declaration was probably the same every time.

Anyway—

???: “We, did it… We did it, we did it! We survived! We survived!!”

???: “We’re alive…! Ah, uwaaaaaah!”

???: “Iiiiiiiii, heeeee…”

???: “…I can’t believe it. I thought it was the end of the world…”

???: “Maybe we died and went to Od Lagna…?”

Around the corpse of the Gladiator Beast were five people, each one with their own way of being stunned and rejoicing at their victory.

They were Orson, Hitz, Nadrey, Quonson, and Codley. All of them lizardmen, but no two were of the same ethnicity, and the formula for victory had been understanding everyone’s unique characteristics and how they worked together.

As had been the case with Weitz et al, victory would not have been achievable were any of them not present. —Of course, it would have been impossible without Subaru.

Subaru: “But, they won…!”

With a snap, Subaru pointed his finger towards Gustav at the seats closest to the arena.

Gustav's stern face remained unchanging even with Subaru's provocative attitude, only reacting by squinting his eyes.

Without saying a word, Gustav turned his back and walked away from the seats, returning to the Island.

Cleaning up the corpse and dealing with the surviving gladiators was left to the guards, his subordinates.

???: "Schwartz!"

Subaru: "Oh?"

As Subaru watched Gustav walk away, someone running toward him called out his name. It was Hiain, having jumped down from the stands and made a run for Subaru.

He seemed to have the scales of his entire body standing on end, and grabbing Subaru's shoulder with his large, webbed fingers, he voiced,

Hiain: "What the hell were ya thinkin'?! No, how did'cha end up back in a Sparka in the first place…"

Subaru: "Punishment, yeah? Punishment."

Hiain: "It was… punishment?"

Subaru: "Yeah. The other gladiators told me that if you disobey Gustav-san or the guards… the administration of the Island, you'll be warned at first, and punished thereafter. Malicious offenders are subject to the curse."

After speaking to several gladiators, he had made sure by corroborating it.

Everyone seemed to know Gustav's desire to not waste gladiators and have their numbers reduced as much as possible, and there was a common understanding of the rules laid out.

Punishment—in other words, forced participation in a Sparka performed by an unrelated Unit.

Subaru: “Sparka is a rite of passage for people who are going to become new gladiators, and those who have already become gladiators don’t participate. They have their own Units, so there’s no reason for them to do it.”

In addition, the Unit assembled for Sparka would be determined at random, composed of a selection of people who entered Gladiator Island at the time of the Sparka. In other words, choosing people one was compatible with, choosing people one liked, were both impossible.

Being paired with people whose capabilities, strong suits, or even identity were unknown, and being forced to work with them to defeat the Gladiator Beast in order to complete it, was quite the daunting task.

A dangerous deathmatch in which participation held no merit, but where the possibility of death was all too great.

It was unanimous among the gladiators’ statements, Sparka had been their toughest deathmatch on the Gladiator Island.

Subaru: “Well, now it seems that because of Ceci, there’s the perception that the deathmatches done with him are the worst.”

Hiain: “—. I get why ya joined that Sparka. But…”

Subaru: “But?”

Hiain: “In the first place! Why did’cha have to be punished? Y’know, it’s strange that ya could join the Sparka immediately after all that talk up there! It’s like…”

There, Hiain took a pause in his angered speech, letting his gaze wander.

Subaru shrugged his little shoulders at Hiain’s hesitance to speak the words remaining from that sentence. He sort of understood what Hiain wanted to say.

Subaru: “It’s like I was trying to help Orson and the others?”

Hiain: “—Hk.”

Subaru: “You’re not wrong. If I weren’t present, all of them would’ve been killed.”

In fact, even with Subaru, the situation of the battle was terrible.

Because to be as one with them, who were no better suited for fighting than Hiain, he had to start by becoming their ally, considering they were united as fellow lizardmen.

It was rather helpful, though, recalling seeing Chaosflame.

Subaru: “From what I got, you were all trying to get to Chaosflame?”

Hiain: “Wha…”

Subaru: “You should really talk about that kind of stuff. After all, you guys got to see each other again.”

As he said this, Subaru put his hand atop Hiain’s hand on his shoulder.

Hiain stared into Subaru’s black eyes with his slit-pupiled eyes wide open. Staring back at him, Subaru cocked his chin towards the five lizardmen.

The five, who had been basking in the joy of their survival, gradually regained composure enough to look around them; then one of them, Codley, noticed Hiain’s presence.

And then—

Codley: “Hiain! It’s Hiain! He’s alive… He’s alive!”

Codley’s voice rang out with a jovial look on his face, and then the other four looked at Hiain. They all expressed their delight at Hiain’s presence, reacting positively to him.

Witnessing Hiain’s face contort seeing his fellow lizardmen’s reactions, Subaru spoke,

Subaru: “This is the chance I risked my life for. Savor it, bro.”

Slapping his hunched back, Subaru sent Hiain off in the direction of his comrades.

Hiain hesitated a few times, but then moved forward with faltering steps, and—

Hiain: “S-Schwartz!”

Subaru: “Yeah?”

Hiain: “…Thanks.”

With that said, Hiain walked up to the five lizardmen awaiting him.

Orson and the others held no animosity or malice toward Hiain, because Subaru already knew why the five had been captured and brought to the Gladiator Island.

There would be no reason for them to be at odds with each other, provided they were able to talk it over proper.

???: “…Schwartz-sama?”

Subaru: “Whoa!”

As he watched Hiain’s reunion with his friends, he was startled by a voice from behind.

Having hopped into the air, so surprised that he broke out into a coughing fit, Subaru,

Subaru: “Th-That was close… I almost died…! Don’t scare me like that!”

???: “That is what I ought to say! Why are you doing that so suddenly… Do you want to die?!”

Subaru: “No, I don’t want to die?!”

Tanza scolded Subaru, who turned around with his hand over his mouth, chastising him harshly.

The little girl's vehement protests had Subaru shaking his head helplessly. Tanza, however, looked not at all convinced by this excuse.

Tanza: "I was very surprised to see you join their Sparka out of the blue. And knowing it was the result of you defying Governor Gustav, I cannot help but think you were throwing away your life because you felt it unneeded."

Subaru: "That would be a misunderstanding. I don't think there's many people who understand the value of life better than I do, you know? That's why I saved Hiain's friends, too."

Tanza: "I am speaking about your own life… I am glad that you were able to save them because it turned out well in the end, but from my point of view, there were many times when you were in a dangerous spot. This is simply a miracle."

Subaru: "A miracle, huh."

Dropping the tone of her voice, Tanza chided Subaru's recklessness from a pragmatic point of view.

Just as she had stated, and it was probably true that there had been a number of harrowing moments as she watched. Subaru could understand why Tanza wished to call it a miracle. —But it had not been one.

Subaru: "Miracles come from God, but this one's my doing."

Ergo, it had been no miracle.

It was proof that Natsuki Subaru had kicked away such a shitty fate.

Tanza: "…You acted so recklessly just to help Hiain-sama's companions? Or, is this just retaliation for your tit-for-tat with Segmunt-sama?"

Subaru: "No, it's true that I was angry at Ceci, but I'd have to be really crazy to risk my life for that… You know, I had a good reason for saving Hiain's friends."

Tanza: "…"

Subaru: "Those eyes are awfully filled with suspicion!"

It was amazing how steep a drop there had been in the persuasiveness of Subaru's explanation.

With his shoulders slumped under Tanza's distrustful gaze, as if she were looking at a criminal caught red-handed, Subaru muttered weakly "It's true…".

Tanza let out a small exhale at Subaru's pathetic state.

Tanza: "Then, what is your goal, Schwartz-sama?"

Subaru: "It's…"

As Tanza changed her attitude and moved on from the topic, Subaru turned around once more to answer her question.

Hiain and his five companions were talking together. Subaru could hear a subtle rise in the pitch of Hiain's voice as he spoke.

That was why—

Subaru: "Maybe we should wait a little longer before we talk about it."

Tanza: "…Schwartz-sama?"

Subaru: "Those eyes are awfully filled with suspicion!"

Exasperated by such a lack of trust in himself coming from her, Subaru surreptitiously stuck his finger in his mouth. Then, he double checked the position of the package hooked to a molar.

Subaru: "…"

What laid there, was the last resort that Subaru had requested Old Man Null to concoct.

He had seized this loop by overcoming a desperate challenge, and he absolutely did not want to accidentally ruin it with an inadvertent mistake. He had to be very careful not to die from careless mistakes.

—Thinking this, Subaru stuffed the wrapped “drug” behind his molar.

???: “Accordin’ to what Orson’s group said, it seems Chaosflame’s been destroyed.”

Tanza: “…”

At the bitter-faced Hiain’s report, Tanza lowered her round eyebrows, her eyes cast downwards.

Even thought she had imagined the worst situation possible, that did not ease the shock of being told that it had actually come to pass. Even if someone knew they would trip and fall, it would hurt all the same once they fell down.

After Sparka was over, Orson and the others, having survived without a hitch and been welcomed as gladiators, were then led by the guards to show them around the Island’s facilities and common rooms.

Although they were comrades, they and Hiain were from different Units, so they could not be together, so Hiain had sheeply made his entrance in Subaru and Tanza’s room, who were in the same Unit as him.

And that was how he had shared the stories Subaru had wanted to know.

Hiain: “Ya wanted these kinda stories from the outside, right? Ya can’t get any information from outside if ya stay on this Island after all.”

Subaru: “It’s half and half. No, let’s make it about seven to three. The side with the seven’s the one where Hiain’s and Orson’s group are.”

Hiain: “What’re ya sayin’, ya creepy kid!”

Hiain spoke as if he meant it but, with his arms crossed, he turned away.

Subaru was glad to see that Hiain had gotten his feelings in order and had thought on what Subaru’s purpose in joining that Sparka had been.

Hiain’s expression seemed to brighten up somewhat, surely because he had been able to hear the important topics from Orson and the rest.

That was—

Hiain: “…Those idiots were caught tryin’ to get me back from the slave traders. There’s really no savin’ them.”

Subaru: “God and fate are both heartless. That’s why I helped them… Or should I say we?”

Hiain: “Heh, whaddya mean? In reality, ya’re the only one who participated in the Sparka.”

Subaru: “Hiain, you got down on your knees with snot running down your nose and requested earnestly, I beg of you to help me, please, Schwartz-sama…”

Hiain: “Don’t talk nonsense!”

A hand stretched out and grabbed his head and shook him about and about. Then, letting go of the now-dizzy Subaru, the sniffling Hiain noticed Tanza’s state.

Hiain called out to the girl with a “Pipsqueak” as she remained with her eyes cast down after hearing the story about Chaosflame.

Hiain: “Are you feeling down about Chaosflame? Why…”

Tanza: “…Chaosflame is my hometown. When the city was near collapse, it…”

Hiain: “I-I see… That, that’s it, that’s it, huh.”

Hiain’s eyes swayed from side-to-side, puzzled by the unexpected reply. His character of being vulnerable to accidents had slipped out, but he immediately shouted, “But!”,

Hiain: “It certainly seems that the town was destroyed, but story is, the people who lived there didn’t get wiped out. Everyone from that town went to a different place… Uhm, it ain’t easy to explain, but…”

Tanza: “It is hard, to explain…?”

Hiain: “Nah, I just dunno how much of it I should believe.”

With that preamble, Hiain hesitated about what words to say next. But, the interests of Tanza and Subaru were directed towards the follow-up to his story.

Having sensed that, Hiain breathed a heavy sigh and then,

Hiain: “Apparently, there’s a big rebellion goin’ on outside. The lot from Chaosflame’re said to be joinin’ that rebellion. Well, story goes that the head of the Demon City raised rebellions every-so-often, and the city was also obliterated as a result of her foolishness… Eek.”

Tanza: “—Yorna-sama is not foolish.”

Hiain: “I-I’m sorry! I ain’t really gettin’ why, but I’m sorry!”

Hiain, apologizing quickly, squeaked out a frightened voice at Tanza’s sharp gaze.

Once again, Hiain was incurring the wrath of someone else with his unnecessary bravado, but behind him, Subaru found some points of relief in what he had just said.

Of course, that was assuming he believed everything in what Hiain had relayed from his conversation with Orson’s group.

Subaru: "Chaosflame may be done for, but Yorna-san and the townspeople are fine. If there's talk of rebellion, it looks like Abel and the others are safe and sound."

The battle to retake the Imperial Capital would not be able to proceed with Abel gone.

In other words, Abel was still alive. He hoped that Medium, Taritta, and even Al were also safe. —Hopefully Louis was also safe by Yorna's side.

Subaru: "…As I thought, there's no time to waste."

Upon obtaining even a partial idea of the situation outside, Subaru's desire to go outside grew stronger.

Naturally, he was worried about everybody in Chaosflame, but also the people in Guaral, whom Yorna and Abel's group would try to converge with—about Rem.

He had a feeling that, if she were to find out he'd been shrunken, assuredly, she would get angry with him again.

Subaru: "—. Even though I really wanted to show Rem my reliable aspects."

Personally, he thought that he was now in better shape, his head clearer, but Subaru could not justify the fact that his outward appearance lacked persuasive power. The fact that Tanza was constantly shifting her eyes to him in suspicion, was probably not unrelated to his small body.

In any case—

Subaru: "Mhm, I got it. Thanks, Hiain, you helped me out."

Hiain: "The ones who got helped out were my… Well, whatever, as long as ya get it."

Hiain gave Subaru an awkward reply, the latter having thanked him. Giving a small chuckle at the way he was answered, Subaru was thinking he should follow-up on Tanza's side.

???: “—Schwartz, the Governor’s calling for you.”

Outside the common room, the voice of a guard of the Gladiator Island, clad in a black uniform, called out. Hearing that summon, Hiain’s expression stiffened, and Tanza’s eyes widened in surprise.

She looked at the guard,

Tanza: “Governor Gustav is calling for Schwartz-sama? Why…”

Guard: “I haven’t heard. There’s also no reason to converse. Obey, quietly. Or else…”

Subaru: “It’s alright! I’d go with you obediently even if you weren’t being so hostile… By the way, would you punish me in case I didn’t comply?”

Guard: “…”

Subaru: “Kidding, kidding.”

Faced with Subaru’s talkativeness, who had one eye closed, the guard, who was in the prime of his life, contorted his lips.

It was obvious that he was not very fond of Subaru. Of course he wasn’t. This guard happened to have been present when Subaru had been talking with Gustav before the Sparka.

This was because he was also someone who had seen the trigger for Subaru to participate in Sparka, or in other words, he had been present when Subaru had become subject to punishment. From his point of view, Subaru’s true nature would seem like a mystery.

Because he was ready to join a Sparka of his own volition, he was surely a kid who was out of his mind.

Subaru: “Well, I’m heading out for a bit. Tanza, please be a good girl and wait for me.”

Tanza: “…Though it is you, Schwartz-sama, do take care to moderate your mischief.”

Subaru: “Yeaah, I can’t argue with that.”

At Tanza’s stifled tone of voice, Subaru’s wry smile grew deeper and deeper. With that, obeying the guard who silently urged him to hurry up, Subaru left the room.

Just then, Hiain called out towards Subaru’s back with a “Schwartz”.

Hiain: “Uhm, well…”

Subaru: “Hmm? What’s up?”

Hiain: “Ah, no… T-take care of yerself. It’ll be us who’ll be in trouble if the number of people in our Unit decreases, even if ya are how ya are, after all.”

Subaru’s face became puzzled at those disingenuous words of concern. Then he immediately spit out a “Pfft” and nodded back at Hiain.

Subaru: “Yep, I know. Well, see you later.”

With a wave of his hand, Subaru temporarily parted from Tanza and Hiain. Then, while following the back of the guard walking in front of him,

Subaru: “Was Gustav-san angry?”

Guard: “…The Governor is not one to get emotional. Unlike me.”

Upon the implication that he should not provoke him with any unnecessary words, Subaru ducked his head in dejection.

4

—And thus, the two of them saw Subaru off as he was taken away by the guards.

Weitz: “Hey, what did that Schwartz kid do…”

Idra: “Just now, what the guards took him away for, was it for something other than the Sparka?”

With those words, Weitz and Idra showed up in the room where Tanza and Hiain had stayed behind. They, too, had watched Subaru’s Sparka from the spectators’ seats.

Naturally, there were many things they had wanted to ask Subaru, the perpetrator of such recklessness.

Although, while they had not been as cornered as Hiain had been, it was not like their tempers would have been as short as to make them jump down from the spectator seats, but—

Weitz: “Tanza, are ya aware of what’s going on?”

Tanza: “…I am both somewhat aware and unaware, it is complicated. It seems that Schwartz-sama is hiding things from me as well.”

Weitz: “He’s a suspicious guy… Tho’ he has some skills in his own way…”

After Tanza spoke, whose eyes were turned down, Weitz and Idra exchanged glances and heaved a sigh.

Listening to the conversation of those three, Hiain remained silently still. Although he was a lizardman, making it difficult to discern his expression, his eyes, swaying from side-to-side, made it obvious that he was worrying about something.

As a result, the three called out to him with “Hiain”, “Hiain” and “Hiain-sama” respectively, and,

Idra: “What’s with that face…”

Hiain: “No, ya guys… a-are also aware that, that Schwartz kid got mixed up in the Sparka on purpose… Right?”

Idra: “That’s… what it seems everybody thought, upon seeing that situation.”

Idra answered the faltering Hiain’s words, and Tanza and Weitz both nodded their heads in agreement.

This seemed to be the common understanding of all the gladiators who had witnessed the battle in the gladiatorial arena. Then, from anyone's perspective, the Sparka held during the present day would not have been a success without Subaru's active participation.

Weitz: "For me, I dunno what his intentions were in doin' that, but…"

Hiain: "—. I ain't got any idea either. But, but."

Weitz: "—? But, what?"

Hiain: "I ain't exactly sure why he did that, but why he was able to do that, y'know, maybe…"

Ya might get it, as he continued with that, the three aside from Hiain also seemed to understand.

The question was not why Subaru had joined the Sparka, but how Subaru had joined the Sparka and been able to survive. Tanza aside, that question was one not unrelated to Weitz and Idra.

Therefore, as he was met with a look of intense interest, Hiain gulped down his spit.

And then—

Hiain: "Somethin' I heard, uhh, from those people who just came from outside… is that there seems to be a rumor goin' 'round that the illegitimate son of the Emperor's out there somewhere. So, here's the thing—"

Everyone: "…"

Hiain: "—The rumor's 'bout a brat, with black hair and black eyes."

SETOWI

Chapter 68: Guidance of the Sword Wolf

1

Gustav: “—Wait for a moment, Schwartz. Now, let me look over this until I get to a good place to leave off.”

Having said this, Gustav did not even take a fleeting glance towards Subaru, whom he had summoned to the room. His gaze remained cast towards the desk, upon the letter in his hands.

Led by the guard, Subaru had been brought to the highest stratum of Ginunhive. Behind a door that looked luxurious, Subaru was greeted by a simple, plain room.

Contained inside the spacious room was nothing except a desk to be used for work, a bookshelf to be used for work, and a toolbox to be used for work. Since the room was too spacious for someone to know what to do with it, it was possible that there had been more things filling it originally.

The room to be used by the Governor, which had been stripped of everything unnecessary for his work, had a very tidy look to it; displaying Gustav’s no-playing-around nature pretty well, it was conversely reassuring.

Subaru: “You tell me to wait until you find a good place to stop, but there aren’t any chairs.”

Subaru was at a loss when Gustav had ordered him to wait in the room.

But having been told to wait, he had no other options. With nothing to do for the moment, Subaru looked around the room until his eyes encountered a person who gave off a feeling of being out-of-place.

Subaru had found them, or rather, found them casually waving towards himself, the other person a sodden look on his face.

???: “Heyhey, Basu, you sure worked hard. You got some business with Gustav-san?”

Subaru suppressed a sigh and walked up to the fake Cecilus, the one who’d spoken to him in such an easygoing tone.

Wondering what he could say, the relationship between Subaru and the fake Cecilus had become a bit more complicated again. To an extent, Subaru’s participation in Sparka had been the result of the fake Cecilus’s incitement.

Although Subaru did think he would have joined the Sparka even if there had been no dispute—

Subaru: “Ceci, I still really wanted to get back at you, there’s no doubt in that.”

Cecilus: “My! Getting back at me sure’s quite the ambitious goal. Is that why you joined Sparka? If so, then sorry.”

Subaru: “You’re sorry?”

Cecilus: “No, you see, I didn’t go to see the Sparka that was going on earlier.”

Subaru’s jaw dropped due to the fake Cecilus’s answer, the latter sticking out his tongue in a quite indifferent manner. However, a surge of anger for screaming “You bastard” arose immediately.

Subaru himself had become quite determined to prove him wrong, and Subaru himself had also rushed in for the sake of having Cecilus take back what he had said, by having him see it with his own eyes.

Subaru: “Y-you, YOU BASTARD…!”

Cecilus: “Nownownownow, don’t be angry! Okayokay, I do understand your feelings of wanting to be angry, but it happens to be the case that I have my reasons too!”

Subaru: “Then how about you let me hear them! They better be good, or else…”

Cecilus: "I mean, I knew the outcome even without seeing it, y'know? Basu would've finished it quickly with a perfect showdown. Then there'd be no reason for me to go, since my life wasn't on the line after all."

Subaru: "…"

Since he displayed no reaction to any amount of hounding, Subaru backed away from the fake Cecilus and his unchanging mannerisms.

Being honest with himself, Subaru was aware that for everything he had done, it was only natural for Hiain to call him a creepy little brat—

Subaru: "For someone on the outside, it'd be pretty fitting to also call Ceci a creepy little brat…"

Cecilus: "It may be that the people who achieve supremacy will always be incomprehensible to others, y'know. In this case, both Basu and I fall into that category."

Subaru: "Well, you really seem to think highly of me."

Cecilus: "Yes, by now I'm pretty much convinced. So rest assured, and continue to pull off unconventional, off-the-mark, daring and misguided acts!"

Subaru: "I don't want to be off-the-mark or misguided though!"

Subaru's lips twisted in protest at the fake Cecilus, who was half-mindedly spouting a bunch of words along that sort. Then, at the tail end of their back-and-forth, there was the heavy sound of a slam on the desk.

Upon looking, the one to have made that noise had been Gustav, having finished reading the letter.

Gustav rested his chin on two of his crossed arms, placing the remaining two arms atop the desk. Subaru was impressed that with four arms, he could do nifty things like these.

Subaru: "I wonder, if you were to put all four hands together, would it be too big to put your chin on?”

Cecilus: “Well, that’s a good question. Gustav-san’s got an adequately large face, so it may be that, surprisingly, stacking four hands on top of each other would make it the perfect size. Could you put them on top of each other for a minute?”

Gustav: “Do you two lack the consideration to be quiet? Common sense would dictate that, if you are waiting for someone to read a letter, silence would be valued.”

Subaru & Cecilus: “But you didn’t say anything…”

Their quibble had been a childish one devoid of logic, yet regardless, Subaru’s and the fake Cecilus’s excuses overlapped.

Because of that, Subaru’s feelings towards Gustav had become those of guilt. Sharing the same view as the fake Cecilus meant that Subaru had behaved in an absurd fashion.

Subaru: “Gustav-san, I’m sorry. I’m at fault here…”

Cecilus: “Aren’t those thoughts of yours sorta just thoughts of seeking acceptance? Be that as it may, since you’ve admitted your fault, I’m going to blame everything here on Basu.”

Gustav: “Schwartz is, in my appraisal as the official, humbler for having uttered an apology. In addition, I, in my capacity, do not recall granting Segmunt permission to enter this room.”

Subaru: “Oh, is that so? Well then, why are you here, Ceci?”

Cecilus: “Naturally, that’s because my plans are to be where I want to be, when I want to be there. No one on this island can put shackles on my freedom, so I think that’s a reasonable way to go about it.”

Nonchalantly, the fake Cecilus uttered about how he conformed to nobody. Subaru looked to Gustav with trepidation, but the Chief of the Island was still conflicted, his eyes closed and his brow furrowed.

It seemed that the fake Cecilus's remarks were no lie, but of course, Gustav was not willing to overlook the situation, is how his position seemed to be.

But—

Subaru: "No one can stop Ceci, huh?"

Cecilus: "Yes, that's right. It's so-called special treatment. Namely, towards the leading actor of this world."

Subaru: "I don't really get what that means, but…"

Although expressed in a peculiar way, it was not hard to understand what the false Cecilus had been trying to say.

Only, were the fake Cecilus to not be mistaken in his statements, another major inconsistency would arise. Such a contradiction was something that Subaru could not ignore.

Subaru: "Umm, so, Gustav-san, I was told you wanted to see me, but… is it okay if Ceci stays here and listens to us?"

Gustav: "—. Segmunt."

Cecilus: "Please don't bother. Nobody'd be able to drive me out. Don't worry, if what you talk about's related to me, it'll reach my ears, and if it's not about me, I'll forget about it quickly. My ability to forget's amazing. It's even possible that I'm forgetting a lot of important things at this very moment."

Subaru: "That's not amazing at all…"

Both Subaru and Gustav had given up because of the fake Cecilus's insolence, the latter puffing his chest out.

Finally, without the room's occupants changing, Subaru headed towards Gustav, just in front of him. The fake Cecilus watched on with his hands folded behind his head and his back against the wall.

It was an inspection by a terribly strange "actor".

Subaru: “Forget about Ceci in the back, you called me—”

Gustav: “Of course, it is a warning of punishment for your case of misconduct.”

Subaru: “…Aren’t you being roundabout on that?”

A low voice interrupted his statement, and Subaru frowned as he muttered.

As per the rules of the Gladiator Island, after the warning came the punishment, and supposedly, after that, lay a death at the hands of the curse rule. Regardless of the final conclusion, for a warning to come after the punishment was the incorrect order of things.

As Subaru pointed this out, Gustav’s expression did not even twitch.

Gustav: “Schwartz, you made a statement before me, the official, that threatened to disturb the order of the Gladiator Island. You ignored the warning, and consequently reached the stage to be administered punishment. Are you not aware of this?”

Subaru: “…Yeah, I am.”

Gustav: “Then, you must vow to never speak of it again before me, as the official. —Never speak that you are planning to escape this island, or that you possess any other plan to oppose the will of His Excellency the Emperor.”

His expression remained unchanging and unmoving. The look in his eyes and the tonality of his pupils also did not change. His tone of voice had a quietness akin to a giant boulder, yet it produced an overwhelming air of intimidation.

If he were a bit more emotional, such as being angry or annoyed, then it would be easier for Subaru to understand. However, neither anger nor annoyance resided within Gustav.

Subaru: “An absurdly strong sense of duty.”

Gustav: “…”

Subaru: “Gustav-san, do you owe His Excellency the Emperor a debt of gratitude?”

Gustav: “Are you attempting to sidestep the question?”

Subaru: “Nothing of the sort.”

He did not intend to sidestep it, nor was he in a position to.

Gustav did not seem like he was willing to let Subaru leave without getting a firm pledge from him. Therefore, Subaru’s question came from suspicion and interest towards the genuine Gustav.

Since, he roughly understood the position of the person Gustav called His Excellency the Emperor.

Gustav: “I have no personal connection with His Excellency the Emperor. As Governor, I have been entrusted with the management of this island. To endeavor, in my capacity, in the professional duties of my position, that is only natural, is it not?”

Subaru: “You’re saying that being overly serious is just your personality?”

Gustav: “It is somewhat dishonest to describe the performance of one’s natural duties as being serious, though, is it not?”

Subaru ducked his head, not having intended to make fun of him, but it had been taken as a slanderous remark.

Nevertheless, Gustav’s answer was not what Subaru desired. Whether this was Gustav’s true intention, or a front to hide it, he did not know.

It was something that was impossible to know about Gustav without learning more about him.

Subaru: “In Gustav-san’s case, I don’t think I’d be able to gain his trust even if I tried five or ten times…”

Subaru’s successes to date had been due to what he believed to be a kind of “suspension bridge effect”, created by the extreme conditions in which he had been placed.

In the midst of Sparka, where lives were on the line, Subaru's words, spoken with an air of knowledge, seemed to pull everyone's attention away from their own situation.

Getting to know them was the biggest reason why Natsuki Subaru had been able to surmount the Sparka.

However, this method was quite difficult to pull off outside of Sparka.

Gustav: "—Schwartz, what is with that face?"

Subaru: "No, I was wondering how I should melt Gustav-san's frozen heart."

Gustav: "There is no such correlation between heart and ice. I ask you to refrain from speaking in the same manner as Segmunt. For the sake of not increasing the seeds of headache burdening me, in my capacity."

Subaru's frivolous comments were answered seriously, and there was a hint of a laugh from the fake Cecilus in the back.

Subaru and Gustav exchanged glances as they cooperated to ignore it. Then, they returned to the question that had not been answered once more.

Gustav: "You must once again pledge, Schwartz. That above your activities as a gladiator of this Island, you shall obey me in my capacity as the Governor. —You shall refrain from doing anything that goes against the will of His Excellency the Emperor."

Subaru: "…"

Closing his eyes, Subaru repeated Gustav's statement in his head.

Upon making a proud declaration that he would leave the Island, Subaru had been given a warning by Gustav, and when he still did not correct it, Gustav had sent him to Sparka with the goal of punishing him.

If what the gladiators had stated was correct, the warning would be followed by a punishment, and if that had no effect, then the penalty of the curse rule would ensue.

Then, there was something Subaru had to make sure of no matter what. It was the confirmation that was absolutely necessary for Subaru and the others to get off the Gladiator Island—.

Gustav: “Schwartz, your answer—”

Subaru: “—Definitely, NO!”

Gustav: “…”

In response to the low, insistent question, Subaru proudly raised his voice, his chest puffed out.

Gustav’s brow furrowed at the answer as he went silent. After seeing this quietude, Subaru immediately understood that the true meaning of his words had not been conveyed in the way he had just said them, and so rephrasing them was necessary.

Subaru: “No means I refuse. I’m sorry, but I can’t accept what you say, Gustav-san. I’ve already decided that I’m going to get out of here, no matter how stupid it may be.”

2

Breaking down the words that may not have been conveyed, Subaru so declared once more.

That he would escape from Gladiator Island Ginunhive, spoken to none other than the Island’s Governor himself, Gustav Morello, with complete confidence.

Gustav: “…”

Subaru’s answer was not what Gustav had sought, of course. He let the astounding sternness of his face simmer, without changing his expression or the intensity of his eyes.

Simmering, like magma waiting to erupt—

Gustav: “Schwar—”

Cecilus: “Ah-hahahahahahaha!”

A moment later, a high-pitched laugh coercively disturbed the magma about to erupt.

The one laughing hysterically was the fake Cecilus, at the back of the room, nonchalantly eavesdropping on their conversation.

The fake Cecilus, as he laughed hysterically, wiped away tears from his eyes with his fingers.

Cecilus: “Definitely no! Definitely no, he says. I don’t know what “no” means, but I personally really like it because it gives me a strong sense of rebellion! Wooow, Basu, you just don’t know fear, do you? Well, I don’t dislike it, rather, I quite like it.”

Subaru: “I see. Well, I think of Ceci as a creepy little brat.”

Cecilus: “Ahahahaha!”

The fake Cecilus never stopped laughing, as he slapped and stomped his feet on the spot.

Despite the fake Cecilus’s uproarious laughter pouring cold water on them, Subaru’s words of rejection to Gustav had not wore away.

Gustav: “Schwartz, as the official, I have warned you and punished you for not recanting your comments. Furthermore, I have given you another chance to rectify your attitude, yet you still possess no intention of doing so?”

Subaru: “…Yeah, I don’t hate you or anything, Gustav-san. It’s the Empire I hate.”

Gustav: “In my capacity, I do not possess the right to twist your subjective opinion about liking or disliking individuals.”

Implication was, Gustav had stated he did not care if he was disliked, but it was true that Subaru did not dislike Gustav. Subaru did not know him well enough to decide whether he liked or disliked him.

To make a decision about someone based on first impressions would be such a ridiculous decision.

Subaru: “That is, unless they kiss the hand of a girl I like of course.”

Gustav: “—?”

Subaru: “I was talking to myself, about someone completely unrelated to this.”

Subaru glanced at Gustav, regretting the words that came out of his mouth so suddenly.

From Gustav’s point of view, Subaru must have been the most troublesome child to deal with. Even though he had sent Subaru to Sparka under the guise of punishment, Subaru had not shown any repentance.

Gustav had certainly realized that Subaru had not taken it as punishment.

And if that were to happen—

Subaru: “Will you actually reprimand me, aside from warning and punishing me? Gustav-san.”

Gustav: “—. If you do not recant your opinion, at worst, I, in my capacity, am compelled to do so in accordance with the power vested in me, as the official.”

Subaru: “I, see… Then, why don’t you do it?”

Gustav: “…”

Tilting his head, Subaru replied to Gustav as if it were nothing.

Hearing Subaru’s words, Gustav’s expression shifted slightly. It was not the action of wrinkling his brow, nor of rubbing it, but rather, his cheeks stiffened.

It was not that he was pondering it over, but it was rather the reaction of one who had been hit in a sore spot.

Subaru: “You can use it to punish me, the curse rule that’s been put on all the gladiators on the Island. I’m a cheeky brat who doesn’t do as he is told at all, and Gustav-san’s the Governor here, so making an example out of me should be perfectly acceptable. You can do it. But…”

Gustav: “…”

Subaru: “Gustav-san, you won’t do it. —No, I don’t think you can do it.”

There was no rebuttal from Gustav, who was thrust into silence.

Subaru probed for what the silence meant, as he continued with his thoughts.

The curse rule was the main reason why the gladiators of the Island were afraid and restricted in their actions.

The gladiators, having been inscribed with the curse mark, could be deprived of their life, at the will of the Governor, Gustav. Subaru suspected that Gustav was unable to utilize that deterrent.

Subaru: “I asked Old Man Null, the geezer gladiator who’s been living here for a long time. He said that, before Gustav-san’s arrival, the Gladiator Island was a lawless place, and more people died from injuries or illnesses. But things have changed a lot since Gustav-san arrived. Fewer people die.”

Gustav: “It is the natural duty of the Chief. To begin with, a gladiator should use their life for the Island’s shows, and they should avoid losing their lives due to other factors as much as possible. Other than shows, the same is true for daily deathmatches. Opportunities are provided to maintain tension and competence, but it is equally important to avoid dying in situations other than the real thing.”

Subaru: “Yeah, Gustav-san wants to prevent the unnecessary loss of gladiators as much as possible. I’ve felt that too, from the days I’ve spent here. Surprisingly, you've got good employee welfare."

Cecilus: "Emplowyi wellfaire, more words I don't know that get my heart racing!"

The fake Cecilus got caught on something in Subaru's questioning, but Subaru was not going to play dictionary.

Even for Subaru, this was a moment most important.

Subaru: "I think the reason deaths are allowed in Sparka is to maintain the quality of the gladiators, and maybe to keep the other gladiators on their toes."

Gustav: "…"

Subaru: "I said it earlier but, once you become a gladiator, the rules here are much more lenient. But, it's not desirable for gladiators to learn to slack off in their lives here. Therefore, they have to participate in Sparka. That makes them more nervous, but also… reassured."

Gustav: "Reassured, how?"

Subaru: "It's relieving that we managed to become gladiators. That's how we're reassured."

To Gustav's question, Subaru answered while clearly looking him in the eye.

When Subaru had thought about the purpose behind Gustav's actions, that was the feeling that seemed correct in more than one way. There was, of course, the possibility of having missed the point, but there was not much to lose by asking.

There would only be something to lose when being laughed at, or when being flatly denied.

Gustav: "…"

But Gustav chose neither; he instead remained silent.

Subaru: "…Gustav-san wants to prevent the gladiators' deaths as much as possible… On the other hand, he doesn't want gladiators to get carried away or become insubordinate. That's why Sparkas are used. When I think about it that way, it just feels right."

Gustav: "Sounds like a reasonable theory. But, it is not reasonable evidence as to why I, as the official, am not activating the curse rule. It is merely your wishful thinking."

Subaru: "There's one more basis for this… Someone who's rebellious and gets carried away, Ceci."

Cecilus: "Huh, what about me?"

Subaru stuck up a thumb and pointed towards his back, prompting the fake Cecilus to widen his eyes at Subaru. When Gustav's eyes glanced in that direction, Subaru nodded broadly.

The fake Cecilus was a cut above the rest of the gladiators in his unruly behavior, including him having openly participated in the discussion between Subaru and Gustav.

Naturally, some sort of warning and punishment should have been given to the fake Cecilus, but that bore no effect on him at all, in a way different from Subaru. If that was the case, it would not be surprising if the fake Cecilus would be punished before Subaru.

Subaru: "And yet, Ceci's safe. Although, it's possible that Ceci's Gustav-san's personal favorite, but that doesn't seem to be the case considering you, Gustav-san."

Gustav: "Quite discerning. As the official, I do not hold any favor towards Segmunt. I am firm in not letting any likes or dislikes reflect in my duties."

Cecilus: "Heyheyhey? Are you telling me that people don't like me? Good grief, sorry for taking center stage everywhere I go."

Subaru: "Your mental strength is too much…"

The fake Cecilus was quite unconcerned in spite of the rather direct accusation. It would be difficult to grow to have his kind of personality without having been that bold.

Regardless, the continued existence of the fake Cecilus was a fairly strong basis for Subaru's theory.

In other words—

Subaru: "Ceci isn't being punished either. I'm as much or more of an eyesore to Gustav-san as Ceci is. On top of that, what do you make of my refusal to do what you just said?"

Gustav: "…"

Subaru: "Do you intend to punish me with the curse rule…? Gustav-san, what will you do?"

Gustav's eyes narrowed subtly in response to Subaru's question.

Gustav, the man of the Multi-Arm Tribe, his four arms atop the desk, had his chin planted on two of them and the other two resting on the desk as if hugging it, while Subaru waited for his answer.

With those statements of his, Subaru's intentions had certainly been conveyed to Gustav.

Telling him to do it, provoking him—that was not what Subaru was doing. Rather, he was trying to confirm.

—That there was no such thing as a "curse rule" that held the gladiators' lives in its hands.

Gustav: "…"

Gustav was intimidating with his stern appearance and oppressive demeanor, but he believed him to be very careful in his management of the Island.

Whatever his intentions in following the instructions of the Emperor were, and despite his appearance, Gustav had managed to govern the gladiators of the Island not by violence, but with rules.

If one were to overcome Sparka and become a gladiator, because of their newfound situation, the gladiators would soften up and not become unruly. And if he were to keep them on their toes by holding Sparkas regularly, making them think that participating in another Sparka was not within their wishes, then he would not have anyone wanting to fall prey to the curse rule that laid ahead of punishment.

With that two-sided safety net, the non-existent curse rule's chain, so to speak, kept the gladiators' feet tied to the ground.

This was Subaru's understanding of the true form of the "curse rule" system that enveloped the Gladiator Island.

And whether this was correct or not, would be revealed by Gustav's subsequent actions.

If he were provoked and the existence of the curse questioned, all the rules that Gustav had laid down would be circumvented.

To prevent this, Subaru would definitely have to be punished by the curse rule.

Gustav: "…"

Subaru continued to stare at Gustav, attempting to discern the answer.

Faced with Subaru's gaze, Gustav remained silent for a while, and then—.

Gustav: "—. I shall punish you. Schwartz, I shall send you to the next Sparka."

—And so, as if giving in, Gustav did not dispossess Subaru of his life.

3

Cecilus: "That did give off the feeling of a complete victory for sure, but how are you feeling, Basu?"

As soon as they left Gustav's office, the fake Cecilus, right next to him, inquired that of him.

Seeing that carefree attitude, Subaru let out a big sigh.

Subaru: “What are you saying? Are you my enemy, Ceci? Or my ally?”

Cecilus: “Gosh, that’s an odd question. I’m the one who went to the trouble of pulling you and the deergirl out of the lake, remember? Considering that you and your companion might’ve died had I not been there, doesn’t it make my position obvious?”

Subaru: “Yeah, sure. Well, are you my enemy? Or my ally?”

Cecilus: “Which of the two do you think is more interesting?”

Subaru asked once more, paying no attention to his long, useless monologue, to which the fake Cecilus answered with a question.

It was a flippant question, making Subaru feel annoyed for a moment, but it possessed a wholly different tenor in comparison from his stare-down against Gustav.

The exchange with Gustav had been a critical turning point that could make a big difference going forward.

But, the question of the fake Cecilus was—

Subaru: “It doesn’t matter which one I say, Ceci’ll decide according to his mood at the time.”

Cecilus: “Spot on. By the way, I’ll say I’m leaning toward your side at this point. For now, my intuition’s whispering to me that it’d be more interesting to watch Basu’s bizarre activities. However, even I can’t trust my mood, so do be plenty cautious.”

Subaru: “I’d like you to at least have a good grip on your own steering wheel…”

Rather than simply being a moody person, the fake Cecilus was a very dangerous moody person.

He thought it was amazing how the protagonists of various games and manga chose their party members so well, like they were accompanied by battle freaks and berserkers.

When he thought about it, he had always struggled to select party members ever since he had come to the Empire. Because of that, Subaru felt sorry for himself.

Subaru: “My Emiliase and Beatromin deficiency’s about to reach lethal levels.”

Cecilus: “Hoho, again with the unfamiliar words. Are these also local words from Basu’s hometown?”

Subaru: “More like terms I coined, the dream substances that make up half of my being.”

Like a medicine half made of kindness, to say that half of Subaru’s being was made of affection for his loved ones would be no exaggeration. It was an exaggeration, but he would stand by it.

That was why the dialogue with Gustav earlier had been so significant.

Subaru: “It’s annoying that Ceci was right, but it certainly got the desired response.”

Cecilus: “Joining in the next punishment? Or…”

Subaru: “Naturally, I’m talking about not being killed by the curse rule. As for Sparka… Well, yeah.”

Subaru, against the wishes of His Excellency the Emperor, had publicly declared his intention to escape the Island. Seeing that Gustav had not punished him with its utilization, the invocation of the curse rule was a virtual impossibility—No, Gustav was unable to do such thing.

And because of that confirmation, he was given the punishment of participating in the next Sparka.

Cecilus: “In any case, it’s not a harsh blow for Basu, since he was planning to participate in Sparka anyways.”

Subaru: “I think it’s a bit of an exaggeration to say that I was planning to do it anyway. I wouldn’t want to participate in a scary event like Sparka if I didn’t have to.”

Cecilus: “I see, I see, got it. It’s a stock phrase to liven things up, right?”

Subaru: “It’s not though?!”

Subaru brushed the back of his molar with his tongue as he replied to the fake Cecilus’s unjust suspicion.

Should he attend another Sparka as he had this day, he would still have to rely on the “drug”. It was a depressing thought, but unavoidable.

In any case—

Subaru: “Another plan in my mind’s moved forward. I don’t know how much longer my relationship with Ceci’ll last, but don’t be… No, don’t get in my way.”

Cecilus: “I’ll keep those words in mind as they were spoken after all kinds of struggles. Now, what in the world are you going to do, Basu…?”

Subaru: “—?”

During this talk of theirs, Subaru and the fake Cecilus were descending to the living quarters where gladiators were gathered. Subaru’s eyes widened at the sound of the fake Cecilus’s strange remark, and he turned his head to look in the direction he was looking—

???: “—Schwartz-sama.”

The one to call out to Subaru, while standing at the end of the group that occupied the table in the middle of the hall, was Tanza.

In the hall where Subaru and the fake Cecilus had arrived, in the area for meals, the largest number of gladiators he had ever seen was present. And in their center, were the members of Subaru's Unit.

It seemed strange that the antisocial Weitz, the socially anxious Idra, and the reserved Tanza would be there. That Hiain, loud and full of false bravado as he was, was there was not so strange, though.

But what surprised Subaru more than the unexpectedness of such a line-up was the fact that—

Subaru: "Uhh, what's wrong with everyone? Everything got quiet all of a sudden."

Scratching his cheek, Subaru so asked of the people in the hall, wearing a forced smile.

For some reason, as soon as Subaru and the fake Cecilus entered the room, everyone went quiet and stared intently as if they were scrutinizing them.

Everyone: "…"

Keeping silent, they steadily observed Subaru and Cecilus—No, they observed Subaru.

That was the first thing that made him uncomfortable. He could understand the reason for their reaction if they had seen the fake Cecilus and sank into silence.

Because the fake Cecilus was a creepy brat, feared and hated by the gladiators.

However, it was not the fake Cecilus they were looking at, but Subaru.

Tanza: "Schwartz-sama, we have been awaiting your return."

Then, Tanza slowly approached Subaru, still puzzled over their reaction.

Her polite words made Subaru's skin crawl, as he responded "Oh, yeah". Even though Tanza's polite way of speaking was normal for her, for some reason there was a pervading feeling of tension.

Or rather, it was not Subaru and Tanza who were brimming with tension, but the atmosphere of the entire hall. The room was ill at ease, and that sense unconsciously made him choke up.

Subaru: "You said you were waiting for me to come back… Oh, you were wondering why Gustav-san called me, right? Sorry to worry you. It went fine and…"

Tanza: "No, that is inconsequential."

Subaru: "Inconsequential?!"

Tanza: "—More importantly…"

Subaru was surprised to be cut off so quickly, but was silenced by Tanza, who quickly approached him. He recoiled with an "Oof" at how forceful she had been, only to be caught from behind by the fake Cecilus.

Taking a look, Subaru saw that the fake Cecilus, who seemed as cheery as ever, had blocked his escape route, his face one that conveyed that his head was empty of thoughts. It pissed Subaru off.

Tanza: "Schwartz-sama, I have a question I would like to ask you. Would you please answer?"

Subaru: "O-ouh, um, yes, sure. If it's something I can answer…"

Tanza: "—Schwartz-sama, about your father."

Subaru: "…About my dad?"

Tanza posed him a question with a meek look on her face, and Subaru frowned, not understanding what she meant.

Tanza had come to Subaru with such momentum, putting on such important airs, querying him about his father. What was more, it seemed that the question was not being raised by Tanza, and only

Tanza.

Subaru: “…”

The heat in the gazes of the gladiators staring at Subaru was growing stronger.

Hiain, Weitz, Idra, and naturally the other gladiators too, were all holding their breath, seemingly paying undue attention to what Subaru would reply with to Tanza’s question.

None of it made any sense to him at all.

However—

Subaru: “Just so you know, if I tell you about my dad, it’ll be a long story, okay?”

Tanza: “Please try to be brief.”

Subaru: “You asked and then you put a condition on it?! Huh, come on, already!”

Scratching his head in a rough way, Subaru sullenly grumbled, “Ugh~”. But that sort of attitude did nothing to divert Tanza and the others’ interest.

Subaru did not understand why the topic of telling them about his father was brought up, but.

Subaru: “My dad’s my idol. He’s super cool, loads of people love him, and he’s always at the center of everyone’s attention. What can I say, he’s got charisma… Like he was born with the disposition of a natural leader, he’s amazing.”

Tanza: “—! Always at the center of a great number of people…”

Subaru: “He’s got a lot of people depending on him, and his work seems tough too, but he always has time for me and he teaches me a lot of things… I, you know, I respect him a whole lot. He’s super cool.”

Tanza: “…”

As he spoke, the face of his father, the face of his mother, the face of those who loved him came to mind.

Subaru felt a sudden surge of warmth behind his eyes and clutched at his chest. Now that he was in this other world, it was both joyful and very painful to remember the two of them.

But, as painful as it was, his cherished parents were the pillars that supported Subaru’s core to this day.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama, that is…”

Subaru: “Yeah…”

Tanza hesitated for a moment before saying her next words, perhaps taking what she had been in Subaru’s expression into consideration.

But, having said all this, Subaru would not be offended no matter what Tanza asked him. Thinking this, Subaru waited for Tanza’s next words, and after waiting for a while, Tanza said—

Tanza: “Your father’s name, what is it?”

Subaru: “It’s…”

Subaru tried to answer Tanza’s question, but hesitated.

With a sentimental feeling, Subaru tried to answer “Natsuki Kenichi” as usual, but this would have been a bit complicated. Since Subaru was known as “Natsuki Schwartz” on the Gladiator Island, the combination of his family name and his first name was reversed.

On the other hand, telling them another name, such as “Kenichi Schwartz”, would have added to the complications, with little benefit.

So, Subaru wavered for a moment and then said—

Subaru: “Sorry. I can’t tell you my dad’s name.”

Tanza: "—Hk."

Subaru: "Tanza?"

The moment Subaru replied, Tanza's expression stiffened in plain sight.

Her eyes were wide and wavering, and her round cheeks were tense and tight. And, though he was surprised by Tanza's reaction in front of him, that was not the only one—

Weitz: "Seems it's no joke, apparently…"

Idra: "Is it possible? Well, no, but it was that conduct that led us here."

Hiain: "S-see, I told'cha! How 'bout that, am I still crazy? Well, oi!"

The gladiators in the hall, with the members of Subaru's Unit at the helm, began to make a commotion all at once.

Their mutual exchanges of glances, and their noisy chatter brought great puzzlement to Subaru. What could be the reason as to why everyone was so surprised?

Subaru: "Umm, guys?"

Everyone: "—!"

The commotion receded as soon as Subaru called out to them.

Subaru felt a pang of loneliness there and then—

Weitz: "Schwartz, whoever ya are, we're not gonna think any different of ya…"

And so, Weitz was the first to speak to the anxious-looking Subaru.

Weitz donned scary-looking tattoos on his face and all over his body, but the words he said were out of concern for Subaru, and were probably meant to reassure him.

Idra: "I-I agree. I mean, I have come to a point of understanding.

I'm more than ready to cooperate with you… Schwartz."

Hiain: "Yeah yeah, that's right! What's the matter with'cha bastards! He ain't any different! He's a gladiator just like us, he's my bro!"

Following Weitz's words, Idra thumped his own chest, and Hiain, running up to him, put his arm around Subaru's shoulders and turned back to the gladiators as he spoke.

Idra aside, Hiain's behavior had even Subaru bewildered, but—.

???: "—Right! Great kid, that Schwartz!"

???: "I knew ya weren't some run-of-the-mill guy! That's the only way ta explain it!"

???: "Yes, the guidance of the Sword Wolf we serve! Thank you for this day's charities and fortune!"

Triggered by the words of the three members of his Unit, the silent gladiators erupted in cheers.

The voices echoing through the hall were so loud that they sounded as if they might shake the entire Gladiator Island, and Subaru's amazement intensified as they went round and round.

But before he could fully process the surprise, Subaru was being vigorously pushed by Hiain.

Hiain: "Heyhey, we haven't even finished celebratin' today's Sparka yet! Ya're the one who made the big splash this time, so make some noise, bro!"

Weitz: "Hiain, yer totally self-interested?!"

Hiain: "S'all good ain't it, come on, open up a seat for bro! Bring meat and drink!"

Pushed by Hiain, wearing a big, undignified smile, Subaru was crammed into the middle of the large crowd of gladiators.

Orson and his teammates, with whom he had fought together in today's Sparka, having returned from the healing room, were present, raising a modest toast and welcoming Subaru's arrival.

Orson: "Thank ya so much for today, Schwartz. —It was good ya were with us."

Subaru: "…"

Subaru choked on the words in his throat as he was greeted by teary-eyed lizardmen.

There was a mountain of things he wanted to say and questions he had, but the words exchanged at this moment were more than enough to reward Subaru for taking on that Sparka.

Subaru: "Thanks for saving me, too."

And so, for the first time in three days, he shared with them the bone-in-meat that was brought out, one after another.

4

Cecilus: "—Miss, aren't you going to make a racket with them?"

Tanza: "…My position is complicated."

Whilst looking over the crowd of people noisily clamoring together, Tanza mixed in a sigh with her reply to the boy who was talking to her.

A boy who looked exactly like a person she knew, with the exception of his height and the length of his limbs. She was hesitant to express her feelings to him, unknowing of how much he knew about the situation.

Naturally, that was regarding the black-haired boy's surprising identity which Hiain had brought about, but also about the complex feelings Tanza had when facing that person.

Tanza: "Yorna-sama…"

As she joined her hands together with her kimono, Tanza thought of her beloved master.

And then, with the wish Yorna harbored, the personage not unrelated to that wish, and the boy seemingly not unrelated to that person, it all kept being churned around and around, chaotically.

Only, if there was something she wanted say clearly—

Tanza: “—I have no other way but to rely on Schwartz-sama.”

Was it really okay for her to believe that? Those doubts had been removed, at least that much was true.

Even if she did not know how far they could go together, after all that.

Cecilus: “I see, your expression truly is a complicated one of being at a loss, there’s indeed a sorrow afloat, isn’t there.”

Tanza: “…”

Cecilus: “Oh dear, Basu sure is a guilty guy too, isn’t he! Well, well, however.”

She glimpsed the boy beside her, bereft of any regard to her feelings, smiling brightly out of the corner of his mouth. But, that smile appeared to be more ominous than any smile the boy had shown until now.

Tanza felt a faint shudder as she listened to the boy’s next words.

Those were—

Cecilus: “—If things don’t start moving soon, my patience’s probably going to run out. Just kidding!”

Chapter 69:
Arriving from the Imperial Capital

1

—It was hard to decide which should be considered the main event between the second Sparka and the subsequent grand banquet, but three days had passed since both had occurred.

During that time, nothing of note happened on the Gladiator Island.

What had also been an anticlimax to Subaru was that there had been no third Sparka to welcome new gladiator candidates from the outside, and none of the usual deathmatches were organized.

The usual deathmatches were a preparation for the shows, a kind of practice match so the gladiators did not lose their strength.

However, even though they were just practice matches, there was still an invariance in that it was quite possible for those who lost their focus to end up as corpses, and there were also dangerous people who were capable of producing corpses regardless of whether or not they lost their focus.

And different from the Sparka, even if he received a punishment in relation to those deathmatches, since it seemed difficult for Subaru to interfere, it would be a great help.

Hiain: “The guards’re gettin’ awfully on edge. Well, guess they’re just scared of ya bro, and us as well, ain’t that right?”

Those were Hiain’s words, who had been interpreting the atmosphere of Gladiator Island for the past few days as feeling good.

It seemed as though this lizardman was very happy that his friends had been saved during that second Sparka, and since then, his friendliness toward Subaru had risen to a different league.

It had been Subaru who had called him a bro first, but he was treated like a bro by him as well.

Subaru: “Well, I don’t feel bad in the slightest.”

Despite being stunned by his self-centered personality, Subaru warmly welcomed Hiain’s attitude.

It would be more comfortable for everyone to get along peacefully, rather than have everyone on edge. The softening of Hiain’s attitude had been very striking, but there had been a change in Weitz’s and Idra’s attitudes as well.

Weitz had substantial trust in him, and Idra displayed some vague respect; that, was how they had been treating Subaru.

And that change in attitude was spreading to the gladiators on the Island in a positive way.

So then—

???: “Yo, Schwartz, ya got a good look in yer eyes today!”

???: “Ya’re overflowin’ with fightin’ spirit!”

???: “The guards really deplore ya. At this rate, they’ll lose all their Gladiator Beasts!”

The number of people who talked to Subaru in such a cheerful and friendly manner had increased tremendously.

His impression concerning this had been the same it had been as towards Hiain, so Subaru gave it a warm welcome. With the people he could talk to being as many as possible, it was easier for Subaru to gather the information he needed.

For now, the present situation was such that Subaru could forget about Gustav’s “curse rule”, since the information that Subaru wanted the most was—

Subaru: “—The control tower for the drawbridge.”

The sole means connecting the Island to the outside. How could he operate the dropbridge and enter the control tower?

Right now, that information was what Subaru desired most.

Subaru: “The control tower itself’s in plain view of everyone, but it seems like you can’t get inside…”

The control tower itself stood proudly on the island side, in the vicinity of the drawbridge.

There weren’t any guards posted at all, but the entrance was secured with a very impressive lock, and it was impossible to open the large metal door without obtaining the key.

Over the last few days, they had been trying to locate the key, but since Gustav apparently operated the drawbridge himself, it was very likely that the key was on his person.

Subaru: “Ummm, we’d stand little chance squaring up against Gustav-san.”

As a matter of fact, Gustav’s strength was quite unknown even to Subaru.

In appearance, he was equipped with four arms, after all. Besides, he had been entrusted with the management of the Gladiator Island, and given his position, that of ruling over the rough-and-tumble gladiators, there was no way he was weak.

Of course, if they fought one time, he could assess if Gustav was strong or weak, but—.

Subaru: “I don’t want to aggravate Gustav-san in the first place…”

From his standpoint, Subaru and Gustav had a confrontational relationship as a gladiator and Chief, but Subaru personally did not dislike Gustav.

In fact, in the Empire, where many people were rather difficult to talk to, he had never once raised his voice to Subaru. So, his impression of Gustav was that he was a valuable person whom he could have a proper talk with.

At least, it was much better than the fake Cecilus, who hovered on the border between friend and foe.

So, the ideal course of action would be to sneak in and steal the key from Gustav.

Subaru: “However, I don’t want to be hanging around Gustav-san’s side like Ceci.”

Now that the curse rule was no longer binding him, it seemed that Gustav, who was faithful to his duties, was no longer a danger to Subaru in a sense. Even so, Subaru was not as brazen as to be careless enough to go around openly looking for or asking about the whereabouts of the key.

The worst-case scenario for Subaru was that Gustav would find Subaru a nuisance, lock him up somewhere on the Island, and prevent him from doing anything.

If that came to pass, Subaru would have to fall back on the last resort behind his molar.

So then—

Subaru: “We’ll just have to keep investigating little-by-little.”

Scratching his head, Subaru grumbled as his lips pursed at the challenges that lay ahead.

In order to get information about the drawbridge, Subaru was investigating the people in control—in other words, the guards watching over the gladiators.

The guards who followed Gustav at the top were fewer in number than the gladiators on the Island, but their presence gave the impression that they were strong Imperial Soldiers, with little room for weakness or vulnerability.

Gustav’s guidance and instructions seemed to be so thorough, that even if the child Subaru attempted to talk to them, the guards would become more alert, rather than relax their guard. Perhaps this was due to the precedent set by the fake Cecilus, a child even less lovable than Subaru.

Either way, it was very difficult to get information from the guards.

Whether Gustav had also conveyed information on what Subaru was up to or not, wherever he was, their stern gazes would be directed at him, so perhaps he had made a bit of a mistake.

Although he had been trying to get to the bottom of the curse rule, it had caused Gustav to become alarmed.

Subaru: “If I had been punished for a different reason than that… Nah, no use in saying it.”

While reflection was important, nothing of value came forth from regret.

Regret was only what he wanted to do. Unfortunately, Subaru had no time to feel sorry for his own stupidity. No minute or second should be wasted.

If one guard gave him the cold shoulder, he would only have to tackle tens, hundreds of others.

Subaru: “Right, a great man once said that picking up girls is all about the amount. Even though I’m not picking up girls.”

With his fists clenched, Subaru referenced the words of the pros in different disciplines to help him regain his bearings.

And with that, walking about the Island briskly to make the guards in some other area hate him,

???: “Yer a restless guy, Schwartz…”

Subaru: “What, Weitz?”

Speaking in a low voice to Subaru as he walked around looking for the guards, was Weitz.

Seeing Weitz sitting on the ground, leaned against a wall, Subaru tilted his head. Their location was near the passageway connecting to the gladiatorial arena. However, the gladiatorial arena was not accessible outside of Sparka or on the occasion of a deathmatch, so an iron gate was lowered in the corridor.

In other words, this day was filled with nothing but dead-ends.

Subaru: “What are you doing in a place like this? Hide-and-seek?”

Weitz: “I dunno what that is, but prolly not… I came to see what’s going on in the basement, for a tad…”

Subaru: “Basement… Oh, over there.”

Weitz jerked his chin, and Subaru turned to glance in that direction.

Right next to the passageway to the gladiatorial arena, there was a door connecting to the basement of the Island. As per his knowledge, the Island floated atop a lake, so the basement did not lead anywhere.

Rather, it was more-or-less connected to the outside world, however —

Subaru: “It’s just a direct connection to the lake, so its purpose is to dump the bodies, they said.”

Weitz: “Gladiators and Gladiator Beasts that die in the deathmatches… They’re lumped together… If we’d lost, we would’ve been fish food in the same way…”

Subaru: “That gives me the shudders.”

By fish food, he was talking about the aquatic Witchbeasts that inhabited the lake.

Rather savage ones were loose there seemingly; the most common causes of death on Gladiator Island were deathmatches, but the second most common cause of death was falling prey to the Witchbeasts, whether by accident or by trying to escape.

Subaru, too, would become no more than fodder for those Witchbeasts were he unable to utilize the drawbridge.

Weitz: "Have ya heard… the story of the gladiator who escaped from the Island, in the past…?"

Subaru: "Huh? Oh, yeah, I heard. I heard it was because of what happened with that person, the previous Chief was fired, and Gustav-san was chosen as the new Chief."

Weitz: "Those poor conditions've improved… but now, the position of gladiator's become stable… What do ya think…?"

Subaru: "What do I think…?"

Weitz: "Should we… resign ourselves to the position of gladiator, to the position of being ruled over…?"

Subaru: "…"

Weitz's words made Subaru check to see if anyone was nearby on reflex.

Weitz's statement just now had been quite out-of-line for a gladiator of the Gladiator Island. If a guard with poor character were to hear it, it would be enough of an excuse to give him a warning.

Regardless, Weitz would probably be looked upon more harshly than other gladiators because he was in the same Unit as Subaru.

Subaru: "Uhh, Weitz, I think you shouldn't be too careless about what you say. It's fine with me, but I wonder what other people might think about it."

At that, Subaru tried to correct Weitz's thinking.

If it were only Subaru getting caught up in the next Sparka, there would be ways to deal with the situation. However, if Weitz were to be added to the mix, the level of difficulty would rise dramatically.

But, in response to Subaru's thoughts, "Schwartz…" Weitz continued, Weitz: "Why do ya think I went to the basement… It's so I can help ya…"

Subaru: "—Uh."

Weitz: "Ya intend on getting outta here… And, and I'm also going with'cha… I'm not gonna stay here as a gladiator… I owe ya a debt, too…"

While saying that, Weitz slowly rose to his feet.

Then, on his tattoo-covered face, he directed earnest eyes toward Subaru. Being gazed at intently by those eyes, Subaru gulped and stiffened up.

The atmosphere was not one to be making jokes about, or to deceive someone.

Subaru: "Weitz, I…"

Weitz: "I know who ya are…"

Subaru: "Huh?"

Weitz: "But, that ain't the point… Don't get me confused with Hiain and his sweet-talking… I ain't interested in the crown ya wear… I just wanna lend ya my strength. Remember that…"

The hairs on Subaru's body stood on end upon those words of Weitz, saying that he knew his true identity. But what Weitz said after that, made Subaru's whole body go numb. Even if Subaru was a nobody, Weitz had stated he would pay his debt, and lend him his strength.

That is, that is extremely—

Subaru: "…Reassuring, Weitz."

Weitz: "Hm…"

When Subaru gave a thumbs-up and laughed, Weitz looked away and sniffed his nose. Subaru took this not-at-all honest reaction in good humor, as it was typical of Weitz.

The reason why Weitz had come to explore the underground had been to find a way to operate the drawbridge—to help out Subaru, who was searching for a way to escape outside.

In the end, there was nothing of that sort here, and as expected, there was no way to leave aside from the drawbridge, and so it seemed the conclusion was for them to return to their original method.

Then, something happened at the moment Subaru reached that conclusion.

Subaru: "—Hk, this shaking!"

Weitz: "Is it the drawbridge…"

As a tremor seemed to shake from below the earth, and a low sound shakily resounded, Subaru and Weitz exchanged glances, having reached the same conclusion.

There were only two possible options for a big mechanism that could shake the entire Gladiator Island, those being the gladiatorial arena and the drawbridge. And, since the passage leading to the gladiatorial arena was already closed off in Subaru and Weitz's vicinity, the drawbridge was the only natural candidate.

Subaru: "Another new group of people…"

For people to arrive meant that the next Sparka would also begin.

Weitz looked at Subaru, who muttered to himself while experiencing a thirst in his mouth. Receiving Weitz's gaze, Subaru displayed a smile.

As if to reassure him that there was nothing to worry about.

Subaru: "—. Let's go take a look…"

Whether his smile had bore any effect or not, and how Weitz felt, it was impossible to tell, as the latter turned his back on him. But, following behind a Weitz who spoke scant words, him and Subaru ascended from the lower stratum of the Island to the middle stratum, and then to the high ground overlooking the drawbridge.

Subaru: “It’d be nice to see the entrance to the tower open and close if possible, though…”

???: “Schwartz-sama, over here.”

Subaru: “Tanza.”

A young girl’s voice called out to Subaru, as he wiped the sweat from his chin, short of breath as he rushed up the stairs. Tanza, who had reached the high ground earlier, waved her hand, and Subaru and Weitz joined her.

While Tanza was taking notice of Weitz,

Tanza: “It seems you were with Weitz-sama.”

Subaru: “We happened to meet downstairs and had an embarrassing conversation… What about you Tanza?”

Tanza: “…I was examining the tower. As expected, it seems that the key is in Gustav-sama’s possession.”

Subaru: “Ugh, I knew it.”

Tanza also knew that it was necessary to operate the drawbridge in order to escape the Island. Since they also both knew about the curse rule, the two children were conspiring to get off the Island together.

However, right then was when Weitz suddenly interjected,

Weitz: “If ya wanna take the key away… Should we fight with numbers…?”

Subaru: “That plan is awfully shortsighted! Most likely, you’ll get hit by the curse rule if you try something so reckless.”

Tanza: “—Huh.”

Weitz: “That’s right…”

Weitz’s shortsighted suggestion was dissuaded by Subaru using the curse rule as a pretext.

Hearing this, Tanza’s eyes widened, so Subaru put a finger to her mouth to quiet her.

The truth that there was actually no curse rule, was something he had yet to confide in anyone other than Tanza. Of course, the fake Cecilus who happened to be present in that place also knew, but on the other hand, the fake Cecilus had no friends to talk to about it with, so there were no concerns about the information spreading.

However, Subaru believed that this was a truth that would be very frightening to spread.

Subaru: “Part of the reason why the gladiators are so behaved is because of the curse rule.”

There were no major complaints about their treatment, since there was a curse rule which if disobeyed, would cost them their lives.

That was the reason the gladiators in Ginunhive were ruled so obediently by Gustav. If it turned out that there was no curse rule, people who thought similarly to Weitz would emerge.

Should that happen, an all-out war would begin between the gladiator side and the administration side.

In terms of numbers, despite the casualties, the gladiator side would perhaps win, however—.

Subaru: “Every guard’s got a Witchbeast with a broken horn, so they can deal a ton of damage.”

Not only were the Gladiator Island’s guards themselves strong, but the fact that they were accompanied by Witchbeasts was also a troublesome aspect of the guards.

Since all the Gladiator Beasts used in Sparka were Witchbeasts kept by the guards, there were still many more like the lion and rat, which Subaru and the others had found difficult to defeat.

That was why, they would be in trouble if Weitz were to become impatient at this juncture.

Tanza: “It seems to me, however, that it is not very practical to wait until Schwartz-sama has defeated all the Gladiator Beasts in Sparka.”

Subaru: “That’s just as reckless as it sounds… First of all, if the Gladiator Beasts were replenished, my spirit would be broken. I’m not planning that kind of strategy.”

Tanza: “If that is the case…”

Subaru: “I’ve been considering a lot of things, so don’t worry. You don’t have to believe me, but please trust my feelings that there are people I definitely want to see.”

Understanding that the secret was to be kept from Weitz, Tanza kept silent after Subaru said that. She slightly cast her eyes down, then continued, “Those that you wish to see”,

Tanza: “Are they, your family?”

Subaru: “Hmm? Well, they’re people as important to me as family, and there’s even a girl I like.”

Subaru replied to the slightly delayed question with a tilt of his head.

Having heard that, Tanza’s lips still moved as if she wanted to say something. Although, before she could say anything, Weitz pointed to the drawbridge below, saying, “Look…”.

From their side and the side over yonder, from both ends the drawbridge was activated, and the new residents of the Gladiator Island would be coming this way.

Subaru: “What kind of people will these new arrivals be…? Surely they aren’t Weitz’s or Idra’s acquaintances this time.”

Weitz: “Anyone who knows my face, I’d be fine with them all dying…”

Subaru: “Please don’t say such scary and lonely—”

Things, just as he tried to say that, he saw a carriage coming across the drawbridge, clearly.

The carriage was pulled by an armored black Galewind Horse, but there was something a little different about it from the one three days earlier, the difference being in how docile the people riding in the carriage were.

Last time, Hiain’s friends, Orson and the others, seemed to be riding obediently in the carriage, but the people this time were not like that. —Someone was standing on the roof of the carriage.

On the roof of the swaying carriage, with brown skin, was a slender-bodied woman—.

Subaru: “—Hk?!”

As soon as Subaru saw that face and the distinctive features of her appearance, he stifled a scream in the back of his throat, and hurriedly crouched down in place. Hiding behind the railing, he made his body smaller.

His heart was beating at a tremendous rate and the sound of blood pumping through his head was explosive.

Tanza: “S-Schwartz-sama? Is there something wrong, being like that all of a sudden…”

Subaru: “Tha…”

Tanza: “Tha?”

Subaru: “That, woman… is bad news.”

Next to Subaru as he crouched, Tanza, having similarly crouched down, widened her eyes.

But, Subaru could not afford to be concerned about Tanza's surprise.

Weitz: "Woman… That woman…?"

Hearing Subaru's mutterings, Weitz, leaning against the railing, looked toward the drawbridge. Even Weitz's eyes seemed to see the person on the roof of the incoming carriage.

Weitz did not seem to know who the woman was, but Subaru was aware of her identity. And being aware of that, he thought it was the worst possible time for her to be there.

That carriage, or at least the woman on the roof, was not a candidate for the next Sparka.

After all, the identity of that woman was—

Subaru: "—The name doesn't come to mind quickly, but she's a Divine General."

Because, she was an overwhelmingly strong woman, donning silver hair and an eyepatch, someone who had gone on a rampage in Guaral before.

2

???: "The visitors this time aren't gladiators, but apparently messengers from the Imperial Capital."

That, had been Idra's report, which he had heard leak from a guard.

Subaru and his comrades had been watching the arrival of the carriages from a vantage point, but the shock brought on by the woman on the roof—by that transcendent enemy, was too great.

???: "That woman noticed me and looked this way…"

Next to Subaru, who had immediately crouched down, Weitz, watching the carriage finish crossing the drawbridge in his stead, had his voice tremble upon witnessing something unbelievable.

Their impression was that they were a hundred meters away, but to feel a gaze, even from there, was monstrous. Subaru was right to squat, since she had looked in Weitz's direction, per his own words.

Of course, even if she were to look at Subaru now, she would probably not recognize him.

Tanza: "Half-dogperson, Divine General… In all likelihood, she is General First-Class Arakiya, I am certain."

???: “Ya also know her, Tanza?”

Tanza: “…She is one of the people who previously targeted Yorna-sama of Chaosflame. I did not see it with my own eyes, but I heard that she covered an entire city block in flames.”

???: “Y-ya’re just makin’ a tasteless joke. Right?”

Hiain tried to laugh off the seriousness in Tanza’s voice. But, there was no one present who could laugh it off.

Subaru, in particular, had received a considerable impact.

Subaru: “Guys who are just plain strong are usually the most troublesome for me.”

Subaru had a chance to win if there was an opening to be taken advantage of, or if the opponent could be managed with a little ingenuity.

However, when it came to opponents with simply too big of a gap in ability, he would be out of strategies. They were strong, after all. Cheap tricks did not work on strong opponents.

It was the privilege of a strong person to trample upon all his preparations.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama, please do not be too pessimistic. Since she is a messenger from the Imperial Capital, it should not mean that there will be anything happening involving us. To declare them as an enemy now is…”

Subaru: “Too premature, huh. Yeah, yes, that makes sense. That totally tracks, but…”

Tanza: “…”

Subaru: “I can’t help but think of the worst-case scenario… You get me?”

Hugging his thin arms, Subaru answered that to Tanza who had encouraged him.

He appreciated Tanza's sentiment, and he was sure that she did not want to make enemies of the Nine Divine Generals herself. To put it mildly, Arakiya was as strong, if not stronger, than Yorna.

Being trapped on an Island like this, Subaru felt that he could not fight against such an opponent at the top-level of strength.

Hiain: "B-but why're ya so worried, bro? If that party came from the Imperial Capital…"

Idra: "Hiain, don't you get it? Right now, the Empire's split in two."

Hiain: "Huh? Ah, ahh! Damnit, so that's it…!"

Besides Subaru, who was deep in thought, Hiain and Idra were also discussing with serious expressions.

Subaru did not quite understand the flow of their conversation, but he did not have time to worry about it.

In fact, it was more likely that Subaru was overthinking it.

Subaru: "At the moment, I don't think that Tanza or I are that woman's…"

Tanza: "General First-Class Arakiya."

Subaru: "Arakiya's objective."

Even if Subaru and his comrades were somewhat conspicuous on the Island, it was unlikely that they were well-known outside it. And even if they were, it would be him, in this form.

It would be unreasonable for that to be considered a problem. Even if Olbart would want to do something about Abel, he could not think of any reason for Olbart to care about Subaru or Tanza.

Tanza: "So, for what purpose did a messenger come from the Imperial Capital to the Island?"

Weitz: “Thinking ’bout it… Perhaps for the Island’s show…?”

Tanza: “Show… That is the original purposeof the Gladiator Island.”

Weitz and Tanza came up with a possible reason for Arakiya’s visit.

The Island’s shows, the original role of the Gladiator Island Ginunhive, was to make a spectacle of deathmatches between gladiators for spectators who hailed from other places.

It was an event in poor taste, but Subaru had heard that it helped to curb the fearsome desires of the people of the Empire.

Hiain: “If we have a show, a-are they gonna make us fight again…? But, with the rebellion happenin’ and all the panic everywhere, why’d they do it at a time like this?”

Idra: “There’s also the idea that it’d be precisely because times are like that. The purpose is to enforce the thought that the people of the Empire must be strong, in a situation where the Empire’s shaking…”

Weitz: “His Excellency the Emperor’s thoughts, huh…”

With Hiain’s voice cracking, Idra’s persuasive thoughts, and Weitz’s grave mutterings, the eyes of each one of them turned towards Subaru.

It was as if they were expecting Subaru to know the answer, but Subaru did not have the answer either. Subaru had no choice but to shake his head.

Subaru: “I think both Hiain’s and Idra’s ideas are possible. But…”

Weitz: “But?”

Subaru: “I wonder if the Emperor really cares about this place…”

Subaru already knew that the Emperor, who was giving orders in the Imperial Capital, was a fake.

Real and fake were both in Chaosflame, and since there was a rebellion going on, it was unlikely that Abel had returned without Subaru's knowledge.

So, as designation was that they were from the Imperial Capital, it had to be the fake Emperor's idea. It was hard to believe that Vincent, the fake Emperor who could devise a plan virtually as good as Abel's, would waste his time and energy on useless things.

Subaru: "There has to be a reason for this, absolutely."

What reason would they, and not the Abel who was supposed to be the real Emperor, possess, to send a Divine General to this lake Island stranded from the entire world.

Tanza: "General First-Class Arakiya, she did not barge in with a large group of people, did she?"

Subaru: "Yeah…"

Tanza: "I only saw it from a distance too, but it was a single carriage that came. There were at most five or six people. The only one that stood out was the General First-Class."

Subaru: "Is… that so?"

Eyes downcast, Tanza stumbled over the same thing as Subaru, not knowing what the other party was up to.

One could say that they were overthinking things and that they should just keep their heads down and wait for the storm to pass. That could also be a way to see it.

Weitz: "How 'bout, if ya think 'bout it the other way 'round… Hide in the carriage that the messenger rode in, and leave the Island…"

Subaru: "The hiding in the carriage bit, I believe that was already done back in Chaosflame."

Tanza: "I would be fine with the same method, as long as it works more than once…"

Weitz's suggestion was taken seriously by Subaru and Tanza. But Hiain, who was listening to the three of them, said in a loud voice, “Wait, wait, wait!”.

The gray-scaled lizardman made them turn to him with his loud voice and,

Hiain: “Are ya seriously thinkin’ ’bout leavin’ the Island? Are ya nuts?! Ya’re gonna die!”

Weitz: “If ya stay here, ya’ll eventually die fighting something, idiot…”

Hiain: “But not today or tomorrow!! Schwartz… Bro, I need ya!”

Subaru: “I don’t intend to stay here forever, either. I mean, I don’t want to stay forever.”

Hiain quivered as his big mouth, lined with tiny fangs, gasped at Subaru’s plan. Perhaps, from Hiain’s point-of-view, he would be more comfortable living on the island than out there.

It was not an overstatement to say that, once someone got over Sparka and became a gladiator, their life was safe outside of deathmatches. It was understandable that one might be tempted to think like that.

Hiain: “Pipsqueak! Idra! Damn ya…”

Tanza: “Like Schwartz-sama, I have my own reasons for not wanting to remain here any longer.”

Idra: “I-I… would get out if I could, is what I think.”

Hiain’s words, who seemed to believe himself in an unfavorable position, received these responses from Tanza and Idra. Despite the differences between positive and reluctant responses, neither of them had positive feelings about the Gladiator Island.

Although, it was hard for Hiain to believe.

Hiain: “Th-There’s a limit to how reckless ya can be with yer life…!”

Subaru: “I’m sorry to put you on the spot, Hiain, but I want you to think about it too. Should you stay here forever?”

Hiain: “…”

Hiain looked at Subaru and the others, his eyes similar to as if he were looking at something terrifying.

But Hiain would know this, were he to think long and hard about it. The peace of mind and safety that they could get here was only a stepping stone, reached only after sacrificing many things.

Hiain: “…Even if ya leave, what are ya gonna do about the curse rule?”

After giving up with his knee-jerk denial, that had been Hiain’s next move.

The unseen chains that bound the gladiators of the Gladiator Island, the main reason why the gladiators still remained there, was something that Weitz too, had mentioned.

That they had already been neutralized, was something he did not want to say until the very end. But, as he remained cautious of that, Hiain continued to doubt Subaru and everyone else’s sanity.

So, Subaru thought to at least make him slacken his caution a little bit.

Subaru: “I’ll do something about the curse rule, too. In fact, I’ve got a hint on how to do it.”

Hiain: “—Hk?! About the curse rule?”

Subaru: “Yeah.”

Subaru nodded with a confident look on his face, indicating that it was not a good idea to waste any more time here.

The answer surprised not only Hiain, but also Weitz and Idra. Only Tanza, who was already aware that there was no curse rule, quietly observed the scene without saying anything.

Subaru could not speak the truth, but his chest puffing out here would aid in dispelling Hiain and the others' fears. Ergo, Subaru could not show a lack of confidence.

Even if Arakiya's objectives as an emissary remained unknown—.

Subaru: "Surely, I'll find a way to get off this island. So—"

When that time comes, I'll need your strength. —Was what he had wanted to say at that time.

But, Subaru did not say those words.

To be more accurate, it no longer made sense to continue them.

Hiain: "—Hk."

There was the sound of a snatched breath escaping, and Hiain collapsed, his eyes bloodshot.

Subaru: "…"

Trembling, slitted-pupil eyes bleeding, Hiain's large body toppled sideways.

Without any forewarning, Subaru was unable to react quickly to such a sudden and unexpected event, and was unable to support Hiain as he collapsed.

Subaru: "H… iain?"

With a heavy thud, Hiain's body fell limp to the floor of the common room. After collapsing, Hiain was motionless. All he did was spasm, his limbs twitching.

It was like a cicada, he thought. Like cicadas in the middle of summer, overturned on the road.

Hiain was dying, moving like a cicada.

—Hiain was not the only one.

Subaru: "…Ah."

There was a sound, light in comparison to the sound of Hiain falling, and Subaru turned around, stunned.

The three who had been talking to Subaru, Idra, Weitz, and Tanza, all lay on the floor, convulsing and trembling in the same way.

Subaru: “Tanza?”

He did not understand a thing. Not a single one, rendering him unable to react.

Crouching right next to the collapsed Tanza, he turned her slumped body over. Tears of blood streamed from Tanza’s eyes while she lay limp, her head slumped over.

Blood was running from her eyes, nose and ears too, dripping onto the floor with a trickle.

Subaru: “Eek!”

And, Subaru’s throat squealed, causing him to drop Tanza’s body.

He rushed to check on the other three. All of them had stopped moving, bleeding from their eyes and noses.

Subaru: “Wh…”

Why, a questioning voice started making a tremendous sound in his head.

Whywhywhy, Subaru’s head was whirling, the ringing in his ears was immensely loud, as his mind was filled with questions as to why and how the scene before him made no sense.

The feeling of his head splitting open was about to engulf Subaru—.

Subaru: “N-no…”

Holding his own head, Subaru looked up.

A sharp, intense pain struck his head, and blood trickled from Subaru’s nose. The ringing in his ears did not stop, and there was also a sensation of blood seeping out.

The sequence of events, was different. Subaru suffered from the same pain as Tanza and the others had, although slower.

He wondered, what the meaning of it was.

Subaru: “This… doesn’t make sense…”

Propping himself up with his hands to the floor and against the wall, Subaru managed to stand up. He got up and went out into the hallway to see what was going on.

Inside the room, Tanza and the others were already beyond hope. And, it was not just Tanza and the others that were beyond hope. Many, many more were.

Subaru: “…”

The adjacent common room, the passageways here and there, the main hall, the drawbridge area, everyone in them had been beyond hope.

With limping feet, flickering eyes, and the contents of his head feeling as if they were melting out of his ears, Subaru, his clothes covered in blood, looked around the Island.

Everyone, was dead. Absolutely everybody, was dead.

They were all dead, bleeding from the eyes, nose, and ears. They were all dead. Dead.

Subaru: “Why?”

So suddenly, the gladiators, the guards, and everyone else had died without any exception.

Everyone, and so suddenly.

Subaru: “Why?”

Everyone was gone. Suddenly, unexpectedly.

Unable to believe it, and unable to accept it, he had no choice but to totter and ask.

To whom, if one may wonder, then to the sky. If not to the sky, then to the water.

Subaru: “Wh—”

???: “—Hey.”

Suddenly, someone answered Subaru’s voice, which no one should have been able to answer.

Suddenly, without warning, Subaru had been left behind on an island where everyone had died abruptly. He himself was bleeding from both his nose and ears, making him worried. Scared.

So, at the sound of someone who might give him an answer, Subaru turned around, and then.

???: “—Hey you, what are you doing in a place like this?”

There stood a man that caused Subaru to freeze instantly, right after making him feel saved.

3

???: “As you can see, I’d thought every guy on the Island had died, but…”

While saying that, the man with the black bandana cracked the joints in his neck.

With his bright orange hair collected in a bandana decorated with lines of red, the slender silhouette wore the appearance of an Imperial Soldier.

At first glance, the impression his face gave off was that he was friendly. However, that was a terrible misunderstanding. Do not be deceived.

Both his gentle-looking face, and his voice that sounded as if he wanted to be good friends, were complete fabrications.

The name of the man who fabricated such things was—

Subaru: "—Todd."

Subaru, who was supposedly having an increasingly, albeit minutely so, harder time opening the drawer of his memories, had stored that name in a place so important that he could easily retrieve it.

Then, if one were to ask why that name was important.

Todd: "—. Hey you, why do you know my name?"

Because, upon being called out with only that single word, his attitude did a complete one-eighty. That was why the man closing the distance between them was a dangerous person.

Taking long strides, the man—Todd, was lumbering in Subaru's direction. Even if he tried to hurriedly run away from Todd, his body, having become worn-out on its own, would not permit him to do so.

His back had been immediately caught up to, and Subaru's body was violently forced against the wall.

Subaru: "Ouch…!"

Todd: "I sure don't recognize you. I never forget a face once I've seen it, but this is really a face I don't know. —No."

His face being forced against the wall of the building, there was a rough sensation on his cheek. Whilst Subaru writhed from the relentless pain, Todd's nose drew close to his hair.

Just like that, Todd sniffed his nose and got a whiff of Subaru's hair.

Todd: "Hey kid, you smell like a scary guy I know."

Subaru trembled as he was spoken to in a low voice, regarding just who Todd was talking about. It was just as if it were a combination technique, one that mixed the feeling that the one being referred to was himself, along with the unpleasant feelings that arose when facing Todd.

If possible, his face was a face he had wished to never encounter again, so then just why was it like this? Why was he on the Island?

Subaru: “Why, is…”

Todd, a man who should have fled from Guaral, in this place?

Come to think of it, as of his escape, Todd had taken the captured Arakiya along with him. He should have realized it. If Arakiya was here, then Todd was possibly present as well.

Something like that was absurd. Just because they had escaped together, did not mean something like being together in the next location was guaranteed.

Why? How? I don’t like it. It’s scary. Why, is, Todd, here?

Subaru: “Why has, everyone…”

Todd: “Been killed? Hey, I can’t answer that sort of thing. From my point of view, you surviving was a miscalculation. Well, if I leave it as-is then it’ll just be a matter of time, but…”

Subaru: “—Gulp.”

Todd: “Time and chance and whatnot, I’d dislike leaving it all up to stuff like that, you see.”

As Todd’s voice whispered close to his ear, something cold was gently pressed against his neck. It was the blade of the large knife that Todd had drawn from his waist.

A knife that seemed as if it could be used to flay the skin off a large animal, extreme to the point he thought if it was given even a slightly firm tug, then not only would Subaru’s neck be cut, but his entire head would probably come right off.

And, it seemed that even if his opponent was a child, Todd would certainly not hesitate.

Only—

Subaru: "…"

There was an highly unlikely scenario.

One in which Todd would not kill Subaru—No, one in which he would not kill him here, and possibly put it off for later. A possibility that he would try to enquire Subaru about something. If that were to happen, then things would become irreversible.

Things would become irreversible, a hopeless possibility.

That was why, he would sooner—

Todd: "Wait."

Subaru: "—Hk."

His head was aching, his nosebleed would not cease.

In the midst of the sensation of his consciousness wavering due to his loss of blood, to somehow make use of his last resort, Subaru fumbled his tongue around at his molars.

The subsequent instant, Todd thrust his fingers into Subaru's mouth.

Subaru: "—Ah."

Having the inside of his mouth invaded against his will with violence, Subaru squirmed with all his might. His stomach was going to regurgitate its contents. However, not worried about anything, Todd continued to move his fingers around.

Then, together with the regurgitated meal, he dragged that out.

Todd: "…What's this? No way, is this poison?"

Subaru: "…"

Todd: "Oioi, just what kind of brat are you? To go out of your way to prepare poison in your mouth, that's for committing suicide when you're down on your knees, isn't it? There's gotta be something wrong with you, for you to treat your life like this."

While wiping his dirty fingers on Subaru's clothes, Todd brazenly said that.

Though, it did not feel like he was making fun of him. He was seriously unable to believe Subaru's thoughts; that was the feeling his attitude gave off.

It was just as if to say that suicide was a foolish thought.

Todd: "I guess that's about right. It's not like I particularly care if you suffer. Feel free to use it."

Subaru: "Is, that…"

Todd: "Ah, if you'll die, then even suicide's fine. Then I'll also complete this without dirtying my knife."

With that evidence, Todd shrugged his shoulders, and put the wrapped "drug" back into Subaru's mouth.

Carefully placing it on one of his molars, in a position so that if he bit down with force the package would tear. Then the contents would leak out, and Subaru's life would be snuffed out. That, he understood.

Todd: "I'm fine with either. As long as you die."

Grabbing his shoulders, he spun Subaru around to face him.

With Todd's form right before his eyes, Subaru's back was pressed against the wall. One way or another, he wanted to retaliate against Todd with a retort, but his body was rapidly losing strength, and he went numb.

Slowly, the same Death that Tanza and the others had experienced, was eating into Subaru.

Why that came so, so slowly, he did not understand, however.

Todd: “Running out of time, suicide, or knife.”

Subaru: “…”

Todd: “Choose.”

The destination ahead remaining unchanged, Todd raised three fingers as he pressed Subaru for an answer.

Extremely, extremely silently, Subaru abhorred Todd.

Tanza, Hiain, Weitz, Idra, had all died.

Orson and the others, Old Man Null, even the guards, everyone had died.

For what reason, was Todd alive? For what reason, was Subaru also going to die?

Subaru: “—Hk.”

While experiencing these thoughts tearing away at his chest so, so terribly, Subaru bit down hard on his molars.

The package tore, and the “drug” contained inside leaked out. Gradually, that flowed into the crevices of his tongue and teeth, it flowed in, and then—.

Subaru: “—Buaah.”

A large quantity of blood filled his mouth, and resolutely, he spit it out towards Todd who stood before him.

To take him down along with himself, his intentions were not anything like that. Feeling vengeful, he thought to soil his clothes. However, Todd’s perception was excellent. The instant Subaru readied himself, he flew to the side.

Because of that, the blood did not hit him. So, having merely spat blood out, Subaru collapsed.

Collapsed, he collapsed, and then, and then, and then—.

Subaru: “Ah, uh, ah, ooooah…!”

As his whole body was quaking in fear, the poison circulated with incredible vigor.

From his nose and from his ears, blood poured out with more vigor than ever before, his eyes swelled up, bulging to the extent it seemed like they would explode, and in unison, both the flesh and bones of his body started to groan.

No, it only sounded like they were groaning. His whole body, was screaming.

Subaru: “Uh, guh, gugueh, gueeeeh…!”

The heat was akin to blood burning. The heat, was akin to being plunged into a boiling pot.

His whole body was boiling, just as if he had been skinned, and then things like wasabi, mustard, and all sorts of other spicy substances were being thoroughly smeared all over his body, just as if a mountain worth of needles were stabbing into him, just as if his whole body was being scraped away on a fine grater, it hurt, it hurt, it hurt, it hurt.

With only pain, he started wanting to die.

With only suffering, he started wanting to die.

Todd: “Hey you, there’s gotta be something wrong with you.”

As he fearfully struggled like a fish that had been reeled in, he headed towards death.

While looking at Subaru drowning in a sea of blood, Todd was muttering something. Whatever he was saying, Subaru could not understand, he did not understand, it was not something he could understand.

He could not understand anything, anymore. He could not understand, any—.

Todd: “—If you’re using poison to kill yourself, wouldn’t you normally prepare one that wouldn’t make you suffer?”

The voice, was distant; his consciousness, went white.

And yet, until the very end, until, the end, the pain, and the suffering, and the blood was, bloodwasbloodwasbloodwas, bloodbloodbloodbloodblood, bludbludbludblud, blud—.

There was a pop, and blood, and his eyes could not see.

4

???: “I know who ya are…”

Subaru: “…”

???: “But, that ain’t the point… Don’t get me confused with Hiain and his sweet-talking… I ain’t interested in the crown ya wear… I just wanna lend ya my strength. Remember that…”

Whittling away at his whole body, was roasting, burning, pain.

Just when he felt such pain suddenly come to an end, Subaru found himself within chilly, cold air.

And then—

Subaru: “Ah, ah…”

Weitz: “Schwartz…?”

Subaru: “AAAAAHH—!!!”

Cradling his own body on the spot, Subaru opened his mouth wide and screamed.

Screamed, he screamed, trying to expel the poison from within him. He tried to expel the poison that should no longer be present in his body. He got the feeling it yet remained, a poison which brought the end through death.

A deadly poison that would make Subaru suffer, it would make him suffer, it would certainly bring him death.

No matter how many times he tasted it—.

Subaru: “Gah, hu, AHHHHHHH…!”

The Death brought about by that drug, was a reminder to Subaru that there was no easy way to die, the guardian of the last bastion from which he must never escape from.

Chapter 70:
One Thing

1

—The most important thing for him when asking Old Man Null for a “drug”, had been its reliability.

For starters, Old Man Null wasn’t exactly an eager student of medicine.

He was just an amateur who had been allowed access to the healing room after treating a fellow gladiator and, somehow, he had ended up staying there.

So it was obvious, that those on the administrative side of the Island would not give Old Man Null, one of the gladiators, a highly effective drug that could be either poison or medicine.

That was why it was impossible for Old Man Null to concoct a drug—an immediately effective “strong poison”.

The only thing Old Man Null could make was a deleterious concoction of as many drugs as he could get his hands on, which would kill someone by disrupting the blood flow throughout their body.

If one were to swallow it, they would definitely die after suffering tremendously—however, its existence, if you thought about it, it was somewhat convenient for Subaru.

Subaru: “After all, my foundation is being a lazy, giant idiot.”

Considering Subaru’s over-reliant nature, a poison that killed without causing suffering was out of the question.

He would immediately think about starting over on something trivial and start relying on the poison’s potency. In doing so, Natsuki Subaru would become a monster.

An inhuman monster that did not understand human pain or suffering.

Subaru: “No way, definitely NO!”

Already, the memory and realization of the time when his arms and legs were fully grown were both fading away. Even so, Subaru would not allow his experience and ideals to be twisted any further.

That change in nature would be a betrayal to everyone who had accepted Subaru as he was.

He could betray himself, but not everyone, not his family.

While Natsuki Subaru could be set side, Natsuki Subaru’s ties could not.

Therefore—

Subaru: “…Sorry, Old Man Null, for lying about using it against a Sparka opponent.”

Even if Natsuki Subaru were to experience hellish pain, he could not withdraw his outstretched hands.

Because that was that one tenet that would not bend, even on this Gladiator Island of isolating waters.

2

Though he had tried to put on a strong front—

Subaru: “Gah, guh, geh… hk”

Gritting his teeth to the point they were seemingly about to break, Subaru endured pain that tore his heart to shreds. —No, he was not enduring it. The pain to endure had already passed.

He had died, he had returned, so the suffering from which that death originated was nowhere to be found.

Still, his soul dragged on. That was why, both tears and snot, did not cease trickling out.

Weitz: “Oi, Schwartz…! What’s the matter, all of a sudden…!”

Subaru: “I-I’m fhine…”

Weitz: “How can ya be fine… in such an ugly state…!”

Weitz’s voice trembled as Subaru cowered on the spot, his face smeared with various fluids.

He rushed over to hoist Subaru up, and without hesitation, wiped his runny nose with his bare hands. Every time, Weitz’s attitude would impress Subaru, always.

To be able to act without believing dirty people were dirty, that was an incredibly respectable thing.

Subaru: “Ahh, uh…”

Violently wiping away his runny nose and tears, Subaru put his hand to his dazed head.

Little-by-little, as the shock of dying in the past faded away, he accepted the slow present of being alive. Switching over to an easygoing consciousness happened generally every time Subaru died from the “drug”.

He had prepared the “poison” behind his molar as a trump card in order to ensure his death, but surprisingly, it had not come into play as Subaru’s cause of death on the Gladiator Island very often.

The overwhelming majority of his deaths during Sparka had been caused by the claws and fangs of the Gladiator Beast drawing near to him.

However, when he was unable to die, or when he was unsure of how to be up to the task in a situation where casualties had been made, he had no choice but to have this “drug” carry out its purpose.

That was, the excruciating anguish Natsuki Subaru had to bear.

After all—

Subaru: "…Since it's my fault for screwing up."

If the person who should be able to, somehow, do the most failed, what could the rest of them do?

Subaru had a responsibility. The responsibility of having the highest probability to somehow accomplish something.

Although that power was not one he had desired to obtain, provided it was Natsuki Subaru, he would be able to master it.

Because he was that person's son, Natsuki Kenichi's son.

Weitz: "—Hk, what…?!"

Subaru: "The drawbridge…!"

He pressed his fist against the dirty floor and, as he tried to raise himself up, the entire island creaked and shook.

From Weitz in front of him and the gloomy cold atmosphere, Subaru realized that the place he had died and returned to was the lower stratum of the Gladiator Island—just before the drawbridge had been raised.

Connecting the Island and the outside world, the only bridge that stood.

Subaru: "—They're coming."

That scene, akin to a painting of hell itself, along with the utmost horrid adversary who painted it.

Once more, he would face a person he even prayed to never meet again—he would have a rematch with Todd.

Subaru: "…"

Trembling, Subaru hugged his shoulders as fear engulfed him.

As soon as he closed his eyes, what came back to him behind his eyelids was the disastrous scene riddled with corpses. The faces he knew, blood pouring from their eyes and noses, trembling with fear while lying on the ground, that was the utmost horrid memory.

Weitz before him, wiping Subaru's runny nose, was no exception.

Subaru: "That kind of, never again…"

He must not let it happen, that sense of duty fired up his chest.

However, even though he was so enthusiastic, his thoughts stopped at the question of what to do. How in the world was such a desperate situation even created?

Hailing from the Imperial Capital, under the name of envoys, and entering the Gladiator Island, were Todd and Arakiya.

Just having a Divine General who had once opposed him standing in his way was enough to give him a headache, but to have Todd, the human devil, join the fray was the worst possible nightmare.

In the first place, just why were Todd and Arakiya together?

Subaru: "…I'm an idiot, I remember. The one who let Arakiya escape after she was captured, it was that guy."

It could be considerably shocking, but memories related to Todd were surprisingly clear.

The end of Subaru and Todd's shared fate had been in the high-walled city—in Guaral, during an operation to occupy the City Hall. The end of it had been when Subaru, dressed as a woman, had interacted with him.

After that, the rampaging Arakiya was done away with by Priscilla, clad in crimson; then Arakiya, who had supposedly been captured, had been released by somebody, somebody who Subaru had suspected to be Todd.

If they were together now, it appeared that his guess had not been incorrect.

Subaru: “Damnit, even though you said you wanted to go back to your fiancée, why are you here? Had you just returned to your hometown quietly… That big lying bastard…!”

Even if he groaned about things differing from what he had promised, it was not like it would make Todd disappear. Though he understood this, he had to let out his pent-up anger at least once.

After doing that, he inhaled a deep breath, exhaled, inhaled, exhaled.

And then—

Weitz: “The next victims for Sparka…?”

Subaru: “Not necessarily. Weitz, can you help me out a little?”

Weitz: “—. Did’cha forget what I said just now…?”

The tattoo on Weitz’s face contorted as Subaru heard this, feeling the tremors under his feet.

At this time, Weitz had spoken some words. Subaru’s head was in a panic because of the aftermath of the “drug”, but he remembered them because they’d had a great impact.

Subaru: “Just lending strength, right? So please, lend me your strength.”

Weitz: “As long as ya get it, it’s fine… So, what do ya want me to do…?”

Naturally, they were going to see the next candidates for gladiator come across the drawbridge.

He was thinking that would probably be his proposal, but Weitz, with his arms crossed, switched quickly. That strong sense of duty, and the rule he had once decided for himself, which he obstinately abided by, were truly helpful.

With great appreciation for Weitz’s personality—

Subaru: “Just a little is fine. I need you to stall the people who came to the Island just now.”

3

—Natsuki Subaru’s only weapon, the Authority of Return by Death.

Ever since coming to the Vollachian Empire, and all while surmounting various obstacles, it had clearly been malfunctioning.

The biggest reason that came to mind was that the ongoing “infantilization” assailing Subaru was its origin.

Because his body had shrunk like it had, Return by Death had yielded behavior that was completely abnormal.

A prime example of that, were those horrible ten seconds on Chaosflame’s Crimson Lapis Castle.

It seemed those endless ten seconds had not been for the sake of saving Subaru, but rather bestowed for the sake of causing him despair; immediately after that had passed, the situation remained poor, even on the Gladiator Island he had been sent to.

It was not as bad as those ten seconds atop the castle tower, but the grace period granted now was unusually short.

This time too, he had been able to return roughly thirty minutes to the past—when taking the time limit until everyone on the Island would begin to die into consideration, that time would become even shorter.

In other words, Subaru had to overwrite this situation in under thirty minutes.

For that purpose—

Subaru: “First, I need time to think. —Remember remember remember, what just happened.”

He was depending on Weitz’s benevolence, who had vigorously declared he would undertake that request to delay the arriving envoys from passing through.

However, he had also said that there would be no strategy involving Weitz himself going on a rampage.

The reason was simple, even if Weitz went on a rampage, should Arakiya be there, he would be stopped in an instant. Furthermore, if Todd were present, Weitz would be killed without mercy.

Both of those, were events Subaru wanted to avoid.

Subaru: “As they died, everyone was bleeding from their faces… Poison gas? Some sort of magic?”

He was in the middle of revealing that he intended to escape from the Gladiator Island.

Hiain, Weitz and Idra had all collapsed one after the other, and Tanza, too, had been no exception to that. Everyone died the same way, together, so he thought that probably there was no mistaking it.

If that meant the cause of death had been the same, then the other gladiators who had fallen had also—That was not it.

Subaru: “The guards, they were also part of those who had died.”

Remembering the events that had occurred properly, there really were no exceptions in that hell.

Unable to think straight at the time, he had not checked to see if the Gladiator Beasts in the cages were still alive, but at least all the humans, without exception, had died—that was not it, either. There had been exceptions.

Subaru: “Me, and Todd.”

Indeed, only Subaru and Todd had met face-to-face on the Island without dying.

However, though Subaru had not died, he had still felt the pain of being near death, and just like everyone else, the phenomenon of blood streaming out his face had also occurred to him. That did not seem to apply to Todd.

Since it was difficult to imagine he would be able to endure that nonchalantly, it was certain that Todd had not been subject to those means of dying.

Subaru: "If it's poison gas, did Todd take an antidote before coming here or something? If it's some kind of magic, was it Arakiya who used it…? Come to think of it, Arakiya was nowhere to be found."

Although he'd had no intentions of the sort, he had briefly checked the corpses of all his acquaintances.

Tanza and the others who had collapsed in front of him, Orson and the others whom he had saved in the second Sparka, Old Man Null in the healing room, and even the guard he recognized, who had treated him coldly and harshly.

Everyone, absolutely everyone, had become motionless with blood streaming from their faces.

Subaru: "But, there are just three people I didn't see."

—Those were Arakiya and Gustav, alongside the fake Cecilus, making it three people.

Subaru: "…"

Of course, Subaru did not remember every gladiator on the Island either, so he could not really declare that all of them had died. However, he could not be certain about those three.

Arakiya was someone on Todd's side. Since she was Todd's ally, who was probably the mastermind behind the massacre, it was only natural that she would not have died in the massacre.

However, just what had happened to the other two?

Gustav, the Chief of the Island holding the position of Governor, and the fake Cecilus, the enigmatic and suspicious juvenile.

Even on this Gladiator Island, those two held special positions—.

Subaru: "—Ah."

Indeed, just as he remembered these two special people, a bolt of lightning suddenly ran though Subaru's mind.

The massacre that had occurred on the Island, he suspected that it had been brought about through the means of magic or poison gas. However, while a feeble possibility, there was one more thing that came to mind.

Something which possessed a large influence on the Gladiator Island only—the "curse rule".

The Gladiator Island Ginunhive's gladiators were shackled by the binds of an unseen impairment.

The curse rule, if disobeyed, would even put one's life in peril. The prospects of its candidacy were rising.

Subaru: "However, the curse rule was just an empty threat, it shouldn't actually exist."

Subaru himself had increased his belief in that, by risking his life in a back-and-forth with Gustav.

He had been clear in telling Gustav that he was escaping from the Gladiator Island, thus displeasing him and defying the will of the Vollachian Emperor, to whom Gustav swore allegiance.

If a curse rule truly were to exist, Gustav would have used it against him right there and then. If he did not make an example of Subaru with it, the Gladiator Island's order would crumble.

Had he circulated the fact of there being no curse rule, there would be a rather major incident involving a riot from the gladiators.

Subaru: "No matter how much Gustav-san doesn't want us to die, it wouldn't be logical to bend on there. So there shouldn't be a curse rule… No, I'm overthinking it."

Gustav's policy of doing as much as he could to keep his gladiators alive, whether true or not, there were grounds that made it easier to deny the curse rule's existence. There were many, many of those lying around.

The guards had also died, not just the gladiators, was it not?

Subaru: "Gustav-san's got no reason to kill all the guards… If you put it that way, there's also no reason for him to kill all the gladiators out of nowhere."

The more he thought about it, the more Gustav's intentions seemed unrelated to the massacre.

If that were the case, narrowing down the reasoning to backtrack to the initial two options, either the mastermind Todd had scattered poison gas, or cooperating with Arakiya, had made use of some outrageous magic.

However, both of these had the exact same problem.

Subaru: "Why was I the only one on whom the effect was so weak?"

Excluding Todd, who would have taken precautions beforehand, Subaru had been the only one with mild symptoms.

What was it about Subaru that had made him alone different from everyone else who had died?

Was it because he was a child? —No, Tanza had died.

Was it because of his behavior being different from theirs just before? —No, Weitz had died.

Was it because race made a difference? —No, Hiain and Idra had both died together.

Was it because he was from another world? Because he had spent time in the Kingdom? Because he had a contractual relationship with a super-cute Spirit? Because he was continuously stalked by the Witch? Because he had been "infantilized" into a smaller body? What else, what else what else what else what else, what else was there?

—Only Subaru was different from everyone else, just what was that something?

Subaru: “What’s—”

???: “—Oh, Basu, something troubling you?”

Subaru: “Woah?!”

A voice came from behind Subaru, who had been frantically racking his brain in search of possibilities.

Because it was so sudden, and because he had erased the possibility of the speaker from his mind, Subaru, squealing, turned around with eyes wide open.

Behind Subaru, walking with his hands in the sleeves of his kimono, was the fake Cecilus.

Subaru blinked his eyes in surprise several times at that attitude of his, carefree as always.

Subaru: “C-Ceci…?”

Cecilus: “Yes that’s correct, but what’s up with that reaction? You look as if me being here is an outrageous, world-shattering development. It’s true that I’m the leading actor of this world, so I can understand why you might feel daunted, but my intention was just to spend my time close to Basu at a distance where I can talk to you and touch you, y’know?”

In this way, the fake Cecilus, approaching from his front, looked down into Subaru’s face at a distance close enough that he could almost feel his breath on his face.

And with that unchanging attitude and gesture, Subaru involuntarily backed away.

Just then, from Subaru’s side, the fake Cecilus quietly looked at the view below—from Subaru’s side as he ascended, the fake Cecilus gazed at the already-submerged drawbridge.

Cecilus: “It seems that the carriage wasn’t carrying participants for the next Sparka, but rather more distinct guests. It’s what everyone on the Island’s talking about.”

Subaru: “…Ah, they seem to be emissaries from the Imperial Capital. I don’t know what they came here for, though.”

Cecilus: “When it comes to emissaries from the Imperial Capital, I can imagine that they came to inform us about the situation outside, or to make preparations concerning the next show. As you want to leave this place, Basu, wouldn’t that be good news for you?”

Subaru: “—. I’m not going to deny it.”

Subaru gave a curt response to the fake Cecilus as the latter looked at the surface of the lake, sheltering his eyes with his hand.

Frankly, this unforeseen encounter with the fake Cecilus had made Subaru unsure on how to behave toward him.

He did not believe that the fake Cecilus had committed the massacre alongside Todd and Arakiya.

But, it was true that he, who was supposedly the most feared gladiator on the Gladiator Island, had vanished in the midst of the massacre.

Subaru: “Though, it’s questionable whether my eyes were working properly…”

In such a horrific situation, by no means could he be said to have been mentally stable.

Even so, if someone had quarreled or battled within the Island, it would have been impossible for him to fail to hear it.

That was why, if he were to think about what had become of the fake Cecilus back then—

Subaru: “Did he die somewhere I couldn’t see him, or was he not on the Island?”

But if he had not been on the Island, then where, and how?

Even at this very moment, while he was talking to the fake Cecilus, the clock was ticking down towards the time limit. Until that absurd eventuality, even though the fake Cecilus had no time to spare either.

Cecilus: “You’re not going to deny it. But your face says that you’re worried about other things, y’know.”

He thought and thought, yet Subaru got nowhere, and the fake Cecilus instinctively picked at his ambiguous words.

It was probably just guesswork, and not something like a reading of Subaru’s expression, speech, or conduct. It was intuition. Reeling in the correct interpretation was something that people like the fake Cecilus were capable of.

Since a handful of those kinds of monsters were crowding this world, Subaru’s resolve came into question.

That he would not lose, that he must not lose, that resolve.

Subaru: “Ceci, something terrible’s about to happen on the Island. Probably, those guys from the Imperial Capital are responsible. I can’t tell you the details, but…”

Cecilus: “Judging from how serious your atmosphere is, it’d be too horrifying to even put into words as well… That little deergirl and the people of Basu’s Unit are in a predicament. No, is it more like a certain-death-kinda feeling?”

Subaru: “—Hk.”

Cecilus: “Weeell, Basu’s response has a splendid feeling to it, how nice! However, is that really so? I’m delighted that there are finally signs of things happening. I was so tired of waiting that I was about to die!”

Laughing with his mouth open, the fake Cecilus cheerfully stomped his feet.

Taken aback by his reaction, which was as if he were warmly welcoming trouble, then, while baring his teeth, Subaru rushed to shorten the distance between themselves.

Subaru: “Ceci! It’s not a joke! Everyone’s in trouble!”

Cecilus: “More gravitas! It’s wonderful if you’re not joking. I’d welcome it, since it’d be souring to be told that everything here was just you thinking too much, a made-up story. Crisis, predicament, and hardship, such great relief!”

Subaru: “—Hk!”

Cecilus: “Or could it be, that you truly thought I’d take your side unconditionally, Basu?”

When Subaru complained that Cecilus could not understand the gravity of the situation, Cecilus lowered his voice. It was just as if the glint in his eyes wanted to say that Subaru was the one who could not understand.

Experiencing blade-like coldness from those long-slitted blue eyes, Subaru swallowed a breath.

As the fake Cecilus broadly smiled at the silent Subaru,

Then, assailing Subaru with straightforward words, he did a twirl on the spot and outstretched his hands.

On the mountainside of the Gladiator Island, in order to set the high ground from where they overlooked the Island and half the lake as the stage. The fake Cecilus looked up to the sky, opened his mouth wide, and—

Cecilus: “This is undoubtedly the divide! You’d asked if you could get me on your side unconditionally, but allow me to inform you that, at this very moment, you’re able to fulfill those conditions.”

Subaru: “Right now, this moment…”

Cecilus: “Yes, yes, that’s right! Basu, you enthrall me through your premonitions! Connect with me through anticipation! Make me laugh through your negotiations! And, you’re proving yourself right at the climax!”

Subaru: “…”

Cecilus: “Come along now, oh wolf pierced by swords! All you Observers who look down upon these harsh and ruthless vast lands, see him clear! In this world, he, who is enthralling me, this very Cecilus Segmunt!”

It seemed that if he were not convinced of those existences, of spectators present beyond the heavens, he would not have been able to make that outstanding utterance.

Without exaggeration, it would be natural to doubt the sanity of the fake Cecilus’s given his eccentric behavior. Certainly, anyone on this Island would avert their eyes and not lend their ears to his conduct, however, Subaru had acquired a peculiar confidence.

That the fake Cecilus was—No, that Cecilus Segmunt was the real deal.

This bonafide monster truly held faith that he could speak to the world, and that if the world truly possessed a mind of its own, then it would be unable to take its eyes off him.

This little monster had been overflowing with that much presence and cogency.

Subaru: “I’m…”

Cecilus: “What was that?”

Subaru: “I’m going to make you my comrade. I’m gonna work you hard, that’s what I’ve decided.”

While being overwhelmed, though it was not the time for it, Subaru put his hand against his chest and spoke out.

Firmly setting his eyes on the other person, he declared that.

Cecilus: “—That impulsiveness, I don’t dislike it, rather, I quite like it.”

He conceived a smile as he spoke, however, this had not been the same carefree smile Cecilus had wore until now, but rather a smile of merely relaxing his lips as he responded to Subaru.

Perhaps it was a sign that Cecilus had undoubtedly recognized Subaru as a contender.

Immediately following that—

Cecilus: “—I see.”

Tightening the lips that had just displayed a smile, Cecilus gently stroked his chin with a finger.

His chin, onto which blood had trickled down from his finely shaped nose, then from which it fell.

Subaru: “Wha…?!”

Seeing fresh blood spilling from Cecilus’s nose, Subaru hurriedly looked over the hand railing.

It was not like he could see inside of rooms or into the basement by looking down onto the Island, but even so, from what he could see here and there, he understood that there many figures, collapsed, belonging to many people.

The massacre, had begun.

Begun, in the time Subaru had been using to put the situation in order and consider the possibilities carefully.

Death had violently ravaged the people throughout the island, harvesting lives without exception.

Indeed, without exception—.

Cecilus: “Uh-oh.”

Subaru: “Ceci?!”

As he pulled himself away from the railing, Subaru also felt a sting inside his nose, but he was more worried about Cecilus, who had sat down next to him.

Cecilus rested his back against the railing, perspiring as he slumped down into a cross-legged sitting position.

He had an easygoing attitude, but the blood coming from his nose, which he was holding down with his hand, had not ceased.

Subaru: “A-are you, okay?”

Cecilus: “Well, this sure seems tricky. This is a quite formidable enemy, Basu. Concerning this opponent, does there happen to be any shortcomings you’re aware of?”

Subaru: “Is this the time to be saying that?! You’re bleeding from your nose, and from your eyes too!”

Cecilus: “I see… Even though I was proud to say that I’d never spilled a drop of blood ’til now.”

Even as they spoke, blood flowed from the sitting Cecilus’s eyes.

Cecilus’s state was becoming so awful that it was hard to look at it, but it was frightening that even with the blood pouring out of his nose, his tone of voice had not changed in the slightest.

However, the scariest thing about Cecilus, had not been that.

Subaru: “Aren’t you… afraid of dying…?”

Cecilus: “People die, after all.”

Subaru: “…”

While understanding that what was drawing ever closer to him was imminent Death, Cecilus responded without any hesitation.

Without hesitation, without bewilderment, without fear, without anxiety, without nervousness, without regret.

Unlike Subaru, no place should lay beyond his death.

Even so, Cecilus held no fear towards Death, supposedly the most feared thing among living beings.

And so, without showing any fear of Death—

Cecilus: "…"

The hand holding his nose down dropped, and as if to conceal the bloodstain, his sleeve enshrouded his arm, and, with his back resting against the fence, Cecilus became motionless.

His eyelids were closed and cast down, and without even a twitch, he became unable to move.

Subaru clearly understood what that meant.

And then—

Subaru: "Khoff"

The hand he placed over his coughing mouth was stained with blood; Death had been looming closer to Subaru as well.

4

The same, the very same devastating scene dominated the Gladiator Island in its entirety.

Subaru: "…"

Slowly dragging his feet, Subaru wandered around the Island, searching for survivors.

However, now that even Cecilus was out of the running, as if living up to Subaru's tattered expectations, there was no occurrence of such an entity appearing.

Subaru: "Tanza, and the others too, and even Old Man Null…"

Every single one of them had collapsed, and lost their lives.

Shutting the eyelids on everyone’s astonished faces, as they were unable to comprehend the events that had occurred, and cleaning their faces somewhat, was the best that Subaru could do for them.

Subaru: “Sorry, Tanza…”

He had failed. He had erred in his procedure.

He should have told Tanza and the others about the danger as well, he should have had them take some kind of precautions.

If only they had stayed together, after converging with Tanza and the others and before ascending to the vantage point. If only he had been able to make her at ease and not let her die. That girl, who was anxious about this place in which she could not rely on anyone, who knew nothing of the situation.

Until he found their bodies, he had not even thought about such an obvious thing.

Subaru: “…”

Having wandered around the Island, he had seen that all the guards were dead as well.

The way they had died was the same as the gladiators; everyone had bled to death, blood coming out from their faces. Along that way, he had gone go see the cages where the Gladiator Beasts were locked up, and there Subaru saw that all of them, too, had died.

They had collapsed in their cages, bleeding from their eyes and noses, having died in the same way the humans had.

Subaru: “…I guess that means I’m more durable.”

While near death, he made a joke that the lifeless Gladiator Beasts did not laugh at.

It was difficult to breathe because his nose was completely blocked by blood. His eyes had also become moist and misty, and upon wiping them with his fingers, it was like a faint red curtain would cover them.

Towards Subaru, and Subaru only, slowly approached an absolutely disgusting Death God.

To that disgusting Death God, Subaru erected his trembling middle finger.

And then—

???: "—Hey you, what are you doing in a place like this?"

In the middle stratum of the Island, in the place known as the courtyard, the Death God muttered as he cracked the bones in his neck.

Wearing a black bandana and giving the outward appearance of a friendly young man, was the Death God—Todd. As he looked at Subaru, who had raised the middle finger towards him, he gradually drew closer.

Todd: "As you can see, I'd thought every guy on the Island had died, but…"

Todd skillfully pulled out a large knife, wearing a puzzled face as he looked at Subaru.

In many ways, he was probably thinking he had gotten into an unexplainable situation. Meeting a living person here must have been outside of Todd's expectations.

The feeling of falling into an ambush, certainly had also been ominous to Todd.

However, Subaru knew that if he waited here, he would come.

If he could finish this without meeting him, he would rather have that, but this was a confrontation he could not avoid no matter what.

There was no one else left alive anymore, and in the time until Subaru died, the only one to have any chance of speaking to him was this Death God.

Todd: “…”

The look in his eyes lacked negligence, but there was no hesitation in his approaching steps. It was not so much an attitude of looking down upon Subaru, but more of an attitude of not viewing Subaru as a problem.

That he was underestimating Subaru because he was a child, could not be the case.

Without letting out jokes or metaphors, Subaru was already at the point of death. If one were to be overly cautious towards a helpless child about to die, that would not be cautiousness, but rather cowardice.

Though, Todd could be spoken of as cunning and cautious, not as cowardly.

—Facing him, Subaru, who had let the girl’s Death go by through his stupidity, was thinking.

Even though Todd had appeared just as he had wished, he was not sure if things from now would go as he wished.

Even if he had a chance, Todd was not a person who would give hints easily. He did not have the kindness to give a helpless dying child something to help them die in peace.

If so, against this cold-blooded Death God, how could he bring back some form of information?

Maybe, there was just one thing.

Even if he did extremely well, the information he could get was just one thing.

That one thing, he had to make it something worth his while.

Todd: “…”

Step-by-step, the distance between Subaru and Todd diminished.

As soon as this distance reached zero, it would not be surprising for the other party to stab Subaru and bring him death mutely. With his head and body lacking oxygen, he had to draw the correct answer.

It was Todd who committed this massacre on the Island. There was no use in asking.

Who was still alive? It would be useless to ask that. There would be no meaning.

Where was Arakiya? As much as he would like to know that, he did not think Todd would answer him. It would be useless.

What had happened to Gustav? That, like Arakiya, would be a useless shot.

Then, what remained, was it the method behind the massacre?

Todd: "…"

Poison gas, was not it. Subaru had erased that option from his mind.

Halfway up the Island's mountain, Subaru had happened upon Cecilus at the vantage point, and had decided to stay there after all. —If the answer to the massacre were to be poison gas, then he would have been safe with the strong winds of the vantage point, probably.

But as it turned out, neither Subaru nor Cecilus had escaped the carnage of the massacre. The possibility of poison gas was quite low, considering those outside and on the Island had also collapsed.

Then, the other possibility was—

Subaru: "—Ah."

Magic, from Arakiya. Arakiya, who had appeared together with Todd, had utilized some kind of slaughter magic to annihilate the gladiators, the guards, and the Gladiator Beasts on the Island.

If he could acquire that certainty, then, next time, next time he would go about things in actual proper fashion.

If he could, acquire that certainty—.

???: "—Here, right here."

That instant, an auditory hallucination dominated Subaru's mind.

The voice of the star actor, who should no longer be among them, yielded a heat within Subaru's weak thinking.

And then, as if that heat was urging him to do so, he opened his mouth and—

Subaru: "—THE CURSE RULE!!"

The possibility he had once erased, albeit unable to do it fully; he shouted it in a loud voice toward the Death God.

That bloodcurdling voice from Subaru was an inescapable attack, one which seized hold of the Death God. And then, the instant he heard that shout, the Death God—Todd, moved.

Todd: "Die."

The hint of suspicion, the bothersome air, just about everything disappeared, leaving only the intent to kill.

If one were to see it in a sane state, that murderous intent was so thick and dense they would almost faint. With that in his eyes and a knife in his hand, Todd leapt at Subaru in a single breath's time.

Subaru: "Kah."

The thrust of the cold blade buried it deep into Subaru's chest.

Without a shred of mercy, the knife clawed through everything vital within his chest, and was wrenched out with a twist, to ensure that he would never be saved.

A gush of blood spurted, staining Todd's blank face with fresh blood.

Subaru: “—Ghuh.”

He had been stabbed, and then, the blade had been yanked out; the force of that had flung his body onto the hard ground. The blood rushed through his throat with a vigor he had never experienced before, as he spit out a gulp of blood alongside the packaged “drug”.

He had bit down, but failed to tear the envelope. But, this wound did not require the “drug”.

Todd: “From the inside of your mouth, are you sane?”

As he picked up the red-tinged package with his fingers and sniffed it, Todd muttered. Could he tell from the smell alone that the contents were dangerous, or had he guessed because it had come out of Subaru’s mouth?

Either way, it did not matter. It was something that Subaru could no longer reach.

Only, only, if there was something he wanted to say, that would be.

Subaru: “…thing.”

Todd: “—What?”

Subaru: “One, thing.”

The one thing, he had grasped it.

His expression changing, giving it precedence above all else, he hastily killed Subaru.

That was why, Subaru had grasped it.

Subaru: “Curs—”

He had grasped it, he had grasped it, and then, died.

In exchange for dying, he had grasped it.

—That which had been responsible for the killings upon the Gladiator Island Ginunhive, was the “curse rule” that supposedly did not exist.

Chapter 71:
Water

1

—The "curse rule" that supposedly did not exist, had been activated to kill everyone on the Gladiator Island.

What had taken Subaru's life at the very final moment, had been the sharpness of a cold knife.

However, just before that, the sensation of slowly dying from edges of his body had eaten into Subaru without any room for doubt, working to ensure he died a cruel death.

Ultimately, everyone aside from Subaru—the gladiators, Tanza and the others included, as well as the guards and Gladiator Beasts, which were supposedly on the administration side of the Island, and even Cecilus, had died in an instant for reasons unknown.

As somewhat of an exception, Subaru had been the only one to outlive it, but just why in the world had that been?

Perhaps that question was one for which an answer could not be produced, even if one thought about it.

There was no person he could ask for the answer, and he thought it was not worth the time or brain cells.

Instead, he needed to focus on the information he could reliably gather.

Subaru: "That reaction from Todd… The answer is the curse rule."

On the verge of death, with a brain short of blood, he'd had to choose between two options, but he had obtained the correct answer.

Had Subaru not rethought things there, fixated on the idea that it had been due to Arakiya's magic, he would not have been able to return with that conviction.

Precisely because he had struck true, Todd had made the decision to kill Subaru in that split second.

He had concluded that Subaru was not a child on the verge of death, but a risk which he must kill immediately.

The speed with which Todd had switched gears, was the basis for Subaru's conclusion that the culprit had been the curse rule.

Subaru: "But, why the curse rule?"

Now that the possibility of poison gas had been eliminated and evidence in favor of the curse rule had emerged, he no longer intended on entertaining the idea that the curse rule was just a scare tactic and did not exist.

But if that were the case, then Gustav's behavior was now far too unnatural.

The basis for Subaru concluding that there was no curse rule, was that Gustav had not punished him using the curse rule, even though the Subaru had defied the rules of the Gladiator Island and had dangerously attempted to destroy order.

Certainly, Gustav did not seem eager to let the gladiators die, but when comparing the Island's order to Subaru alone, it made no sense for him to hesitate to make use of the curse rule.

That was why, thinking about it the other way—

Subaru: "—When I provoked him, even though Gustav-san wanted to use the curse rule, he did not use it. But, when everyone on the Island was killed, had the conditions to use it been fulfilled?"

For the time being, that was the arrangement of the events that had taken place that he could consider with the information he currently had.

Subaru: "…Gustav-san's an enemy, huh?"

Since the curse rule had been employed, in all likelihood, the Chief, Gustav, was an enemy to Subaru and the others.

In other words, with Gustav joining Todd and Arakiya, and it could be said that those were the three enemies. It was good to know with certainty that Cecilus was not an enemy, but at the same time, it was not enough for him to be pleased.

Since that curse rule was a threat of such caliber, that it had even taken Cecilus's life.

Subaru: "…"

In exchange for the information he had obtained, more and more bad ingredients were thrown into the cauldron.

Was it possible to filter through the contents of a cauldron of darkness boiling gently, and see all the way through to the bottom?

Thus, as far as the bad ingredients were, those were things he had to get rid of.

The reason was—

???: "Schwartz…!"

Subaru: "—Hk."

???: "This shaking is…"

Subaru was crouching down, clutching his chest where no wound was present, only the leftover shock of being stabbed.

Weitz, who had been worrying over Subaru, was surprised to feel a tremor coming up from under his feet. Of course, Subaru had known this was coming, and what the reason for this shaking was.

He knew, but there was a big problem.

—The grace period until the drawbridge would begin to move, had been shorter than it had been for his previous retrial upon Death.

2

If he turned away from what he did not want to think about and covered his ears, the matter would be settled without him having to feel down.

But if he were to do that, and were to turn his mindset into one of a loser, there would be no way to overcome the impending defeat.

That was why, no matter how unpleasant reality was, he could not close his eyes and cover his ears.

—Even if that reality was, for instance, the restart point having moved forward by ten seconds.

Subaru: “…”

The Authority of Return by Death possessed by Subaru had been yielding abnormalities, which had been particularly acting up recently.

In addition to setting unusual restart points, this time there was a slight discrepancy in time—the grace period had been shortened by ten seconds.

This was an anomaly different from previous cases, in which grace periods would be extremely limited, making it a perfect situation for fueling Subaru’s sense of anxiety and despair.

This time it had shortened by about ten seconds, but there was no guarantee that it would not shorten further.

If this anomaly continued to occur over and over again, until finally the time to death became less than a second, or if it even became impossible to Return by Death in the first place anymore, what would be left for Subaru to be able to do?

Even if he did not wish make plans based upon Return by Death, he would still consider the possibility of using Return by Death.

Now that he was smaller, Subaru was more helpless than before he shrank. This Empire’s realms were not so kind as to allow him to rest on his laurels only because he was adorable.

Therefore—

× × ×

???: “O-oi, Schwartz… Are we seriously just gonna sit there?”

Subaru: “Seriously. I’m begging you, this is a big one, don’t freak out this time, Hiain.”

???: “I won’t! I won’t, but…”

Thus, Hiain, who was right beside Subaru, bit his teeth and hesitated to speak, his voice trembling so much that everyone could tell he was just acting strong.

Subaru could understand why Hiain would be frightened and try to get him to reconsider.

If they were found, they would not get a free pass; Hiain had no idea why Subaru would want to do such a reckless thing.

However, if Subaru were to talk about the events that would ensue with honesty, whether he believed it or not, there was no doubt that Hiain would not cooperate with Subaru.

For that reason, Subaru had tricked Hiain into cooperating under false pretenses.

He was willing to be somewhat reckless with Hiain in order to obtain information that he could not ignore.

That information that Hiain also could not ignore was—

Hiain: “Shit, envoys from the Imperial Capital’re comin’ to talk ’bout a show…? Ya gotta be kiddin’ me…!”

Subaru: “—. I’ve asked Weitz to buy us some time. We’re gonna go get the details.”

Hiain: “Got’cha, I got’cha, I really do…”

Impatient and frustrated, Hiain was concerned about the island's events—a showcase of deathmatches involving the gladiators, the primary reason why Ginunhive was being run.

After having survived Sparka, and having been provided with an environment in which it was difficult to perish in a deathmatch between gladiators for the purpose of training, the biggest threat to one's life would be an event being held.

Falsely claiming to have information about the upcoming show, Subaru had requested help from Hiain.

As a result—

???: "—Come in. Allow me to hear what you have to say."

With a stern voice, the sound of a door being opened echoed through the room.

Two log-like arms threw the entrance open, and the atmosphere turned heavy with the return of the room's owner.

Subaru: "…"

Subaru shut his mouth at their entrance and tapped Hiain beside him on the shoulder. Hiain too, responded silently, as if resolving himself for a situation they could no longer back out of.

It was only natural. Subaru and Hiain could no longer afford to screw up.

The reason being—

???: "General First-Class Arakiya, and…"

???: "Todd."

A straightforward female voice answered Gustav's words, the person of a large build who had opened the door. There was a hint of a strained smile at that short, unkind answer,

Todd: "Private First-Class Todd Fang. For the time being, just until this task is finished.”

So followed the voice of a man, as if it were crushing Subaru’s very soul.

With no regard for Subaru’s feelings, the two people who being guided—Todd and the brown-skinned woman with an eyepatch, Arakiya, entered the room.

The room was Gustav’s office. The room to which Subaru had also been summoned for a stern warning the other day; Todd and Arakiya stepped in, as emissaries from the Imperial Capital.

Todd: “Though it’s for someone with a position like that of Governor, it’s a terribly plain room.”

In the middle of the room, standing to the side of the guest sofa, Todd surveyed his surroundings.

Admittedly, the things contained within Gustav’s room were few. With a work desk and bookcase, it could be said to be a room that matched its label as an office, containing naught but the necessities for carrying out his work.

It was understandable why he was paying attention to that point. But, Subaru wished that he would not look around.

And especially, not in the direction of the bookshelf in the corner of the room.

× × ×

Gustav: “—. It is an office. I have assembled everything I, in my capacity, need. Are you here to conduct an inspection?”

Todd: “Not at all, I’m just General First-Class Arakiya’s assistant. The General is very particular and has no subordinates but me.”

Arakiya: “Few in number, but elite.”

Todd: “Saying I’m elite, I feel that evaluation’s a bit impolite to my superiors.”

Todd shrugged at Gustav, who closed the door to his room and headed for his work desk. Todd slowly sat down on the sofa, his expression unchanged by Arakiya's subsequent words.

With that gaze now removed from the bookshelf, inwardly, Subaru took a very, very big sigh of relief.

It had been an unthinkably tense moment.

No matter how much he thought about it, the one who had repainted the worst situation with fear had been Todd.

That was why, from the bottom of his heart, he was afraid that he might be noticed again.

—Beside the bookcase, while covered by Hiain camouflaging against the surrounding scenery, Subaru was listening intently to this situation.

Subaru: "…"

Subaru had asked Weitz to stall the incoming carriage, and during that time, he and Hiain had trespassed into Gustav's office, hiding themselves using camouflage.

While there was a precedent of stalling being successful, whether the camouflage could be detected or not was something that could not be known without trying. He thought that he had understood the mechanism of Hiain's camouflage through the first Sparka and their conversations afterwards, but his conviction in it was a different matter.

The precision of Hiain's camouflage was influenced more by his nerve while remaining motionless, rather than the state of his mind and body. Were he to have the guts to stay still, he would be almost invisible, being assimilated into the scenery. He could hug Subaru's small body, so that the same effect would apply on him as well.

However, as soon as he moved, the ambience of the camouflaged scales would become disorderly, and turning it very much like a child playing hide-and-seek; they would be in full view of everyone.

In their fight against that lion-like Gladiator Beast, his scaredy-cat nature had caused him to die many a times. It was Hiain's own weak heart that hampered his strong points.

—However, the camouflaging he was performing right now should be able to tackle those weak points, to better them.

Subaru: "If they don't find us, we won't have to worry about them doing anything to us. The coming emissaries are a Divine General and her sharp-eyed second-in-command, but as long as your camouflage doesn't waver, you'll be fine. Besides—"

Hiain: "B-besides…?"

Subaru: "—I'll be with you."

Before they went into the office, Subaru looked him straight in the eye and told him that.

Even though they were the words of an audacious child with short arms and legs and a voice that had yet to become deeper, they had reached Hiain, whose friends' lives he had saved. Indeed, it seemed to resonate with him.

—That was why, this was the "first time" Hiain's camouflage had gone undetected.

Just what had Arakiya, and her second-in-command Todd, have come to the Island to discuss with Gustav beyond this point? This was the first time that conversation was able to begin.

Gustav: "General First-Class Arakiya, would you care to take a seat?"

Arakiya: "…I'll stand. Since, I can't settle down."

Gustav: "You cannot settle down?"

Arakiya: "It seems various things have happened since I came to the Island. I guess, it's because a Dragon's nest is nearby."

Even when encouraged to take a seat, Arakiya shook her head and remained standing. Her second-in-command, Todd, sat on the sofa, with Arakiya standing behind him.

Even so, the picture of Todd with his boss behind him did not feel out of place to Subaru, perhaps because he had too much of an image of Todd as someone very powerful and dreadful.

The moment Hiain's camouflage had become slightly distorted, he had gone straight for the kill, so it was impossible to not be cautious of someone like that. But—.

Gustav: "If that is fine with you, then it is no problem to me, as the official. So, the purpose of this visit is…"

Todd: "I appreciate being able to get right to work. We don't want to take too long either. General First-Class, permission to hand over the letter?"

Arakiya: "Do as you please."

Todd: "I'm grateful. Governor, this is a letter from the Imperial Capital, from the Prime Minister."

While Arakiya was quite literally standing there like a decoration, Todd took the letter out of his pocket and handed it over to Gustav. Now in Gustav's hand, the letter was sealed with a proper waxen seal, as to indicate the sender.

Though Subaru was unable confirm the imprint mark.

Subaru: "Imperial, Prime Minister…"

As Todd explained who had entrusted them with the letter, his words made Subaru's tongue dry up.

As he recalled, according to what Subaru had heard from the disagreeable Abel, the person in the position of Prime Minister was one of the main culprits for Abel having been driven out of the Imperial Capital.

Gustav had received a letter from the wicked Prime Minister who had chased out the Emperor of poor character. Moreover, the one who had delivered the letter was the human devil, Todd.

Considering the massacre that would occur on the Gladiator Island after this, this letter was nothing but a bad premonition.

Todd: “High Count Gustav Morello, I heard that you were assigned to this island as Governor by the order of His Excellency the Emperor, Vincent Vollachia.”

Gustav: “There are no discrepancies in your understanding.”

Todd: “Even though it was by the order of His Excellency the Emperor, a loathed job such as the management of the Gladiator Island Ginunhive isn’t suitable for someone such as a blood relative of the hero of Vollachia, Kurgan, the Eight-Arms.”

As if to support Subaru’s premonition, the atmosphere of the room tingled with an intent to kill.

The cause was Todd’s rude, rambling manner of speaking. And Subaru knew what made Gustav the angriest based on their previous encounters.

The reason behind Gustav’s anger, more-so than what had been said about himself, was—

Gustav: “—That manner of speaking, do you doubt the honorable judgment of His Excellency the Emperor?”

That anger was due to disloyalty towards His Excellency the Emperor, or in other words, disloyalty towards Abel, who was Vincent.

× × ×

Todd: “…”

At the stern air Gustav emitted, Arakiya suddenly lined up next to Todd.

Arakiya’s face did not show what she was thinking, but that action alone made Subaru think that Gustav’s extreme loyalty would be crushed with force.

However, saying “General First-Class” while holding up his hand, it was none other than Todd himself who stopped Arakiya’s threat.

Todd: “Just now, I went too far with my words. The Governor’s anger is justified.”

Arakiya: “…But, I won’t let you die. You need to exact vengeance for your friend. Right?”

Todd: “—. Ah, of course, that’s right. Right now, that’s the purpose I live for.”

Despite reprimanding Arakiya’s attitude, Todd’s face showed sadness as he answered.

Vengeance for his friend, so had Arakiya pointed out towards Todd; Subaru could not help but bend his lips as he tried to not miss a single thing they said.

Todd, and vengeance, they were words with such terribly poor compatibility.

Subaru did not know Todd well enough to say that, but he supposed it meant that Todd had people who were important to him.

Neglecting his fiancée despite wanting to see her so badly, he had come to this island to kill a lot of people.

Todd: “I’m sorry for speaking so thoughtlessly, Governor. General First-Class Arakiya and I have some external concerns. Because of that, my behavior was inadequate. I apologize.”

Gustav: “…I accept your apology. But, going too far with what you say can invite disaster.”

Todd: “As far as that goes, it is painfully true to hear. I’m very, very aware of that.”

Todd, who had held Arakiya back, made a bitter face at Gustav’s advice. Ignoring Todd’s reaction, Gustav cracked the wax seal with his thick fingers, and opened the letter.

The Imperial Prime Minister, the person who was responsible for the current havoc within the Empire, the contents of his letter were —

Gustav: "—This is…"

Todd: "It was the intention of my impolite talk earlier, I didn't mean to offend. I just wanted to say that if the Governor's tired of managing the Gladiator Island, that's completely fine."

As Gustav ran his eyes over the letter, small wrinkles were notched into his rock-like face.

Gustav ran his eyes over the letter and carved little wrinkles in his rock-like face. Todd closed one eye as it seemed like a crack had been made on a real rock, and that crack was spreading.

Leaving Arakiya silent, Todd continued, appearing as if he was the main representative emissary.

Todd: "The gladiators of this Island are liable to cause internal conflict. In accordance with His Excellency the Emperor's wishes, they are to be disposed of, all at once."

3

Matter-of-factly, with a deadpan delivery as if he were just talking about taking out the trash on garbage collection day, Todd had made a firm request to Gustav for the gladiators of the Gladiator Island—for several hundreds of people, to be disposed of.

Subaru: "…"

The only reason Subaru had been able to stomach that forecast of the worst outcome being right on the mark, was that he had already seen the massacre actually killing everyone on the island, and had henceforth steeled his heart.

Thus, it was a miracle that Hiain, who had received a bolt from the blue, did not scream.

Although, it would be more accurate to say that he was far too dumbfounded to grasp the situation.

Subaru: “…”

That singular voice had been so devoid of any sense of reality, that Hiain had forgotten to even move.

However, although they had gotten past through the lucky break of the camouflage not coming undone, Subaru could not help but bite down on his molars.

This request, it had led to the activation of the curse rule that would kill everyone on the Island.

As expected, it was just as he feared, Todd and Arakiya, and finally Gustav, had become his enemies.

As long as he could not stop those three from committing that heinous act, he would not be able to prevent that massacre.

Gustav: “Fear of internal trouble, you say…”

Todd: “Internal trouble is internal trouble, it’s something that, with its insolence, darkens the gracious influence of His Excellency the Emperor. Be that as it may, the Prime Minister does not believe that it is something Gustav is sheltering. The Governor’s loyalty is the real thing.”

Gustav: “…”

Todd: “For that reason, it must cause your heart to anguish. I am told that ever since the Governor was appointed to this Island, the quality of the gladiators unveiled at the shows is incomparable to what it used to be.”

While ordering the disposal of those gladiators, Todd’s attitude was one of showing appreciation for Gustav’s work.

As he looked down at the letter, Gustav's expression did not shift. Just how had Todd's words been resonating within him? Lacking freedom as he watched the situation, Subaru did not comprehend.

Gustav: "—. By decreasing the risk of needless deaths, by allowing them to acquire the foundations of how to fight, and by having them stand side-by-side rather than outmaneuvering others, the quality of the gladiators who survive shall improve."

But, in Gustav's own notions, having performed the administration of the Gladiator Island, it felt as if there had been something like pride in the tone of his voice as he calmly responded.

Instead of making the gladiators into a mere spectacle, Gustav had trained them, nurtured them, and reformed the rules of the Island in order to win the favor of both the Emperor and his subjects.

Probably, gentleness akin to attachment or affection towards the gladiators had not been present there.

It was Gustav's decision as the person placed in the position of Governor, and only that.

Arakiya: "Finished? Talking, that is."

So Arakiya asked of Gustav, who had placed all four of his hands atop the desk on which he had placed the letter as he closed his eyes.

It was an insensitive question that completely ignored the flow of the conversation, something that Subaru might have reacted to with anger and a flushed face, had he been in Gustav's shoes.

But, Gustav did not object to it, and Todd simply took it as a given.

Todd: "I've heard of a curse rule that'd be very convenient for the disposal. It seems that you have a curse tool given to you by General First-Class Groovy Gumlet, of the Nine Divine Generals. Using that, you can get them all in one go, or something."

× × ×

Gustav: “It is possible.”

Todd: “Then this’ll be a quick affair. Let’s get this over with and head back to the Imperial Capital together. We’ll need some time to prepare the new gladiators, so we’ll have to shut down Ginunhive for a while—”

Todd spoke as one might at the end of a class, putting away all the supplies he had used. The lack of seriousness in the way he spoke interfered with Hiain’s ability to reboot, his thinking still shut down.

However, even if Hiain had yet to reboot, it seemed like they were running out of time towards the great trigger.

If Gustav were to activate the curse rule in accordance with the written decree brought by Todd and Arakiya, total annihilation would follow.

Knowing that it was a capricious and unstoppable future, the only way to stop it was for Subaru to make a move here. But, just how should he act?

He already had the perfect notion that if he were to himself without a plan, he would be killed on the spot.

On the other hand, even if they tried to take the one who was probably able to make use of the curse rule, Gustav, he was significantly stronger than both Subaru and Hiain—.

Gustav: “—I refuse.”

And so Gustav declined Todd and Arakiya’s demands, so he would take advantage of that. Take advantage.

Advantage, taking advantage, what would that be?

Todd: “…What?”

Subaru, desperately trying to wrack his brain, was just as scrambled in his thoughts as Hiain was.

In contrast to Subaru, who had lost his train of thought, Todd's voice was unfeeling and sharp.

Subaru felt as if the atmosphere in the room had become more thick and viscous.

That change in temperature was fundamentally different to the time Gustav had gotten offended by Todd's manner of speaking. It was not the heat or moisture in the atmosphere, but rather, what had changed was its very color.

Clad in that atmosphere, staring at Gustav, who had his hands on his desk, Todd said,

Todd: "Is there any discrepancy between the contents of the written decree and what you understand from our end?"

Gustav: "No. The letter contains the same information you have just given me. The Prime Minister's name and his seal are not misprinted."

Todd: "If that's the case, then what kind of intent are you expressing?"

Spreading his arms out, Todd asked this of Gustav, who had thrust aside his demands.

Subaru, too, did not understand anything that was going on. Gustav had rejected the demands Todd had brought from the Imperial Capital to purge all the gladiators on Gladiator Island by utilizing the curse rule.

Just why? The reason was—

Gustav: "—As the official, I have been ordered by His Excellency the Emperor. In preparation for emergencies, strive to develop the gladiators, trained in both body and mind."

Todd: "The seal of the Prime Minister reflects the will of His Excellency the Emperor. Are you saying that, because it conflicts with what your orders from beforehand, you're unable to make a decision? The written decree is the real thing, you know."

Gustav: “I do not suspect forgery. I accept it as a written decree from the Prime Minister.”

Todd: “…But it’s still not worth considering?”

Frowning, Todd turned his discerning eyes toward Gustav, someone he could not understand.

For just this time, Subaru shared the same opinion as Todd. Even though he was grateful that Gustav had brushed off the demands, he had no idea of the true motives behind that.

Then, in front of Subaru and Todd, who were harboring identical bewilderment, Gustav continued.

Gustav: “From His Excellency the Emperor, I have directly been given orders.”

Todd: “Like I said, the written decree is retracting that, and telling you to obey the next orders…”

Gustav: “The order of His Excellency the Emperor, came when I was installed as the Governor of this Island.”

Interrupting Todd’s words, Gustav was stating the basis for his option. Several years ago, the time when Gustav had been appointed as Governor of the Gladiator Island.

That was—

Gustav: “His Excellency the Emperor told me this. “—Even if you receive orders from me, do not disobey this first order.”“

Todd: “…”

Those were undoubtedly the words that would guide Gustav, who had been placed in this situation.

Those words had foreseen that Gustav would be placed in this situation. Something like “proper preparation” was not adequate in the least, so it was an order that could not have been established without prescient foresight.

Because of the Vollachian Emperor, Vincent—no, because of Abel, there were preparations for the future.

Todd: “So, what you’re saying is, because you have previous orders from His Excellency the Emperor, you cannot obey His Excellency the Emperor’s current orders?”

Gustav: “He also told me that I need not know the reason. As the official, I agree. Regardless of whether I know or not, the duties that I, in my capacity, must carry out, do not change.”

Shaking his head, Gustav firmly responded to Todd’s question.

Todd slightly narrowed his eyes as he faced Gustav, who maintained his resolute attitude. That his gaze was trying to somehow persuade Gustav, was not what his face suggested he was thinking.

After all, he no longer had any reason to exhaust his words trying to persuade the resolute man who refused to listen.

In other words—

Todd: “Arakiya. —Negotiations have broken down.”

Gustav: “—Hk!”

Like that, Todd spoke to Arakiya in a flat voice.

The subsequent instant, before a fatal situation arrived, Gustav grabbed all four sides of the desk with all four of his arms, and was about to lift it up and throw it at the two visitors.

As the muscles in his thick, strong arms bulged, he easily lifted the desk, which seemed to weigh close to a hundred kilograms—

Arakiya: “Slosh—”

Together with that unfeeling chant, Arakiya pointed the wooden branch she held towards Gustav.

Immediately subsequent to that, an immensely powerful jet of water spurted from the tip of the wand, blowing away Gustav’s stone-like face in its entirety alongside everything else above his neck, and that life of his transformed into a deceased one.

There was a heavy thud, and the desk whose legs had been lifted for a moment fell to the floor. A beat later, as if trying to throw the desk using his entire being, Gustav's body, having lost everything upwards of its neck, collapsed to the ground.

A large amount of blood gushed from the wound on his neck, where he had lost his head, which dirtied the floor of the office non-stop.

The fresh blood that spread seemed to insist on Gustav's quick death, which did not feel real.

Todd: "People of the Multi-Arm Tribe, they sure are the same no matter how many arms they got. If anything, just go and get some more heads."

Todd cracked the bones in his neck while looking at the dead Gustav. Then he looked back at Arakiya, who was staring intently at the tip of her branch, and asked "What's wrong?" as he tilted his head.

Todd: "No way, you couldn't be surprised by your own power, right?"

Arakiya: "Incorrect. But, I'm surprised… So much power, with mere water."

Todd: "Oh, that, huh. If you're aiming for a crowd of people who are spread out, then fire's better, but if your opponent is one person, then water's definitely the best. Next time, just put one glass of water's worth or thereabouts inside your opponent's head, that'd be enough."

Arakiya: "Understood… Todd?"

While suggesting some frightening things, Todd walked up to Gustav's corpse. As she cast her eyebrows down, Arakiya called out to him, who had drawn a somewhat large knife from his side.

Not answering her call, Todd went around behind the corpse atop the desk, and thrusting his knife into its thick back without mercy, he sliced it open vertically.

It was a method sparing no quarter, as if carving up a fish.

There was a large quantity of blood flowing from the neck, but the spurts of blood from the already-dead body were minimal; even so, while basking in an amount of blood that was not small in the least, Todd dissected Gustav's body.

Subaru: "…"

Reflexively averting his eyes from that scene, Subaru became aware of his own trembling.

Until now, Subaru had considered Todd to be a dreadful enemy, but this was the first time he had seen him involved in such grotesque conduct. —To think that he would take a person, and dissect them as if they were an animal.

Todd's violence was consistently focused straight on the goal of eliminating enemies and danger.

If he had such a liking towards defiling a corpse in this way, Subaru wondered if every time, after Todd had killed him, his own corpse had been defiled in the same fashion.

Thinking this, an unbearable sense of dread and feeling of revulsion dominated his entire body.

Amidst the unpleasant noises that made him want to plug his ears, Subaru was unable to do so.

Even in a scenario that made him want to kill his emotions by instinct, he never knew what could be lurking there. Perhaps when running away from Todd, if there were corpses nearby, then he might get distracted by them.

And why he was thinking about such a stupid thing was—

Todd: "—There it is."

Arakiya: "—? What is?"

Suddenly, that unpleasant wet sound came to an end, and Todd and Arakiya's conversation shifted.

Arakiya, too, had lowered her voice at Todd's vulgar taste, to which Todd had replied quite indifferently, wiping the blood splattered on his cheek with the back of his hand.

Todd: "It's the curse tool y'know, the curse tool. I figured someone like him would keep it embedded in his body somehow."

Arakiya: "Curse tool…"

Todd: "It's necessary to activate the curse rule… Ah, it's fine if you don't know. Anyhow."

While saying that, what Todd had pulled out of Gustav's body was what appeared to be a black orb, which had been embedded dead center in his large body.

The orb Todd had called the curse tool was around the size of a golf ball, at most.

Even so, it was the curse tool necessary to activate the curse rule.

In other words—

Todd: "As long as I have this thing, it doesn't matter whether the owner lives or dies. —He sure did something stupid."

Fiddling with the curse tool in his hand, Todd moved away from Gustav's corpse's back, which had lost its head under heroic circumstances, while calling out to it.

There was neither pity nor sympathy in his voice. Instead, there was a tinge of indifference and disgust.

Todd: "It's strange that you thought you could compete against a monster."

Todd muttered as he tilted his head, presumably referring to

Arakiya, who had killed Gustav in the time of a single breath.

However, neither Gustav, who had lost his life, nor Subaru, who had been present at the scene, could help but think that the “monster” in question was undoubtedly Todd.

Subaru: “…”

—Thus, by any means necessary, he must steal the curse tool from that “monster”.

Todd: “Arakiya, give me water. I need to rinse off the blood, then, as for the guys on the Island—”

Todd’s attention turned to Arakiya after tearing Gustav’s corpse open, wanting to wash his bloody knife and hands.

Putting the curse tool in his hand onto the work desk for one moment, Todd turned to Arakiya’s side.

—Instinctively, Subaru decided that it had to be then.

Arakiya: “Ah.”

And, prompted by Arakiya’s word, her mouth wide open, Todd turned back around. Noticing a child having appeared in the middle of the room all of a sudden, reaching his hand out to the curse tool on the desk, Todd’s eyes opened wide.

Hiain’s camouflage came to an end, having completed its job.

So thoroughly, that neither the meticulous Todd nor the monster-grade Arakiya, had noticed Subaru and Hiain’s presence.

Subaru: “Hiain!”

The instant he caught onto the curse tool with his fingertips, Subaru called out to Hiain, who had concealed himself by assimilating with the floor he lay down on.

However, his gaze was in a completely different direction—the entrance to the office.

Facing that way, he raised his voice,

Subaru: “Blow away the whole room!!”

Todd: “—Hk, Arakiya!”

Hearing Subaru’s strained shout, Todd immediately called out for Arakiya. While also keeping vigilance towards the door, Arakiya clung close by Todd’s side.

If an outrageous attack were to be cast from near the door, they would be able to respond to it.

However—

Todd: “—It’s a bluff?!”

In one second, a moment in which nothing happened, Todd saw through Subaru’s intention. But by being given just that second, Subaru was able to fulfill his objective.

He grasped the cursed tool, and just after—

Hiain: “Wooooooaaaah!”

While howling, Hiain came flying towards the waist of Subaru, who had gotten a hold of the curse tool, and grabbed him. Just after, Hiain held Subaru in his arms as they plunged into the side of the room opposite to the entrance—into the window of the office.

The entire weight of their bodies crashed into it, and Subaru and Hiain flew out as the window frame was destroyed.

The moment they jumped out—

Arakiya: “Splash—”

And, with power unimaginable from such an unfeeling chant, a flash flood devastated the office.

Water with tremendous pressure blew away the upper stratum of the Gladiator Island, and the furniture and bookcases that Gustav, the owner of the room, had so meticulously arranged, were swept away without mercy.

However—

Arakiya: “They’re gone.”

Watching the items in the room streaming out of the broken walls one-by-one, Arakiya, the one responsible, stepped on the wet floor and muttered so.

Looking towards the exterior of the broken office, downwards, a white cloth tied along the wall could be seen.

If one were to grab it and let their hands glide, they would be able to descend to the bottom.

Arakiya: “This…”

Todd: “So they were fully prepared to ambush us, huh? —That kid, just what is he.”

Next to Arakiya, also looking out the wall, Todd put his hand over his mouth, murmuring.

Narrowing his eyes, Todd, in careful thought, let out a small sigh,

Todd: “Arakiya, go recover the curse tool. It’s alright to kill.”

Arakiya: “Understood. What about you, Todd?”

Todd: “The things I’m going to do, you don’t need to know about them.”

With a shake of his head, Todd brushed off Arakiya’s question like that. However, Arakiya was unbothered by that, and instead leaned out of the broken wall and dropped straight down.

Without cheap tricks, without any assistance, from dozens of meters high.

And then, seeing Arakiya off as she chased after the intruders, Todd heaved a sigh, and,

Todd: “…That brat sure had a nasty smell.”

And, muttering so, his eyes lacking any expression, he clicked his tongue in annoyance.

Chapter 72: Ludicrous Rumors

1

—The sheet dangling from the office's window had been insurance, in case the worst came to pass.

Inside Gustav's office, a discussion between him and two emissaries, Todd and Arakiya, had been in progress, although only led entirely by the two of Todd and Gustav—getting to the crux of the pair's visit to the Island had taken quite a lot of trial and error for Subaru and Hiain, as they had eavesdropped.

The events that would occur, the words that would be employed, a way with which to calm Hiain down, the blind spot for him and Hiain to hide in, an escape route; those were the requirements.

They would have to deceive Todd, a meticulous person, and Arakiya, one of the Nine Divine Generals.

They had no problems in being similar to characters in a manga that could feel any presence. For the purpose of deceiving them, Subaru had needed to pull out all the stops.

He had asked Weitz to buy some time, Tanza to bring herbs with strong odors on the way to the office, and Idra to gather people on the vantage point so as to distract them, even if only a little.

By doing all those things, they would raise their suspicion to the utmost, but only so much that they still would not act on it.

Those fortifications, built upon thin ice, had allowed them to overcome their opponent's own defensive fortifications.

However—

Hiain: "Schwartz, what's the plan now?!"

Subaru: "Still thinking!"

As he clung on to Hiain's body, having barely avoided a fall to their death, Subaru bellowed.

Being a lizardman, his hands and feet could attach to the walls in a manner akin to actual lizards. However, Hiain's body was bigger than a lizard's, and furthermore, he had been saddled with a weight, that being Subaru.

A closer description would be that they had descended rapidly, borrowing the dangling sheets' assistance to avoid injury.

Having been lowered from Hiain's arms to the courtyard, Subaru then confirmed the feeling of the curse tool in his hand.

The black ball, still sticky and wet with blood, had been inside Gustav's body—just where exactly it had been placed, he did not know, only that it had been ripped out of him.

Subaru: "Guh."

Enduring the nausea rising from within, Subaru frantically planned his next move.

The very instant Todd let go of the curse tool had been the instant Subaru thought he had to act. Since he had attained the curse tool this way, he had not been mistaken in that.

But at the same time, there was no doubt that it was a move made without any thought on what to do afterwards.

Subaru: "Anyway, let's use your camouflage in those bushes!"

Hiain: "A-are ya sure we shouldn't run?"

Subaru: "No, we can't just run away without any thought, she'd find us right away! Quickly!"

Between the options that popped into his head, "running" or "hiding", he had immediately chosen "hiding".

As they had already aroused the hostility of Todd and Arakiya, there was no doubt that they would face Death either way. So he had opted for a path that would give him better insight into future events.

If they were to run away, they would have to continuously stay on the run.

But if they hid, they would be able to continue mulling over what to do next for as long as they stayed silent.

Subaru: "…"

Pulling the arm of the bewildered Hiain, Subaru dove behind a plant in the corner of the courtyard. Then, Hiain camouflaged himself while covering Subaru, hiding themselves from those around them.

With Hiain's body pressing down on him, he felt his heartbeat on his back, beating with an inordinate force.

He was frightened, cowering. Still, he had to endure this.

Because if he could not—

???: "They're not here."

With a light thud, a girl overcame the height that Subaru and Hiain had struggled to descend.

The one landing barefoot in the courtyard was Arakiya, holding a thin tree branch in her hand. One of her eyes covered by an eyepatch, she turned, surveying the courtyard with her sleepy-looking eye.

Could Hiain's camouflage truly deceive her eye as she searched?

Even if they could elude one's perception provided the person was unaware of their existence, they would not be able to conceal themselves in the blind spot were their existence to be known. If she just searched for Subaru and Hiain with the slighest bit of extra attentiveness, would heighten their anxiety on being found.

There was nothing Subaru could do about that. But they absolutely could not let themselves be found.

Not because he had obtained a curse tool capable of killing or saving everyone on the Island.

For a more pressing reason, a reason directly related to Natsuki Subaru's own state, was why he could not afford being found, was why he could not afford dying.

Arakiya: "Hm—"

He wished that she would turn around and walk away in the wrong direction.

But in the end, that wish of his was in vain; wrinkling her brow and letting out a small growl, Arakiya approached the shrubs where Subaru and Hiain were hiding.

Their presence, their smell, their breathing, the sound of one of their heartbeats, he did not know which one had tipped her off.

Or perhaps, it was some sort of aura that only the strong were able to sense, something Subaru and his partner could not. If she was feeling anything along those lines, it would be beyond foul play. To corner them with something they had no way to counteract should be against the rules.

But it seemed that, in Arakiya's point of view, those rules were laughable at best—.

???: "Oioi, the hell's this? The Governor's room's been blown up!"

???: "Who's this beautiful woman, is she a guest?"

???: "What is it, did something happen?"

Just before these bitter thoughts completely filled his head, just before Arakiya reached the garden shrubs, the courtyard's atmosphere was disturbed by the voices of multiple men.

Looking over, five gladiators had lumbered over and made their appearance in the courtyard. They were probably onlookers of a

Unit who had caught the sound of Arakiya blowing Gustav's room up.

Their attention was focused on Gustav's room, with its blown-out walls, and on Arakiya, a beautiful, unfamiliar girl standing in the courtyard.

Arakiya, too, turned towards them as they appeared, tilting her slender head with a thoughtful look.

From her perspective, it was as though she was suspecting that those that had now appeared were comrades of the ones she was chasing, Subaru and Hiain. But Subaru did not mind that, not in the least.

Their appearance in this juncture had been completely unforeseen by Subaru, they were intruders summoned by coincidence.

Even if she were to question them, she would obtain no information in regards to Subaru and Hiain. In fact, Subaru and Hiain would wait for a chance to sneak away while she attempted to make them talk.

They were a lifeline provided by the heavens, different from what Subaru and Hiain had prepared themselves—

???: "—Listen!"

???: "—Hk."

Not wanting to miss their chance, Subaru and Hiain, who had been watching Arakiya's movements intently, heard a voice emanating from the room with a broken wall above them.

The one who the voice belonged to was Todd, the last person remaining in that room.

Regaining his fear of Todd, whose existence had momentarily been put out of his consciousness due to focusing on the threat of Arakiya in front of him, he psyched himself up as he trembled.

He braced his fearful heart, so that he would be able to deal with whatever Todd was about to say.

Todd: “Governor Gustav Morello has been killed! The two perpetrators are a black-haired child, and a gray lizardman! Kill them as soon as you find them!”

Subaru: “…”

Todd: “I repeat! Governor Gustav Morello has been killed! The Governor’s role will be taken over by General First-Class Arakiya! If you don’t want to die due to the curse rule, kill them both!”

His voice was not rough, neither did it overwhelm with emotions, but it possessed emotional control necessary to be heard by a large number of human beings and make them act.

That voice lingered in one’s eardrums, forbidding those who listened from forgetting its contents, even if they lagged behind in understanding.

The moment Todd spoke, Subaru’s eyes widened as he realized that they had been outsmarted.

The blame for Gustav’s death was now being attributed to Subaru and Hiain. Even if they claimed they were being falsely accused, there was no hope that a proper investigation or trial would be held on this Island.

To begin with, if they were caught by someone even once, everything would be over for Subaru and Hiain.

In other words—

Todd: “—Now, let Sparka begin!!”

The evil custom of Gladiator Island Ginunhive, its Lifeblood Ritual, would begin with the entire Island as a stage.

Todd: “Arakiya!”

Declaring the commencement of that cruel ceremony, with those who had heard it still unable to move, Todd called out to Arakiya in a less strident voice.

She looked up and their eyes met, and Todd silently pointed to the courtyard below. For a moment, Subaru's heart palpitated, but Todd was not pointing at him and Hiain.

He was pointing at the gladiators, the heavenly lifeline that had appeared in the courtyard at the last moment.

Todd, after pointing at the gladiators, brought that very same finger to his neck, and,

Todd: "—Kill them."

While his voice had been inaudible, even Subaru had been able to tell that his lips had moved as to speak that.

Moving his finger along his neck was a ruthless cue for lopping off someone's head. Arakiya, having witnessed the same sight Subaru had, slowly turned her gaze toward the gladiators.

The gladiators were puzzled, being stared at by Arakiya, through the one red eye of hers that was uncovered by an eyepatch.

They had yet to digest the meaning of Todd's prior words.

Gladiator: "Lil' miss, ya know somethin' 'bout that? That thing 'bout Gustav being dead, is that…"

Arakiya: "I'm sorry. I was told to."

Gladiator: "Huh…? Told what?"

A gladiator tilted his head, the combination of that sudden order and the pair of people unknown to them being the reason. And Arakiya, responding to the gladiator, produced a great sideways swing of her right hand, which held the branch.

That was all she did. That alone, was enough.

Gladiator: "Buah…"

The next moment, the heads of all five gladiators facing Arakiya exploded from the inside.

To be precise, the effects had been split. Some'd had their heads burst from the inside, some had died because the contents of their faces had been pushed out of their eyes and noses, and some had died because their heads had swollen in bizarre fashion.

Although it probably had not made much of a difference as far as they were concerned, since the results had been the same regardless.

Arakiya: "To not talk to dead people."

With their heads destroyed, the gladiators fell limp.

Only after a while did Subaru realize that her mutter, let out while looking at the fallen gladiators, was the answer to his question from earlier. His mind was too occupied for him to pay any attention to it.

His mind was too occupied in processing what that monster, Arakiya, had done.

—It was probably, water.

Todd had given Arakiya advice at the time Gustav was killed. To put water inside her opponent's head, perhaps that was what she had done.

The heads of the gladiators had been blown up from the inside, with the water that materialized there being the cause.

Arakiya: "One glass of water's worth…"

As she voiced that, Arakiya fiddled with the tip of the branch in her hand with her other hand.

While her ruminating tone lacked emotion, to Subaru it sounded somewhat like she was expressing dissatisfaction she felt. —A dissatisfaction that only amounted to her being unhappy about not reaching that amount.

Having feelings of that sort after murdering people, it was far from normal.

That was why she was a monster. Arakiya, and of course, Todd was one too.

???: “Anyone here?! Did anyone hear that loud-ass voice just now?!”

Arakiya’s inhuman deeds made Subaru’s mind grow darker; and while Hiain froze, forgetting to even breathe, yet another voice arrived at the courtyard.

Another gladiator. One gladiator after another rushed there, understanding that it was the most likely spot everyone was gathering at since they were able to look up at the Governor’s office, from which they had heard that voice.

And so, that meant—

Gladiator: “Oi, you, where did you come from! The Governor’s…”

Arakiya: “I was told to. —To not talk to dead people.”

That the victims of the Spirit Eater, of Arakiya, would increase.

Hence, it commenced.

—A massacre on the Gladiator Island commenced, for a reason different to the curse rule being invoked.

2

The situation that Todd had set up was so horrid, that it was hard to believe that it had been a sudden flash of inspiration.

One-by-one, Arakiya would kill the gladiators indiscriminately.

Naturally, there was not even a single person able to take her on and return a blow, given that she was a Divine General. Entering her field of vision was a calamity of such magnitude as to signify instant death.

Certainly, Arakiya should have been able to manipulate waterspouts and explosive flames, but the fact that she had not utilized those kinds of powerful techniques that seemed like they could engulf the entire Island, at the very least, truly provided some modicum of relief.

Perhaps loathing being unable to check the corpses in that case, Todd had ordered her as such.

And Arakiya aside, the Island's guards were also troublesome.

From what it seemed, the guards had somehow believed Todd's words that Arakiya had taken over Gustav's role after the latter's demise. Subaru did not know how someone could actually take over an official position of the sort, but he did not believe Gustav would wish his murderer to succeed him.

A portion of that matter had become that Subaru and Hiain had killed Gustav, so as far as the guards were concerned, there was no reason to doubt Todd's words.

Subaru disliked being misunderstood by the guards like that, but his biggest problem was—

???: "Shit! They've really done it! The guards have unleashed the Gladiator Beasts onto the Island! They're coming at us! Runrunrunrun!"

Such bellows and screams were continuously raised throughout the Island as it descended into chaos.

The unleashed Gladiator Beasts—the ones employed as enemies during Sparka, were, as far as Subaru could see, Witchbeasts who'd all had their horns broken off, and currently, they were obeying the guards.

Those Gladiator Beasts, complying with the orders given by the guards following Todd, were on the prowl for the pair of Subaru and Hiain on the Island. —However, the Gladiator Beasts could not distinguish between each gladiator.

That was why, one after another, the Gladiator Beasts had also begun attacking the gladiators indiscriminately.

???: “Where are ya?! Hurry up ‘n c’mon out, Schwartz! Ya creepy lil’ brat!”

A guard yelled, his eyes shimmering with hostility, as he patrolled the corridors with a large two-headed dog next to him.

The guards did not make active attempts to communicate with the gladiators, so this marked the first time Subaru had seen them lay their emotions bare in such a way. The thought that they had always harboured hostility in that way, also brought sadness to Subaru.

Only, it did not just bring sadness, it also brought a realization.

The guards looking for Subaru and Hiain appeared to be impatient and irritated, and moreover, they appeared afraid. Probably, that was not unrelated to the fact that the guards too would die when the curse rule was activated.

The guards, too, were taking many things into consideration as they chose to obey, so that they themselves would not die.

Arakiya and the guards, from Subaru and Hiain’s perspective, were dangerous enemies prowling the Island.

Had Todd, the one controlling them like pawns, been operating on his own, or had he been spreading his instructions? The fact that his whereabouts were unknown considerably diminished Subaru’s capability to think.

The whole time, because he had continuously been on the lookout for Todd, his strained heart was on the brink of cracking.

And to pour salt on Subaru’s wounds—

???: “Oi, where’s Schwartz?! Was he there?”

???: “Haven’t seen him! I’m more worried ’bout the guards! If they find us, we’re dead!”

???: “So, if we hand Schwartz over to them…”

???: “Ya moron! They’re killin’ anyone they find! They ain’t makin’ any distinction!”

???: “Then what’re ya gonna do?! Are ya gonna just shut up n’ die’?!”

???: “B-but, if those rumors about Schwartz are true…!”

Heard were the voices of gladiators, desperately keeping on struggling as best as they could, in order to survive.

Faced with the threat posed by Arakiya and the guards, among the desperate gladiators, opinions were split.

Either stand up to the tyranny, or do as they were told and hand Subaru over; there were those who had resigned themselves to the fact that both were futile, some who lamented this unreasonable situation, others who tried to cling to a papier-mâché hope devoid of any basis, among various others.

Even amongst the gladiators, Subaru had enemies, as well as a great number of people that could potentially become enemies.

In a way, compared to Arakiya and the guards, who could all be classified as enemies, this group may be far more formidable.

Since he could not tell friend from foe, Subaru could not rely on them so carelessly.

Arakiya, the guards and the Gladiator Beasts, the gladiators whom he could not know if they were friend or foe—and finally, Todd.

With the commencement of the pursuit after Subaru and Hiain, the Gladiator Island headed for destruction.

It had indeed come to pass. The massacre. Even though he had struggled so desperately to try and prevent it.

Subaru: “Old Man Null!”

Dashing through the island that had become a catastrophe, Subaru barged into the room just around the corner.

The healing room on the lower stratum of the Island was the workplace of Old Man Null, where he had taken care of Subaru many times. The entrance to the room had been demolished, and because of that, Subaru felt a bad premonition as he rushed into the room.

And that bad premonition of his came true.

???: “Schwartz-sama…”

Greeting Subaru as he ran into the healing room, was a hoarse hail of a young girl. It had come from Tanza sitting in the back of the room; lying next to her petite form, was the corpse of a rat from which wings protruded.

Tanza had probably defeated that Witchbeast single-handedly. Subaru thought that that was very incredible.

But before Tanza had come along, that Witchbeast had devastated the healing room, and killed a person.

At Tanza’s feet as she crouched down, was a collapsed cadaver whose head had been bitten right off, the cadaver of a feeble old man who was nothing more than skin and bones.

Hiain: “S-Schwartz…”

Hiain, having burst into the healing room alongside Subaru, had his voice tremble upon witnessing the same sight.

That he had been able to remain hidden until Arakiya left that courtyard in which she executed that heinous act of murdering gladiators as they came along one bye one, had only been thanks to Hiain.

Without him, it would have been utterly impossible for Subaru to return to this place.

However, if they just repeatedly ran and hid, in the end, they would not win.

???: “Schwartz, you’re back?!”

???: “Hmph, ya didn’t die either, lizard bastard…”

Idra and Weitz also rushed over to Old Man Null’s corpse, in front of which Subaru and Hiain were hanging their heads. All the members of his Unit, who had helped him sneak into the office, were present.

Considering the state of the Island, that no one had died and they had been able to reconvene was akin to a miracle.

However, if it truly were a miracle, shouldn’t the results they had procured be much, much better than this?

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama, are the stories floating about true? About Governor Gustav’s fate?”

Subaru: “That it was me and Hiain? There’s no way we could’ve done that. Gustav-san was killed by the emissaries from the Imperial Capital… By Arakiya. No, it was Todd, who made use of Arakiya.”

Tanza: “Todd…? Who is that…”

Subaru: “Someone scarier than a Sin Archbishop.”

At least, that was Subaru’s current perception.

From what he recalled, Sin Archbishops were not good people either but when compared to Todd, they still had some charm, was what it seemed like. No, it did not seem like that. No matter what they were compared to, scum remained scum.

But the way Subaru had put it seemed to make Tanza and everyone else understand just how dangerous Todd was.

Tanza: “Do not give such a reckless example. Even if we comprehend they differ from the likes of the Sin Archbishops, it is still bad for the heart.”

Subaru: “Ah, sorry, but I’m quite familiar with them. After all, I’ve happened to encounter them plenty of times.”

Tanza: “You have encountered Sin Archbishops plenty of times? That is, as expected…”

Subaru: “As expected, what does that mean? Do you know something about me?”

Everyone: “…”

Partly out of frustration, he spoke in a way that sounded like he was reproaching Tanza.

Subaru regretted this, but Tanza’s reaction, her eyes downcast, was not due to being reproached, but seemingly in concern for Subaru’s previous comment itself.

That was a little strange to Subaru.

No way though, that any of these people knew of Subaru’s circumstances—that every time he Returned by Death, his Miasma, which was seemingly connected to the Witch, got stronger.

Idra: “So, what should we do? If Governor Gustav is dead, then the curse rule that binds us must be gone as well. Should we raise the drawbridge and head off the Island?”

Hiain: “Y-ya idiot! We ain’t got the key for that! Besides, if we move the drawbridge, we’ll be targeted immediately!”

Weitz: “So, ya prefer to keep on fighting everyone else on the Island…? If the enemy’ll be a Divine General, then sooner or later… There’ll be no way left for us to retreat…”

As Idra and everyone else discussed how to overcome the situation, Subaru’s attention also turned in that direction.

Idra’s suggestion of escaping via the drawbridge was a good one. Of the various conditions that had changed, because the curse tool was present in Subaru’s hands, and the curse rule was no more, they could now leave the Island.

However, as Hiain had said, if they were to escape by using the drawbridge, they could be ambushed in two places. On the control tower for operating the drawbridge, and on the drawbridge itself as they crossed it.

On the other hand, not leaving the Island was an idea that kept getting worse and worse, so as per Weitz's statement, they would not choose it.

In addition to that—

Subaru: "—Gustav-san."

If things continued at this rate, the island's gladiators, who were still losing their lives, falling prey to Arakiya one-by-one, and Old Man Null as well, would remain dead in a world that would live on.

That was something unbearable for Subaru.

Even if he had succeeded in recovering the curse tool, and the fear of the curse had disappeared, deciding that this was the "very best" and moving forward was not what Natsuki Subaru had originally desired.

—Such a path was not what the son of Natsuki Kenichi ought to choose.

Subaru: "At least, if I can reduce the number of people I have to deal with…"

His eyes shut tightly, Subaru was stuck amidst a maze of deliberations.

As he murmured, Tanza beside him bit into her thin lip. In a situation where the entire Island was hostile, certainly another different choice would also emerge if their circumstances were even a bit better, but—

Hiain: "…Hey, heeey, in that case, can't'cha just stop hidin' it?"

Subaru: "…"

Hiain: “Oi, Schwartz, I mean you. I’m talkin’ to ya, man.”

Subaru: “…Huh?”

As Hiain suddenly started talking, a feeling of trepidation in his voice, Subaru widened his eyes in wonder.

It had happened as he was pondering over things, but even more than that, since he had no idea what the hell Hiain was talking about, Subaru had been slow to reach.

To stop hiding it, so Hiain had told Subaru.

So he had told him, but—

Subaru: “To stop hiding it… Hiding what?”

Hiain: “C-cut it out! In this situation, keepin’ it a secret ain’t the right move!”

Weitz: “Oi, stop it, lizard bastard…!”

Hiain snapped at Subaru with an intense vigor, the latter without a clue as to what the former was going on about. Weitz intervened to stop him, but Subaru was too surprised to thank him.

But Idra, also making a serious face, prefaced with “Schwartz” towards Subaru,

Idra: “The way he’s putting it aside, I understand how Hiain is feeling. Isn’t it about time you come forth with it?”

Subaru: “No, like I said, I have no idea what you’re talking about…”

Idra: “—It’s, about your father.”

Subaru: “…My dad?”

With seriousness, with unbelievable seriousness, Idra declared so to Subaru.

But despite being told that with such seriousness, Subaru’s confusion only grew more and more. He did not understand why it was so necessary to talk about his father right now.

Subaru's father was, in the eyes of his son, in the eyes of his wife, a man of paramount splendidness, a person who ought to be respected, the very object of Subaru's admiration, but—

Subaru: "But, he's an ordinary salaryman…?"

Hiain: "Don't pull the wool over my eyes! I already know! Ya're His Excellency the Emperor's illegitimate son, ain't'cha?!"

Subaru: "…"

Subaru's voice, as he attempted to explain that that information would not be useful in this situation, was drowned out by Hiain's own, as the latter's arms were held behind his back.

It was drowned out, but the volume of water employed to do so was so overwhelming, that Subaru's mind was unable to comprehend the vastness of the wave that had washed him over.

Just now, what did Hiain say?

Subaru: "…I'm, His Excellency the Emperor's, child?"

Hiain: "Yeah, that's right! It's bein' talked about outside the Island! With black hair and black eyes, the illegitimate son of His Excellency the Emperor Vincent Vollachia's somewhere in the country! That's…"

Idra: "—Schwartz, it seems that'd be you?"

Taking over from Hiain, Idra spoke towards Subaru, his voice and eyes serene.

The eyes of Hiain, seemingly depending on him, and the eyes of Idra, which had faith in him, when they appeared as if they had not just told an unfunny joke in this situation, Subaru looked to Weitz.

His tattoo-covered face contorting, Weitz spoke,

Weitz: "I believe I told'cha… I know who ya are… But, I don't give a fuck ‘bout that, I’ll lend ya my strength regardless…”

Were it not for these circumstances, those faithful words would have been far more moving.

Back then, when Subaru had been told that in the lower stratum, just how much resolve had it taken Weitz to go and say that, its weight only now becoming clear.

And that too, came from a wholly mistaken idea.

Subaru: “W-wait, wait a sec… Me, the child of the Emperor, why?”

Idra: “For someone of such young age, your ability for judgment, command, and survival are unimaginable. You were the one who saved us and Hiain’s people during Sparka, Schwartz.”

Subaru: “That’s…”

It was true that Subaru had defied fate by making full use of his ability.

But he had no idea that it would cause such a preposterous misunderstanding among Idra and the others.

In the first place, for them to have even gotten such a wrong idea of him.

Subaru: “Tanza, why didn’t you tell them they’re wrong…”

Tanza: “—Schwartz-sama, I have been viewing it with my own eyes.”

Subaru: “—Ah.”

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama… You were accompanying His Excellency the Emperor at that place.”

With Tanza gently holding the hem of her kimono in place as she asserted so, Subaru was left speechless.

What she was talking about, had taken place at Chaosflame. Indeed, Subaru had been in his shrunken state alongside Abel, donning his ridiculous mask.

Since Tanza was Yorna's attendant, it would not have been odd for her to be aware of the truth.

And Tanza had seen the shrunken Subaru, together with the real Emperor, Abel.

And that had appended onto Idra and the others' mistaken assumption.

Subaru: "But, Tanza was working with Olbart-san… No."

Subaru's guess had been that Tanza had been conspiring with Olbart in various deeds.

Perhaps she had been acting to protect Yorna, so he thought, and he did not really feel like blaming her for that. And Olbart would not reveal his hand, even to an accomplice.

Tanza was unaware that Subaru was a shrunken Natsumi Schwartz.

If so—

Subaru: "Tanza, who do you think I am…?"

Tanza: "—. Um, the black-haired woman and His Excellency the Emperor's…"

Subaru: "…"

And the rest, was silence.

Tanza spoke no further, but he understood what she was thinking. Having understood that Subaru was speechless, and he also comprehended that it would be difficult to explain it.

He could offer no evidence. There was no other way but for Subaru to become larger, right here, right now, all of a sudden.

Subaru: "…This thing about the Emperor's illegitimate child, why's that relevant?”

Idra: “—. Right now, a rebel army has been raised outside the Island, against His Excellency the Emperor. The one considered to be the leader of that rebel army is…”

Subaru: “The Emperor’s illegitimate son?”

Idra nodded at Subaru’s suspicion.

And so, even if with some difficulty, the theory was making sense within Subaru’s mind. A power struggle between an Emperor and his child. The battle initiated by Abel and his group outside the island, had become a story along those lines.

In truth, it was a battle between a real Emperor and a fake Emperor.

But what was made known was that it was a battle between the real Emperor and a rebel army led by the Emperor’s child.

He could envision just who had concocted that, and how they had done it.

Subaru: “That bastard…!”

Immediately, Subaru comprehended that the situation had been set up by Abel, and that the rumor had been spread by him.

Then, that was not Abel harassing him; it was a justification for the internal conflict itself, and also a means through which they could find Subaru, who had disappeared from Chaosflame.

To think that this situation had arisen from him considering that Subaru was not dead. He would never, under any circumstances, say “I believe” on the matter of Subaru not being dead.

Subaru: “…”

Tanza and the others watched Subaru, having fallen silent with his hand over his mouth.

Weitz released Hiain, the latter having grown quieter; the attention of all four people turned to Subaru.

During all this, outside the healing room—battles were taking place all over the Island, with the gladiators' situation a precarious one in which they would possibly even lose their lives, that much was understood.

To be silent, to be calm, to take their time, to think, they had no leeway for any of that.

That was why—

Tanza: "—Schwartz-sama."

Tanza beckoned him to instruct him that they had no time, even if that much was understood.

Feeling a slight sense of awe in that call of hers, Subaru surveyed the faces of everyone in his Unit.

He surveyed, and he decided. —That, in the current situation, he would fulfill what was asked of him.

3

—Sensing the turning of tides, Todd Fang calmly stroked his chin.

Todd: "—What an unsettling feeling."

Back in the office, they'd blown the uncooperative Governor's head off, literally replacing the head of the Island; however he had this feeling that, afterwards, things had moved sluggishly.

Of course, if it were just to wipe out everyone on the Island, Arakiya alone was more than capable of doing it.

That Divine General did not have the brains to think for herself yet was extremely powerful, in stark contrast to how simple she was; if she felt like it, she could engulf the entirety of the Island in flames.

Her doing that would be too much trouble for Todd, so he had gone ahead and told her not to do that.

And to begin with—

Todd: “I really didn’t want to come to a place like this.”

Every single one of their actions, which he had marked as being necessary, had backfired. And for that, Todd felt bitter.

The purpose of rescuing Arakiya from captivity in the Fortress City had been to recoup something despite the fact that the city had fallen, return to the Imperial Capital alongside her, and there, have his wishes of being reassigned granted.

In fact, he could say that he had indeed been reassigned, but the way that had come to pass had been far from his expectations.

Todd had been appointed as the sole subordinate of General First-Class Arakiya, someone who’d had no underlings previously.

All that because of one singular lie he had told to deceive Arakiya.

Todd: “Jamal, even when dead, you’re a pain in the ass.”

Although Todd’s lie begat the situation, Arakiya had no doubt that Todd sincerely wished to avenge Jamal.

Because that lie had been necessary to win her over, Todd was unable to renege on it now.

Frankly, he did not know what would cause that woman to bring down her anger on him. Considering the possibility of being turned into charcoal the instant he incurred her wrath, he was unable to retract his comment so carelessly.

As a result, Todd had been made Arakiya’s subordinate.

Arakiya had been given orders by Berstetz Fondalfon, the Imperial Prime Minister, as his pawn; thus, Todd had been sent to this paradise of madmen, to the Gladiator Island.

Berstetz’s command had been to dispose of the problems within the Island. They had been told that Governor Gustav held the means to do so, and that ordering him to carry it out would be an easy task.

Falsehood, all of it.

An easy task was never all that easy to solve. He knew what to expect. Hence why he had been prepared.

Most things could be handled by being prepared in advance. Only unforeseen freak incidents could not be avoided, but the risk could be minimized by averting situations in which these incidents could happen.

And yet, an unforeseen incident had happened.

Something very much out of his hands, like a child, having gone unseen, jumping out from a blind spot in that place.

Todd: “When it comes to killing people of higher rank, I can think of numerous ways to do so, but…”

He really had never given much thought on ways to kill a child.

Nothing about it felt nice, and he doubted he would have a whole lot of opportunities to employ them. As such. he had used something from his short array of leftover candidates, in conjunction with his method of killing for the Gladiator Island.

—If the guards, the Gladiator Beasts, and half of the gladiators were dragged into it, it would be possible to target specific individuals on the Island.

With Arakiya in the mix, it would be odd if the child did not die.

Then again—

Todd: “—There’s no such thing as perfect, isn’t there?”

Twisting his head, Todd muttered such as he walked through a corridor littered with corpses.

The bodies were all gladiators hailing from the Island, their attires shabby. Whether that had been the result of internal conflict, Arakiya's aggression, or the savagery of the Gladiator Beasts, was of no interest.

A corpse was a corpse, so if they were dead, he could erase them from his mind.

???: "Private First-Class Fang, there's no need to go this far…"

Todd: "Of course there is. Governor Gustav was killed. The gladiators have organized and readied themselves. They have planned to turn this island inside out with their armed revolt. I don't know just who's involved, but can you guys tell who's the enemy among them from those who aren't?"

???: "Uh…"

Faced with Todd's query, one of the two guards following behind fell silent.

They were the two guards who had rushed in as soon as Todd declared Sparka after sending Arakiya out of the office. They were obeying him since he had made a display of their fetters, the curse rule. However, since the situation allowed for excuses, they were being weirdly stubborn, even though they should be obeying him without questioning him.

Todd had been the one to make them do this, so they could just blame him.

Their hesitation was pointless, since they were still going about what they had to do with looks of guilt on their face.

Todd: "Stop putting on the airs of being an upstanding person. First and foremost, right now you're being made to work as guards here, so both you and your friend there must have shady pasts. Uniform aside, you're almost the same as them."

Guard: "—Hk."

Todd: "But that uniform's your lifeline. Make sure you comprehend that thoroughly."

Patting the young guard on the shoulder and smiling at him, bitterness still evident on his face, Todd sighed inwardly. — Uniforms or no uniforms, it really just amounted to that, so they ought to be grateful.

Each and every single one of the guards on the Gladiator Island were Imperial Soldiers, their backgrounds such that it would not be at all strange if they had ended up as gladiators.

It was a place of exile where half-wits who disregarded orders, assaulted others in their corps, or failed to follow the iron rules, were sent.

They were a bunch of dullards who'd had their lives bound by the curse rule, and thanks to that, had finally learnt to obey. Coupled with their half-baked act as human beings, one could not help but be compelled to say it was indeed comical.

Todd: "Well, whatever, it doesn't matter."

What was needed of them had not been so much their abilities as guards, but rather the Gladiator Beasts bestowed to them.

If it were possible to sidestep them and get the Gladiator Beasts in his possession, one could do away with the guards as well in one fell swoop. But the guards must have been put in-between to prevent that from happening.

Perhaps that too was a failsafe prepared by the dead Gustav, or perhaps that had been a decision made by His Excellency the Emperor, the one who Gustav so obstinately followed.

Todd: "Anyone who willingly wishes to go to war, anyone who stands by it, is out of their mind. Please, don't disturb mine and Katya's peace…"

Both the signs of rebellion that had cropped up in the Fortress City, and the subsequent events in the Demon City of Chaosflame, to Todd, were nothing but an irritating racket.

He cared not if the apex of the Empire changed, as long as the Empire became a better place to live. And if it did not change, he was fine with the way it was already.

If nothing came to pass, and the days with his beloved woman continued, then—.

Todd: “—That reminds me of something detestable.”

The matter of Todd recalling the rebellion caused a terrifying being to flash through his mind.

A child of war, who loved war, and was loved by war. He would rather that he had died during a tempestuous battle, but he did wonder what had happened to him in actuality.

If he were aligned with the insurgents in terms of position, once that calamity spread, he would appear.

If he were to wage violence, then he would take his leave together with Katya—.

???: “—Todd Fang!!”

Todd: “…”

The moment a high-pitched voice invoked his name, Todd felt agitation in his chest for reasons unknown.

As though the concern envisioned in his head had opportunely manifested itself as reality.

And then—

Todd: “…The hell are you thinking?”

Todd turned around. Before his eyes, at the end of the hallway, was the boy who was supposedly being chased after turning the entirety of the Gladiator Island into an enemy.

A child with black hair, and mean-looking eyes. He was sullied here and there with blood and mud, but all his limbs were still attached; and even more, it seemed like he had not lost anything.

In other words, Arakiya and the guards had missed him altogether.

Todd: “I can tell there’s something there which I can’t express by mere words such as “luck”. But, why did you bother to show your face here? It doesn’t make sense.”

Boy: “…”

Todd: “It’s not as if you’re invincible because you’ve got friends you can count on.”

As he said this, Todd surveyed the boy and the four people who had come alongside him.

A gray lizardman, and a man with tattoos all over his body. Then there was someone of medium build, who had no distinguishing characteristics when compared to those two, as well as a young deergirl garbed in a kimono for whatever reason.

It did not seem that these four were exceptionally powerful people, even in Todd’s eyes. From the aura they gave out, all of them were amateurs; only the tattooed one’s expression and the deergirl’s stance merited attention.

The tattooed man had no hesitation, while the deergirl appeared to be strangely confident in herself.

And thus—

Todd: “It’s hard to read that look in your eyes. I can’t quite tell if this is just you being confident or…”

Boy: “Todd, surrender. And make that woman… Make Arakiya stop, too.”

Todd: “—. First of all, why should I?”

At that absurd, senseless request he was given, Todd raised his eyebrows.

For now, he had urged the conversation onward with a pretense of interest, all while silently signaling with his hand to the two guards standing beside him.

Each of the two guards were accompanied; one by a black great eagle, the other by a frog Gladiator Beast that looked like a lump of rocks.

Like that, Todd and his group squared off against the boy and his own companions. Right beside Todd's group, outside the passage, the great eagle soared through the sky as the frog crawled across the wall, and little-by-little, they closed the distance to their opponents.

If the Gladiator Beasts could slay them and retrieve the curse tool, that would be the best.

Of course, there was the possibility that the curse tool was hidden somewhere, so trouble would remain all the same. But if he could deal with the boy and the lizardman, things would be settled for the time being.

It would be much easier if Arakiya were present—

Todd: "Where is she being held up…?"

There was no way that Arakiya was one to enjoy hunting gladiators.

Some soldiers revelled in murder, but Arakiya was not a person of such ilk. Arakiya was a soldier whose purpose was to put her everything against important opponents; nothing more, nothing less.

He should give consideration to the fact that her not fulfilling her main task meant that some kind of interference had cropped up.

However, if something like that had happened, then the situation was different.

Todd: "So, what reason are you going to give me?"

Boy: "A simple one. —The curse tool that controls the curse rule of this Island is in my hands."

Guard: “Wha…?!”

The boy answered Todd with a shrug of his shoulders, his words causing unrest in the two guards.

Of course they would. The main reason they were following Todd was because the latter held their lives in his hands, a circumstance they could not go against.

However, Todd dismissed it with “It’s a bluff”, as he continued,

Todd: “Worthless bargaining. First of all, a curse tool? Even if you have something like that…”

Boy: “—Here you go.”

Todd: “Oi, oi.”

Even though no demands to see it had been made, the boy pulled something out of his own pocket. It was a black sphere, wiped clean of blood, and very recognizable even at a distance.

It had been in his hand only for scant time, but there was no mistaking it.

It was the real thing, the curse tool that had been inside Gustav’s body.

If it were Todd, he would definitely hide it somewhere on the Island and use the item and its whereabouts as a bargaining chip.

What was the purpose of bringing the real thing instead of doing so?

Todd: “What’s with that dirty orb? Don’t tell me you think you can invoke the curse rule with it? If so, give it a try. Try reducing the number of guards in your way.”

Guard: “Wha?! D-don’t! If he does that…”

Todd: “I told you, it’s a bluff. Or perhaps you do not believe the words of a messenger from the Imperial Capital?”

Having once more conveyed that to the guard who had lost his composure, the guard fell silent, his face pale.

The reaction made Todd a bit uneasy. It was understandable that he would be anxious, doubting the authenticity of the claim of the black orb being a curse tool; however, his reaction was peculiar.

It was as if the guards possessed a reason, a well-founded reason as to why they could not dismiss the words of that child and his companions—No, the words of just the child, as a bluff.

Todd: “What the? Is there a problem with that chi—”

???: “—Listen closely, you boor.”

Todd: “…”

Seeking an answer to his uneasiness, Todd attempted to question the guard. But before he could, a high-pitched voice echoed down the passage, drawing his attention to the deergirl.

She rolled up the sleeve of her kimono up to her arm, and gently pointed her hand towards the boy beside her.

Deergirl: “If you hail from outside the Island, you have probably already heard about it. About the great upheaval currently shaking the entirety of the Empire, and the numerous rumors circulating on that topic.”

Todd: “…”

Todd shut one eye at the girl’s appeal, which felt dignified, even majestic.

Regardless of how they had secured the means to obtain information while on the Island, the girl was correct, the public would gossip about this thing or the other to their hearts’ desire.

As far as the insurgents went, various sayings already existed; one of those was that one among the Nine Divine Generals had already joined them.

Some of those were quite ridiculous, but—.

Todd: “Hey, no way.”

Deergirl: “—This gentleman right here is the one at the heart of the situation shaking the Empire. This esteemed gentleman, who has stood up to correct the erred ways of the Empire, the one endowed with the legitimate credentials to do so.”

After a beat, after a pause, the young girl looked over at him.

In the recesses of those round eyes of hers, Todd caught a glimpse of a thought that swelled the concern that had been brewing in his heart—

Deergirl: “—He is the son of His Excellency the Emperor Vincent Vollachia, Natsuki Schwartz-sama.”

The illegitimate son of His Excellency the Emperor, with the curse tool in his hands.

Those ludicrous claims had been delivered by the girl carrying herself with utmost dignity. Her demeanor was as though she’d had plenty of actual experience in scenes of the sort, and was accompanied with persuasion; such that one was unable to doubt the truth of those ludicrous claims.

Indeed, among those ridiculous rumors, there had been something of this sort.

The leader of the insurgent army was the illegitimate son of the Emperor, possessing black eyes and black hair, or so the rumors went. Of course, Imperial Soldiers with their head screwed right would have doubled themselves over in laughter, struggling to take such absurd nonsense seriously.

If he did indeed exist, even Todd thought that spelled trouble.

But the idea that he would just happen to be on this Island by chance, was far too ridiculous to contemplate seriously.

However—

Guards: "—Hk."

The guards gulped, their complexion changed. The guards' reaction had not gone unnoticed by Todd.

Perchance they had heard something similar to the information Todd had just been told. They had heard something of the sort by accident, and that had nurtured the seeds of suspicion within their hearts.

Henceforth, upon the boy's—upon the child named Natsuki Schwartz's declaration, that of possessing the curse tool, they were incapable of laughing it off as a bluff.

They were possessed by an illusion that he could perhaps be more credible than Todd, with his position as a messenger from the Imperial Capital, and as Arakiya's subordinate.

Hence—

Deergirl: "Now then, all of you belonging to the guards, let us quickly—"

The girl had tried to run her mouth and say something in quick succession.

Before the girl's request could reach them, Todd brought his arm to his waist and grabbed a hilt, sweeping it sideways with all his strength.

Guard: "—Hk!"

The arcing blade of an axe swept towards the two guards standing beside Todd. The head of the guard to the right was chopped off, while the head of the guard to the left was cracked open and slammed against the wall.

Both were granted instant death, the momentum of them still wavering having prevented them from joining the others.

And then—

Todd: “—Let’s go!”

Rushing to the head of the guard he had chopped off, Todd punted it forward as hard as he could. The head splattered blood as it flew, soaring towards the boy and his group, eyes wide in amazement.

They looked on as though they had not understood the meaning behind his actions in the slightest—

???: “—GYAOO!!”

The next moment, the colossal body of the black great eagle plunged into the passage from the side, engulfing everything nearby in destruction; the flying guard’s head, the boy, and his companions.

Chapter 73:
Weitz Rogen

1

—Weitz Rogen had never believed he could live or die honestly.

Either way, the thing called society tended to undervalue the word “normal”.

“Normal” was employed to convey the meaning of “average” or “ordinary”, something that did not stand out, but from the viewpoint of those that were less than human in particular, it was an unreachable standard.

The City of Iron and Blood of Glarasia, was the name of Weitz’s hometown, where he had been born and raised.

It was an unhinged city where the weapons and armor used throughout the whole Empire, as well as the numerous tools necessary for battle, were manufactured. Where craftsmen worked diligently to make arms for the sake of wounding others, forging their steel day and night.

About half of the residents were involved in some form of arms manufacturing, and Weitz had been no exception. He’d had no parents around at the time he had been gaining awareness of the things around him, and had been forced to do chores in a craftsman’s workshop, so he had neither interest nor pride in such work.

He would perform his job in order to eat, and perform chores at workshops for no other reason than the fact that the place he had been born in was the City of Iron and Blood.

If their main occupation were horse gear, he would help to make it, if it were agriculture, he would carry a hoe.

Without fixation or interest, Weitz had worked silently under the sidelong glances of the craftsmen forging steel. Unable to know what he had been thinking, there had been those who called the antisocial Weitz a hard worker, but most had probably thought of him as a mysterious and creepy guy.

Weitz had not been concerned about that as well. He had not been thinking of getting along with anyone.

He thought that, since he had been alone since birth, it was natural to be alone upon his death.

Such an ephemeral indifference, that way of life was probably loathed by others.

When suspicions arose that the materials stocked from the workshop he frequented were being sold through illegal channels, Weitz had been the first one to come under suspicion.

Weitz, who had often worked by his lonesome, possessing no partner whatsoever to protect him, had been in possession of absolutely zero means to clear up the suspicions that had been cast on him.

Ultimately, unable to clear up the false accusations, Weitz was tried for a crime he had no memory of committing, and became a criminal. —The first tattoo inked onto him was evidence of his punishment, in order for him to be recognizable as a criminal at a glance.

There were no people who wore clothes with long sleeves, since the city was constantly enveloped in hot air from the forging of steel; and so, his tattoos had constantly been laid bare upon both his forearms.

Even if he were to wear long-sleeved clothes, it would have been immediately blatant that it was because he had something to be guilty of.

Once the evidence of his crime had been inked onto him, he could no longer live the same life as before.

It may not have been an excellent life until then, but that was when he gave up the idea of being “normal”.

No longer able to work in a workshop run legitimately, Weitz turned to thievery to earn his daily income, starting to steal materials and sell through illegal channels. In the end, he had become a real criminal.

—In short, his supposed sin had now caught up with reality.

When he had been suspected of selling through illegal channels, and no one had been willing to listen to Weitz’s side of the story, Weitz had not been a criminal. But afterwards, Weitz ultimately became a criminal.

Perhaps it was something such as an inevitability.

Weitz: “If I’m a repulsive fuck, then I’m fine with that…”

Inked with tattoos and having become a criminal, in anyone’s eyes, he would appear be detached from the concept of “normal”. Even while committing crimes in order to earn money, it was the same as before; he had been unable to get along with others.

In that case, he should have severed all troublesome relationships and the like from the get-go.

The tattoos which had only been on his forearms, now inking shoulders and chest, had been enlarged by his own hands. Before long, they had covered his upper body, his legs, and had even reached his face and head.

Tattoos on one’s arms was evidence of a criminal, but tattoos across one’s entire body was the sign of someone dangerous, someone who ought not be approached.

Make way, everyone, fear and relent. The once-pitiful man, forsaken by all and fallen to crime, was no more. What remained was merely someone “less than human”, some troublesome, with nothing left to lose.

That was why—

???: “—Halt, criminal scum! Don’t think you can get off unpunished!”

Encircled by the city guards with their weapons pointed at him, Weitz quickly surrendered.

By his feet, bloodstained and collapsed, had been someone from his former workshop—from the place where Weitz first became a criminal, it had been a man who worked as an apprentice craftsman.

The man’d had his ear bitten off, crying and shouting as the tears and blood flowed. On that day, he had falsely accused Weitz of being a criminal, and hearing that rumor leak out over a drink, Weitz had retaliated.

Spitting out the ear he had been holding in his mouth, Weitz was seized by the guards and thrown in jail.

Weitz was notoriously known within the City of Iron and Blood. Without anything like a path of salvation granted to him, soon after, it was decided that as a criminal slave, he would be sent to the infamous Gladiator Island.

Without the will to oppose, he accepted it. Without the intent to resist, he crossed the lake.

At the place where he had been sent, having been put together with a group of seedy-looking people in similar circumstances, he had been forced to participate in a ceremony to fight an extremely dreadful Witchbeast.

I don’t care what happens. I ain’t got any intention of dying.

No matter who I must sacrifice, no matter who I must outsmart, I’ll survive, and then, one day.

One day, I’d be treated—.

Subaru: “—Weitz! Grab the sword! I’m counting on you!!”

—I’d be treated as a “normal” human being, that was my wish.

Weitz: “Take cover…!”

The moment he saw the head belonging to the guard flying through the air, having been kicked, whirling around as it sprayed blood, Weitz immediately thrust Schwartz, standing next to him, towards Tanza.

Dressed in a kimono, this girl, contrary to that youthful appearance, possessed great strength.

However, she had not mastered that power. The strength of her body and her mind were misaligned, it was far too risky to rely on her. —With Schwartz, they made a good combination.

Weak in body, but strong in mind, was Schwartz. If it was him, Tanza would probably be put to good use.

Therefore, at this moment, pushing him towards Tanza, strong in body, but weak in mind, had supposedly been the right choice.

And then, Weitz himself, the performer of such deed—

Weitz: “A-AHHHHHHHHH…!!!!”

Running forward, he swung his arms up and slammed the guard’s head flying towards him into the floor of the passage.

Beheading his ally in an instant, then punting that head to make it fly, that utmost shocking deed was a scheme that had put the thoughts of Weitz and the others to a standstill—But, it did not seem to be just that.

In reality, the judgment of the four people aside from Weitz had been one beat too slow, but Weitz had made a move.

Schwartz had been so vigilant of that man, so it did not seem like that was all he was aiming for.

And it happened right after Weitz had thought that.

Weitz: "—Hk?!"

Right beside Weitz, who had been glaring towards the man in front of him, who had taken an axe into his hand, the monstrous black bird—the Gladiator Beast, had charged in, destroying the wall of the passage.

Smashing the wall half a step behind Weitz, it laid waste to the passage of the Island's upper stratum right beside him.

Aiming for Weitz and the others, the flying Gladiator Beast approached to slaughter—no, that was wrong. It was not wrong that it was a Gladiator Beast, but that bird had not been aiming for Weitz and the others.

Gladiator Beast: "—GYAOO!!"

Having smashed the wall and made its appearance, what had been pierced by the monstrous bird's beak was the head of the guard that had been decapitated.

Aiming for the head of the decapitated guard, the monstrous bird had crashed into the passage. Neither did he understand what that meant, nor did he have the time to think about it.

Weitz: "I'll…!!"

While his back was showered with wounds from fragments of the wall bursting open from the tremendous impact that had occured half a step behind him, as well as the sharp wings of the Gladiator Beast, clenching his teeth, Weitz did not take his eyes off the man.

Even having inquired about Schwartz's lineage, he had not bowed down, but rather enhanced his intent to kill—he was dangerous.

He was a honest-to-god threat, different from Weitz's tattoos, which only created a sense of danger.

No matter what, he would stop it.

Todd: "…"

Seeing Weitz moving forward, the man ruthlessly narrowed his eyes.

Just from the look in those eyes without uttering a word, Weitz could tell his opponent intended on killing him. Without a pause, seeing the man raise the axe overhead with his left arm, Weitz raised his own left arm.

That was the arm that had been the first to become inked with a tattoo, becoming evidence of him being criminal, the impetus for him drifting to this land.

Resolutely channeling all his strength, he would try to receive the blow unleashed by that man—

Weitz: “Guh, geh… Hk.”

Without mercy, the swinging axe took aim at Weitz’s head from the left.

Forcing his raised arm into its trajectory, Weitz’s arm did not meet the blade of the axe from up high, but rather from the side. At the moment of impact, the bones of his elbow were shattered, and the bones of his upper arm and shoulder were pulverized alongside his flesh.

Through the impact and pain, his vision turned a deep red, and his left arm was dyed with darkness completely different from the color of the tattoo.

But—

Weitz: “I endured it…!”

He had not been waiting for it, rather, by stepping forth, he had been capable of weakening the power behind the axe slightly.

That was the main reason why it had not smashed Weitz’s head in, why it had not ended his life. From the start, he’d had the grit from being called abnormal, but he had not possessed the judgment to match that.

The unification of that grit and judgment, had been the result of encountering a child far more reckless than himself.

Hence, that encounter allowed Weitz's arm to reach the man—

Todd: "You haven't."

With his left arm destroyed, he tried to seize the man with his remaining right arm; at that moment, the form of the man had vanished.

—No, the form of the man had not vanished, Weitz had just become unable to see it.

Exiting his field of vision, he became unable to see the form of his opponent in the dark, blurred space.

Something akin to that had happened. However, it was strange. It had been strange. Suddenly, on the right side of Weitz's vision, the portion he could not see expanded in the span of a breath.

Just as if something had suddenly crushed the right side of Weitz's vision.

???: "Weitz—!!"

Unable to find the vanished form of the man, Weitz harbored physical unease as someone called out to him.

Slowly turning to look behind him, there was the destroyed passage and plumes of smoke. Then, he saw the head of the monstrous bird that had destroyed the passage, sent flying by a downward swing of the axe of the man who had vanished.

Weitz: "…"

Beyond the man who had beheaded the bird monster, he could see four people standing above the crumbling passage.

There were also some who had fallen on their butts while retreating, but it seemed that all of them had avoided the monstrous bird's intermission. That he himself was relieved about that, Weitz was a little surprised.

While surprised, there was one thing he wanted to tell them, who were watching him in amazement.

His broken left arm ached plenty. For some reason, the right side of his face had also started aching plenty.

While making use of that pain to somehow keep a grip on his consciousness, which had been getting distant,

Weitz: “It was the first time…”

???: “Weitz…!”

Weitz: “Anyone’s said, they believed in me…”

Muttering, Weitz understood that that had been the thing lodged within his heart.

Understanding that, he lost the strength in his legs, collapsing right then and there.

???: “Weitz—!!”

While hearing his name cried out with such emotion once more, he closed his eyes.

For some reason, it had been an awfully pleasant feeling.

3

As he tried to rush to the collapsed Weitz, he was stopped by the slender fingers reaching out to him.

Tears in her eyes, shaking her head when Subaru turned to look back at her, the kimono-clad girl did not permit Subaru to take impulsive behavior.

And then, before he could shake those fingers off—

???: “—GWOGOBO!!”

There was a hideous, ear-splitting screech, and the ceiling of the passageway was crushed from above.

Right overhead of the collapsed Weitz, the passage succumbed to the weight and collapsed with a violent screech; directly under the falling ceiling, Weitz was engulfed, and the floor gave way.

The destroyed passage had opened a hole to the lower strata, and Subaru witnessed Weitz falling headfirst together with the gigantic gray frog which had crushed the ceiling.

To Weitz, who had taken an axe to his left arm, and suffered a blow from a knife to his right eye, he must.

Subaru: “WEITZ—!!”

Subaru screamed as he reached his hand out towards the falling passage, towards the crumbling floor and ceiling.

Weitz had fallen. Weitz, who had rushed forward to protect Subaru and the others. Quickly, quickly, they had to jump down there, and save Weitz.

Todd: “It sure is lucky that the second one fell. Witchbeasts are a pain to kill.”

In front of Subaru, whose thoughts had gone astray, Todd muttered, giving a sidelong glance to the collapsed passage.

At his feet lay the corpse of the decapitated giant black bird. The Witchbeast had been killed by Todd with an axe after it had crashed into the passage.

The events that had occurred had done so far too quickly for Subaru to digest.

What Todd had done, what had occurred before his eyes, anything and everything. Until he was finished dealing with them, he would be unable to think about anything else. —He would be unable to think about Weitz.

What had happened with Weitz, and what had become of him, he would be unable to think.

He would be unable t—

Todd: "—As for Witchbeasts, they'll eat the corpse of the guy who broke their horn."

Subaru: "…"

Suddenly, Todd had said that, resting the axe on his shoulder.

Subaru, much like everyone else, had yet to fully accept the situation before them; their breaths hitched due to Todd's words, turning to face him.

Receiving the gazes of those four people, Todd pointed to the dead body at his feet.

Todd: "When someone breaks a Witchbeast's horn, they can make it obey them, but it seems that over the time they give it commands, some resentment will surely accumulate. When that person dies, the Witchbeast'll eat their corpse in revenge. Disgusting, isn't it?"

Shrugging his shoulders, Todd spoke about this little-known ecology of Witchbeasts.

Neither did Subaru want to know how Todd had found out about that, nor was the information itself the type he would benefit from knowing in the first place.

However, it did provide an adequate explanation of what had happened there.

The reason the giant bird had crashed into the passage was because the guard who had been beheaded was the one who had broken off its horn, and Todd had known in advance that it would home in on his corpse.

Kicking that head into flight, he had tried to get Subaru and the others engulfed by the large bird as it aimed for that.

But, that had not happened. Because, because, because.

Because—.

Subaru: “Weitz.”

Todd: “He sure looked like a guy who cared for his companions. —That’s why he died.”

Subaru: “—Ah.”

Unbefitting of Todd, it was a thorough explanation of the events that had taken place.

Without listening to anyone, notifying anyone, explaining to anyone, to kill without giving any information whatsoever, that was Todd’s way of doing things. Despite that, why had he spoken incessantly, allowing them to hear all that just now?

Letting them hear, letting them understand, to let Subaru’s mind move on to the next question.

The relationship between the two guards who were killed and the Witchbeast who had charged in.

Once that was settled, Subaru’s thoughts could move to the next. Next, was about Weitz.

About how Weitz had died, and that there was nothing he could do regarding it.

Subaru: “A-AHHHHH—!!”

He should not have died. Weitz, should not have died.

While facing the horror that was Todd, he should not have attempted to protect Subaru and the others. This monster who would kill someone for opposing them, should not have been opposed by him.

After all, if he were to die here—.

Todd: “Your expression’s finally started to look like a brat’s.”

The moment he understood that Weitz had died, Subaru’s head was filled with regret and impatience.

Seeing that reaction, Todd smiled as if things had gone according to plan, and raised his axe overhead.

The purpose for Todd’s careful explanation, had been to let Subaru put his thoughts in order.

Forcing Subaru to confront Weitz’s death, which he had unconsciously tried not to think about, had been so that his heart would be crushed, in order to turn an enigmatic enemy into a mere human being of flesh and blood.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama—!”

Subaru’s legs had come to a halt in shock, and Hiain and Idra’s minds were still unable to recover. The first to move before the three of them could, had been Tanza.

Tanza set her eyes on Todd approaching them; with her arms outstretched, she stood in front of Subaru.

However, Todd frowned at Tanza’s conduct and,

Todd: “Hey you, you’re doing it all wrong.”

Tanza: “Huh.”

Saying that in front of Tanza, who had been standing in the way, Todd dropped to his knees on the spot. While Tanza’s eyes had been captivated by that movement, the crouching Todd extended his arms up to her inner thighs, and hoisted her up.

Just as that happened, Tanza’s small body floated upwards, and was thrown to the side. —Through the large hole in the wall destroyed by the giant bird, which connected to the outside.

Tanza: “Ah.”

Even though she wielded physical abilities that were unthinkable for a child, she could not defy gravity or the laws of physics. Naturally, her body was not even heavier than an adult’s, as Tanza’s weight was that of a single little girl.

Instantly, Tanza reached her arms out, but her slender fingertips had nowhere to reach, and her body was thrown to the other side of the Island.

Todd: “Have fun.”

Thrown into the air, Tanza’s screams quickly faded as she descended.

Thus, with Tanza who had been standing in the way now gone, there was no one left to protect Subaru and the others from Todd’s axe.

Idra: “He’s His Excellency the Emperor’s…”

Todd: “Yeah?”

Idra: “He’s His Excellency the Emperor’s son! Are you insane?!”

Glaring at Todd, who had turned around, Idra cried that out.

Eyes bloodshot, his friendly facial features burning with anger, he reproached Todd for not being swayed by the “lie” that Subaru was the illegitimate son of the Emperor of Vollachia.

However, Todd's answer to that complaint was simple.

—Wordlessly, he merely swung his axe to bash Idra's head in.

Idra: "Woaaah!"

Just before his head was smashed in, Idra, his clothes having been yanked, fell on his butt. The axe missed and landed behind Idra, whose eyes widened, while Subaru, who had yanked him down, shook his head hastily.

It was impossible, words would not get through to him. From the start, this threat itself had been a mistake.

Subaru had tried to rely on taking the easy way out.

As punishment for that, he had found him into this situation.

Todd: "You dodge that huh, my bad, my bad. However—"

Readjusting his grip on the axe, Todd turned to the side with a disgusted expression. At the point his gaze had been directed to, near Subaru and Idra, who had fallen on his backside, Hiain camouflaged himself against the surrounding scenery.

Assimilating with the destroyed floor and walls, he would be incapable of telling that Hiain was there.

But, it was not like he had been able to move quickly.

Todd: "Disappearing right in front of me, what's your plan?"

Hiain: "Schwa—"

Meeting eyes with Todd, Hiain flinched, and his camouflage was instantly disrupted.

Until then, his assimilation with the scenery had been perfect; as if part of a painting had been ruined, it then became something exceedingly unsightly, unbearable to look at.

This time, it was red paint that had been applied to the picture, gushing out of Hiain.

Hiain: "…"

Taking the blow from the axe on his shoulder, it cleaved through to his lower chest, and Hiain collapsed. As his blood profusely flowed out of him, the camouflage of his body was undone, and the remains of the gray lizardman fell over with a thud.

Weitz had died, Tanza had been thrown out of there, and Hiain had been killed as well.

One after another, before Subaru's eyes.

And then—

Idra: "I-it's a duel… Hk."

His voice trembling, taking his eyes off the slain Hiain's corpse, Idra stood up.

Pointing his finger at the man who, just a moment prior, had killed his comrade before his eyes, gnashing his teeth, Idra's face was red with anger, blue with fear, and as if he knew not what to do, his face turned white while glaring at Todd.

At the location Sparka had taken place, he had told a lie to inspire Subaru and the others, and to encourage himself.

Different from Subaru's cheap lies, the lie about his title carried ideals.

Idra: "If you too, are a warrior—"

Those ideals of Idra's, ideals that were perhaps too idealistic, were betrayed.

Todd: "Wow!"

Idra: "—Hk."

There was no doubt it had been a faint hope, but Idra's offer had been frantic and earnest.

Shouting in a loud voice to cut him off, Todd had attacked Idra as he tried to be strong, even if it had been merely bravado, while he was unprepared. Thus, he thrust his blade during that unpreparedness.

Idra: “Gah!”

Todd: “I’m not a warrior, I’m a soldier.”

Idra, fallen to his knees, raised his trembling hands to his neck. Lodged in the middle of his throat was Todd’s knife, its sharp tip protruding from the back of his neck.

Even so, Idra’s hands grabbed the handle of the knife to pull it out. And then, before he could pull it out, the axe smashed through Idra’s head from directly above.

Idra: “—Ah.”

Idra fell forward, and Todd pulled the knife out from his body. Idra’s corpse, having fallen over clumsily, and Hiain’s corpse were lined up, like something out of a nightmare.

Some place far, Weitz’s body was buried in the debris of the collapsed rubble.

Had something happened to Tanza, who had fallen from up high and had not returned? That reminded him, the frog that fell together with Weitz was supposedly down there as well.

If so, Tanza, and the gladiators of this Island as well—.

Todd: “What’s actually happening here?”

Subaru: “Huh…”

Todd: “You, are you really the child of His Excellency the Emperor?”

Todd, carrying the axe on his shoulder, looked down at Subaru, who had slumped down with blank eyes.

Having lost his comrades, lacking the willpower to run away, as the man gazed at his state, Subaru understood why he had been kept alive until he was the last one remaining.

The lie Subaru had told, that he was the Emperor's illegitimate son, had driven an actual wedge into Todd.

He, too, had been considering the possibility that Subaru really was the Emperor's illegitimate son.

Subaru: "Then…"

Todd: "Hmm?"

Subaru: "Why don't, you just surrender, or something? I'm the Emperor's…"

If he had considered the possibility that Subaru was his son, then there was supposedly some room to consider the appeal of Subaru and the others.

Subaru had decided to go along with Tanza and the others' misunderstanding by using this strategy, because he had thought it would be the best way to put his Unit on their feet again, and because it had been a gleam of hope for them.

It was possible that Todd, instead of picking the option to have them kill one another, would choose to raise the white flag in order to survive.

But as a result of that, Subaru had lost all his comrades, while Todd had kept his grasp on his life.

Subaru: "Why, what is it? You're…"

Todd: "If I did something like surrender, I'd get killed due to some half-minded justification, and there'd be nothing I could do."

Subaru: "…"

Todd: “I’ve decided that it’s always better to inquire about the authenticity of a matter when the situation’s in my favor. I can devote my thoughts to making a decision, and it’s also harder to make a mistake. —That and, it gives me peace of mind.”

At the last reason, which seemed to be the most important with the way Todd had put it, Subaru took in a breath.

It felt just as if, all this time, Todd had been strangling his neck.

Todd: “Regardless of whether you’re the Emperor’s illegitimate son or not, it’s your name I’m curious about.”

Subaru: “My, name…?”

Todd: “Natsuki Schwartz, that’s similar to the name of a scary guy I know. And to top it off, the way you smell is really similar to that scary guy as well.”

With a small sniff, Todd looked at Subaru with cold eyes.

Something about his smell—he had been told the same thing back during the first massacre, when he had first come to know that Todd had arrived at the Gladiator Island.

Having been informed that it was about his smell, an unpleasant hunch emerged within Subaru’s mind.

Subaru: “Do you know about the Miasma?”

Todd: “Miasma? Ah, no, that’s not it, that’s not it, don’t get the wrong idea. It really does smell, your body odor. I have a bit of a good nose. That’s why it’s so strange.”

Subaru: “…”

Todd: “—Hey you, do you have an older brother or something? If so, I’d be happy to keep you alive as a bargaining chip with him.”

Denying Subaru’s question, what had followed was a surprising proposal.

I'd be happy to keep you alive, to think such a thing would come from Todd's mouth. Furthermore, the older brother Todd had spoken of, was in all likelihood none other than Subaru himself.

He had thought that the Subaru with longer limbs was the older brother of the shrunken Subaru.

Moreover, Subaru seemed to remember introducing himself to Todd while he was dressed as a woman, he might be suspecting that Subaru was related to "Natsumi Schwartz" because of that.

In any case, if "not killing" had become an option in Todd's mind.

Subaru: "…"

Weitz's, Hiain's and Idra's deaths, had occurred right next to him.

If he closed his eyes, the deaths of Gustav and Old Man Null also came to mind. He could also see the deaths of the many gladiators, see their their remains, which he had witnessed along the way.

Absolutely everyone, had ended up dead. They had ended up dead, thus.

—Thus, because Subaru absolutely must not die.

Subaru: "…You know, about Nii-chan?"

Taking advantage of Todd's misunderstanding, he switched gears to advancing the conversation.

If Todd was somehow cautious of the big Subaru, then by using that caution, the small Subaru could live.

If he could survive this place in that way—.

Todd: "—Wait."

Subaru: "Huh?"

Subaru opened his mouth and tried to string together some words that would get him through this. Todd outstretched his palm and grabbed Subaru's face as it made an expression, and Subaru could see his eyes through the gaps between his fingers.

Crouching down while grabbing Subaru's face, Todd gave him a terribly cold look.

And then—

Todd: "—Hey, you tried to manipulate me, didn't you?"

With a dull thud, a sharp sensation slid into his chest.

Feeling the chill of the blade's tip inside his body, Subaru widened his eyes. Then, one beat later, a pain so great that his limbs went numb screamed in the back of his head with potency.

And due to that potent scream, Subaru's own mouth also screamed.

Subaru: "GYAAAA, GEEEEE!!"

Todd: "My bad, my bad, there's no room for carelessness or weakness."

An oversized knife had been lodged deeply within Subaru's chest.

It was not a matter of pulling it out or not pulling it out, it was simply too big. It had pierced him. Having stabbed him, it was probably destroying that which was important within his chest.

Blood frothed at the edges of his mouth, and while spilling red saliva, Subaru's body trembled.

Coughing violently, a red-stained package fell out of his mouth.

It did not matter. It no longer mattered. He could not use it. It was not like he could use it. Die, he must not die. If he died, it would be terrible. If he died, dying would be, he must not die.

Todd: "Don't move."

Lying down, trying to crawl away from that place, Subaru's abdomen was stepped on by Todd as he spoke. So that he could not move, so that he could not get away, he had been stopped.

Having stopped him, in front of Subaru, Todd raised his axe overhead.

It hurts, it's scary, and it's awful, it's dangerous, at least, at least, this red, this cold pain, this, at least this, I must, stop this.

Subaru: "I must, not, die…"

Todd: "One, two aaand three!"

Weakly, he raised his hands to shield his head. Useless.

The head beneath Subaru's hands, and his very life, the blade of the falling axe pulverized all of those—.

4

Subaru: "—Hk."

As his head was smashed in, everything contained inside of it had spilled out.

Feeling as if he had been watching that horrific scene, a scream exploded from the depths of Subaru's throat. Reaching out both of his trembling hands, he touched his own head.

It had not been smashed. A head that had not been smashed, a chest that did not ache, a life that had not been snuffed out, it was all there.

Upon ascertaining this, as he breathed a sigh of relief, Subaru raised his head to the sky, and—

Subaru: "—Ah."

There was a man covered in tattoos that, slowly, turned to look back at Subaru.

His left arm mangled by the axe, his right eye stabbed out by the knife, he was shedding a tremendous amount of blood. Weitz.

Weitz: “It was the first time…”

His lips quivering, the bloodied Weitz spilled those words.

Seeing that, Subaru let out an “Ah” along with a truly, truly pathetic breath of air.

Weitz: “Anyone’s said, they believed in me…”

Subaru: “AAAHHHHHH—!!!!”

Spilling those feeble words, Weitz’s body collapsed to its side.

Even if he were to extend his hand, no matter what he did, Weitz’s body could not be saved any more, definitely.

He should not have died. Subaru, should not have died.

He should not have let it become absolute.

Subaru’s starting line, restarting at the point of Death, continued to move forward—.

Subaru: “AAAHHHHHH—!!!!”

—Because once it happened that someone could not be saved, Natsuki Subaru’s “heart” would be shattered.

Chapter 74:
Idra Missanga

1

The sound of footsteps, the sound of steadily approaching footsteps, paralyzed Subaru's heart.

It was absolutely necessary to prevent the massacre brought about by the arrival of Todd and Arakiya from the Imperial Capital.

Frantically, earnestly, for the sake of brushing aside the malice and absurdity that befell him, he struggled with all of his might. He struggled and struggled, he continued to struggle, however, the worst case scenario had occurred.

The restart point continued to move forward, having made Death its starting line.

This time, what Subaru feared the most was not Death itself. Rather, he feared that upon meeting his Death and returning, reality would become absolute.

—That a life he could not save had carried over, was what he feared the most.

That, the inescapable Death of someone, gradually drawing closer, was what he feared the most.

Subaru: "AAAHHHHHHHHHH—!!!!"

At the scene before him, the collapsed and bloody form of Weitz, Subaru's throat shrieked.

Screaming as he tried to run away, the fingers protruding from the sleeve grabbed him, and forbade his movement. Grabbing him was Tanza, the girl whose gentle eyes were filled with tears, as she shook her head desperately at Subaru.

This too, he had seen. He had already seen. Looking, he looked at it, it was something he knew the sight of.

The same scene, the scene he had witnessed just a minute ago, he observed it once more.

???: “—GWOGOBO!!”

Immediately after, there was a hideous, ear-splitting screech, and the passage was crushed along with Weitz’s collapsed body, which as it was, would fall through the floor down the side of the island’s mountain.

That debris, falling down together with the large body of the gray frog, engulfed Weitz, and he vanished from sight.

Subaru: “No, nonoNOOOOOO—!!”

Tanza: “Schwartz-Sama?!”

Frantically waving his arms about, Subaru shook off Tanza’s hand. Abandoning the voice of the shocked young girl behind him, Subaru sprinted towards where Weitz was falling.

If he rushed right now, he could pick up the falling man, block up the wounds the man bore on his eye and left arm, wrap bandages around him in the healing room, if he could just give everything treatment then surely, surely, surely—

Subaru: “Not yet—”

Todd: “You sure are weaker than I thought.”

To save Weitz, he sprinted with reckless abandon.

Subaru was met head-on by something swinging to mow him down. Only after a hard, heavy sound emanated as his field of vision began rapidly spinning did he realize it had been the blade of an axe, dirtied by a dark red.

In Subaru’s field of vision, rapidly spinning as it ascended up high, he saw the body of a child, clumsily sprinting. Seeing it pitch forward and collapse, he understood it had been his own headless body.

In that case, where had his head gone? More importantly, Weitz, he must, must, mustmustmust.

× × ×

Spinning round and round, then abruptly being fixed to one spot, Subaru's brain was thrown about.

With a vigor akin to a ferociously revolving camera coming to an abrupt standstill, his semicircular canals that were not actually moving gave him a disorderly sensation.

With the surging nausea and confusion, that from there he must save Weitz, that this wasn't the time to stop his legs, that impatience was—

Weitz: "It was the first time…"

Then at Subaru, whose vision had returned, the bloody form of Weitz muttered so.

One second later, the form of Weitz crumbled, an immense quantity of blood flowing from his left arm and right eye.

Weitz: "Anyone, has said, that they believed me…"

Subaru: "AHHHHHHHHH—!!!!"

The reality that could not be undone, had crushingly trampled upon the soul of Natsuki Subaru.

2

Slowly but surely, the tremors of ruin were creeping near.

The massacre commenced, and Subaru, without preventing it, began to run.

However, starting with the restart point having moved ten seconds forward, the reduction of the grace period felt as if it was being shaved off, distancing from a miracle, erasing all hope from Subaru's heart.

Sneaking into Gustav's office, he learned the truth of the massacre through cooperating with Hiain.

Many times, they were discovered before Todd and Arakiya's conversation with Gustav could reach its crux, mistakes piled up, repeating through Trial & Error so that next time—it had become irreversible.

The restart point, it had moved forth to when he was hiding with Hiain in the office.

Subaru: "…"

Since that moment, Subaru had been hearing the grand voice of ruin laughing from within his heart.

Hanging over Subaru, while he heard the heartbeat of the frightened Hiain, probably beating more violently than that had been Subaru's heart.

Unable to stop the massacre, what would he do if the restart point had moved past that?

If the point of restart had made this a place of no return, filled with despair, Natsuki Subaru wondered just what in the world he could do.

And then—

Arakiya: "Slosh—"

Along with that unfeeling voice, Gustav's head had been blown off, that was when Subaru knew.

He absolutely must not die anymore. Dying, and returning to before, if that was after Gustav had been killed, that his life could no longer be saved, would become absolute.

If he made anybody's Death absolute, then that was already the same as Subaru killing them himself.

Letting a world that could not be saved become absolute, no matter whose hands had brought about that Death, Natsuki Subaru would be the murderer.

That was why, he was desperate in order to not die.

Even if Gustav died, even if Old Man Null died, even if the Gladiators died, even if the guards died, even if anyone died, he was resisting desperately in order not to die.

If Subaru died, they who had been killed would die for real.

Though he understood it was an unreasonable notion, Subaru could not do anything but struggle like that.

If Subaru did not die, there remained a possibility that he could finish things without letting his dead comrades die. If he did that, he could finish it without them really dying, that was why—.

If he does not die for the rest of eternity in this way, he could finish things without anyone dying, such a fantasy it was.

Such a fantasy, it had been nothing more than a fantasy, the life of Subaru, who had uncouthly died, was proof of that.

3

How many times had he welcomed Death already?

???: “Disappearing right in front of me, what’s your plan?”

???: “Schwa—”

A voice that was about to call his name was cut short in front of Subaru, who was slumped over on his knees.

The axe, swung devoid of mercy, hacked into Hiain’s body, taking his life with it, causing him to clatter loudly onto the floor, eyes wide open.

Flowing blood gushed out, spreading onto the floor, mixing with the blood from Idra's body, who'd fallen earlier.

Idra, whose head had been split open, had been killed before Hiain.

Subaru had failed to save him from Todd's first attack. Idra had been killed first, then Hiain, and finally Subaru was left alone once again.

And all that was after Tanza had already been thrown by Todd, and fallen out of the hole in the wall.

The world had already been rewound to the point where the screams of a falling Tanza could be heard.

Weitz, his arm and face injured, swallowed by the collapsing passage along with the frog Witchbeast, along with Tanza, thrown out while trying to protect Subaru, were "locked" into a reality that could not be changed.

And then—

Todd: "What's actually happening here?"

Subaru, who was slumped over on the spot, his knees stained with their flowing blood, was posed a question by Todd carrying his axe atop his shoulder.

Subaru's numb brain received a jolt, telling him the words that would follow.

The question from Todd, which he had been asked so many times already, was—.

Subaru: "You, are you really the child of His Excellency the Emperor?"

Todd: "…Quit predicting what people are about to say."

Todd let out that mutter with a tone of voice that indicated displeasure in response to Subaru, who still had his head hung down.

He did not know how he actually felt about being beaten to the punch, but to Subaru, it did not feel like things were precarious to the point Todd would instantly become enraged and try to kill him.

Not that he was trying to create a sense of danger, that had just left his mouth in a fit of panic.

But if Todd's pace were disturbed even slightly—

Subaru: "If you don't want to die, stay put."

Saying this, Subaru pulled out a black orb from his pocket—the curse tool that had been placed in Gustav's body. He held it out as to display it to Todd.

The black orb, having wiped clean of blood, and possessing a texture and feel akin to that of a glass ball, was far heavier than a golf ball.

What it was made of, and what material it was made of, knowledge of that did not really matter.

The important thing to remember was that it concealed a very great and cruel power.

If this was truly the key needed to activate the curse rule, that which Todd desired, then he could use it.

It could possibly, supposedly be a second chance for him to be listened to.

Subaru: "This, it seems, is what you need for the curse rule. If you don't want to die…"

Todd: "—. Hey you, what you've got there is…"

Subaru: "—I'm the one! Who's doing the talking! Right now!! I said "if you don't want to die", you heard me damn well, didn't you?!"

Subaru barked as he waved his hand with the curse tool, spittle flying.

There was no room in his head, crammed with regret and despair, and no leeway for him to examine Todd's every word. Intense anger welled up in him as he just commanded him to do as told.

Todd: "Good grief, I got you, I got you."

Seeing Subaru's anger, Todd let out a small sigh and raised his hands, lowering his axe.

Subaru was astonished to see Todd following his instructions so readily. His reaction made Todd raise an eyebrow.

Todd: "You're a weird one. Aren't you the one who told me to do this?"

Subaru: "W-well… It's not so simple…"

Unable to argue back with Todd, Subaru's eyes darted around, clearly flustered, as he strongly rued his own foolishness.

Using being Emperor's illegitimate son had been mistaken, he should have just used the curse tool as a shield from the start. He had been scared and impatient, so he had jumped to the easy option. And because of that, he had ruined everything.

Gustav, Old Man Null, Weitz and Tanza, all because of Subaru.

All because Subaru had not made proper use of his head—.

Todd: "By the way kid, you know how to use that?"

Subaru: "Huh…?"

As he condemned and rued his own foolishness, a voice interrupted his thoughts.

Due to that question cast by Todd, his hands raised, Subaru let out a hoarse voice and looked at the curse tool in his hand. As far as how to use it went, he did not know. It did not have an easy-to-understand switch or a mechanism that told him how to use it just by holding it.

Subaru: "—I guess."

Todd immediately saw through the threat just by how much his gaze wavered.

Todd: "If you knew, you wouldn't have done this, there'd be no need for threats."

Subaru: "Ah."

Immediately after, Todd kicked Subaru's hand away with an upswing of his foot, his hands still raised.

Having kicked the hand which was holding out the curse tool, the black orb flew up directly overhead. Subaru reflexively followed it with his eyes; once again, he was acting foolishly.

Looking up was the same as offering your neck to the enemy.

Subaru: "…"

His gaze chased after the flying curse tool, until it was abruptly interrupted.

Just before the interruption, he thought he heard a thunk coming from his left side to his right, but he had no way or reason to know for sure what it was.

And he had no choice but to admit something.

—He was unable to conceive a way to stop Todd Fang.

4

—A fool who had everything taken away from him, after playing the good guy and having been made fun of.

That was how the people around Idra Missanga, a man who had lost his family's business, ended up on the street, and became a slave, evaluated him.

A small farming village in the northwestern part of the Empire was Idra's home, the land where the Missanga family had kept the family mill business going for generations.

Idra had heard that the mill had been established in the generation of his grandfather's grandfather, who had apparently been a very skilled person during his lifetime.

He had been entrusted by his lord to manage the waterwheel built along the river in the village and the mill that used it, and he was in charge of milling the entirety of the grains from the village.

The rewards were high, the labor was low, and Idra came from a privileged background in the eyes of those who had to rely on the Missanga family to mill the crops they produced.

However, neither Idra himself nor his family were using their business to have a life they could boast of.

There was no doubt that they were well-off compared to their neighbors. At the same time, however, they had also acted as members of the village, taking on roles that should normally be performed by the village head, such as paying taxes to the lord on behalf of the villagers in times of crop failure, or going directly to negotiate with the lord.

—Do business honestly, and strive to earn widespread trust and confidence.

This was the family motto and philosophy of the Missanga family as millers.

In the process of milling using a waterwheel, many would pocket some of the grain. Indeed, Idra, and his father, had been sternly told by their own parents, who were in charge of the family business, that the world looked harshly at millers, and that exactly was why it was important to be humble.

Because he had a role in which he could easily arouse suspicion, he had always kept an open mind when interacting with people.

Never monopolizing wealth, sharing joys and sorrows with those around them. Even if this was not the right way to live in the Vollachian Empire, which respected the strong, it had been honored as the correct way to live in the remote rural village that was out of reach of the iron and blood rule of the Imperial Capital.

Idra was also one of those who had grown up with its benefits since childhood.

So even after his seriously-ill father handed over the family business early on, he had tried to keep the tradition alive.

???: “It’s an honest and good life, isn’t it? I’m jealous.”

Envying Idra’s life, was a man who stopped by the village’s bar.

A man, exuding the atmosphere of a veteran soldier, had revealed his identity as a mercenary who had traveled across battlefields wielding a large sword.

Since people from the outside were rare, Idra shared drinks with him, listening to his various stories.

For Idra, who had not possessed much knowledge of the outside world, the world the man had spoken of was full of surprises.

Unlike rural villages where time passed slowly and peacefully, the world in which that man lived was dangerous, and cruel. But at the same time, it was filled with an unforgettable heat.

By that time already, Idra had held a vague yearning for it.

As a person born in the Vollachian Empire, he had wondered if any option other than him taking over the family business existed, a hope that he had not taken very seriously.

The life of a warrior who respected his own strength and faith, would never choose a lowly way of life.

Man: “Idra, you have a cousin. Actually, I’ve taken an interest in her…”

Idra became close with the man who visited the village every few months and drank with him each time.

And so, after several nights spent together, the man had confided that in Idra, donning a serious face. His younger cousin was still unmarried, and Idra was fond of that man as well.

So, without hesitation, Idra introduced him to his cousin, set the stage for the couple to bond, and celebrated the birth of their new family with drinks on the night of their nuptials.

A month later, that man conspired with his cousin to steal the family business of milling.

The man insisted that Idra's cousin was also entitled to run the family business of the Missanga family, and spoke further lies, that Idra and his father, who had been working at the mill until now, had falsified the results of their milling to the villagers.

Of course, Idra asserted that that was not so, but the suspicion attached to the profession of a miller itself could not be dispelled, and the opinion of the village was split down the middle.

Before a settlement could be reached, his father, who had been very sick, died of his illness, and his mother, suffering from heartache, passed away, as if chasing after him.

Idra: "I've run out of patience. I will protect my household at all costs…!"

Mourning his parents, Idra decided to fight back, even cursing his own carelessness.

If his cousin and the man planned to do something nefarious, Idra would surely reclaim his rights. For this reason, Idra requested the presence of the villagers to bring the man to justice.

He believed that the trust that the Missanga family had developed through their honest business practices would bring justice.

However—

Idra: "—Why, what in the world?"

No one showed up at the place that had been agreed upon, and on the contrary, preparations for an armed uprising were found in Idra's home.

Abandoned and brought to an unwanted trial before their lord, Idra had desperately pleaded innocence, but none of the villagers defended him.

His cousin and the man orchestrated the whole thing.

The villagers chose the man who lied but contributed profits over the honest Idra.

There had not been even a single shred of hope to win.

Deprived of his family business and reduced to slavery, Idra was sent to the Island by slave traders.

A place for those who had nowhere else to go, a horrible Island where the only thing they had left, their lives, would be toyed with. Ginunhive.

In that place where fighting for his life was made a spectacle, Idra felt his heart fall in despair and his soul rotting away, and he decided to follow his despair.

Isn't it enough already?

How can I still be motivated to work hard, when I worked so hard and was not rewarded?

What I believed was a lie. What I relied on was a mistake.

Everyone's looking to take advantage of everyone else, trying to save only themselves.

If that was the case, then there was nothing wrong with him doing that as well.

Indeed, Idra was nothing.

It was only natural that no one would choose him.

He had no trained strength, nor any ability to be of any special use. Who would choose Idra?

Even Idra would not choose Idra.

And yet, who in the world would choose Idra, who was merely honest to a fault, that Idra—.

Subaru: "—You wanted to be a warrior, right, Idra?! If so, now's your chance! Now is the time to do it!"

—The day for him to be rewarded for living an honest life, was not supposed to arrive.

5

Idra: "…"

Feeling a throbbing, aching sensation in his head, Idra had become completely unable to move.

His tongue was numb, and as if his throat were blocked, he was unable to breathe. The sensation in his limbs was distant, he was assailed by a fear akin to that of his own body having been torn asunder.

Fear, he could no longer avoid facing it.

Considering what had happened just before, even back in his hometown, when nobody took his side, that cold sensation of the blood freezing throughout his body was a far cry from this fear.

Weitz was killed before his eyes, and the brave Tanza was thrown outside the passage.

As he watched, Idra simply stiffened, unable to do anything. It would be too ironic if that cowardice was the reason he had been able to outlive Weitz and Tanza.

Would these few seconds, maybe around ten, suit the humiliation that burned through his chest?

Unable to do anything, he watched as two people who could have done something died.

The despair and regret that this fact brought to Idra was even heavier than in the past, when the family business had fallen victim to his careless behavior.

Idra: “—Heh.”

Thinking that much, Idra laughed at his own inexperience in life.

Regardless of joyful experiences, he could not think of any painful ones, other than the downfall of his life when the family business was taken from him. —He truly felt that he had been blessed and plentiful.

Perhaps it had been his way of living, that which had provoked the man who had stolen his livelihood away from him.

Even if that were the case, there was no way he could forgive that man for what he had done.

Idra: “…”

With excessively ragged breathing, his vision blurry, Idra checked his surroundings.

Just what had happened? Were the pains throughout his body and this lack of ability to comprehend related somehow? Was this even real to begin with?

That everyone on the Gladiator Island could be killed, that Schwartz was the illegitimate son of the Emperor, that Weitz and Tanza had both been killed, he wondered whether it was all a dream.

It was all a dream, and Idra still had the luxury of being bored with his privileged life—.

Todd: “You’ve sure done a bold thing, you know.”

Idra stiffened in horror, forgetting the pain in his body as he heard a cold voice.

The blood throughout his body felt frozen beyond a mere chill, and Idra slowly realized that the footsteps of the owner of the voice were approaching.

And then—

Todd: “It’s better than standing still, but that’s what happens when you jump off without a plan.”

The man’s seemingly fed-up voice was not directed at Idra.

Because the voice had directed somewhere a short distance away from him, Idra took in his relief. Then, with a wistful glance, he looked to the place the voice had been directed.

And there—

???: “—Ah, ugh.”

He saw the crawling form of a ragged, bloodied, black-haired boy.

Idra: “…”

The sight of the crawling boy and the fact that this was not the passage of the upper stratum he had seen a moment prior reminded Idra of what had happened before his consciousness went blank.

Weitz had been murdered, Tanza had been projected outside, Idra had yelled at the heinous man’s incomprehensible thinking, and just before his demise, Schwartz had moved in.

Ranting and raving, Schwartz had clung onto the waist of the frozen-still Idra and Hiain, and jumped through a hole in the wall opposite from where Tanza had been thrown down.

Via the holes in the wall created by the large bird plunging through, Tanza had fallen to somewhere else on the Island, and Schwartz had jumped in with Idra and the others into a hole on the side opposite to that—still, the chances of them surviving had been slim.

They had been scraped by the wall and hated by the protrusions, then slammed to the ground from a great height, and left to die.

It had been a reckless and desperate escape, with a nine out of ten chance of dying, but it had been the only way for them to escape.

That he had been able to grab that one chance to save his life could be said to be a miracle. However, the miracles stopped there.

Neither the crawling Schwartz, nor the collapsed Idra could escape from the man who was chasing them.

They were unable to lay eyes on Hiain, either because he had not managed to fall onto the mountainside scaffold they were on, or probably because he was using his camouflage to hide and lurk.

Even in case he were hiding, Hiain's courage could not be counted on.

He was by no means a bad guy, but he was not brave. Though he was subservient and cowardly, though he would get carried away, though he was attached to Schwartz, one could not expect more from him.

Even so, if there was any chance for him to get through this without dying, then he should hold his breath and hide.

If the miracle that Schwartz had so desperately grasped would keep Hiain alive, then that was fine.

At least that much should be repaid to Schwartz.

Idra: "…"

Suddenly, he had a thought.

Now that he had fallen from a great height and was in tatters, and now that that man was paying attention to Schwartz, maybe Idra, too, would be overlooked as having died.

He was a scary guy, but there was no way he would go around crushing the heads of all the corpses.

Depending on Idra's condition, if he could make him think he was dead with a convincing performance, then he could possibly get through this without dying. Like this, he could survive, even if only by himself.

Idra: "…"

It was time to choose.

In order to survive, what would Idra Missanga sacrifice, what would he do?

In this cruel world, where the strong and cunning got whatever they so wished, just what kind of person would Idra Missanga choose to become?

If he was honest, then people would have faith in him; and foolishly, honestly believing that he would then be trusted, this man who had lost everything—.

Todd: "—One, two aaand three!"

He raised the axe; gripping it with both hands, he was about to swing it down onto the crawling boy's head.

Holding his breath, shutting his eyes, he hid his face from just about everything.

—What in the world could be saved with that?

Idra: "N-NOOOOOOO—!!!!"

He forced his whole body to move, tearing it off from the ground it seemed to stick on to, and ran clumsily, spitting up a lot of blood.

He ran and threw himself onto the man's back. He could not move his left hand, so he just used his right hand to grapple that body, desperately trying to bite it.

Todd: "I knew you were alive."

A moment later, as if to mock Idra's resolve, the man dropped the axe he had raised over his back. His empty hand immediately pulled out a knife, and turning around, in a flash, Idra's right forearm was blown off at the elbow.

Since he worked the waterwheel as a miller, his unworn, thin arm, which had never known hard labor, flew away.

However—

Idra: "—TAKE HIM AND GOOOOOOOO!!"

As scorching heat crawled up from the severed arm, Idra's vision was stained a deep red. But for just that moment, forgetting the pain, Idra shouted with all of his might.

The man in front of him slightly raised his eyebrows at the volume of that voice, as Idra still vomited blood.

He probably did not understand the purpose behind Idra's shout and actions.

And yet—

Todd: "Tch."

The man turned around with a click of his tongue, and threw the knife that had slashed Idra's arm.

The man had thrown it behind him, aimed at Schwartz who was crawling on the ground—no, he was no longer there. Escaping while carrying Schwartz, was the scenery, moving.

It was Hiain.

Having held his breath as he laid in hiding, Hiain had taken Schwartz on his back and escaped. Seeing that, Idra gritted his teeth and threw himself onto the man's back.

Since he had lost his right arm, and could not move his left arm, he bit down and clung to the man's clothes.

Idra: "Bft."

He was struck in the chest by an elbow over his back, and his bent-over body was kicked to the ground. However, his left arm, which had been struck by the impact of the fall, began to move instead of being in severe pain. His dislocated shoulder had been popped back in.

And then adding to the series of miracles, the axe that the man had dropped lay next to his left arm.

Todd: “Did you not think that he had escaped?”

Not letting go of his knife and having lost his axe, the man tilted his head as he looked at Idra.

Even though he had lost his weapon, he did not look disadvantaged in the slightest. That was a matter of course. The blood Idra had shed, and the blood that he was shedding, was ceaseless.

It was a miracle that he was alive, and too many miracles had already happened.

Henceforth, Idra shook his head at the man’s question.

Idra: “No, I thought he had escaped. But, I also hoped.”

Todd: “…”

Idra: “I hoped he wouldn’t leave me behind.”

A man who was just subservient and cowardly, who would easily get carried away, but was not a bad guy.

That it would be good as long as Hiain had not run away, Idra had foolishly and honestly believed that.

After all, people did not change so easily.

He had tried to deceive and use the people around him by making them think he was a warrior, a lie that had been exposed quite quickly.

He had to be honest, and he had to be widely trusted and relied on.

Even if they pointed and laughed at him for being a good person.

Idra Missanga would become neither a warrior nor a fraud.

Brandishing the axe with his left hand, while shedding blood, Idra shouted.

Idra: “I am Idra Missanga! The son of a miller!!”

Todd: “Never heard of him.”

Now, mustering up the strength he possessed to the fullest extent, Idra lunged at the man who wore an apathetic face.

—He was glad that, thanks to Schwartz, he had not become a liar on that day.

6

Carried on a body that was running for its life, he had been taken from the jaws of death.

He was shaken violently, without concern for his wounds or safety, but that was only natural.

Subaru too was battered, but given the state of the other person’s body, this was not the time to be concerned about that.

Subaru: “Hi, a… Hia, in…”

Having been gripped around the waist painfully, Subaru dug his nails into the other person’s body. He was not even sure where he was clawing. The person he had clawed at already looked an utter mess.

It was not that they were all scraped up or anything, but the colors, the patterns, everything was all messed up.

As they mimicked every bit of the surrounding scenery nonstop, he could not even accurately gauge what was supposed to be correct. The figure, running on in such a state, abruptly lost their strength and fell forward.

Hiain: “Gahk!”

Of course, if they were to fall, Subaru would also follow suit.

Hurled in front of his collapsed companion, Subaru tumbled across the cold stone floor. Since he had been unable to catch his fall, it felt like the impact had broken his front tooth.

Without pause, he raised his oozing, aching face and looked back while sprawled on the ground.

And right there—

Hiain: “Huu, huu…”

Literally barely breathing, Hiain lay collapsed on the ground.

Listlessly lying prone, Hiain had a large knife stuck deep in the middle of his back. Subaru had no idea when he had been stabbed.

Regardless of whether it had been when they were running away, or before that, or even prior to that, there was nothing he could do.

If Subaru were to die, he would come back to just before Idra’s head was smashed open.

Maybe it would be after it had already been smashed. —No, he had jumped outside so that would not happen, so perhaps it would be before their fall, after their fall, or while they were in midair.

No matter how it was done, it was difficult for three people to fall in a way such that none of them would die, and, the first time they had succeeded, Todd had come.

Idra’s voice, and Hiain’s breathing, were so distant.

Before long, they would be in a place where nothing could reach them.

Hiain: “It’s… strange…”

Still collapsed, Hiain’s feeble voice made its way to Subaru’s ears as the latter tried to crawl to him.

The reason he sounded like he was talking while breaking the water's surface with his head, was probably because his throat was rife with blood. He probably needed some kind of treatment, sort of like draining the blood, or something.

That was what he had to do. Even if he was not a doctor, he had to.

Hiain: "I once heard that… life's like a… flower, ya pick the beautiful ones first…"

Subaru: "D-don't talk… I'm coming now, right now…"

Hiain: "If that's the case, it's strange that someone with a fucked-up personality, like me'd die first… Ah."

He crawled. He kept crawling.

So that he could pull Hiain up, who was drowning in his own blood on the ground.

And yet, he could not move his body forward, not even a little.

Hiain: "But…"

Since he could not keep going, he would not be able to get there.

Hiain: "…It'll be better, if I'm first, yeah?"

He was crawling slower than a turtle. Crawling too slow, with movements smaller than those of an ant.

He crawled and crawled, and by the time he finally got there, it was far too late.

Hiain's color had returned to its original gray.

With a knife in his back, one arm broken, and blood running down his body, it would not have been strange if Hiain had succumbed on the way running here.

Maybe he had been running while dying. That must have been the case.

Everyone was already dead, with Subaru unable to help them.

Subaru had as good as killed them.

Since he had been unable to save everyone, it was as if he had killed them.

Subaru: “Guh!”

Was it blood, tears, or snot that was sullying his face?

He did not know which was which, what was what, who was who, what the answer was, anymore.

He just, he just, he just, he just, he just did not understand anything anymore.

???: “—Oh my, is that you, Basu, groaning there by any chance?”

Subaru: “…”

???: “Yeah, I knew it, Basu! Dear me, what an unexpected coincidence it is to meet you in a scene like this. Things’ve gotten quite lively, doesn’t it excite you?”

A lighthearted voice called out to Subaru, who lay there stunned, feeling like he had let go of everything.

He could not turn around to the place the voice had come from. Using all the strength in his body, he was going to pick himself up, somehow, and look the person who had uttered those stupid words in the eyes, and say somethi—.

???: “You don’t have to bother risking your life turning around.”

Subaru: “—Ah.”

???: “After all, this isn’t the place to overdo things, is it?”

And with that, they themselves circled around to Subaru’s front—Cecilus looked into Subaru’s face as he spoke.

With the left half of his body scorched black, the Blue Lightning was smiling carefree.

Chapter 75:
I know

1

—In that wretchedly hopeless scene, such a cheerful voice and smile were terribly out of place.

It was evident at first glance that his kimono was violently smoldering, and despite the left half of his face also having been scorched black, Cecilus's attitude as he gazed at Subaru was the same as it had always been. That was far too abnormal.

It was not just him. —Right now, those who remained alive upon this island, all of them were abnormal beings.

The people who were upright, all of them had certainly died already.

Cecilus right in front of him, Todd pursuing him, Arakiya on her killing spree, and Subaru, the great sinner.

Every single one of them, because they were not upright, but instead, shameless people, they had been able to survive like this.

That was why—

Subaru: "Ce, ci…"

Cecilus: "From the looks of things, it seems like you've also had a considerably hard time. On that note, lizardman-san's also died, and at this rate, the lil' deergirl and your other friends from your Unit are all gonna be annihilated, won't they?"

Subaru: "—Hk."

Cecilus: "Oh, is it possible you've yet to realize that he died?"

Through the tremors of the eyeballs of a trembling Subaru, Cecilus was reading through all of his heartfelt thoughts.

Right then, outrage surged forth. Despite seemingly reading Subaru's heart like that, why was he completely unable to sympathize with Subaru's current feelings?

Hiain had died; having been told that, just what would become of Subaru's feelings. And, just why?

Just why, would he speak of that death so frivolously?

Cecilus: "He really died y'know, absolutely and irrevocably… Only, the face he died with wasn't too bad."

Subaru: "Even though, he, died… Hk."

Cecilus: "Are you thinking it doesn't matter whether it was good or bad? That seems to just be a difference in opinion, then. If they had a good way of living, then they'd also have a good way of dying. It's rather tactless for us listeners to butt in with how we feel about it, so let's stop with that. Lizardman-san had a good death. That face of his is proof of that, y'know."

Subaru: "…"

Cecilus: "It's the face of having died after fulfilling one's duty, I also want to go out like this."

Subaru did not say a single thing to Cecilus, who incessantly spewed his nonsense.

He had not been cajoled by those words, rather, he thought them to be meaningless. He had not seen the visage Hiain had made upon his demise, so it was utterly unthinkable that he could comprehend Cecilus.

That was why, there was not even a fragment of a reason for Subaru to engage with his point.

Cecilus: "Well then, though we happened upon each other here and have been blathering on, in truth I'm actually quite busy right now. I'm in the middle of a fantastic showdown with the half-naked woman who's been rampaging around the Island."

Stretching his crooked back with a jerk, Cecilus continued to speak as he pleased.

The person who had been mentioned in conversation, Subaru knew it to be Arakiya without even needing to think.

Arakiya had commenced a massacre upon being told to do so by Todd. Todd's lack of outstanding fighting strength had been his only good aspect, but that had disappeared once paired with her, making him an impeccable evil.

He imagined he would not lay eyes on her again after she had begun turning the gladiators' heads into water balloons, but it seemed like the one who had been keeping her in check was Cecilus.

Even with the latter weakened, could it be that a Divine General was being suppressed by a fellow Divine General?

Cecilus: "But, as you can see I'm in the middle of getting cooked in a close fight. Well, I'm beat, I'm beat. Seems like she's here, the person who can compete with me toe-to-toe, that is. Though I'd always thought that, without a doubt, the path to reach the Heavenly Sword was something that had to be climbed on one's own."

Subaru: "…Why?"

Cecilus: "Pardon? What was that?"

Subaru: "Why, do you seem, like you're enjoying this…?"

Quite literally, at the end of the agonizing struggle that had seemed to wring out his soul, the venting of his anger rushed forth from his mouth.

Indeed, it was just him venting his anger. In this hellish situation, on this island where Weitz, Tanza, Idra, and Hiain, and just about everyone had died, Cecilus's smile was revolting.

Why was he smiling? In this situation, just what was so amusing?

Subaru: “Why…?!”

Cecilus: “Ah, you’ve got cause and effect backwards. I’m not smiling because it’s enjoyable, I’m smiling to make the situation of this play more enjoyable.”

Subaru: “—Ah?”

Cecilus: “In this cruel world, everyone’s in pursuit of their own ideal happiness. The myriads of different people in existence, the philosophies they each follow, that pursuit remains constant in all of them, but whoever it may be, they have to herald a faith that suits them. Thus, the faith I herald, is the reason behind this way of being.”

While he spoke, Cecilus touched his scorched left cheek with his right hand. Though his tattered and charred skin was peeling and flaking away, even in the midst of seemingly unimaginable pain, his smile did not deteriorate.

Without relying on any cheap tricks like not feeling pain, Cecilus kept on smiling.

Cecilus: “I’m the leading actor of this world! Therefore, I’m not going to adhere closely to the script, but instead the script will adhere closely to me. If you ask me why I smile, then that will be my response.”

Subaru: “…”

Cecilus: “For whose sake do I laugh for, it’s for my own sake. —May it be so that the Observers in the heavens above never feel any shame whenever they might look at me.”

Subaru: “…”

Cecilus: “Well, Basu, what kinda faith do you herald?”

That was Cecilus’s philosophy for maintaining his smile while half of his body was smoldering.

That was something Subaru could not comprehend in the slightest, but as if something were making him hesitate to kick Cecilus for relying on his emotions, he had felt something akin to that peculiar faith.

Observers, Cecilus had once spoken of the same thing before.

That someone, or rather something, of an ethereal nature had been observing them, that seemed like what he had wanted to say.

Even in the situation they were in, he staunchly stuck to that recitation of his, so certainly nobody would be able to bend it.

That was why—

Cecilus: “Would you look at that, seems the intermission’s over.”

As he said that, even when witnessing Arakiya’s figure descend, coming from the passage of the lower stratum, his smile did not vanish.

Surely nobody among the gladiators would have stood a chance against Arakiya, her whole body clad in flame. And yet, the wooden branch in her hand had snapped, and she had lost the eyepatch that concealed one of her eyes.

Loathing the fact that she was able to see with the eye under that eyepatch, Arakiya was concealing her left eye with her vacant hand, and her face, which had been emotionless in the past, was contorted, expressing utterly complex emotions.

Arakiya: “Cecilus…!”

Clenching her teeth as she glared at Cecilus, the woman’s pupils flickered with turmoil and ire.

Having sprouted from her back, wings of flame danced; the force of their blaze wavered as if in tandem with her emotions, immolating, continuing to permeate the passage with terrific heat.

The scent of burning was in the air, the woman proceeding to incinerate everything encompassing her surroundings.

The walls and floor of the passage, the candlesticks and doors, and even Hiain's collapsed remains—.

Subaru: "—Hk."

Cecilus: "If we all burn to death here, together, would that be proper recompense for the face he died with? That was a pretty uncharacteristic thing for me to say. By all means, do as you wish, feel free to either stay or leave."

Seeing bits and pieces of Hiain's body catch fire, Subaru's expression changed as Cecilus's voice fell upon him. Firmly, Subaru put his arm to the floor, and little-by-little, tearing his body away from the ground as it began to heat up, he stood up.

His head was aching. His blood was lacking. His chest felt like it was overcome with feelings of powerlessness.

Even so, just why, was Subaru still standing? He would neither burn to death here, nor would he bite down on the "drug" placed behind his molar, just why?

Cecilus: "Then, 'til we meet again in this life."

The reason why he had started sprinting unbeknownst to him, Subaru turned his back on the flaming passage.

Running, limping, he was running at far too slow a pace.

Faster, if only he had been able to surpass this speed, would he not have been able to finish things without letting them, Idra and Hiain, Weitz and Tanza, die? And while he lamented such things.

Subaru, still continued to run away.

2

Cecilus: "—Well now, Basu's disappeared as well, huh ."

Arakiya: "…"

Cecilus: "Dear me, seems like I'm hated an awful lot."

Feeling the presence of that faltering sprint grow distant, batting one eye shut, Cecilus produced a wry smile.

The woman clad in flames cast him an intense glare; he understood that he himself was the target of her ire, yet he did not quite understand what the source of said ire was.

Only, he felt that it was neither his opposition, nor him interrupting her slaughter of the gladiators, that had originated that rage.

Perhaps, there were other reasons beyond that.

However—

Cecilus: “In general, I do have the special skill of angering the people I come into contact with, but, as is usual in those situations… I don’t have the faintest clue why!”

Arakiya: “—Hk, for how long, will you keep joking around…!”

Cecilus: “Hmm, I’m joking around, huh. May I go as far as to ask what part exactly am I joking around about?”

Arakiya: “That! That… appearance, just what is it…!”

Those red eyes glaring at him, his appearance had been pointed out.

She had asked what was up with it, though it had been none other than her who had cooked him until he was seared on only one side.

Cecilus: “But that’s not what you mean, is it? Is it possible that maybe you and I happen to know each other?”

Arakiya: “Joking around…”

Cecilus: “I’m really not, but that being said, since I can’t provide any evidence for you to believe me, I can do nothing but insist and insist on it. However, I see, if I think about it that way it feels like many things make sense.”

While he spoke, Cecilus whirled around an extended finger of his right-hand, and nodded as he spun the eyepatch he had stolen from her in the midst of battle.

His memories up until the uproar on the Gladiator Island were terribly unclear. That it was in accordance with what Subaru had asked before, this was fact. That he had not paid much heed to it, was also fact. Nonetheless, just when he had thought that some of those were present, the woman before his eyes had made her entrance, her face looking as if she knew him.

If that woman were present within his vanished memories, he felt that was somewhat too good to be true. If she was capable of this much, he had expectations of what could happen.

On the path, to reach the Heavenly Sword—

Arakiya: "Always like this… Nobody, no one will tell me anything…!"

Cecilus: "Oh?"

However, in front of Cecilus as he pondered over, as the woman's voice trembled with frustration, powerful bitterness began mixing in with her turmoil and fury.

From red to blue, the flames upon her back shifted in hue. They had a graceful charm to them.

As that graceful transfiguration was brought about, the breaths she took seemed strained,

Arakiya: "The Princess, His Excellency as well, are both hiding… I was, always…"

Cecilus: "Are you having painful thoughts about having been left behind?"

Arakiya: "—Hk."

As if that brief comment had somehow hit bullseye, her facial expression stiffened.

Witnessing those red eyes wavering as if a deep emotion had throbbed from the faded beyond, ultimately, even if said deep emotion had not throbbed, her relation to him was something he was unsure of.

Cecilus: “Well, it’d be strange for you to try killing me if we had a good relationship, so surely it was a rather harsh relationship. That lines up with this situation perfectly!”

Arakiya: “Cecilus…!”

Cecilus: “The audience will get bored from such long-winded dialogue. It’s about time we get this stage moving. Unfortunately, I won’t be able to give you any answers whatsoever, but a some small weight may be removed from your chest.”

Slowly concealing the aching half of his body, grasping the spinning eyepatch tightly, he came to face her.

Thereupon ending the conversation, his attitude was that of wishing for the conversation to not enter the realm of unnecessary words. Then the woman, after remaining silent for a while, slowly lowered her left hand.

Beyond that, was a red eye bereft of all light. Meeting its gaze with his own eyes, Cecilus produced a wry smile.

Cecilus: “Feel free to go all out. —Every single time, you only cook your fried eggs on one side.”

Arakiya: “—Hk.”

Cecilus: “Eh? Did something slip out just now?”

Cecilus cocked his head, wondering about the words that had left his mouth as if by reflex.

Albeit, it seemed that had spurred her ire further.

Arakiya: “…”

Furiously, the sprouting blue flames proceeded to incinerate the lower stratum of the island as they rose.

Devoid of the leisure to concern himself with his surroundings, as he plunged into the inferno, Cecilus himself became Blue Lightning.

3

Subaru: “Haaa, haaa…”

Feeling the heat of the inferno on his back, Subaru frantically fled from the lower stratum.

Fled, indeed, he was fleeing. Not resisting, nor struggling, but fleeing.

That it had been a strategic withdrawal, or a valiant escape in order to follow-up next time, he could not make those excuses.

After all, he had nothing at all to follow-up with beyond this point.

Everybody had died, there was no getting anyone back anymore.

Although Weitz and the others had staked their lives so he could escape, he was unable to do anything whatsoever.

Everything, and anything, his intention had been to succeed in both.

In reality, he had intended, by overcoming Sparka on two occasions, helping out the comrades of his Unit as well as Hiain’s comrades, to surmount every hardship.

It had been a terribly mistaken presumption.

To begin with, Subaru had died many times. Even if he died, as long as he had the chance to do everything over, it would turn out well; thus, it could no longer turn out well.

If he really were a capable person, he should have made everything turn out well, dying not even a single time.

Just as though he were that dreadful existence, just as though he were Todd Fang.

Without even possessing the Authority to start over through death, he had the capability to surmount every situation through his own power.

Lacking any outstanding fighting strength, he was identical to Subaru, so then why, why was Subaru unable to do the same things as Todd.

Since he could not do those things, Subaru, had ended up killing a great number of people—.

Subaru: "Damn it… Hk!"

Rushing out of the island's lower stratum, just as he felt the open air, his vexation swelled unbearably. Bashing the outer wall he leaned against, Subaru cursed himself for his own weakness.

His small fist, his frail body, his non-functioning mind, his useless Authority. Were he to start enumerating the reasons for his defeat, what came to mind was unending.

Rather, just what did he, this shitty brat with scary eyes, possess—.

???: "—Hk."

Subaru, ceasing his footsteps in regret and cursing himself, stifled a scream from his throat at the unexpected sound.

A sound at this place, his whole body trembled violently as he imagined the worst possible thing. Could Todd, who Idra had desperately tried to fend off, have caught up to him?

However—

???: "Schwartz, sama…"

Subaru: "—Tanza?"

As the sound of the hoarse voice continued, Subaru received a shock, although it had not been one of dread.

Calling out to Subaru through feeble breaths, was the one who had been thrown out of the passage by Todd's hand, whose safety he had been uncertain of thereafter, Tanza.

The girl's entire body was drenched as it limped, and having discarded her kimono, she was dressed in her white juban. She was in a battered condition, with one of the two horns sprouting from her head having been broken off.

But even so—

Tanza: "Schwartz-sama, thank goodness, you are alright…"

As her gentle eyes wavered with relief, Subaru felt an agonizing sensation stemming from the bottom of his heart.

Upon seeing the soaked girl, he understood that she had been thrown into the lake from the upper stratum. The lake was inhabited by aquatic, savage Witchbeasts, her fractured horn serving as proof that they should not be glossed over as anything trivial.

It was a figure one would expect to cling to an adult, crying out "It hurts, It's painful, help me".

And yet Tanza had found Subaru, letting out a "Thank goodness" with a content look.

This, Natsuki Subaru, who could not do anything at all, finding him —.

Subaru: "—Ah."

And, it happened the moment he had that thought.

The strength in his legs sapping away, Subaru sank to the floor where he stood. The thread of tension snapped, the insides of his head, which had only been ranting and raving, swiftly grew silent.

That he had become relieved upon coming face-to-face with a living Tanza, was not what had happened.

Neither had he somehow gotten a sense of accomplishment by finding a breakthrough solution, nor had he shaken off his fear directed to Todd.

—Merely, he had run out of patience with himself.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama…?!”

Seeing Subaru fall to his knees, Tanza ran towards him, her expression a changed one.

The way she dashed was odd, perhaps she had sustained an injury to her leg. Looking closely, he could see that the sides of her drenched white juban were slowly being dyed red.

Despite having sustained a wound seemingly of awfully immense pain, she was still worrying about Subaru.

When he realized he could not live up to any of Tanza’s expectations, he lost all strength.

Resignation, had overwhelmed his inner heart.

Subaru: “…”

It was neither pain, nor fear.

That which dealt despair to Natsuki Subaru, was not something as easy-to-understand as hardship.

He had been unable to meet the expectations, the wishes, placed upon him.

That, above everything else, was what brought Natsuki Subaru despair, a despair that had become deadly poison to him.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama, compose yourself… The others, Idra-sama and Hiain-sama…”

Arriving at his side, Tanza touched Subaru’s shoulders as she fret over the two people not present.

She had not called out Weitz’s name. That was a matter-of-course.

Tanza too, had witnessed Weitz be slain through her very eyes. Then, regarding the two people not present here as well, she had surely felt a bad premonition.

That premonition, was accurate to a hopeless extent.

Subaru: "The two of them… They died…"

Tanza: "—Hk."

Subaru: "Both Idra, and Hiain, protected me…"

Everyone, had died. It was not just that he had not been able to save them, but they had saved him.

Weitz, Idra, and Hiain, all three of them had perished while protecting Subaru. That Tanza was close to death, was also because she had attempted to defend an immobile Subaru.

Everyone dying, was Subaru's fault.

Everyone being killed, was also Subaru's fault.

The horrible tragedy that had befallen the Gladiator Island, all of it had been Natsuki Subaru's fault.

Tanza: "Schwartz-sama… Let us leave this place. At once, we must hide somewhere."

Subaru: "Even if we hide, it's pointless… No matter what, we'll be found immediately."

Tanza: "Even so! Shall you do nothing at all, and wait like this until you are killed? Then for what purpose did everyone in our Unit lose their lives?!"

Subaru: "…"

Shaking her head side-to-side, Tanza let out a frustrated cry directed at Subaru, still unmoving.

Her tearful appeal, however, far from kindling Subaru's heart, only brought about a cold understanding.

Indeed, Subaru, for whose safety the three had staked their lives, was utterly, completely useless.

In other words, he had let the three of them die in vain. Because, all of them had tried to protect Subaru.

He had not been capable of living up to their expectations. Even though he had gone as far as having lied to them, deceived them.

It would have been better had they not believed that lie. Had he been unable to deceive them to the end of the end, or had there been no gain for Subaru in telling that lie, if they had not believed such a lie.

Had that been the case, then the three of them would have not tried to die in Subaru's stead.

It had not been for the Emperor's child's sake, nor for Natsuki Schwartz's, but for Natsuki Subaru's; that, they would never come to know.

And now that he thought about it, there was another person whom he had deceived with the same lie.

Tanza: "Schwartz-sama! If you collapse here—"

Subaru: "…Everything, all of it was a lie, Tanza."

Tanza: "…"

Subaru: "Me being the illegitimate child of the Emperor, that's a downright lie. I'm the child of a praiseworthy, incredible and cool dad… but, I'm nothing of the sort of a child of the Emperor."

Casting his gaze down, Subaru willingly confessed that he had carelessly tried to rely on that lie and their false expectations.

If only he had done this sooner—no, he should not have told such a lie to begin with.

Tanza: "…"

As her already-round eyes widened further, Tanza was rendered speechless due to Subaru's admission.

That was natural. Given the situation, to think he would tell a lie made Subaru himself want to curse his own self. Having been deceived, it would not be strange in the slightest for the girl to surrender herself to anger.

Rather, even if he were to be killed by Tanza's hand, that was something unavoidable.

The same went for everyone else as well.

The chance to exact rightful punishment on the deceitful Subaru, had been lost by those he had deceived.

So, even if Tanza were to do that.

Tanza: "…Schwartz-sama."

Subaru: "…"

Tanza: "Quickly, let us move from here. I shall carry you upon my back."

Subaru: "Huh…"

Subaru, who had shut his eyes in preparation for the fact that whatever came out of her mouth would be only natural, lifted his head upon hearing Tanza's words.

Pursing her thin lips, Tanza tried to pull on Subaru's arm. Earnestly, she attempted to take Subaru upon her back and get out of this place; a "Wait" leaked out through his voice at that development.

He had conveyed everything, every single thing. He had said it had been a lie.

Subaru: "You didn't hear me, did you… I'm…!"

Tanza: “Not the illegitimate child of His Excellency the Emperor, I heard you. We will address that later…”

Subaru: “It’ll be just as shit later, won’t it?! I’m unrelated to the Emperor! And as such, right now, something like a reason to save me is…”

Nonexistent. For pretending that something that did not exist, actually did, had been Subaru’s sin.

That was the very thing that had taken the lives of those three away —.

Tanza: “—Schwartz-sama, is that truly what you believe?”

Having shaken off the small hands touching his shoulders, Subaru ceased his movement.

In front of him, Tanza, crouching, was looking straight into Subaru’s eyes with intent. Unable to take his eyes off of hers, he struggled in understanding the meaning of the words she had stated towards him.

Regardless of what she thought, everything, all of it was just as he had said.

Tanza: “Weitz-sama, Idra-sama, Hiain-sama, the reason everyone put their lives on the line to protect you, Schwartz-sama, was all because of the falsehood you spoke, do you truly believe that?”

Subaru: “A-after all… After all, I said I was the Emperor’s child.”

Tanza: “Myself and everyone else, all of us believed it. Nevertheless, those three… Those people, a scaredy-cat, a coward, and a liar, do you think they would wager their lives out of loyalty and patriotism to the Empire?”

If Subaru were the illegitimate child of the Emperor, he would be known as an Imperial Prince.

That was why, for those three, as people of the Empire, it would have been only natural for them to try to protect Subaru. But, once again, he slowly digested Tanza's words, pondered them over.

As a scaredy-cat, Hiain had tried to run away so he could save himself.

As a coward, Weitz had struggled to survive by outmaneuvering those around him.

As a liar, Idra had tried to make himself look bigger so as to be able to control everyone.

Not one of them felt like someone he would get along with. Assuredly, the three of them had held similar feelings.

Despite that, in the end those three had staked their lives, standing to defend Subaru. Protected him. Allowed him to escape.

Why had it been so? Because the three of them had believed Subaru to be the illegitimate child of the Emperor.

Though, it was possible. —It was possible, that if that had not been the case.

Subaru: "Just, why…?"

Tanza: "It is because, Schwartz-sama, you actually got close to those three."

Subaru: "…"

Tanza: "You engaged in actual conversations with them, answered them, and attempted to actually come to an understanding with them… By doing that, Schwartz-sama, you became close to everyone."

His understanding lacking, as Subaru voiced that question, Tanza spoke as she looked into his eyes.

What had Subaru done? Why had those three tried to save Subaru? She was trying to inform him as to the answer.

Even so, Subaru did not comprehend the meaning of what Tanza was saying.

After all—

Subaru: “That kind of thing, it’s natural. I haven’t done anything even remotely special.”

Conversing with the companions he had been cooperating with, and coming to understand them, had been only natural to him.

Things that he was unable to do certainly existed. Things that he wanted to do, but could not. But, doing something so natural with everybody, getting close to them, that was not such an extraordinary thing.

Tanza: “Personally, I understand how they all felt. I too, was once rescued by Yorna-sama. I was able to grow close to her. Without a doubt, it was the same for those three, with how they felt about you.”

Subaru: “…”

Tanza: “Nonetheless, there was meaning in them staking their lives on just that… There are times when one is made to feel so.”

Unfair, those words had been unfair.

Had she only had her experience with Subaru, it would be impossible for Tanza to say such a thing to his face. But, Tanza spoke of her own experience on what she had received from Yorna.

Yorna Mishigure, the Demon City’s Mistress, a city where many tribes lived—as far as Subaru knew, she was the kindest woman in the Empire.

Putting him on the same level as Yorna, what an absurd proposition. Even disrespect had its limits.

Tanza had appraised Subaru far too highly.

However—

Subaru: "…"

However, for those three, for Hiain and Weitz and Idra, just how had it been?

In all likelihood, Subaru knew more about those three than they had thought.

Hiain's self-hatred, Weitz's false accusations, Idra's downfall, he knew about all of those.

He knew that, having gone through tough times, having gone through miserable times, having been unable to rely on anyone, they had all been sent to this island.

He had not given much thought to that. Because, surely, all three would have also had their chances.

And despite him having thought that they would die here, to think that that would be their end.

Subaru: "I wanted to save, everyone."

Tanza: "You have saved them. To the extent that they would stake their lives in order to protect you, Schwartz-sama."

Subaru: "No, you're wrong. It's not like that…"

By some chance, perhaps it was just as Tanza said.

By some possibility, more than Subaru had believed, those three had perhaps thought of Subaru as their comrade.

Subaru had possibly, by some chance, saved the hearts of those three.

But, just their hearts, was not enough.

It would be unthinkable for him to merely save their hearts and leave it at that. What he wanted to save, was everything.

Subaru wished, for those who had kindly taken his side, for those who had treated him well, for everyone, to have their hearts and bodies alike be saved by his own self.

Were he unable to do so, then, he would be no son of Natsuki Keni—No.

Subaru: "—I, hate it."

With him hopelessly bawling out, with everything in his surroundings dying out, this world was ending.

Before he knew it, the Gladiator Island had been engulfed in black smoke, burning in spite of being an island floating atop a lake, burning, its tongues of flame spreading, bringing the lives carried within it to an end.

Subaru: "I won't…"

Permit anything of the sort. I don't want to allow anything of the sort. I don't want my knees to buckle because of an end like this, unable to save everyone.

I can't accept an ending like this, with everyone sacrificing their lives.

I cannot accept it. Therefore—

Subaru: "—I, don't want, to lose to you."

???: "I don't really care about stuff like winning or losing, though."

From behind the ascending black smoke, tapping his shoulder with the axe in his hand, the man responded as he tilted his head.

4

For but a moment, Subaru had mistaken the man, who had made his appearance with relaxation as he carried a bloodstained axe on his shoulder, for someone else.

Missing his trademark bandana, his orange hair hanging down, he lent a vastly different impression from the man Subaru was acquainted with.

However, that pair of eyes—those green irises, the malice there-in unable to be fully concealed, could not quite falsify his identity.

Subaru: “Todd…”

Todd: “You sure have the devil’s luck. Even though I was chasing you, it took some time to catch up to you since the passage was on fire. I told Arakiya to put her water to use, but…”

Subaru: “…”

Todd: “Somehow, it seems like Arakiya’s got her hands full. She’s useless at the times that are actually important.”

Saying that with bluntness and annoyance, Todd, partly due to his lowered hair, had no hint of positivity. The fabricated aura of a friendly young man from their first meeting had evaporated, and what was present now was only a chilly thirst for violence.

Perhaps even that violence was also a misunderstanding on Subaru’s part, and was possibly another fabrication.

He was a man who would tell only the needed lies if push came to shove, utilizing those around him, a fabrication as was typical of Todd—

Tanza: “Please, refrain from coming any closer than that…”

Glowering at Todd as he tried to take a step forward, Tanza picked up a nearby rock.

With the arm strength Tanza possessed, power unthinkable for a child, then even an ordinary stone would be enough as a lethal weapon when thrown. In the case Todd was the opponent however, Subaru did not feel like a rock would not have any usefulness beyond being a rock.

And in fact, Todd was no coward, instead narrowing his eyes,

Todd: “Even though you fell in the lake, you’re quite stubborn, little miss. Are you the same as that lot from earlier?”

Tanza: “…If you are referring to everyone from the Unit…”

Todd: “That’s a troublesome look in your eyes. I also don’t intend on underestimating just how dangerous that desperation is. If I did, it’d be troublesome, as we’d render each other unable to move.”

As he stated that, Todd ran his hand through his own hair. Transmitted from that gesture, was that the removal of his bandana had been an achievement left behind by Idra.

It was not that he had been able to defeat Todd, nor was it that he had injured Todd, even, it was just that he had snatched Todd’s bandana away.

And that notwithstanding, because Idra had carried out a single retaliation, Todd was exercising caution towards Subaru and Tanza.

Tanza: “What… Just what is it exactly that you desire?”

Todd: “—? I just want to go home to my fiancée, though?”

Having brought his legs to a halt, that was Todd’s reply to Tanza’s question.

Devoid of any apparent hint of jest or sarcasm, Todd vocalized his desire plainly. He just wanted to go home, that was the sole thing he desired. That was what Todd had declared.

Perhaps, then, that had not been a lie of any sort.

Tanza: “—Hk.”

Subaru: “Tanza, you don’t need to speak to him anymore. The one to speak to him, will be me.”

Pulling Tanza back, who had cast Todd a stern look, Subaru silently trained his gaze on him.

With the pair of tattered children before him, Todd shrugged his shoulders.

Todd: “I’ve got nothing to talk about, boy.”

Subaru: “I’ll keep you company as you look for an opening. Or could it be that you’re scared of a kid who’s this close to death?”

Todd: “Sure is scary. A brat still trying to provoke me despite the situation, being scared is unavoidable.”

Not letting himself be provoked in the slightest, nor relaxing even a shred of his vigilance, he would not cut corners even if his opponent was a child.

In truth, against an opponent troublesome to no end, he thought it only natural to be driven to a corner like this. Though, he also considered something else. Todd was someone who cautiously used his wits and did not overestimate his own ability, such a way of doing things was—.

Subaru: “You’re someone who tries to manage everything all on your own.”

Todd: “—. It’s impossible to do everything. I know the extent of my own ability.”

Subaru: “Although you came alongside Arakiya as comrades, you really don’t trust her in the slightest.”

He could not feel any consideration towards Arakiya in Todd’s attitude.

Not because he was not confident in Arakiya’s strength, nor because he believed there was no way she would lose, but rather because, regardless of her strength or weakness, Todd simply did not care about Arakiya.

And that was unrestricted to just Arakiya. That way of thought applied to everything in Todd’s vicinity.

That was why, his thoughts, his actions, his ideals, all were fulfilled entirely by his own self.

Subaru: “I don’t want to lose to a guy of that sort.”

Todd: “It’s not about winning or losing. I don’t particularly mind. It’s fine if you win, as long as you die.”

Subaru: “My defeat, won’t just be my defeat. It’ll be Tanza’s, Hiain’s, Weitz’s, Idra’s, everyone in the Unit’s defeat.”

That, was absolutely loathsome.

All together, Subaru and the others had fought, they had resisted, and they headed towards victory. As a Unit.

That was why, they would win. —With everyone, he would go and win.

Subaru: “…”

Kneeling, his body close to death, Subaru put a hand to his own chest.

Though Todd scowled at those words, he did not heedlessly shift his vigilance away from Tanza. Naturally, were Subaru to attempt any discernible action, Todd would surely move to impede him.

Though, as Subaru remained kneeling on the spot, he did not move. He would not move.

Subaru: “Todd.”

And, he had no need to move. —There was just one thing, he had to say.

Subaru: “—I can… Return by Death.”

Powering through his slight hesitation, Subaru spoke so.

Prepared for what could happen should he say that, with his hand still upon his own chest, Subaru clearly spoke those words.

And then—

Todd: “…What?”

After an instant of nothing, because of Subaru’s words, Todd wrinkled his brow, creating deep creases.

Unable to grasp the meaning of those words, Tanza returned signs of doubt all the same. From the reaction of those two, and from the lack of pain hailing from his chest, Subaru discerned the origin of the discrepancy.

Although his body had shrunk, he could not forget those memories of agony.

Were he to speak of that, a disaster should, without fail, befall Subaru. Unbearable pain would be bestowed upon him as punishment for breaking the Taboo, by the black shadows that governed the world of stopped time.

That did not arrive. For what reason? —The Witch had lost sight of Subaru.

At the tower of the Crimson Lapis Castle, during the Sparka on the Gladiator Island, during the massacre triggered by Todd—a discrepancy had accompanied the spirals of Death that had occurred at every single one of those scenes.

Instinctively, unconsciously, Subaru had understood that.

Akin to how a bird would not forget how to fly. Akin to how a fish would not forget how to swim.

Natsuki Subaru, would not forget how to use his own Authority.

Was being sent to the Vollachian Empire the reason? Was the onwards march of Infantilization the reason?

Before this, way before this, he could have noticed it.

Even during Sparka, even while the massacre was ongoing, the moment the unleashed Gladiator Beasts—the Witchbeasts, did not rush towards Subaru, it was made certain that he had been parted from the Witch's hands.

Henceforth, he shouted.

Subaru: “I can Return by Death!”

Todd: “—Hk, you…”

Subaru: “I… can Return by Death! Return by Death! You understand? Return by Death!”

—Return by Death, was something he must not reveal to anyone.

Because accompanying it was a penalty of unbearable pain, and beyond that, there was a possibility that it could directly lead to despair akin to one’s heart cracking.

To sow the life of those listening by abusing that mechanism, he did not expect anything of the sort.

He did not stop it from reaching Tanza’s ears either. He even bestowed Todd with information he did not want him to hear.

However, the one he truly wanted to hear it was not Todd, nor was it anyone else on the Island.

Subaru: “—I… can Return By Death!”

Raising his eyes to the heavens, Subaru projected his voice towards the same overcast skies black smoke was ascending to.

With his body in tatters, the reverberation of his loud voice brought pain to his viscera. He was near death. Nevertheless, Subaru’s resolve was settled, for the pain he wished for was nothing of this sort.

May it be so the Observers did not feel shame, those were the rambling words left behind by Cecilus.

It was unlikely that Subaru and Cecilus had been envisioning the same thing. In the first place, there was a high probability that it had merely been one of Cecilus’s thoughtless remarks. Yet, those thoughtless remarks had aided him in realizing.

Similar to the Observers Cecilus was aware of, there was something that was supposedly observing Subaru.

That existence which was supposedly observing Subaru, were it watching over Subaru even now, without parting from him, then these loops bereft of hope, bereft of Love, would not come to pass.

Subaru: “—I can Return By Death!”

I’m right here. Come find me.

I know that it’s selfish. But, I want to save everyone.

With my, with Natsuki Subaru’s Authority and nothing more, it just isn’t enough.

That’s why—

Subaru: “…Come find me, Satella.”

???: “—I love you.”

SETOWI

It happened the moment that name was called out.

Subaru: "…"

The world abruptly lost color. The loud throbbing that resounded, the ringing in his ears vanished into the distance.

He was incapable of moving his limbs. His tongue became parched and numb. He became unable to both move his eyes and breathe. The force restraining his free will, the threat slowly disrupting the beating of heart, all of that had been, because.

—Donning a dress weaved from jet-black shadows, the Witch he yearned for appeared before his eyes.

???: "I love you."

As she spoke so, the Witch's magic hands of black stretched out towards him.

Caressing Subaru's cheek, tenderly cherishing him as she slid down the back of his neck, tracing his collarbone down towards his solar plexus, to then finally arrive at the place she sought.

???: "I love you. I love you. I love you."

While she whispered the love his ears had grown accustomed to, her fingers phased through Subaru's, through that child's chest, then finally wrapping themselves around the organ where the facilities of life were contained with gentleness.

???: "I love you. I love you. I love you. I love you. I love you."

Subaru had somehow managed to do it, that much was certain.

The countless whispers imbued with the power in the word "love", the fingertips wrapping his heart which seemed to run contrary to that, the ensuing pain that lasted seemingly until the end of this world, he had longed for all of it.

Therefore—

???: “I love you. I love you.”

—Even if this repulsive world was fully permeated by the power in those words, Natsuki Subaru would not be broken.

5

As the world regained its color, as his once-vanished tinnitus returned, as the sensation in his limbs and the numbness of his tongue both faded, as he took gruff breaths, the flow of time for everything outside of Subaru was set in motion.

Subaru: “Guh…”

With that, it seemed both Todd and Tanza did not understand what Subaru had meant, the latter with a strong clutch on his chest as he groaned.

Nevertheless, the subsequent change ought to have been noticed by the two of them right away.

Todd: “What…?!”

Eyes sharpened, his expression stiffening in terror, Todd shifted his focus to his surroundings.

The cause of that was not something visible to the eye, but an approaching, audible report—in more detail, roars. The Witchbeasts still remaining upon the Gladiator Island were howling in unison, as though they had arranged this beforehand.

Furthermore, having been stimulated by an unordinary trigger, the aura was of such menace that it seemed as if they had lost their senses.

Todd: “—Hk.”

That instant, casting his mind back to the sense of crisis, Todd immediately detected Subaru as the cause.

It seemed that even Todd himself did not know the meaning of that “Return by Death” Subaru had shouted out. But he had no necessity to comprehend it; so casting that aside, he put his intent to kill into practice on the spot.

While remaining vigilant of Tanza’s counterattack, Todd’s body ferociously charged towards Subaru.

Opposing Todd, Tanza hurled the stone in her hand at great velocity. The stone flew true, rocketing towards the very center of Todd’s being.

And yet—

Todd: “Shit…!”

Letting out a minute grunt, Todd gnawed his molars at the pain originating from his left arm, which had been struck by the stone.

Unable to allow him to dodge, Tanza had set her aim to the largest possible target, his torso. Catching wind of that, Todd had sacrificed his left arm, and thus minimized the damage he had suffered.

Following that, Todd brandished the axe with his right arm, and tried to cut Tanza’s petite form down.

However, Subaru would not permit such a thing.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama?!”

Her shoulders sent flying due to a thrust from behind, Tanza called that out as she fell on her side.

The one to send her flying had been Subaru, who she had been protecting with that small back of hers just before. Tanza had vanished from the range of the axe's downswing, but Subaru had entered it in her stead.

For but an instant, Todd's pupils constricted, however, the momentum of his axe did not cease, his swing being brought to completion.

The blade drew near without haste, it would send Subaru's head flying—it happened then.

Todd: "—HK?!"

A firm sound and a weighty impact gave rise to a hollow echo, and Todd's body flailed around in midair.

Todd, having been blown away, now on his back upon the floor, promptly got back up. And yet, droplets of blood dripped from the grand gash now on his mouth, whereas his knees really seemed to be on the verge of buckling.

Todd: "Guoh… Just now, that…!"

Unsure of what had just occurred, Todd's eyes darted about.

Thrusting his finger towards that Todd, Subaru—

Subaru: "—Invisible Providence."

What the meaning behind that punch to his defenseless jaw was, Subaru politely explained it to him.

Subaru: "Next, I'll blow your head off."

Todd: "…"

Having withdrawn his thrust-out finger, Subaru now erected his middle finger and asserted such.

Perhaps because his jaw was broken, his hemorrhage did not cease; while spitting out blood, Todd suddenly squinted his eyes. With that, he would begin his retaliation over that broken jaw, or so they had thought—

Todd: “…”

While quietly training his gaze on Subaru, Todd slowly retreated into the background. His legs backing up to enter the ascending black smoke, without any faltering, he vanished into the fumes.

As soon as he noticed that the situation had become unfavorable to him, discarding just about all of his reluctance, he had chosen to escape.

Subaru: “Well, I thought… he’d do that, but…”

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama!”

Seeing Todd’s disappearance with her own eyes, Tanza rushed over to Subaru, her facial expression altered. Before he could take Tanza’s hand, Subaru slipped and tumbled down right where he was.

He had already been on the verge of death, even before reaching this place. Most likely, at the time he had descended alongside Idra and Hiain, he had sustained serious wounds of having multiple bones broken.

The Authority of Sloth, which he had not utilized for a long time, was providing a strong stimulus to Subaru’s brain as per usual; blood was trickling out his nose, and yet he was incapable of staunching it.

Though in any case, even if he could staunch it, it would not make much of a difference.

Todd’s axe had pulverized Subaru’s right shoulder with its final blow, and was currently lodged there.

The fact he had not inadvertently lost consciousness, was proof that Subaru’s life had already drifted away, so much so that pain or anything else were already irrelevant.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama, Schwartz-sama…!”

Clinging on to a sobbing Tanza, Subaru’s innermost feelings were entirely those of guilt.

With this small body, with earnestness, Subaru nestled closer to her, to the girl who had desperately tried to keep him alive, to whom he must leave something behind.

Only—

Subaru: “Take, this…”

Tanza: “—Hk, the curse tool?”

From his pocket, he retrieved the black orb, and entrusted it to Tanza’s hand.

It was not that he’d had some sort of idea. He thought he should at least leave something behind to Tanza, even if he would soon perish.

Subaru: “Ceci, is… over, there, with Arakiya…”

Tanza: “U-understood…! I understand, since I, understand…”

Subaru: “Todd is, already… You don’t… need… to worry.”

As far as Todd’s personality went, Subaru could not imagine that the former would consider challenging him once more after having had an experience that painful. That was a detestable aspect of that man, and yet, simultaneously it was a belief that he could trust on, and make use of.

Like that, whilst enduring tears, Tanza touched Subaru, who was frantically stringing words together.

Until the end of the end, for the sake of Subaru, who was worrying about her, she felt she had to do something, desperately so.

Though, that was wrong.

That order of things, was completely backwards.

Tanza had treated him kindly just before. She had remedied just about all of Subaru's thoughts.

That Natsuki Subaru was, until the end of the end, someone better off not giving up; she had aided him in remembering so.

Thanks to that, once more, was he still able to fight.

That was why—

Subaru: "—Next, time."

Indeed, at a Subaru softly vocalizing his resolve, Tanza widened her eyes.

Still, for the girl, that must have sounded like a final show of obstinacy from a Subaru about to pass away.

As tears accumulated in her eyes, firmly enduring those emotions, Tanza's small hand, her slender fingers, gently wrapped around Subaru's minutely trembling hand.

And then—

Tanza: "Yes, that is correct, Schwartz-sama. Next time, without a doubt, we will not lose."

Taking care as to not disgrace Subaru's final wish, while crying, Tanza uttered that.

Aligned with each other, they did not become. Even so, they were aligned in their desire to save one another.

That was sufficient.

With that sufficient desire, while bearing the feelings of this moment—

Subaru: "—I will…"

—Save everyone.

With that resolve in his final moment, the life of Natsuki Subaru burned to ashes—.

6

—Dark, dark, a world of utmost darkness.

Nothing but darkness existed in this space where light could not flow in, this ultimately distant land a place neither prayers nor wishes could reach.

Always did that place gnaw at his heart, imposing a feeling of helplessness, bringing about grief and sorrow; a cursed land untrodden by any being.

However, this time, this very moment, did his thoughts wish, anticipate this arrival.

Subaru: "…"

The darkness he could not stand a chance against by his lonesome, was engulfing everything, taking away everything.

Even if he was being tortured by that feeling of helplessness, abandoning everything in his vicinity, even himself, the feeling of defeat that originated from being unable to do anything anymore had scorched his body.

???: "—I love you."

Subaru: "—It may not be everything. But, I know."

The things he could accomplish by his lonesome, were not that numerous.

He was not a human being ambitious to such an extreme extent. That was why, he could also make mistakes, and why his resolve too could bend.

Even so—

???: "—I love you."

Subaru: "I know that as well, I really do. —I know."

Having parted ways, it was something he knew at last.

Simultaneously, he became unsure on how he should retain the emotions he'd had up to this point.

Still, as he had indeed been thinking that he wanted to know.

The most important thing, he knew it, he really did.

Subaru: "Thank you. —I'll be heading off now."

To that place, to that land of isolating waters, where all life had been wiped out—for the sake of losing no longer, for the sake of not allowing those he held dear be trampled upon, once more, Natsuki Subaru would rise.

—Once more, he would rise.

7

—Through his buttocks, he felt the Galewind Horse-pulled carriage shake with a rattle.

It had not been too comfortable of a journey.

It was not about how comfortable the ride had been, but rather about how comfortable he had been. In regards to the former, it was likely that this was a rare privilege, even within the Empire. He did not feel overly grateful about that.

As to why he felt so uncomfortable in such a luxurious carriage, was due to the scarcity of windows, and to the fact he was not in control of the reins. Naturally, both left some margin for one to be targeted in exchange, so whichever was preferred varied from person-to-person.

Quite simply, it was just that he hated his response being delayed because he had left things to others.

The horse-led carriage itself had been made quite solid through the protection of earth magic, and when it came to being vigilant towards their surroundings, it was being handled by someone who possessed considerably greater senses than he did.

Man: “It sure does leave nothing to be desired. Apart from it being a journey I hadn’t wished for.”

As expected from the customs of a country that esteemed the strong, the extravagant praise the Generals received was quite an extreme thing.

In other words, considering he was being treated like this, he could even say that it seemed that he had been placed amongst the powerful, but in his true opinion, that in itself was a bothersome kindness.

His personal opinion was that, as long as he was not precisely the summit of the world, he would lose far more than he would gain by being thought of as strong. Being thought of as weak was much, much easier.

It was from this reason, that the discomfort from this treatment had become the logical conclusion.

???: “—Are you bored?”

Suddenly, his closed eyes slowly opened, the voice that had come from atop the roof as a culprit.

The owner of the voice he was hearing was located there; the interior of the coach was empty, himself excluded. The lack of people was rather splendid, as it would be suffocating for him if others were present, but his companion was intolerable, someone unbefitting of being a civilized person.

That notwithstanding, they were not someone who ought to do the talking themselves. He would rather have someone else take charge of both her education and her discipline.

He did not have much intention of engaging with her for long, either. Though she seemed to be empathetic in regards to his intentions to exact revenge, it would be better for him if he made up a story and chose someone at random as his enemy.

???: “Are you listening?”

Man: “I heard you. I was just thinking about something. What about you, do you remember your instructions properly?”

???: “Even I can remember that much.”

Unthinkable, was what he wanted to say, but there was room for doubt as to whether it was something he could believe.

In the first place, he had never heard of a General that delegated full control of their plans to a subordinate, who himself was no more than a Private First-Class, only because they were not very good at thinking. He had been told to stop speaking politely, and he had responded exactly in tandem with her wishes, but what was on her mind was wholly unknown.

Perhaps she had taken to him. If he thought of her as a female version of Jamal, there did not seem to be much of a difference.

Although it seemed more difficult to find a place to abandon her in, than it had been to do so for Jamal, which was bothersome.

???: “The Island, I see it. Are you prepared?”

Man: “As long as I don’t lose the Prime Minister’s letter, all that’s left is to get the Governor-sama we heard about to follow the orders. There’s no need to get in a fight with anyone, it’s an easy job, you know.”

Atop the roof, Arakiya listened as she looked at the coach’s destination, on the other side of the drawbridge it was crossing over.

As he answered, he ascertained the feeling of the letter within his pocket. Indeed, their role was something akin to messengers; as long as they got him to follow the directives, it would be fine.

However, if ordinary messengers really would have been sufficient, there was no reason to bother with sending Arakiya.

That was the sole thing that bothered him.

Man: “It should be an easy job, kinda.”

Arakiya: “…The objective is the annihilation of the Island. Is it possible?”

Man: “Provided the Governor agrees to activate the curse rule obediently.”

Governor Gustav Morello, the manager of the Gladiator Island, the place where their goal lay, had imposed an absolute regulation called the “curse rule” for the sake of ruling over the gladiators assembled on the Island.

The curse rule was invoked when someone who had been engraved with the curse mark from Gustav violated the rules. That life would then be taken without any room for argument. It truly was a convenient thing.

A curse tool created by one of the Nine Divine Generals, the Master of Enchanted Items, was serving as the trigger for the curse rule, and the conditions to invoke it were plain and simple—

Man: “—At a fixed distance, those who go too far from the curse tool will die.”

Arakiya: “…Any concerns about the people of the Island?”

Man: “The safe zone seems to be roughly the whole area of the Island. At any rate, even if they try to slip away covertly, they’ll die if their curse mark hasn’t been removed. It can prevent their escape even if they get frightened into crossing the drawbridge. That ability to restrain them is enough to keep them inside.”

In truth, if they were to let one gladiator die as an example of the curse rule’s effect, then probably, nobody would try and do the same to double-check it. No fools that reckless existed.

It was a curse activated without taking the trouble to look the recipient in the eye, or pressure them in any way. On top of the Island’s special characteristic, he honestly admired how that restraining device was thoroughly drilled into them.

However, were they to realize that the curse rule could not be utilized freely, it would rouse an uprising right away.

Man: “Well, I intend on annihilating them when that time comes, so it’ll be fine to just throw the curse tool into the lake.”

The water surrounding the Gladiator Island was quite deep. Were it not for the large drawbridge, its coast would be unreachable, much like an island amidst isolating waters, but the distance to the bottom of the lake was even deeper.

If the curse tool were to be thrown into the lake, by the time it reached the bottom, they would be in the range of activation of the curse rule.

In the worst-case-scenario, that of the Governor not cooperating, throwing the retrieved curse tool into the lake would also enter the realm of possibility.

Man: “It’s essential to prepare for the absolute worst. The hiding place of the curse tool included.”

For one to untactfully hold pride in their work, it would trouble him should that be a cause for difficulty.

It would be best for him to cooperate in slaughtering all the gladiators, obediently, being reasonable without incident. He wanted to return home as soon as possible, after finishing their task like that, and thus fulfilling the objective of their journey.

Man: “Katya…”

Because they had been separated for so long, their short reunion had strengthened his attachment.

It was a cruel action, one akin to spilling a single drop of water into his parched, water-craving throat. He wished to ingest water until his stomach burst. That could perhaps be called a natural emotion for a human being, he thought.

Even if it made it just one second faster, he would finish his task, and return to the Imperial Capital. If it were for that purpose—

Man: “—I’m completely fine with any sacrifices.”

Indeed, that was when one of the switches within himself flipped towards violence.

Arakiya: “—Todd, something’s strange.”

Called out by his name, the man—Todd, lifted his head with a “What?”.

Her tone lacked seriousness, but that was the kind of manner she conducted herself with more often than not. Nonetheless, having ascended to the rank of Divine General, her true abilities were nothing to be made light of, and it was also true that a normal person would not be able to guess them.

That which she had pointed out, was their objective, the Gladiator Island, which they were steadily approaching—they were already nearing halfway through the drawbridge, at a place between the two shores where the coach would cross over to the island half of the bridge. Having been called out precisely just before they entered their opponent’s lair, a bad premonition overcame him.

And then—

Todd: “—Stop!”

???: “Huh?”

Todd: “Right now! Stop! Turn back!”

The instant he looked closely at the path outside the window, Todd yelled that out, bewildering the soldier on the driver’s seat.

Clicking his tongue at the slowness of that reaction, Todd immediately climbed onto the driver’s seat, snatched the reins away from the soldier, stopped the carriage, and whipped the Galewind Horse to make it turn around post-haste.

After that, he ignored the befuddled coachman and looked back toward the roof, Todd: “Arakiya, keep an eye on the Island, be alert! If there’s movement, fire at will.”

Arakiya: “—. Understood.”

Coachman: “Come on now, our responsibility as emissaries from the Prime Minister is…”

Todd: “…”

Coachman: “Ah, uh…”

Arakiya obeyed without complaint, the coachman voiced his sense of duty. Disregarding the former, and glaring at the nearby latter, who had a poor understanding of things, Todd quietly narrowed his eyes.

At that gaze of Todd’s, the coachman, his spirit withering away, choked on his words and shut his mouth.

That was the right choice. Were he to try to persist on the issue, he would have been pushed off into the lake.

It would be better if they were saved the trouble of not losing their coachman for their return, and that that had happened had been Arakiya’s achievement, who had noticed something abnormal before they finished crossing the drawbridge. —Seemingly, the situation had already changed.

Arakiya: “Todd.”

Todd: “It seems Prime Minister Berstetz’s concerns were valid.”

With that as his response to her short call, Todd turned the Galewind Horse to the opposite direction, retracing the path they had come from.

They could not afford for the drawbridge to be withdrawn on them. Those in control of the drawbridge on the farther shore were not restricted to people not cooperating with their opponents.

At any rate—

Todd: “—For them to be waiting for us fully prepared, they’re being led by a pretty dangerous person.”

Arakiya: “We can’t win? Even though I’m there?”

Todd: “Yeah, that’s right.”

Quietly, while hearing Arakiya’s voice raise in tension, Todd gave a nod.

With a shudder, as he felt dread run down his back—

Todd: “—It’s not an opponent we have any chance of beating. At least, for today.”

So he spoke.

8

???: “…I thought that they’d turn back, but that decision to cut their losses seemed way too quick.”

While viewing the coach turn around exactly halfway into the drawbridge, retreating without any hesitation, he vented a sigh.

He had been amazed and impressed by the speed of their judgment, but even so, it had been within range of his expectations. Had he truly intended to perform a surprise attack, he would first quietly lure the opponent onto the Island.

However, that situation would have never been settled with both sides remaining unscathed.

As someone aware of the massacre that would ensue in the case they lured the carriage in, he had been unable to take such a risky gamble.

—That was, because he had already thrown himself head-first into the riskiest gamble available.

???: “Schwartz-sama, the emissaries are…”

Subaru: “Yeah, they ran away. As expected, they thought it strange that we’d just line up to welcome them. Though, that was what I wanted them to think, so it was a bluff.”

???: “Is, that so…? I am relieved that we did not end up making the Second an opponent.”

A girl in a kimono stood next to Subaru, who was shielding his eyes with his hands to his forehead as he gazed towards the drawbridge. Gently patting her own chest, Tanza digested the relief over the plan’s success.

The two horns atop her head were intact and well, and there were no wounds visible on her beautiful and youthful skin whatsoever.

With absolutely no problems at all, she was healthy and well. An admirably perfect Tanza.

Tanza: “—. E-excuse me, Schwartz-sama?”

Subaru: “Hmm?”

Tanza: “No, um, I was just wondering why you were patting my head…”

Subaru: “Ah, sorry sorry, it was by reflex.”

At Tanza’s question born of embarrassment, realizing that he had been subconsciously stroking her head, Subaru apologized. But regardless of his apology, he did not stop patting her head.

Then, as Subaru continued to caress her head, Tanza pursed her lips and did not resist.

For her sullen face to appear childlike once again, Subaru thought he would continue patting her head no matter what, as long as he was not shaken off, however—

???: “—How long are ya gonna do that for?! Is this really the time for brats to be flirtin’ with each other?!”

Subaru: “Huh.”

Just as a vigorous voice came from behind him, Subaru's hand stopped patting. Parting his hand from Tanza in haste then, Subaru bent his lips in displeasure and turned around.

With Subaru's line of sight falling upon him, the lizardman—Hiain, saying "Wh-What is it…" as he stiffened his face, looked at the two beside him in turns as if asking for help,

Hiain: "Why do ya hafta look at me with those kinda eyes?! Even tho' I just said somethin' obvious! Am I wrong?!"

???: "It seems that it's more about the way you said it, and your timing in saying it was terrible. Though, it isn't something that I'd say, even if the timing was appropriate."

???: "He's a better person than ya… Have some consideration, lizard bastard…"

Hiain: "Huhaa?!"

Betrayed by the two people on his flanks—by Idra and Weitz, Hiain's eyes darted about in bewilderment.

Due to Hiain's reaction, Idra produced a wry smile and Weitz gave a snort of his nose. At the figures of those three lining up, Subaru remembered his deep emotions.

In response to Subaru gazing at them like that, Idra frowned and,

Idra: "Schwartz, that somewhat meaningful look in your eyes is unsettling…"

Subaru: "It's nothing. It's just, I was thinking about how far I've come."

Idra: "—?"

As Subaru rubbed his finger under his nose, Idra cocked his head in puzzlement. Regardless of Idra's reaction, right next to him, Weitz crossed his burly arms with a mutter of "I get it…".

While distorting frightening tattoos on his body, Weitz glared at the other side of the drawbridge, and,

Weitz: “We chased away the messengers from the Imperial Capital… With this, we don’t have a path of retreat. Ain’t that so…?”

Subaru: “—. You’re a little bit off-the-mark, but that’s also true.”

Weitz: “A lil’ bit off-the-mark…?!”

His appearance of looking like he understood the most out of everyone crumbled, and Weitz’s eyes widened in surprise. Producing a sarcastic smile to that reaction, Subaru reflected on how the deep emotions he harbored differed from the impression those three had given off with pride.

Those three—rather, no one knew anything at all, but that was completely fine.

And Subaru, he would remember every single thing.

And then—

???: “—Apparently, their verdict has been passed.”

Turning around due to that weighty and imposing voice, he saw a personage who had been awaiting the emissaries in the vicinity of the drawbridge.

The horse-drawn carriage that the emissaries were riding on had turned back, and having made sure it finished its crossing over to the other shore, he stared seriously at Subaru, with a terrifying expression like that of a demon.

As the giant of a man wielding an intimidating aura slowly approached them, and while having the light impression that Hiain and the others behind him were getting overwhelmed, Subaru shrugged his shoulders, and spoke,

Subaru: “With this, do you believe me?”

???: “No objections. The imperial command bestowed upon me, as the official, by His Excellency the Emperor, the time has come for it to be fulfilled. That is to say—”

Subaru: “That is to say?”

???: “All the gladiators of the Gladiator Island Ginunhive, they are to be placed under your command. —Your Highness, Schwartz.”

While declaring so, interlocking the hands and fists of his four arms in front of his chest, demonstrating his dignified stance was the Chief of the Gladiator Island, Gustav Morello.

The guards under Gustav, exchanged glances at his statement, and all took an identical stance in unison.

Weitz: “This ain’t pleasing…”

Discontent with the attitudes displayed by Gustav and his group, Weitz muttered.

Subaru looked back, and Weitz jerked his chin as he closed one eye,

Weitz: “I object to ya deciding by yerself that all the gladiators are to obey… Even if yer the Governor and Island Chief…”

Gustav: “Weitz Rogen, keep your opinions within your heart. However, there are things that take precedence over one’s personal intentions. I would be troubled if you forgot that, in my capacity, I have means to have you do as I say.”

Weitz: “Ya wanna fucking go…?”

Weitz gave a snort of his nose, and Gustav also harbored silent intentions within his eyes. With things as they were, it seemed that the two would come to fight each other, and before Subaru could intervene,

Idra: “Governor, please don’t act hastily, Weitz, you lowlife… You never use enough words. Seems to me you were asking for a misunderstanding because of that.”

Weitz: “I don’t mind fighting ‘cause of that in the slightest…”

Hiain: “Others are gonna mind, y’know! Ahh, damnit! Governor, we ain’t gonna do somethin’ as shameful as to obey your orders outta fear!”

As Idra held Weitz back, Hiain stepped forward in his place, and declared so devoid of any shame.

Hiain would not look Gustav in the eye were the situation to be unfavorable to him, but, not letting his lack of nerve show, boldly pointing at Subaru with his hand, he spoke,

Hiain: “Even without that strange threat of yers, we’re goin’ with Schwartz. Hey, ain’t that right, ya assholes! Y’ain’t afraid, are ya?!”

???: “—Don’t make me laugh, lizard bastard!”

???: “Who’s afraid? Who?!”

???: “Aight, aight, let’s go, Your Highness, our Imperial Prince!”

???: “Let’s wrest it away from yer nasty ol’ man, it’s the start of our Empire—!!”

Hiain’s oh-so-loud call was responded to by a crowd of voices.

Rising one after another from all around them—no, from all throughout the Island, were the voices of the gladiators who had all come together to welcome the emissaries.

Mixed along with the voices of the many men with their blood boiling, were the voices of Hiain’s comrades, Orson and his group, and the voice of Old Man Null, who most unusually was present outside the healing room.

Quite literally, the Gladiator Island Ginunhive had become one.

Subaru: “—Thank you.”

While hearing the cheers from his excited surroundings, Subaru clutched his chest and muttered.

To the comrades in the surroundings, then to himself, and above all else, to the one who had granted him this chance, he was grateful.

Then, Subaru slapped both of his cheeks with his hands, raised his face, its expression cheerful, and,

Subaru: “Well, we’re going now, but what are you going to do, Ceci?”

???: “—Hahaaa, guess you’re right about that.”

As Subaru, having tilted his head, asked a question, a silhouette twirled around as it descended. Having watched over the events as they unfolded from a vantage point up high, Cecilus made a light sound as he landed.

He did not have one side of his body scorched, and his manner was unchanged from the time it had been scorched. Gazing over Subaru as well as the large crowd of people surrounding him,

Cecilus: “…As one’d expect of you, you managed a totally unexpected result. No matter how I slice it, I didn’t expect you to get this far, truly, I must say bravo. However, I got just one question.”

Subaru: “Ehhh? What is it?”

Cecilus: “Kindly, carefully, and thoroughly going around back and forth to several places, your ability to win everybody over’s truly superb and praiseworthy. But indeed, that’s just it, y’know. —Aren’t you going to persuade me?”

His two hands concealed by his sleeves, Cecilus asked that of him with a face that showed curiosity from the bottom of his heart.

Unable to comprehend it, the smile Cecilus always had plastered on his face had disappeared. Seeing that expression, Subaru slightly widened his eyes, then gave a satisfied nod.

That was correct, Subaru had not attempted to persuade Cecilus.

Despite having persuaded Gustav, Hiain and Weitz and Idra, Orson and the others and Old Man Null, as well as Rex and Milzac, as well as Kashew and Moizo, as well as Deeroy and Creegkin, as well as Codroe and Phenmelle, and even that stubborn lone-wolf Jawsrough, he had ignored Cecilus.

The reason was—

Subaru: "—Ceci, I wanted to see you make that face."

Every single time up until now, the one Subaru had failed in connecting with at the crucial moments had been Cecilus.

He was not enough of a fool to cross a dangerous bridge for revenge, but the result of all his thinking that, for better or worse, this was the best way to have an effect on Cecilus.

And thus, when it came to pass in reality, Cecilus's eyes went wide upon hearing that, and only then did Subaru give him the announcement.

Subaru: "I'm gonna work you hard if you come with us now, so, are you coming?"

Cecilus: "Ha, hahaha, hahahahaha! Ahh-ha-ha-ha-ha!!"

Shrugging his shoulders, Subaru winked. Just after Cecilus heard that high-handed invitation, he opened his mouth wide, then delivered a round of explosive laughter while bending his back.

Flailing his legs around on the spot, Cecilus was having a hearty laugh. Having had a thorough burst of laughter, he wiped away the tears emerging from the corners of his eyes, and,

Cecilus: "You're kidding me! You're kidding me, you've got to be kidding me, from this very me! From this very Cecilus Segmunt, the Blue Lightning! From the leading actor of this world! From me, whom you ignored, you ask that?! To please come together with you?! That's, that's… completely preposterous, Basu!"

Subaru: "…So, what will you do?"

Cecilus: "I'll go with you, of course! I'd like to say something like "Though it's annoying to be taken along", but it's incredible how you've talked me down to think it's not annoying in the slightest! Ah, incredible! It's a pleasure!"

While clapping his hands with force, Cecilus got fully on-board, his actions aligned with Subaru's expectations. While relieved by the merit of that decisiveness, Subaru placed his hand on his chin.

In truth, this was something he had been thinking from the very start, but—

Subaru: "That way of calling me, Basu, it just doesn't sit right with me in the slightest, you know."

Cecilus: "Woah-ho, adverse winds! To rupture things like that just after I answered I'd come along with you, you're awfully poor at communicating, but then, do you have an alternative I should use to call you?"

Subaru: "Guess you're right, huh…"

As Cecilus pitched forward, Subaru thought for a bit.

He suddenly thought about how Cecilus's mouth would have grown accustomed to saying "Basu". Hitting upon an idea that was, unexpectedly, not so shabby, Subaru smiled with a wicked face, and,

Subaru: "—Boss."

Cecilus: "…"

Subaru: "From now on, call me Boss."

He did not intend to be pretentious, but surprisingly, going along with Cecilus's penchant for being a drama geek didn't feel so bad.

As Subaru responded in that manner, Cecilus sighed with a "Hoho",

Cecilus: "Boss, Boss, Boss Boss Boss… It's got quite a nice ring to it! Though I've got no clue whatsoever about its meaning, I don't dislike it, rather, I quite like it."

Subaru: “It means leader. Just right, isn’t it?”

Cecilus: “Yes, indeed, Boss! Then, shall we begin?!”

Cheerfully smiling, the words of the high-spirited Cecilus were met with Subaru nodding and letting out a “Yeah”.

Starting with Cecilus, Subaru then looked over at Hiain, Weitz, and Idra, the comrades of his Unit, as well as the other gladiators, after that making eye contact with Gustav and the guards who accompanied him.

As the result of his utmost grand experience, with the comrades who had become one—

Subaru: “—Let’s go, everyone! Let’s go give my shitty old man in the Imperial Capital a wallop to the cheek!!”

Everyone: “YEAHHHHHHH—!!”

At Subaru’s rousing shout, the people of the Gladiator Island returned that grand reply.

While basking in that intense spirit, so intense it seemed to make the entirety of the island floating on the lake quake, Subaru suddenly noticed Tanza’s gaze trained on him.

Subaru: “Don’t worry, Tanza.”

The one and only person who actually knew that Subaru was not the illegitimate child of the Emperor; giving her a reassuring nod, Subaru resolved himself to head from these western lands towards the Imperial Capital without resting.

As the son of Natsuki Kenichi, with the trust of his comrades, he would push forward.

Therefore, from now on, because he had been summoned to another world—

Subaru: “—This time, it’s our win.”

—As the strongest existence, Natsuki Subaru would trample upon the Vollachian Empire.

The Land of Wolves:
Death unto the Weak, No Mercy VI

1

“Miss Katya, do you have a minute?”

The moment she heard the girl’s voice, Katya thought to herself, “Oh no.” She may have thought that, but she couldn’t do anything about the voice coming from behind. It would look bad if she ran away in a hurry, but more than that was the fact that her body wasn’t capable of such a thing. Katya sat upon a wheelchair—a tool that enabled her to move around freely on her own, but it wasn’t simple to use. It was an impossible task in particular for her, who easily became overwhelmed. And while she was flustered…

“If it’s okay, let me come with you to your room. I don’t have anyone to talk to right now,” said the girl, and Katya—who had lost her chance to escape—was now caught up with the owner of the voice.

The one beside Katya was an individual with distinctive footsteps—no, it would be more accurate to say that an extra sound was mixed in. The reason was clear: she walked with a cane.

As the one with the cane came to stand in line with her, Katya deliberately averted her gaze. “…Go find someone more suitable,” she said.

“Everyone seems to be busy.”

“So you thought of me and assumed that I would be free? What a shame, I have things to do too.”

“Do you? What exactly do you have to do?” replied the girl without hesitation, as Katya was trying to get away by using appropriate words.

And when asked for an example, she was at a loss for words. She didn't have anything she should be doing; it had just been an excuse. No one actually expected her to do anything. She had never been given a role.

Suddenly, thinking how no one ever expected anything from her, a thought crossed her mind. "I…"

"Miss Katya?"

As Katya let out a small sigh, the other peered at her face. It was a girl with pale blue hair and a lovely face with round eyes. She may use a cane because of her bad leg, but unlike myself she's someone who can bear and raise children.

"…A letter."

"A letter?" repeated the girl. "Oh, could that be to your fiancé?"

"I… My fiancé… It's not that kind of relationship…"

Katya had once again fumbled over her words. The excuse that had come out of her mouth had failed to convince herself, let alone the one in front of her. After all, if she didn't have that kind of relationship, she wouldn't have been there in the first place. She was being held captive like this because it was known to all that she was that person's fiancé; there was no other reason for her to be deemed worthy of being taken into custody. Nonetheless, even though she knew it was foolish, she still considered it a comfort that at least she was, in fact, wanted.

"…Yes, I'm writing him a letter," responded Katya. "So I don't have time to talk to you."

"I understand," said the girl. "Let me give you a hand."

"Wha—"

"I'm sure we'll come up with more ideas together than if you were to ponder on it all by yourself. If you're already a good writer, then maybe writing something different for a change would be a good idea. Your fiancé might enjoy that."

Katya had clenched her hand into a fist and tried to divert the conversation, but her plan was spoiled by that girl.

Katya opened and closed her mouth several times because of how pushy she was, while the other tilted her head and said, “You seem to be very eager, so let’s go straight to your room. It’s this way, right?”

“You… Can’t you see that I don’t want to?”

“I’ve learned to pretend that I don’t see what is inconvenient to see. I’ve spent a long time around someone who acts all stubborn and stays unhinged.”

“…They lack basic human decency, don’t they?”

“Not all of their behaviors are respectable, but there are many I wish to imitate. Now that I’m no longer with them…it seems like a good time to do so.”

With this response, Katya pouted, and she had no choice but to give up. Moreover, she now had to write the letter that had been meant to be an excuse she made to escape. It seemed that her bad habit of strangling herself with her own words had now reached a climax.

“Miss Katya, I’m going in without your permission, alright?”

“Who do you…”

Cane in hand, the girl took a large step and turned to give her name. “I’m Rem.”

Her chest was somewhat puffed out, her back straight. Katya raised her eyebrows feeling that her words carried a strange weight.

In front of Katya, the girl, Rem, put a free hand upon her chest. And with that, continued, “For the time being, I’ll start by trusting that there are no doubts that that is who I am.”

2

Katya Aurélie was currently under house arrest in the mansion of the Imperial Prime Minister, Berstetz Fondalfon. Once again, this was a situation that made her wrack her brain to understand why. Katya Aurélie came from a non-outstanding, low-ranking noble family. With the next in line—her older brother—having passed away, she was the formal heir, with nothing more than the title of nobility to her name.

In the Vollachian way of thinking, which respects strength above all, Katya would be considered a piece of trash not even worthy of existence. Whereas in terms of self-awareness, it was a feeling of alienation that she had felt since her brother was alive—no, even from the moment of her birth.

Anyhow, it was no trivial matter that Katya, in these circumstances, was hidden away in the mansion of the imperial prime minister, a situation that not even a high-ranking count would easily be able to find themselves in.

But then… "We are hostages," Katya began, "and if we don't understand that, then we might get in trouble."

"I understand that," stated Rem.

"…And yet you've been walking about the premises quite freely."

"As long as we don't try and escape, they said we can do as we please."

Katya looked bitterly at Rem, who immediately betrayed her previous statement with her next words. Seeing the girl asserting her opinions so confidently made her feel uneasy, as though she was the one in the wrong for being anxious.

Objectively speaking, the one who understood best about their hostage situation was Katya. So why should I be the one feeling inferior when it comes to hostage-ness? she thought.

In the room she had been assigned, where every luxury had been arranged so she would feel that nothing was missing, Katya was forced to turn to the desk to take responsibility for her words. She had a quill and letter paper in hand, which Rem observed closely from nearby. Wanting neither the former nor the latter, Katya found herself incredibly annoyed.

“What do you normally write to your fiancé?” asked Rem.

“I hardly ever write letters,” Katya replied flatly.

“Oh, really? Why did you decide to write this time then?”

Rem intervened to help out, surprised that Katya was having a hard time deciding how to begin such a letter. In reality, Katya had rarely written letters herself. Even with a body like hers, she would sign a letter if necessary because of her status, but nothing more. To me, letters are something to be received. The sender had always been my brother Jamal, and these past two years… “I only ever receive them, so I thought I’d send one this time…”

“…That’s… I think that’s really nice.”

“…Tch, what do…” Katya was about to snap and ask what exactly she knew about such things, but she hesitated. The reason being Rem’s expression as she stared at her.

Even Katya, who scattered her hostility indiscriminately, was thrown off by the girl’s soft, downcast eyes. It wasn’t mockery or pity. On the contrary, it was an expression that made her more miserable than being mocked or pitied.

“…You were loved as a child, weren’t you?” Those feelings of envy burst past her lips, leaving Katya to once again regret speaking.

Rem, however, merely replied with a bitter smile, “I wonder about that.”

What a strange answer, thought Katya. “What do you mean ‘I wonder’?” she asked. “The way you said it makes it seem like you’re thinking of someone other than yourself.”

“I lack a sense of self, and it feels like someone else’s life. Since I’ve only been alive for a month, so…”

“Huh?” Her response having been unexpected, she looked Rem from head to toe. It’s nonsense that shouldn’t be taken seriously, but I really don’t understand the point of the joke.

“It’s a figure of speech. The truth is that I have no memories… Whether it’s about me, or the things around me, I remember nothing. I built my current self up from the ground up.”

“You have…no memories…?”

“So just as you said, I have no idea whether or not there were people who cared for me. However, I do think I’ve been lucky enough to meet some good people this past month,” she replied, and seemed to be counting on her fingers while thinking of the people who had met her empty self and that she was lucky to have met them because of that. If she really were lucky, however, she wouldn’t be here.

Her situation was not so different from Katya’s, being a sort of hostage. And if that was the case, then in keeping her there, Berstetz should be able to keep the people close to her in check as well.

“I can’t understand what you’re talking about. Are you saying it was by chance that the last encounter you had was bad?”

“I think there are many kinds of fate… And to me, I think the worst encounter was the very first one.”

The very first one… If what she’s saying is true, then does she mean her newly-born state with no memory? Unwittingly, Katya, who had become engrossed in Rem’s story, asked with her gaze what exactly that terrible encounter had been.

In response to her gaze, Rem replied, “Well…” and raised a finger to her lips. “When I came to, they were holding me in their arms and staring at me with tearful eyes. Helpless, lonely eyes, like those of a child.”

“…They weren’t rough with you or anything like that?”

“If anyone was rough, it was me. I smelled something I simply couldn’t…stand, so I strangled them…”

Katya was about to say “How violent,” but held back as she remembered her own outbursts. Out of frustration, she had thrown vases at her fiancé, or even scratched him a number of times. It wasn’t a particularly smooth way to build a relationship, but it was something she was known for. However…

“I shook them off once…but they caught up with me again and kept following me. And during that time, the stench persisted—it was suffocating.”

“Following you around… That must have been tough.”

“Yes, it was tough… I didn’t remember anything. I could only trust in my own senses, and because that person really did smell like a bad person…”

“…That man did?”

“Because someone like that was trying so hard to protect me…”

Rem’s eyes suddenly became downcast, those words making Katya’s breath catch in her throat without a sound. She had tricked Rem into revealing that the person in her story was a man merely because of the way she looked when talking about him. If they were courting her, of course it would be a man.

But for some reason her expression and situation did not feel like someone else’s problem to Katya. Rather, she understood what Rem was feeling.

Not being able to understand why this person was approaching her, and being treated this way and that, all causing doubts and dislikes to accumulate—but at the same time, being touched by that. It was as though their minds were being twisted to follow someone else’s will.

It’s awful, and painful, and annoying, it’s— “Disgusting, but you don’t want it to stop…”

“…Yes, that’s right.”

It had become so natural to live with that sense of suffocation that they could no longer imagine what it would be like without it. In fact, they had forgotten how they had breathed when that feeling of oppression wasn't there. Even though she knew it was the life of a pitiful doll-like woman, with nothing else to cling to.

"So you also have someone like that?"

"…"

Naturally, when you meddle in someone's affairs, they will equally meddle in your own. While Katya regretted having said unnecessary things, at the same time, she also thought this:

Rem, who truly knows that suffering, will probably understand her own.

"For me, my fiancé…is the man doing that to me. From the moment we first met, he was over-familiar. He approached me of his own accord, and then…"

"…"

"I don't understand why he chose me. As you can see, I'm disabled, and unable to perform my duties as a woman. I'm worthless. Even so, he whispers to me that it doesn't matter." I can't give anything that should be given. After nearly twenty years of suffering, I had finally accepted it, but then he showed up. That made me hopeful that maybe the last twenty years of suffering had been a mistake, and that this was to make up for it. But I also knew deep down that there was no way that could be the case…

"…You… You're not saying the usual comforting words."

"The usual comforting words?" Rem parroted.

"Looking at my body, and saying that's not true; that who I am on the inside is all that matters, and that he only cares about that…the underhanded words that only sound pretty on the surface."

"…I don't know you well enough to say anything like that. When someone is hurt and even if you long to comfort them, telling them something that doesn't come from the heart is wrong."

That's a noble way of thinking. It sounded astonishingly different from the superficial words used by cowards that Katya hated—words which would only make themselves feel good about them comforting someone.

"So what are you going to write to your fiancé?"

"…After what we just spoke about, you're still trying to make me write it?"

"You're right… Well, shall we do this then? I'll also write a letter. Just as you're doing—to the person with the horrible stench."

"…What's the point of that?"

It was offered as an exchange, but there was no actual reason for Katya to accept it.

At Katya's puzzled expression, Rem thought for a moment, then said, "There's no way for the letter to reach that person. But it would be a bit sad if no one read it, so it would be nice if you could."

"I understand even less. Why would I read a letter written to a person you hate? It's nonsense; I don't understand."

"I was hoping you, who are in a similar situation, would help me put my feelings into words," Rem admitted, sticking out her tongue a little, as Katya was trying to quickly respond to refuse the bargain.

Katya widened her eyes and was thus convinced that she had grown up being loved by those around her. There'd be no way she would know how to be spoiled by someone like this; she wouldn't be able to do something like this otherwise, she thought.

"So, what do you say?" Rem pressed. "Do we have a deal?"

Katya sighed as Rem repeated her question, wondering how she had interpreted her silence. I still have no idea exactly why she is being held captive, but I can't be bothered. "I wasn't sure what to write in the letter before, but I think I've thought of something: that there's a woman staying in the same place as me I don’t get along with.”

At least, that was Katya’s honest impression with regard to Rem.

Provisional Rem's Paranoia: Whether Oni or Snakes Live There

1

Abducted to the capital city Lupugana in the middle of the battle in the Walled City of Guaral, and placed under house arrest.

She understands that it's objectively the situation she had been placed in but…

"—I do not, truly feel that I harbor as much of a feeling of endangerment as that makes it sound like."

Cane in hand, Rem gave a sigh while walking through a hallway expansive in width.

In position, Rem was meant to be what you'd consider a prisoner of war and hostage, however she had no soldiers attached to her to watch over her while she walked through the mansion as she's doing. Of course, there are human guards posted around the premises here and there, but there were none keeping constant watch over Rem.

Should she call this carelessness? Or perhaps she should think of it as them looking down on her?

"…It is probably, neither."

If she had to say, this must be them aptly appraising Rem's judgement.

Rem is the one captive here, but she understands the meaning of her being used as a hostage. And of the fact that even if she was allowed freedom within the premises, she was not given the freedom to go outside.

If Rem considers her position, it is proof that she's being valued by the other party—The lord of this mansion, the one who has locked Rem up, the chancellor of the Empire, Berstetz Fondalfon.

—Berstetz, while holding the office of Chancellor, also led a rebellion against the empire.

From Rem’s point of view as someone who had been thrown about by the Empire’s civil war, she couldn’t really approve of Berstetz actions, but Rem herself didn’t hold a bad impression of Berstetz. Of course, it was hard to hold a positive impression, but the fact they exchanged words directly made her think so.

Berstetz had not rebelled out of selfishness, but had acted out of concern for the future of the empire.

If she had only heard that reason, because the problem would be on Abel’s side so she would be unable to defend him.

However, as far as Rem knew, the person known as Abel, is the reason for Berstetz rebelling, and he was not the kind of man to thoughtlessly leave that main cause alone.

“Abel-san has his own way of thinking… Even if I understand that, I wish he would have shared that with Berstetz.”

Perhaps, if she was told that if they had been able to talk things out, then this rebellion wouldn’t have taken place, then would that help things? Or not? That was something Rem failed to tell.

Could Rem say that the situation she was left in was a bit better even then?

Would Rem have been able to reach her current state of mind without the Empire’s civil war?

“—I’m-.”

Rem thought about herself, who has nothing outside of the memories of approximately this single month, and she pressed down on her chest.

What had driven Rem, who had woken up in a completely empty state, to her wit’s end, was the existence of Subaru, who knew Rem and had tried to hold on to her somehow.

While it was difficult to hold the same impression she had of him at the beginning, that of the owner of such an evil stench, it was undeniable that such a way of facing him had only come about because various circumstances had held her down.

While not the best way to put it, you could also say it was necessary for her to shelve her quarrel with him, so she cooperated with him, and while she kept that shelved, she lost the chance to unshelve it.

However the case—

“When that person comes back to Guaral, he will surely be very surprised.”

Guaral had been attacked by a swarm of flying dragons, and ended up in a half-destroyed state. There, a great number of their allies had been injured, and then Rem had been abducted.

What would he, Subaru, think of that?—That she was sure that he would not be able to help but think of it, was something that somehow made Rem uncomfortable.

It was likely precisely because of that—

“—I see you’ve got a long face, Wife-san.”

That the moment she opened the doors to the room she arrived upon, the inner side of her heart was read immediately by Flop, who was laying down in the center of a bed.

2

Hovering her hands above the resting flop’s wounds, as he lays on the bed, she performs healing magic on him.

On his bandaged body, even now painful looking claw marks still remain carved. His wounds now having closed quite a bit, it was fair to say now that he has escaped any danger to his life. But even then, frustration remained.

If she could draw out the former power of this healing magic more, she could have healed this heavy wound in but a moment. —This heavy wound of Flop's that he received by protecting her.

"However, if the Wife-san could have instantly healed my wounds, then Madelyn would lose any reason to abduct the Wife-san."

"Ah…"

"Perhaps, wouldn't she lose any reason to spare the city… Guaral? So, this is all in how you think about it, Wife-san. It was because your healing magic was crude that lives were saved. If you think about it like that, there's nothing wrong with being green right?"

When she was lowering the hands that were aloft his wound, it was once again that the insides of her heart were read.

Rem was surprised by that, so Flop closed one eye and tried to poke a bit of fun at her.

She thought herself pathetic at the fact he was being attentive to her while being injured. She felt a reliability from him and honest admiration for Flop's unchanging attitude even when he's in that state.

That Rem wasn't more depressed than was necessary in this condition, was undoubtedly thanks to the bright Flop being put in the same situation as her.

"That I cannot allow the injured Flop-san to exert himself is also a reason for why we can't create any opportunities to escape from here though…"

"Woah there, bit harsh there aren't you, Wife-san! But well, it's indeed a fact that I'm in a half-dead half-alive state where I'll die if I move around carelessly, so I really can't argue with you there. However, I believe it'd be difficult even if you didn't have me with you. Because this mansion, is her turf."

"…Madelyn-san's right?"

Flop, having laughed wryly, gently nodded to the name Rem whispered.

The flying dragon general Madelyn Eschart, she was the General first-class who had attacked the walled city with a swarm of flying dragons at her command, and the one responsible for abducting Rem and Flop into the capital. If she, who is one of the top power houses even in the empire, came at them, they would have their lives taken in the blink of an eye.

That it hasn't come to pass, was because of the ties between her and flop—

"Flop-san, what is Madelyn-san…"

"We have a shared acquaintance you see. That we just both hit it off so well because of that… would be quite inaccurate to say, but the fact remains that it is the one reason for her overlooking me. However, know that it might only be on the scope of overlooking. It's likely we'll be bitten should we try anything careless."

"In that case, it seems like it would be difficult to request our release."

"That would be tough, yes. Of course, I also wish for that. —For I am so worried about Husband-kun's jealousy should I keep the Wife-san with me for too long."

"—That might not be, quite as you put it."

"Is that really so?"

For a moment, she turned her eyes away from what Flop pointed out, and she became lost for words from the preceding question.

This was the aftershock of what she had been thinking by herself before arriving at Flop's room. What Flop had said was not wrong. She believes, he might be worried about her.

Though of course, she doesnt believe that it is because she is with Flop.

"I don't believe he's jealous. More that he's worried about me and Flop. But, Medium-san also qualifies for that.."

“Goodness, that is quite true indeed! I really have scarcely experienced being separated from Medium for this long, so I think it’s likely it’ll become a bit of a pickle. Well, my sister’s a bit of a special case who can always be cheery, but I may have taken being away from my sister a bit harder than I thought I would.”

His tone remains bright, but it’s unlikely his feelings for his far away little sister are a lie.

Just how much of flop’s usual attitude is his true self, and how much is a strong front construct he made to not have Rem be concerned? Rem can’t quite tell.

And precisely because she can’t tell, Rem scolded herself as she cannot allow herself to be too pampered by that.

“Let’s both do the best we can, even in this situation. In the meantime…”

“Meantime?”

“Flop-san, you rest, you must hurry your recovery if it’s even one day sooner.”

Negotiations or use of force, whichever of those they choose, he needs to get his body in perfect shape or else their options will narrow.

To increase the hands you can choose to play, it is first important to solidify your foundations.

Hearing such fighting spirit from Rem, Flop’s blue eyes widen. His puzzled, surprised face is so rare, Rem calls out to him with a “Flop-san?”

Hearing that, Flop shakes his head to the sides sluggishly.

“No, it’s just that, don’t get mad at what I’m about to say ok?”

“I will endeavor not to.”

“I want you to try your best. You see, the Wife-san’s words just now, felt like they had something to them that somewhat resembled Husband-kun. So I was just thinking how married couples do resemble each other after all."

To those words the laughing Flop gave as an answer, Rem gave a small gasp.

—She tried so hard, but not getting angry was difficult.

3

"Oni girl, how is Flop?"

Once she finished her conversation with Flop, Rem returned to her room, and what welcomed her was a brusque voice.

On the other side of the room, was a window thrown open through which wind blew in, on that windowsill sat with bad manners a girl whose sky-blue hair was swaying. —Her hair which had two, very prominent black horns poking out of it.

"Hey you, did you listen to what The Dragon said?"

That sudden arrival with no greeting, and her appearance that held onto one's gaze had birthed a momentary silence, at said moment, she grew discontent, and her yellow eyes narrowed.

She thought she lacked patience, and that even if she narrowed her eyes to intimidate her, she could not diminish the cuteness of her outward appearance. But Rem did not dare express that out loud.

She is the personification of a powerful dragon hiding its strength—She is Madelyn Eschart.

"Even if say, she cannot hurt me due to being entangled by various conditions."

"Wassat?"

"No… Could you not come in by knocking the door instead of from the window??"

“Are the likes of you intending to limit what The Dragon can do?”

“Again, no. It’s just that this is the second floor.”

Perhaps to Madelyn there was not much difference between the first and second floors, but there are stairs for a reason, so she would like her to be understanding of that.

On the topic of being understanding—

“Would you please refrain from referring to me as Oni girl?”

“Why? Just as The Dragon, calls The Dragon, The Dragon, it is an obvious to call an Oni an Oni.”

“Even if you refer to me as an Oni, I don’t feel as such to me, so it makes me feel restless.”

Oni girl, is what Madelyn kept fully confidently referring to her as, which Rem was now fed up with.

It’s not that she wants to reject the fact she’s an Oni. But it is simply that she has no memory of such, and it registers to her referring to her previous self who was an Oni.

“Please call me Rem. You also call Flop-san his name do you not?”

“…Flop’s special. You should bear that in mind.”

“Then could you also have me—”

“—You.”

Be special as well, was what Rem wanted to continue with, but Madelyn’s serious intimidation pierced through her.

Instantly, Rem felt the sensation of her innards shrinking inwards, and couldn’t mouth any more words. Looking with eyes that had become slitted at Rem who had been silenced, Madelyn came down to the floor from the windowsill and said,

“You’re being allowed to be on that hag’s words, and because of Flop’s treatment. Do not misattribute The Dragon’s kindliness and clemency. When it comes to saving Flop, I have other means too.”

“…I will bear that, in mind.”

“Hmph.”

Scoffing, Madelyn’s slitted pupils returned to normal, and Rem was released from the pressure she was being put under.

If just a single word was out of place then literally, she would have incurred Madelyn’s wrath. Rem, now remembering once again that she was balancing on a tightrope, took several deep breaths.

After which, with her gaze silently fixed on Madelyn…

“Flop’s injuries are, currently, stable. While I believe it necessary that he rests for a while, he’s past the worst of it.”

“—. Are you retarded?”

“Eh?”

“If Flop is healed, then The Dragon will have no more business with you. And yet, you report stupidly honestly to The Dragon, do you not want to keep your life?”

Madelyn told that while looking straight at Rem, who had answered the question she was asked at the beginning, about Flop’s condition.

Rem said “No”, at Madelyn’s eyes which seemed to be looking at something hard to believe, and shook her head side to side.

“Of course, I want my life. I can not go dying.”

“…Then, why?”

“I could’ve lied, and put a stopgap on that for the moment…but establishing a relationship without lies with Madelyn, was something I believed to be the correct choice right now.”

“…”

Hearing Rem's answer, Madelyn goes wide eyed.

She was caught by neither anger nor displeasure, but the simple astonishment of being caught by surprise, Rem walked closer towards her, to the windowsill, and gazed at the view outside.

She could see the well-arranged garden, together with the heavy number of imperial guards deployed in it. At the far reaches, glances of the imperial capital here and there, and there was also a very beautiful and outstanding palace built out of crystal.

It was a world unknown to Rem, this imperial capital of Lupugana's sights—

"But, being in an unknown place where you know nothing is something that comes naturally to me. Which is why, I've decided to challenge it."

"Challenge…"

"Madelyn-san, though you have nothing that would bond you to me…even for just a moment, there may be something that could perhaps make you hesitate."

Rem doesn't think anything could get Madelyn to turn to her side. And she's not shrewd enough to warm herself up to anyone like Flop does either.

But, perhaps if it were just a single moment that's not even a second, Rem might be able to create that gap when it all comes crashing down. That, is what Rem considers her own little way of fighting.

Abducted to the imperial capital, and held captive—Rem had taken that into consideration as something that he would be worrying about. She can already picture him trying to push his limits. And that he likely wouldn't even lend his ears to her telling him, that she wishes he'd stop.

In that case, if she can't avoid him coming, then at least she will remove the pebbles from the road.

That was Rem's captive way of fighting.

"…The Dragon doesn't understand what it is you're thinking. But."

"…"

"The Dragon pays no mind to the petty ways in which weak humans resist. If you keep to what The Dragon tells you here, then do whatever you want after."

Depending on things, that previous anger was at risk of flaring up again in that exchange. However, Madelyn overlooked Rem's resistance, and didn't attempt to challenge it.

Unlike with Berstetz, she was looking down on her clear as day.

However, it was precisely because she was thought of as harmless, that there should be something that only Rem can do.

"By the way, there was another outsider in the mansion other than me and Flop. Do you know who that is, Madelyn-san?"

"Only heard that she's someone the hag guest…Spirit eater brought along."

"Spirit eater…"

Rem realized she meant the Empire's general first class that had attacked the walled city once before, Arakiya.

The one Rem talked about was a woman strolling around in a chair with wheels on it that she saw around the Residence—is it likely, that she who was thought to be under a similar position as Rem and Flop, was also under house arrest?

If she hears her out, she may gain a reason to progress on the situation, and to go against her feelings of impatience.

"…To depend on something other than power, what a strange Oni girl you are."

So whispered Madelyn with her golden eyes narrowed side-eying

Rem who was silently deep in thought.

Not paying any mind to the evaluation from the dragonkin, within this residence that could be called a dragon’s den, Rem continued to grope for a means to rebel against the situation she’s in, with seemingly the diligence of a certain someone, somewhere.

The Dragon Kingdom:
Missing Child Search Chronicle VI
(LQ AI Translation)

1

—The plan to infiltrate the Vollachian Empire illegally had at last entered its final stage.

Emilia: “So then, since Petra-chan wrapped up the talks with Diadora, and Otto-kun properly said “I’m sorry” and apologized, they’ll introduce us to a method for illegal entry.”

Beatrice: “…While Betty wasn’t aware, things became awfully complicated, in fact.”

Emilia: “Mm, that’s true—sorry. I really wanted to consult Beatrice too, but…”

Saying that, Emilia gently stroked Beatrice’s hair as she dozed on the bed.

Beatrice accepted the feel of Emilia’s palm—part of it was that she had opened her heart to her, but more than that, she seemed listless about doing anything, and watching that was very painful.

Until she could have her reunion with Subaru, who had been flung away, Beatrice had been spending her time with an “energy saving” mindset, sleeping for most of the day.

It was because they could only choose this time while Beatrice was awake that the matter of the scuffle in the Commercial City of Picoutatte had ended up being reported after the fact.

—“Scuffle”—that was how Emilia chose to describe the events of this city.

Emilia: “It was a scuffle Otto-kun hadn’t been able to resolve for years, so I think it being resolved was reaaally good. It’s the second good thing about this time.”

Beatrice: “If Otto’s homecoming is the second, what was the first, I suppose?”

Emilia: “That I could confirm my knight is cherished by all sorts of people.”

As for the search for the vanished Subaru and Rem, Emilia and the others were aiming for illegal entry as their method, while from Kararagi in the west, Anastasia and company were trying a different approach.

The hole created by Emilia’s camp being absent from the Kingdom would be filled by their supporters, beginning with Annerose and Clind, and no one tried to stop Emilia.

Of course, they offered cautions and advice, but no one opposed that they had to bring Subaru back. That made Emilia happy.

Emilia: “Everyone knew properly that Subaru is always working hard.”

Beatrice: “Subaru is a hard worker, in fact. The bad part about Subaru is that he doesn’t quite look the part, I suppose. …And so, Betty understands Emilia’s feelings, in fact.”

Emilia: “Hehe, right?”

With Beatrice understanding, Emilia felt warm and fuzzy.

Even if she tried hard at looking for good things, there were only about that many which could distract from the worry over Subaru and the others being gone—so they had to work hard.

Surely, Subaru was also doing his best so he could return to Emilia and the rest.

Emilia: “When we go to get him, Subaru might cry from being surprised.”

Beatrice: “In that case, making him cry soon would be better, I suppose.”

Emilia: “Yeah, that’s right. Very soon, our preparations to slip into the Empire will be in order…”

Just as they were saying that, the sound of someone knocking on the door echoed through the bedroom. When Emilia turned around, from beyond the door came Frederica’s voice—“Emilia-sama”—and then,

Frederica: “Would now be all right? There are a few things about what comes next that I would like to discuss.”

Emilia: “Yes, it’s fine. Beatrice is awake right now too, so I think it’s just right.”

Frederica: “Beatrice-sama as well. It seems the timing was good.”

Hearing Emilia’s reply, Frederica slowly stepped into the bedroom. Seeing her figure, Emilia softly widened her eyes with an “Ah.”

It was because Frederica—whom they usually only saw in her maid uniform—had changed, on this occasion, into a different getup—something like men’s clothing that did not sacrifice neatness.

At Emilia’s surprise, Frederica faintly smiled and said,

Frederica: “Since we must conceal our identities in the Empire, Petra selected an outfit that would change the usual impression. I hope it does not look strange.”

Emilia: “Not strange at all. It looks reaaally good on you. Right, Beatrice?”

Beatrice: “…If Petra chose it, there’s no mistake, in fact. To Betty’s eyes as well, it doesn’t look bad, I suppose.”

Frederica: “Th-Thank you very much.”

Praised, Frederica brought a hand to her cheek and blushed faintly.

However, she soon cleared her throat with an “Ahem” and switched gears, Frederica: “Enough about myself. I must ask both Emilia-sama and Beatrice-sama as well to act so that your positions will not be known in the Empire. I trust you understand.”

Emilia: “Of course. We’re going to be entering illegally. If my identity is exposed, that would be a big problem, right?”

Frederica: “Yes. There is a high possibility it would develop into a diplomatic issue… To put it plainly, if your identity were revealed, Emilia-sama, it could even lead to war.”

Emilia: “That’s a heavy responsibility. But it’s okay. I’ll do my best, and… ugh.”

Frederica: “Emilia-sama? What is the matter?”

Frederica worried over Emilia, who had grimaced and trailed off. To that concern, Emilia shook her head with a “No,” and said,

Emilia: “I’m fine. It’s just, hiding who I am means telling a lie, right? When I think about that, my tummy suddenly starts aching…”

Beatrice: “If this is how you are just from thinking about telling a lie, without even telling one, the road ahead is worrisome, in fact.”

Frederica: “Indeed. Emilia-sama must swallow this expedient.”

Emilia: “I-It’ll be fine—I promise. This is a necessary lie. I’m sure Puck won’t get angry and will forgive me.”

It was Puck who had taught Emilia that lying was bad, to be honest.

Granted, in Puck’s case, it seemed to have been advice based on his thinking that Emilia was ill-suited to lying, and from Emilia’s own thinking as well, lying was something bad.

Even so, as she herself had said, this time it was a necessary lie for Subaru and the others.

Emilia: “So bring it on. I’ll tell any lie—about ten of them!”

Frederica: “I appreciate your enthusiasm, but ten will not be necessary. In the Empire, you shall go by the name “Emily.” And as for Emily’s position, she is the bodyguard to a young lady traveling to the Empire incognito—yes, please remember that.”

Emilia: “Ah, Emily! Leave it to me. I’m used to that lie.”

Puffing out her chest, Emilia answered brimming with confidence, together with a great sense of relief.

“Emily” was the first alias Emilia had ever claimed in her life; she remembered that she had given that name when she first met Frederica.

When she had left her home forest, Emilia had spent a few days as Emily.

Emilia: “So I’m used to it. And, about this “bodyguard” thing…”

Frederica: “Your purpose is to protect Petra-ojōsama, and her sister, Beatrice-sama.”

Beatrice: “…I see, so that’s how it is, I suppose.”

Emilia: “Eh, how is it?”

From Frederica’s explanation, Beatrice immediately looked like she understood, and Emilia tilted her head at that.

Beatrice: “You do not need to overthink it, in fact. Emilia—and, while we are at it, Roswaal—cannot have their true identities exposed, I suppose. So Betty and the rest will altogether falsify our backgrounds. Then, to the question of who sits at the center of Betty and company for the lie we tell, the answer is…”

Frederica: “The two of Petra and Beatrice-sama, correct.”

Emilia: “Ah, I get it. We’ll say Petra-chan and Beatrice are close sisters, and we’ll lie that we’re their bodyguards, and slip quietly into the Empire.”

Having it explained simply, Emilia at last managed to catch up in understanding. At the same time, she was impressed at how well thought out the plan was.

Emilia: “Patrasche-chan is worried about Subaru too, and if we took her along, since she’s a reaaally beautiful ground dragon, people would take it the wrong way.”

Frederica: “Considering the long journey, we also cannot carelessly use a cheap dragon carriage. So that our affiliation will not be known, we have had a new one prepared through the help of the Suwen Company.”

Beatrice: “In that case, we should leave unhidden the part about this being the journey of an influential person, in fact. The strategy is to conceal only the identity of that influential person, and who the truly important one actually is, I suppose.”

Emilia: “Reaaally smart… Was it Roswaal who came up with this plan? Otto-kun?”

Frederica: “Let us say it is the crystallization of both of their craftiness.”

With a hand to her lips and an elegant smile, she looked like the usual Frederica. From that impression and her answer, Emilia felt reassured.

The two whom Emilia thought ranked first and second in wisdom within their camp were very good at thinking about such things, and if those two had cooperated, she could trust it.

Therefore—

Beatrice: “…If Otto thought it up together as well, then we need not worry about Roswaal putting in any mischief, I suppose. We can feel at ease, in fact.”

And Emilia agreed with Beatrice’s remark.

2

And then, before they knew it, preparations advanced in a short span of time, and the morning of departure arrived.

At the entrance of the Suwen Company, which had taken care of them for several days, there were two dragon carriages, inconspicuous yet sturdy, readied for this illegal entry and waiting with imposing air.

Each would be pulled by two ground dragons—Patrasche and Frufoo—reliable companions who would accompany Emilia and the others wherever their harsh journey led.

Otto: "Frufoo, for her part, is saying, "Please don't make an old lady go on a long trip," though."

Emilia: "Frufoo-chan is elderly?"

Otto: "She only says that. She's always had a tendency to be a bit lazy."

Saying so, Otto gave a wry smile as he stroked his beloved dragon's neck. Blessed with the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language, Otto could speak with any living creature, and he got along very well with his dear Frufoo—it was heartwarming to see.

Otto: "Emilia-sama, you also got along well with the Great Spirit with whom you're contracted, didn't you? I have yet to speak with him myself, but…"

Emilia: "Yes. I think we'll be able to meet him before long, but I'm sure Puck will get along with you too, Otto-kun. Puck's the kind of child who can get along with anyone."

Ram: "—Ram has some slight objections to that assessment."

Just then, Ram cut in like that while Emilia was talking with Otto.

Having finished her travel preparations, Ram—like Frederica the day before—was dressed for the road in a way that wouldn't be recognized as a maid. Since Otto and Garfiel were in their usual clothes, that felt fresh.

Emilia: "But I might have gotten used to seeing Ram not in a maid outfit, since we’ve been together like that for a while.”

Ram: “That may be so. Ram, in fact, has forgotten all the duties of a maid.”

Otto: “Isn’t that a matter entirely unrelated to your clothing?”

Ram: “Hmph!”

Snorting through her nose, Ram dismissed Otto’s words. Having his words tossed aside, Otto shrugged his shoulders, and Emilia gave a small laugh at the two’s back-and-forth.

Meanwhile, the others also started gathering one after another around the dragon carriages.

Petra: “Emilia-nee-sama, are you ready?”

Trotting over as she said that was Petra, clad in a fluffy outfit. Though it didn’t use as much fabric as a dress, it was a combination that seemed to mix cuteness, ease of movement, and elegance as hard as she could—showcasing her stylishness perfectly.

Emilia: “Yes, I’m just fine. Petra-chan, you look reaaally cute yourself. You give off the feeling of a young lady—it’s very lovely.”

Petra: “Ehehe, thank you very much. I have to properly look like Beatrice-chan’s older sister, and like your mistress, Sister and everyone else’s.”

Clenching both fists tight, Petra’s enthusiasm was most reassuring. Her desire to bring Subaru and the others home was strong, and Emilia was also encouraged by Petra’s attitude.

That delicate girl with the cherry-blossom-pink cheeks would, from here on, take the position of Emilia and the others’ mistress. Emilia felt a surge of determination that she must protect her properly.

Garfiel: “Gettin’ all fired up’s a good thing, Petra-ojōsama. Long as ya handle sittin’ there all calm-like nice ’n’ easy, the rest of us’ll guard ya proper.”

Ram: “Yes, do it properly. To begin with, if Garf hadn’t been slacking off in the Water Gate City, the situation at the tower should have been settled more easily.”

Garfiel: “Gao…”

Garfiel, rolling his shoulders, wilted at Ram’s words. But as Emilia saw it, Ram’s words meant that if Garfiel had been there, he would have been dependable, so there was no reason for him to be dejected.

And—

Emilia: “You’re coming with us this time. I’m counting on you, Garfiel. Together, let’s do our best to take Subaru and the others back. First, protect Petra-ojōsama properly.”

Garfiel: “O-Oh, r-right, Emilia-sama! ……Er, I mean, Emily!”

Falling into step with the downcast Garfiel, Emilia gave a firm nod with a “Yeah!” And among everyone gathering around the carriages, the last to arrive was a tall figure.

With his usual makeup removed and his long indigo hair tied back, the man shed his fluttery, fabric-heavy clothing and donned a butler’s suit like Clind—Roswaal.

Like Emilia, Roswaal, concealing his identity, bowed deeply and said,

Roswaal: “It seems we are already all present—how wonderful. Petra-ojōsama, are your preparations complete?”

Petra: “Garf-san loaded our luggage, and Otto-san’s family helped us get ready, so we’re fine. You make sure you’re proper on your end too, Dudley.”

Roswaal: “Yes, yes, most reassuring. Precisely so. —Now then.”

Called by his alias “Dudley” by Petra, who was already acting as the party’s mistress, Roswaal’s smile deepened, and his gaze—those mismatched eyes of his—turned to Emilia.

And just like that, everyone else's eyes gathered on Emilia as well.

Beatrice: "Emilia, before we depart… before you become Emily, give us a few words, I suppose."

So said Beatrice, explaining the reason for the attention, as Frederica held her in her arms beside the dragon carriage.

From here on, the group would enter the Empire as a party centered on Petra. But before they became that fabricated group, at this point the one in the center was Emilia.

It was none other than Emilia who had insisted that they would go to save Subaru and the others herself, without leaving it to anyone else.

Emilia: "Everyone, first of all, thank you for lending me your strength. You even listened to my selfishness, and prepared all this like this—I felt really, really blessed."

In a situation like this, with Subaru and Rem perhaps in danger right now, and her heart constantly worried and flustered, she didn't know if it was right to feel that way—but still.

Emilia: "Of course, Beatrice, who worries most about Subaru and Rem, and Ram as well; Otto-kun, who mustered the courage to return to his hometown; Petra-chan, who took on a difficult role; Garfiel and Frederica, who are lending their strength as usual; and also… he's keeping a calm face, but Roswaal, who worked so hard making the arrangements."

Everyone gathered there—and in particular, Roswaal, who had been named last—slightly raised an eyebrow.

Emilia could not even imagine how much the usually easygoing Roswaal had run around to get everything ready so that he and Emilia could go to the Empire. But within the scope she could imagine, she thought he had probably done the hardest thing—and so she was grateful.

Emilia: "My knight and Rem, a precious comrade I still haven't been able to speak to even once, were flung far, far away to the southern Empire, and I think I was the most flustered I've ever been in my life. If I had been alone, I'm sure I would have been so at a loss that my eyes would have been spinning. But because everyone blazed the trail, we have today."

Time and again, Emilia keenly felt that she could do nothing by herself. And yet she couldn't feel that as frustrating or pitiable—and she felt a little proud of herself for that.

It was thanks to Emilia's knight, who wasn't here, that she could feel that way.

Emilia: "So let's go to bring Subaru and the others home. If everyone's here, it'll surely be all right. From this time, I was able to feel that way."

To keep on facing troubles and problems like this, and to keep on living together with everyone from here on. As the big, big first step for that—

Emilia: "—Everyone, let's do our best at illegal entry!"

Beatrice: "That rallying cry sounds far too bad to onlookers, in fact!"

At Emilia's spirited call, Beatrice's high voice rang out like that.

And thus Emilia's camp set off on a journey to search for the missing knight and the young girl who was their comrade.

Even if their path was full of unease and nail-biting, as the great nation awaited them ahead, their feet would not halt.

—Beyond this, someone very, very important was waiting. There was not a single reason to hesitate.

Stand By Me Pleiades I

1

Natsuki Subaru had disappeared from the Pleiades Watchtower.

In short, that was what the letter sent to the mansion said.

Pausing for just a moment, Roswaal L. Mathers rested a finger on his pointed chin and closed his heterochromatic eyes.

"Your handwriting has certainly seen much improvement, Lady Emilia."

He read the letter and muttered a leisurely remark contrary to the dire circumstances it described.

The writer of the letter was Emilia, whom Roswaal was backing in the royal selection to make her the next ruler of the Kingdom of Lugunica.

When Roswaal met Emilia for the first time in the forest, she was living all alone with a spirit who was her only family, and she knew nothing of the manners and general knowledge of the outside world. It took a great deal of effort to bring her up to scratch; just teaching her how to read and write, along with the bare minimum of education, took a considerable amount of time.

However, Emilia was honest and driven, so she continued to grow in many ways.

Of course, she had a lot of room for improvement—but he was happy to see her growth as her teacher. If it wasn't for the royal selection coming up in the near future, it would've been entertaining to further explore her full potential.

In any case…

"It seems like now is not the time to be taaalking about such leisurely things," Roswaal muttered, pinching the edge of the letter with a sigh.

Currently, Emilia was traveling with companions to the Augria Sand Dunes east of the Kingdom in order to reach the Pleiades Watchtower where the Sage lived.

Shaula, the Sage who lived in the Watchtower, was rumored to have knowledge of the entire land, but crossing the sand dunes was difficult—to the point where even the Sword Saint had failed to find a passage through the desert.

If Natsuki Subaru wasn't there, Roswaal would never have approved the journey.

Natsuki Subaru was Roswaal's trump card.

He wasn't the person that Roswaal could trust the most. Subaru would reject that line of thought, and it wasn't true to begin with.

Subaru was someone who Roswaal could trust the most when it came to his 'objective.'

For Roswaal's ultimate goal, Emilia becoming ruler was a necessity. And Natsuki Subaru's existence would turn that 'necessity' into an absolute.

Because of that firm belief, Roswaal had allowed Emilia to journey to the Augria Sand Dunes. As long as Subaru was there, Emilia's safety—and the safety of her companions—was assured. And in fact, the letter had stated that all of her other companions were safe—but the issue mentioned at the beginning still existed.

"Lady Emilia has been separated from Subaru. This should be considered an unforeseen situation."

Roswaal knew that Natsuki Subaru's Authority could bring forth the best-case outcome.

With that in mind, the current situation indicated that they might come across a problem. And a roadblock to Roswaal's goal.

This must be corrected—no matter the price.

His way forward decided, Roswaal squinted for a moment and opened the window of his office. His tall, lithe figure swiftly leapt out of the window, letting his cape flutter about him as he landed in the mansion's front garden.

The office was on the top floor of the building, but the drop posed no risk to the softly landing figure. However, there were others who weren't pleased with this type of behavior.

"Master! What are you doing? It is ill-mannered to jump out of a window like that…"

"Frederica."

The maid who had spotted Roswaal jumping down and ran over was Frederica.

Her long blonde hair fluttered as her emerald-green eyes flashed with anger.

"What?" she replied in displeasure to her name being called. "I'm not listening to any excuses. If Petra had spotted you, then you'd be getting even more of an earful than from me, so you have to…"

"A carrier bird from Lady Emilia arrived—it's an emergency. Begin preparations."

Frederica stopped and inhaled sharply at Roswaal's words. But she was an ideal maid nevertheless, so she immediately corrected her posture. "Understood. What are you going to do, Master?"

"Currently, I need someone who can move faaast… I will be requiring Clind's assistance. So I'm heading to Annerose's place. I'll return in three hours."

"…Understood. I will let Petra know."

For a moment, Frederica looked displeased upon hearing Clind's name, but her personal feelings weren't important right now.

Frederica and Clind are both competent individuals, and I want them to work together well if possible—but they have a complicated relationship, and they aren't compatible.

But as far as Roswaal knew, they had been close when she was little.

"The situation is as seen here. If it's true, then there is much that must be done. Think carefully and prepare accordingly," Roswaal ordered before handing Emilia's letter to Frederica and turning his back to her.

Frederica was capable enough to know what to do once she read the letter. Roswaal just had to lay down the foundations of his plan without cutting corners.

"I'll be going then… We'll meet up later," said Roswaal before lightly kicking off the ground and flying up into the air.

It was flying magic: a combination of wind, earth, and yang magic mixed together into a practical form, yet fairly difficult to replicate—it could reach speeds similar to a migratory bird and was faster than using an earth dragon.

I was asked not to use it outside of emergencies by an old friend and the royal palace, but…

"…This is definitely an emergency now," Roswaal said in an unexpectedly serious tone as he cut through the blue sky.

And so, left behind in the mansion's front garden…

"Sister Frederica, was that the master flying off just now?"

Amidst the swaying grass caught up in the downwash, a small girl in a maid's dress—Petra—came scuttering into the garden.

At Petra's query, Frederica, who was bowing, took the letter from her master, straightened her posture, and replied, "Yes," before continuing. "It was an emergency, so he is heading towards Lady Annerose's mansion. He said that he requires Clind's help."

"Clind? That's so sudden… Ah, that means…" Frowning, Petra was questioning Roswaal's actions when her doe-eyes suddenly went wide upon seeing the letter in Frederica's hand.

Smiling awkwardly at Petra's quick observation, Frederica opened the letter.

"A letter from Lady Emilia. It arrived by carrier bird a moment ago."

"I knew it! I had a feeling something was approaching from the sky, so…"

"You felt something approaching from the sky…?"

Petra clapped her hands with joy, but Frederica was more surprised at her statement.

Carrier birds were a method to send letters over a long distance, and the birds required special raising and training methods. In order to make sure that a letter would be received by the correct person—and that the letter could not be intercepted or lost in flight—it was standard practice to conceal their presence and profiles with magic seals.

It was a method first suggested by Roswaal's grandmother, who was the head of the house two generations ago, and became a standard method of communication in the kingdom after it was established over thirty years ago.

Of course, due to the cost of raising the birds, the survival rate of carving the magic seals, as well as other reasons, it wasn't widely available to the common person yet. But that wasn't where the problem lied.

The important part was that it was a form of communication used by those who held important positions in the kingdom—such as Roswaal—so letters sent to him should not be so easy to track.

But Petra was able to instinctively sense the carrier bird's arrival.

"I know that she has been learning magic under the master this past year, but even so…”

Frederica was aware that Petra was a fast learner, even with her work. But despite that, it appeared that she had underestimated Petra’s potential.

One could say she possessed a talent that heaven only granted to a select few.

“Sister Frederica? What did Lady Emilia say?”

“…Ah, right. The master was quite serious about this.”

“The master, serious…?”

Frederica could find no words to placate Petra’s doubt. Unfortunately, the suspicion towards Roswaal in Petra’s mind was difficult to erase.

Frederica thought that only natural, and Roswaal seemed fine with it.

But regardless, Roswaal had hurried off towards Clind, leaving Frederica in charge of preparations, so there was no doubt of the situation’s seriousness.

Readying herself, Frederica turned her eyes towards the letter…

“So? Are Subaru and Sister Emilia okay?” Petra asked, trying to sneak a look at Frederica’s face as she went silent.

The last letter they had received from Emilia was right before they had entered the Augria Sand Dunes. It had stated that they were going to enter the desert from the town closest to it.

Petra’s curiosity at any letter describing the things that had happened after that was natural.

However…

“…How do I explain this to Petra?”

Frederica was well aware of Petra's feelings for Subaru. Knowing that the letter was the cause of Roswaal's urgency was enough to make Frederica find herself at a loss for words.

2

While Frederica was struggling to explain the contents of the letter to Petra, Roswaal, who had just arrived at his destination, was received with cold eyes and forced to provide his reasons.

"As always, your visits are so sudden, Uncle."

"I am well aware of my ruuudeness. But it is an emergency. Please forgive me."

"It'd be more troubling for you to arrive on my balcony if it wasn't an emergency."

She sighed as Roswaal landed on the balcony outside the study and leaned against the handrail.

However, to have such a reaction to someone suddenly flying in was proof enough of the owner of the mansion's upbringing and mental fortitude—a girl only nine years of age.

In response to Roswaal's unspoken admiration, the girl raised an eyebrow at him. "I'm not nine years old; I'm ten years old now. Don't get that wrong."

"Oh? I didn't saaaay anything."

"Your eyes gave it away. Could you please be more proper? People accept your appearance and your attitude because they believe that at least your mind is normal."

"Oh my, quite harsh coming from you."

Roswaal smiled wryly at the banter of Annerose Miload, the small girl shrugging her thin shoulders. It was pleasing to see such growth from her. He knew of no other girl at her age that could act so noble.

And as if to prove such an impression, Annerose continued. "So what is it? It was urgent enough for you to fly here. Do you need something from me…? Or is it from Clind? Or perhaps from both of us?"

"Veeery perceptive. Am I so easy to read?"

"Yes, you are. You always choose the most expedient method, Uncle. You're always afraid of roundabout ways or indirect methods failing."

"That's quite harsh to saaaay…Indeed, I require the assistance of you and Clind."

It was miserable to be at the receiving end…but Roswaal figured that not talking back would be the best way to keep the damage to a minimum. In the first place, he couldn't see an outcome where he was going to win an argument against Annerose.

Due to the circumstances of her birth and her parents, Annerose was Roswaal's Achilles' heel. His weakness was that he had a lot more weaknesses than the others believed him to have.

And so, ignoring Roswaal's self-evaluation, Annerose closed her eyes. "Clind, come here. You're here already, aren't you?"

"…Yes, it is as you say. Well-noticed."

A voice responded to her call, and then the door to the study opened slowly. The man who appeared quietly had a thin face with a monocle and gave a sharp impression.

This man, with his neatly-worn butler uniform was Clind, chief steward of House Miload. And the person Roswaal was seeking out, along with Annerose.

"You were eavesdropping, weren't you?" she asked. "Then you don't need me to fill you in on the situation at hand."

"Forgive my rudeness. I apologize."

"You did it because you knew that it was Uncle, right? I won't scold you for that… Uncle.” Kindly forgiving the servant who was bowing to her, Annerose called to Roswaal, beckoning with her hand at the balcony where he stood. “How long do you intend to stand outside? Hurry and state your business. Despite appearances, I do not have time to idly stand around and chat with you.”

“I thought it prudent to wait for the owner’s permission.” Smiling, Roswaal entered the study under Annerose’s sharp glare. And so, without the need for long-winded explanations, he entered into the heart of the matter.

And that was…

“A letter from Emilia arrived. Apparently, due to things concerning Subaru, it is necessary to travel towaaaards the Empire. I wish for your help in dealing with my family’s issue.”

“…Emily…and Natsuki Subaru,” Annerose muttered thoughtfully, frowning.

For the upcoming royal selection, Annerose’s House Miload was a crucial supporter for Emilia. Due to their close relationship with House Mathers, she had been informed of Emilia’s journey.

And of course, she had probably guessed that the current problem was related to the Pleiades Watchtower.

She called Emilia by a pet name and had complicated feelings about Emilia’s knight Subaru, but Annerose had the ability to know what to prioritize and make the correct decisions.

Meaning…

“…While you are out, you want us to manage House Mathers, correct?”

“Yes, that is what I wish. I don’t have other people I can rely oooon.”

“You can stop with the pleasantries… Are you going to leave someone behind?”

“I was thinking…either Ram or Frederica. It’s actuaaaally quite complicated. The issue appears to not only be with Subaru but also with Rem.”

Shaking his head, Roswaal thought back to the contents of the letter.

It had only been touched on briefly, but the letter also mentioned that Subaru wasn’t the only one who had been separated. Rem had been as well.

The reason why Ram accompanied them on their journey was to find a way to get her sister, Rem, out of her coma. Though to Roswaal, that was only a minor issue compared to Subaru’s disappearance.

Having fallen victim to Gluttony, Rem had disappeared from everyone’s memory, Roswaal’s included. However, Rem’s place in Roswaal’s current plans was unknown. At worst, she could disappear and there wouldn’t be a problem, but that line of thinking was unnatural.

As long as she was a part of the mansion with Ram, she must’ve had some sort of role.

…As to what that was, Roswaal had a guess.

And if Ram found out, she would never forgive him.

“I understand, Uncle. For now, I will take care of your house. Please ensure that Frederica prepares for Clind to…” Annerose tried to continue the conversation while Roswaal was trapped in thought. And so as her words drifted off, she looked up at Clind with her almond-shaped eyes.

Taking in the gaze of his mistress, he bowed respectfully and spoke up. “If I may speak? Question. What would you have me do, my Lord?”

“…There’s another problem regarding Subaru,” replied Roswaal. “We cannot allow Beatrice to be separated from him for a long period of time. Our time is limited.”

“Mr. Subaru and Ms. Beatrice’s spirit contract. Time limitations and restrictions.”

Roswaal nodded bitterly at the quick understanding of both the mistress and the butler.

Subaru and Beatrice were Contractor and Spirit, but the two were codependent and covering for each other’s shortcomings.

Subaru had lost his gate, and with it, the ability to release mana built up in the body. Beatrice’s shortcoming was that she could only support herself with mana from her contractor. It was a mutually beneficial relationship, allowing the excess mana (with nowhere else to go) to support the existence of the spirit.

The two of them would argue against it being a relationship built on self-interest, but as long as the result was the same, there was no need for debate… The problem was that such an ideal agreement could be easily destroyed.

If Subaru and Beatrice were to become separated, they could both easily fall together.

“If this goes on for too long, Subaru will die from mana buildup,” Roswaal explained. “And without any other means to replenish her mana, Beatrice will disappear as well.”

“And that would be terrible for you, my Lord, and for me. Complete loss.”

“Right. I can’t afford to lose a card as valuable as Subaru.”

“I apologize, I was referring to Ms. Beatrice. Apologies.”

Roswaal put on a sour face at Clind’s hollow apology.

Putting a stop to the two of them, Annerose spoke up. “Anyway, I understand your situation, Uncle. And so, what do you want to do?”

“As I mentioned before, I believe I’ll be heading to the Empire. The situation is quite delicate, so I will need to travel to many places. And for that, I would like to use Clind’s power.”

"…That's only possible within the kingdom," replied Annerose.

Nodding at Annerose, who had lowered her tone of voice, Roswaal turned towards Clind for confirmation. "Of course, I am aware. Can I ask you this favor, Clind?"

In response, Clind rested his hand on his chest. "If Your Lordship wishes, and if Lady Annerose agrees. No problem. However…"

"You require compensation, correct? Yes, I'm well aware of that, too," Roswaal replied, showing minor displeasure at Clind's pretentious response.

It couldn't be helped, but paying compensation came with an immense pain that made you feel as if a part of your body was being cut off. And if asked, Clind would mostly likely respond that if it didn't, then there'd be no point.

"Three…no, four magics is what I'll provide in compensation. And so I wish to use your Authority."

"Four, oh my, quite a bold decision. How daring."

"To be frugal and fail is the biggest mistake one can make." Closing one eye, Roswaal stared at Clind with his yellow eye.

There was little time. Not only for this issue in front of him, but for all the choices that would determine the outcome of his desire. Roswaal had no room for failure from now onwards.

He would not have the luxury of waiting for the next chance.

"First things first: I need you to go meet with Lady Emilia's group. Be sure not to let them find out about your Authority or the compensation."

"Understood. Lady Annerose, shall I? Confirmation."

"…If that's what Uncle has decided, then I have no objections. This is for Emily's sake as well."

Annerose closed her eyes and nodded in confirmation at the decision that would normally be too much for one her age. Accepting that, Clind bent over deeply at the waist… At the next moment, he disappeared from the room.

He quite literally disappeared. He wasn't hiding, nor did he become invisible.

Most likely, he had arrived at the town closest to the Augria Sand Dunes, Mirula.

"If he wanted to, he could probably reach the Pleiades Watchtower," Roswaal posited.

"He said so himself that he couldn't," responded Annerose. "Something about the tower being hard to reach…but I'm not sure why that is."

"I can't imagine him lying to you, so it must be true."

Talking about Clind, who had just disappeared, Roswaal let out a long sigh. Noticing his behavior, Annerose pursed her lips and called out to him considerately. "Uncle, are you sure about this?"

"…I thought you weren't going to object to my decisions."

"I'm not objecting. I'm just confirming. To you, magic is a very important thing. A very, very important thing."

"…True. And that's why."

With Annerose's large eyes gazing at him, Roswaal gave a small wry smile. Clutching his chest, he bore the pain of being sliced up… He had a goal to fulfill. A person he wanted to see. For that, he would sacrifice anything.

Even if it was the blessing he had received from that very person.

"Uncle, please don't get too lost in your thoughts."

"It's the opposite, Annerose… I have no reason not to be lost in my thoughts."

Roswaal shook his head at the younger girl's sympathy.

He knew she meant well by warning him, but he could never heed it. That was the path that Roswaal L. Mathers—no, that Roswaal Mathers had chosen.

3

In an instant, the world changed completely, and they found themselves standing in front of the mansion.

They had traveled hundreds of kilometers in a heartbeat. In terms of time, it would've been more than a week's worth of travel. But how was one supposed to react to crossing such a distance in the blink of an eye?

For starters, Otto Suwen pinched his cheeks to confirm that he wasn't dreaming.

Upon feeling the pain, he sighed with the confirmation that this was indeed reality.

"Well, this much doesn't really surprise me anymore…" Otto muttered.

"You're much bolder now, Otto-bro," replied Garfiel. "Or were ya always that way?"

"Ha-Ha-ha. I don't remember what I was like a year ago, so let's say it's both."

Hearing Garfiel's guffaw in response—even though he had experienced the same thing—made Otto start to think that worrying was pointless. Though even if he were to let go of his immediate worries, it wouldn't necessarily release him from them. And that was due to Otto's current position.

"Anyway, now that we've established that the strange occurrence was a strange occurrence, could we now hear the details?"

"I'm terribly sorry, but it's forbidden to speak of," answered the chief steward. "All I can say is that it's not easy to do and that it's not dangerous. Rest assured."

Otto nodded reluctantly at Clind's words. "I see…"

He knew that Clind was an ally, but he still was a mysterious character. He was apparently an old friend of Roswaal, as well as the person who taught Frederica her skills as a servant. He had also taught Subaru how to use a whip and was a key figure in Petra's education.

In other words, he was a key support character for the entire Emilia Camp.

"I didn't expect ta jump from Priestella to the mansion in one go," commented Garfiel. "Is this the Door Crossing that Beatrice used before?"

"No, it is fundamentally different from the Yin Magic that Ms. Beatrice uses," explained Clind. "Very different. Please refrain from asking about the details. Forgive me."

"You don't sound like you're trying to hide it though…" muttered Otto.

"My apologies."

Otto gave up trying to get an answer, seeing as he was clearly not budging as always.

What's important isn't the teleportation…there's no other way of naming that phenomenon…but the reason why Clind brought us back to Roswaal Manor using such drastic means, thought Otto. "Mr. Natsuki and Ms. Rem were flung to the Vollachian Empire, huh?"

Garfiel answered with silence as his gaze hardened. The light-hearted atmosphere from moments ago vanished, and in its place stood a tiger ready to pounce. "I knew I shoulda stuck by 'em."

"It was a group decision. People were needed for the restoration of Priestella. And your power was needed to find the Witch's Remains."

"But still…" Snapping his fangs, Garfiel still regretted not traveling with Subaru's group. But after much discussion, it had been agreed upon by everyone that this would be best.

If he were to push the argument, one could say it was because Otto couldn't be left behind healing in the water city by himself. Meaning the fault lied with Otto receiving his wound.

He wasn't trying to evade taking the blame. It was just that there was no end to the excuses that could be created.

"You could say it would've been better if Mr. Natsuki hadn't been flung away."

"Ain't that puttin' too much fault on the captain?"

"I think so too. That's why thinking about who to blame is meaningless. Well, Ram would probably blame Subaru mercilessly either way."

Despite only knowing Ram for a year, Otto knew that while she might say such things out loud, she would never seriously think that.

In any case, thought Otto, everyone involved in the camp would most likely lament their lack of power. Either because they have a strong sense of responsibility or they're underestimating themselves.

"The only ones with a reasonable evaluation of themselves would be me and Petra," Otto reflected aloud.

"Huh?" asked Garfiel.

"Oh, it's nothing."

In terms of underestimating themselves, Garfiel was no exception. Though his experience in Priestella seemed to have forced him out of it more or less.

In any case…

"Clind, have Lady Emilia and the others already arrived?" asked

Otto.

“Yes, they have already returned,” replied Clind. “All arrived. They are waiting for you two to return. Long-awaited arrival.”

“‘Long-awaited arrival’ feels like stretching the truth, but understood.”

The place they were flung to wasn’t safe. What was important now was to combine everyone’s knowledge and personal connections and figure out how they were going to get Subaru and Rem back.

However, thought Otto, it would have been better had they been flung to the North or the West.

“Why did they have to be sent to the country with the most enemies…?”

“That sounds like the captain, though. Sounds like ‘The Father King’s Trial of Magrizza.’” Garfiel seemed to feel the same frustration as Otto.

From Otto’s long experience as a traveling merchant, the Vollachia Empire was considered the most difficult to deal with out of the four great countries—though the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko was a close second.

“Even so, we might be able to talk things through in the frontiers of the Holy Kingdom, unlike the totally strict Empire.”

“Otto-bro, yer quite knowledgeable about this, huh?”

“If the borders weren’t closed, then I’d be selling oil in the Holy Kingdom right about now.”

With the borders closed due to the recently announced royal selection, Otto’s plans to travel to the Holy Kingdom ended. If not for that, he wouldn’t be working with almost no rest in the Emilia Camp. Life is such a strange thing, he thought.

And he didn’t want to lose Subaru, who had started him on this strange fate.

“Anyway, Lady Emilia and Beatrice are probably fretting themselves. Shall we join them?”

“Heh. No need to worry, Otto-bro. My amazin’ self ain’t gonna be much help coming up with a plan, but I’ll be very useful for breakin’ into the Empire!”

“…I’ll try my best so it doesn’t come to that.” Otto felt bad for the pumped-up Garfiel, but he had no intention of creating an international incident.

In any case, they wouldn’t want the royal selection to be impeded, and if it came to that, even Subaru would be crushed under the responsibility. And if Subaru fell, then the possibility of Otto being crushed as well was high.

If only I could flee before that happens… he thought.

“But I stopped trying to run away from my problems a long time ago.”

The time when he would give in to his fears was when he viewed the boy snickering next to him as a ferocious opponent and not the friend and brother he was today. Ever since then, Otto had never thought about running away from his fears.

“Julius, do ya think ya could learn that magic the monocled butler—Clind, I think it was—used?”

“I’m terribly sorry, but using Yin Magic is reliant on Nes’s growth…”

“Ah, don’t take it seriously. Even I know it ain’t easy to learn.” Anastasia Hoshin lightly brushed off the concern of her proper, serious knight standing beside her and reflected on her action. I made him needlessly concerned once again, she thought.

Ever since they had reaffirmed their master-knight relationship at the Pleiades Watchtower, their interactions remained awkward. It couldn’t be helped though, as his memories had yet to return.

“It’s because you didn’t like that, that you hid yourself within me,” Echidna interrupted. “Easy to understand.”

“Ya don’t have to say that each time, you naughty girl,” Anastasia responded to the invasion of her inner thoughts, sticking out her tongue at her scarf.

It wasn’t a figure of speech; it was actually directed at her scarf. Her white fur scarf was in fact an artificial spirit, Anastasia’s long time companion, Echidna.

Anastasia was prone to pout at Echidna’s jabs, but due to her absence, Anastasia had to hear how much hardship they had gone through. She didn’t have much room to respond.

On top of that, all the hardship had amounted to nothing in the end because of her, which was also a reason that she couldn’t talk back.

“You didn’t come out so that the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony’s Authority wouldn’t affect you,” Echidna commented.

“And it didn’t accomplish anything, because I couldn’t handle it. I really have no patience.” Anastasia rested her hand on her cheek and sighed at her own failings.

“That’s not true at all,” Julius called out. The handsome knight took issue with Anastasia’s self-admonition. “At that time, your voice was the one thing I needed to push forward. If you weren’t there, my sword would never have reached Reid Astrea.”

“Do ya really think that?” replied Anastasia. “You ain’t just exaggerating things for my sake, are ya?”

“I speak only the truth. I swear on my sword and my loyalty.”

“Well, if yer goin’ that far…”

Julius’s yellow eyes pierced deep into Anastasia’s blue-green ones. Seeing the unwavering resolve in them, and hearing the strength in his words, all of Anastasia’s doubts drifted away.

What abundant confidence he has in me, though, she thought. “We really must’ve been good together. Was there some kinda spark that started it?”

“The reason I serve you?”

“Yeah. I’m a foreign merchant, and you’re a true-born knight of the kingdom. Even if ya know my motives, I don’t understand yours.”

She did have some knowledge about Julius’s circumstances. He was the heir to House Juukulius of the Kingdom of Lugunica and a knight of the royal guard. That was clear from his behavior and sword skills. But she didn’t understand why someone of such noble birth would reach out to her.

“…There are various reasons, but…”

“But…?”

“The main reason is that… I saw a ray of hope in your potential.”

At Julius’s completely honest trust and expectations, Anastasia could only stand there dumbfounded. She believed that he would have a larger and more personal goal in mind.

And so, as Anastasia stood there frozen for a moment…

“Aha-ha-ha!” Echidna suddenly burst into laughter around her neck.

“Woah.” Anastasia squeaked in surprise and looked down at her, finding her black eyes looking back.

“Ah, sorry,” said Echidna. “It’s just that I didn’t expect you to answer with something so relatable.”

“Relatable?” parroted Julius.

“It’s nothing special. Just something I thought, as someone who has very big expectations for Ana’s future. Oops, maybe I should say ‘as an animal’,” Echidna jested lightly, as Julius frowned at her remark.

But yes, Anastasia felt like it was similar to how she and Echidna had met. It reminded her of when she had been told something similar by Ricardo when she was a little girl.

“If it’s like that, wouldn’t people think that I persuade others the same way each time?” Anastasia questioned.

“What’s wrong with that?” Echidna replied. “Even if you have other means of negotiation at your disposal, if you have a great tool, there’s no reason not to use it.”

“I see, wise words,” Julius responded seriously, while Anastasia could only smile wryly.

“Is that how it is?” she said.

Echidna was always like that, but she had to question whether or not to let it slide upon seeing Julius’s ability to see wisdom in everything.

Perhaps if we still had the relationship we had in the past, I wouldn’t be worryin’ about this.

“I can’t say. I believed I interacted with you without any trouble. But in order for me to think that way, you’ve worked to the best of your ability, Lady Anastasia.”

“…Cheeky boy. Did ya read my thoughts?”

“It might’ve slipped your mind, but I’ve always been the closest to you.”

Lifting her hand to her mouth, Anastasia giggled lightly at the knight’s behavior. “Such a playboy.”

A lingering concern remained. However, this knight who looked as if he could do anything, and elegantly, firmly kept in mind their master-knight relationship.

Meaning they could do well together… Handling adversity was one of her strengths, after all.

“Also, I was able ta remember Ms. Emilia, so that should mean maybe I’ll be able ta remember ya too, Julius.”

"That would ultimately be the best option," Echidna chimed in. "Her and Julius were both hit by Gluttony's Authority. Though we don't know the means of recovery…"

"There's no need to rush. That's what I think now. And I'm proud of that." Julius smiled honestly, placing his hand on his chest.

Seeing that, Anastasia closed her eyes in acceptance. "I see, I see," she said, nodding.

And with that, they got an idea of how to reestablish their relationship as master and knight, and the stagnant negotiations were over.

"Like we said in the tower, we're helping find Subaru and Ms. Rem," Anastasia said. "I ain't sure if Ms. Emilia remembers, but this third Gluttony concerns me."

"Yes," replied Julius. "If they were sent to the Empire with Subaru and Ms. Rem, then the situation is dire."

"However, that country is unlikely to listen to us," Echidna added. "Which begs the question of how we're going to find them."

Once they decided on a direction, Anastasia, Julius, and Echidna quickly brainstormed a plan.

With all the issues having been brought up, Anastasia smiled, placing her hand against her white cheek. "Even if it came with conditions, Ms. Emilia and Subaru are the reason we're still here. If we don't repay this debt and just walk away with the product, then my name as a merchant will suffer."

"Then what shall we do?" asked Julius with closed eyes.

Anastasia shrugged as she gave her answer. "We'll do what only a merchant can do."

Luckily, Anastasia's way with words had just been proven by the other two people there. Although…

"Shouldn't it be the person and the animal instead of two people?"

asked the scarf around her neck, sticking its tongue out playfully as it danced ticklishly around her neck.

“Everyone’s working so hard to get that man and Rem baack…”

Meili sat with her elbows on her knees and her face in her palms, uninterested.

Within the hurried atmosphere engulfing Roswaal Manor, Meili couldn’t find any nostalgia in it. Even though she had spent a year within those walls.

“In my case, I spent most of that time as a prisoner. Seeing it all become so lively like this is actually refreshing.”

The reason Meili met Emilia’s group in the first place was because of her assassination contract.

She had attacked their old mansion that had burned down and become their prisoner after being defeated. Normally she’d be tortured or killed, but somehow fate had led her here.

They had no sense of danger, letting her out in the mansion like this without even restraining her.

“Don’t they think I might betray them and go on a rampaage?”

She didn’t have any weapons, but Meili never needed them in the first place.

With one call from her, she could summon the witchbeasts from the nearby forest if she felt like it. It was feasible that she could try to exact revenge for Elsa’s death at any moment.

But the moment she thought that, she found herself smiling.

“But Elsa’s the last person who’d want revenge for her deaath.”

She didn’t care the slightest about the afterlife while she was alive, so it was hard to imagine that changing after her death.

In actual fact, Meili had plenty of opportunities to learn about Elsa while she was alive. But she didn't take them, and now she thought that was for the best.

Back then she thought that if she never learned, then she would never go anywhere. "…But I was taught that that wasn't the caase."

She was told to find her own path, that there were other people she could follow.

But the person who said that had gone far away to where she couldn't follow.

"Ah! Meili!"

"Oh?" At her name being called out, Meili leaned her head back off the edge of the chair she was on. In her upside down vision, she spotted a familiar, adorable face.

It was the girl who had visited her along with Subaru and Emilia while she was a prisoner.

"Petra, how have you beeen?"

"I've been doing good. It's good to see that you're doing good as well. I was so worried."

"After Subaru, Emilia, and Beatrice, riiight?"

"Don't say that. I don't have rankings when I'm worried about people." Pouting with reddened cheeks, Petra put her hands on her hips in protest. Giggling at her response, Meili straightened herself on her chair to face Petra properly.

Even from this angle Petra looked the same as when she saw Meili off. Of course, it had only been twenty days, so not much could change.

Normally though, it would've taken the same amount of time to get back, but…

“You came with Clind right? What kind of magic was it?”

“…Who knows? I am not being secretive, I really don’t know what it waas. He just came, talked with the others for a bit, then both dragon carriages were sent here.”

“It must be Yin Magic… I don’t want to, but I’ll ask the master about it later.”

Hearing Meili’s strange experience brought out Petra’s burning passion for knowledge.

I’ve heard about how Petra has been improving rapidly in various fields, and her passion and talent being directed at magic. So much so, that people speculated that she would eventually learn the magic that Clind the butler used.

But in any case…

“Petra, you don’t seem that torn up about Subaru.”

“What are you saying? I’m very worried. And angry too!”

“…Geh.”

Meili gave her honest opinion, but Petra responded by giving an angry smile. Meili lost the ability to form words upon seeing that.

Indeed, Meili was mistaken. Petra was very angry.

But the girl in front of her wasn’t just releasing suppressed emotions. She was capable of using terrifying methods that Meili couldn’t even imagine to relieve her rage.

One year ago, while Meili was still being treated as a prisoner, Petra spoke some words that still made Meili shiver to her bones even to this day.

Meili had just attacked the mansion and put even Petra’s life in danger. Yet, when Petra had walked up to where she was imprisoned she declared this:

"I'm gonna get you to like me no matter what. Then you won't think of anything scary like killing, right? Relax, I won't bite."

And after that, Petra did in fact become friendlier with her.

Even though she was aware that Petra could perform such calculated acts of self-interest, Meili felt an honest goodwill towards her instead of disgust. Thus…

"S-Sorry."

"…? Why are you apologizing, Meili? You did your job correctly. You saved them when they were surrounded by witchbeasts."

"That's true, but I couldn't saave Subaru."

Those words were not born from fear of Petra but were Meili's honest regrets.

Petra calmed her rage as she empathized with Meili's remorse. "Thank you for apologizing. And sorry for making you apologize. I'm the worst, since I couldn't even go with everyone."

"That's not…"

"That's why next time I'll definitely go. I swear it," Petra declared strongly, making fists with her small hands.

Feeling that strength in her words and her eyes, Meili went wide-eyed, then laughed as all the tension left her body. "Subaru's a lucky maan," she smirked. "He has so many people who care so much for him. From you, to Emilia, to Beatrice…"

"Yeah. Oh, but I care about you too, you know?"

"Yeaah, yeaah."

It was just a side statement, but Meili didn't mind it. She had been taken in by Petra's innocent charm, and it seemed like she was completely under her spell. It probably wasn't just her, either…

"I can't go with theem to search for Subaru."

"…I know, I heard. You're going with Clind and Ms. Annerose to the capital, right?"

"Yes. There we have to talk about how to cross that deseert." Meili nodded in response, thinking of the Augria Sand Dunes that had changed completely.

Originally, the Augria Sand Dunes was said to be impossible to cross, and the Pleiades Watchtower behind them was impossible to reach. But now, with the reason for the sand dunes hostility, the Sage Shaula and her duty, gone, it was possible to enter.

The Trials that Emilia undertook also cleared out the sand storm that surrounded the tower. With that, there was very little left to defend the Books of the Dead that the tower held.

And so, thought Petra, the only thing stopping the abuse of the Pleiades Watchtower is… "The Divine Dragon that Emilia befriended and Meili…"

"When you say it like that, it sounds too much like Emilia."

Even the massive, intimidating Divine Dragon grew meek in the face of Emilia. Regardless of what Meili thought, Petra's statement wasn't wrong.

And right now, the only things protecting the Pleiades Watchtower were the Divine Dragon living there and the witchbeasts that lived in the Augria Sand Dunes. And both of those things the Emilia Camp could handle.

"…I feel like I'm being forced into this group as atonemeent," Meili whined.

"…? Why are you bringing that up now?"

"Petra, that face is scaring me, please stop that."

She looked as if everything had gone according to plan—or at least that she had stated the obvious. However, it was still the role assigned to Meili.

In order to fulfill her promise with Subaru and Emilia, Meili had to cooperate with them as well.

“Meili, will you be okay?” Petra asked. “Clind is a really kind person, but he’s got his own demons, so be careful.”

“Thanks for increasing my anxieety. But relaax. I won’t be alone. Riiight?” Closing an eye, Meili shook the hood of the robe she was wearing.

“Eh?” exclaimed Petra, her eyes going wide as a shadowy figure jumped out. Using its multiple legs, the crimson scorpion crawled up Meili’s shoulder until resting on her head. “Is that…?”

“My bodyguaard. Her name is…well I haven’t decided on a name yeet. For noow she’s Ms. Crimson Scorpion.”

“Crimson Scorpion…” Repeating the name under her breath, Petra stared at the scorpion. At her gaze, it raised its small body to make it look bigger and snapped its pincers.

It wasn’t obvious whether it was an act of intimidation to protect Meili or not, but…

“Take care of Meili, Ms. Crimson Scorpion,” she said.

Pinching that little pincer with her fingers, Petra did something like a handshake.

The scorpion appeared to acknowledge her gesture by waving its tail as if it was satisfied.

And so…

“Let’s both do our joobs,” said Meili. “That’s what’s best for us.”

“Yes, that’s right,” replied Petra. “And once Subaru comes back, let’s talk about it together.”

“Yeah, that’s riight. I have lots of things I want to talk with him about tooo.”

Meili smiled gently as she answered Petra's declaration. But as Petra heard that, she tilted her head to the side. "Huh, it's like, I'm curious about your reaction."

"…What about iit?"

"I don't know… Did you happen to see Subaru's cool side?"

Hearing Petra say that in such a timid manner, Meili's eyes went wide. She wanted to say 'not at all,' but she hesitated before she could say it.

Part of it was because she wanted to get back at Petra, but there was also hesitation around what happened at the Pleiades Watchtower.

In any case…

"You're such a worrywaart, Petra."

The scorpion on top of Meili's head snapped its pincers again—though whether in confirmation or denial, it was unclear. And it only increased the worry that Petra felt.

6

…And so, the many allies gathered to rescue Natsuki Subaru formed their resolve.

Everyone knew Subaru's judgment and bravery, along with his ability to succeed at the last moment. But at the same time they also knew of his recklessness, so their resolve was important.

And amongst them, the one who worried the most about Subaru was…

"…Lady Emilia, please calm down."

"…It's really obvious that I'm not calm isn't it?"

Placing her hand on her chest, Emilia smiled and looked to her side. In her amethyst eyes, Ram, who had traveled with her on her journey, straightened herself.

Seeing Ram compose herself, Emilia realized that she had to collect herself as well.

Ram's probably worried a lot about Subaru too. On top of that, it wasn't only him that disappeared from the Pleiades Watchtower, but Rem too.

"You must be all anxious too, with Subaru and Rem missing."

"Disregarding Barusu, Ram is worried about Rem. Disregarding Barusu."

"You don't have to repeat yourself, I suppose. Betty's worried enough for Subaru, but she will worry for him in your place, too… We have to believe that those two are okay, in fact." Beatrice responded naturally to Ram's tough front.

Linking hands with Emilia, Beatrice's expression was dark with worry. That was because she was worried about Subaru's condition, but there was another reason.

With Subaru being missing, Beatrice was running low on mana.

"Ms. Beatrice, how's your body?" Ram asked.

"Betty's getting by conserving energy, I suppose. You're supposed to be tired though."

"Ram is going to jump into Master Roswaal's arms later tonight."

"…Betty can't understand your tasteless behavior, I suppose."

"Ram could say the same to you…no, to the both of you."

"Eh? Me too? Why?" Emilia spoke up at suddenly being involved in Ram and Beatrice's back and forth. However, the two of them didn't give a response.

And with that, the relaxed atmosphere that had formed between them disappeared the next moment—the moment the three of them, who had returned to the mansion, reached the door to Roswaal's room.

"…We managed to gather everyone extremely fast thanks to Clind, but we still have to hurry."

They had sent the letter to Roswaal via carrier bird and were preparing to return from Mirula when Clind appeared, which had surprised them, but they were more surprised by the teleportation afterward.

But thanks to that, they were able to return sooner. However, since they couldn't use the same method to travel to the country where Subaru was, they had to find another method.

That's why…

"…Roswaal, we're coming in." Calling out, Emilia grasped Beatrice's hand and entered the room with Ram following behind. Emilia's group was the last to arrive, with everyone else already gathered ahead of them.

There was Frederica, who had protected the mansion in their absence, and Clind, who was the main reason everyone could gather so quickly. Otto and Garfiel, who they had separated from at the Water Gate City Priestella, and who had managed to return to the mansion safely.

There was Anastasia and Julius, and Echidna, who had returned with them from the Pleiades Watchtower and promised to help them search for the missing Subaru and Rem.

And there was also Meili, with a crimson scorpion resting on her head, and Petra next to her, who was looking on with a serious look.

And at the back was Roswaal sitting proudly at an ebony desk.

"…Thank you for gathering, everyone." Feeling all eyes on her, Emilia felt her hand being tightly grasped by Beatrice's; she squeezed in return, and faced everyone directly.

She knew that everyone was of the same mind, so she urged her anxious heart to be good and not cause her to lie or overthink things.

“No matter what, we’ll find Subaru and Rem, who were flung away.”

…And so she called out to everyone, hoping to be reunited with her lost knight.

Stand By Me Pleiades II

1

“We’ll make our move from Kararagi. Lugunica and Vollachia have always kept an eye on each other, so it might be easier to find a way in from there.”

Anastasia’s proposal came as a pleasant surprise to Emilia.

Of course, it was completely understandable for Anastasia, Julius, and Echidna to worry about the missing Subaru and Rem. She knew that, but those three were from a different camp. They had originally headed for the Pleiades Watchtower for the same reason but from a different standpoint. Having safely returned, they had no obligation to go along with the search for the missing children.

“I agree with Anastasia. Considering the relationship with Vollachia, we have a better chance with Kararagi than with Lugunica. Moreover, it has the headquarters of the Hoshin Trading Company.”

“We can use our connections to the fullest. Those ain’t bad odds.”

“Anastasia, Julius…!” Emilia was rather moved by the two who planned to help with the search for the two they had lost, and her eyes involuntarily began to blur as she felt their enthusiasm—tears filling her amethyst eyes. “I’m so happy we became friends, Anastasia.”

“Well, friends might be takin’ things a bit too far,” Anastasia responded, dampening Emilia’s enthusiasm. “We’re still rivals, just as before, but…”

“But?”

“How about we become friends once both the Natsuki thing and the royal selection are done with? I don’t really have friends, either. Just like you, Emilia,” Anastasia replied to Emilia’s emotional words with a gentle smile.

That answer, too, brought a warm feeling to Emilia's chest.

"By the way, she's not saying it out of embarrassment—it's true. Ana doesn't have many friends."

"No need ta say somethin' so unnecessary." Anastasia silenced her fox partner—Echidna—with a pinch, who was currently draped around her neck in the form of a scarf.

Emilia giggled at the scene and rubbed her chest reassuringly. She was happy at the thought of becoming friends with Anastasia, but she was even more happy at having settled on a plan to find Subaru.

"But don't start jumpin' for joy just yet," Anastasia cautioned. "Goin' through Kararagi may give us a better shot, but it'll also take more time… And Natsuki ain't got much time, right?"

"Probably not," Emilia replied. "We need to meet with Beatrice as soon as possible."

"The contract as a spirit arts user, and the defectiveness of Subaru's gate…" Julius spoke, sharing his insight. As one who used spirits himself, he understood the predicament Subaru had been placed in. "If we can't compensate for both, it will be unfortunate for both Beatrice and Subaru."

If they were to remain separated for a long period of time, both Subaru and Beatrice's lives would be in danger. And although Emilia was happy that the two of them had become so close, having to be together to such an extent was a major drawback.

"If you come with us, the certainty may be higher, but it'll take time. So—"

"Yes. We'll use a different method than Anastasia's group… We'll do our best using the method that Otto thought up." Clenching her hand into a small fist, Emilia returned the gaze of Anastasia's pale blue-green eyes.

Anastasia's group would try entering Vollachia from Kararagi. And if possible, Emilia's group would aim to enter Vollachia using their own strategy.

Emilia raised her eyebrows as a serious look crossed her face. “We’ll do our best to sneak in!”

“…”

“…? What’s wrong?” Emilia asked, confused by their reaction. “You two… No, all three of you have a weird look on your face.” Having been so enthusiastic, Emilia tilted her head at their reactions. I thought they would for sure cheer for us.

Anastasia elegantly touched her cheek. “Talkin’ to you seems to soften both the good and the bad. It’s quite funny.”

“Really?” Emilia asked with uncertainty. “I don’t really understand what you mean, but that’s better than hardening it, right?”

“Maybe. What do you think, Julius?”

“M-Me…?” Julius asked hesitantly. “I think that it’s…a virtue of yours, Lady Emilia.”

“Umm, thanks.” Emilia thanked Julius earnestly for what sounded to her like praise, but Julius only grew flustered by her response, causing Anastasia to laugh mischievously. Emilia didn’t seem to notice, but there was most likely a deeper meaning to it.

“It’s fairly rare to get an opportunity to cheer on the act of smuggling,” Echidna continued, “but this seems like the right time. Both I and Ana will be looking forward to your efforts.”

“…Yep. Right,” Anastasia affirmed. “Although it seems a bit too serious a situation to look forward to. You’re aware of your position, right, Emilia?”

“…Yes. Because everyone keeps nagging me about it.” Accepting what Echidna said, Emilia nodded at Anastasia—who had a serious look in her eyes. Smuggling was, in short, sneaking into another country without permission. It’s illegal, right? That means we’d probably get a good scolding if we’re caught. But as a candidate in Lugunica’s royal selection, I—

"I might end up causing the empire and the kingdom's relationship to sour… My qualifications for the royal selection might be taken away too."

"You're going to do it despite that?" Anastasia asked. Her question carried both intensity and kindness. "Don't you have goals you want to achieve, Emilia?"

Indeed, my desire is to become the monarch. There are people I want to save, and dreams I've fostered since the royal selection began. By sneaking in, won't I risk chances at both?

"But those were all things that I wanted to do with Subaru. So I'll do my best."

"…Subaru is one lucky guy," Julius muttered, lowering his gaze as he heard what lay in Emilia's heart.

He sounds a little relieved. He must be worried about Subaru. They've both grown so close over the course of our journey, so the feeling is most likely genuine. However, Julius is a little wrong about one thing.

"Subaru isn't lucky—I'm the lucky one."

Subaru has always done his best to save me, several times over. So if something happened to him, saving him is my first priority.

Being able to think this way, Emilia was surely quite fortunate.

"Yes, yes. I understand what you're saying, Emilia. I'm quite full now," Anastasia said, clapping her hands together as if she had just finished a meal.

"Quite full…" Emilia just stared. I know she didn't eat anything while we were talking. Why would she say she's full?

Anyhow—

"Ana and the rest of us will aim to enter the country from the direction of Kararagi," Echidna informed. "From what Margrave Mathers said, it seems we can use that butler's power."

“Clind?” Emilia asked. “He’s a steward, not a butler. That’s what he told me.”

“Either way, we can shorten the time it’ll take to reach Kararagi’s border…” Julius said decisively. “Although I’m quite curious what kind of magic he has, personally.”

“Put that curiosity to the side for now,” Anastasia warned. To Julius, who loved magic, this was rather disappointing, but Emilia didn’t really know anything about Clind’s strange powers either. However, since he had never shown it to her before, she assumed that it was a power he couldn’t use without a special reason. It could well be a power that he couldn’t handle—just like Emilia.

Perhaps Clind is also scared of hurting people.

“Emilia,” Anastasia called out, drawing her attention away from her thoughts. “As you already know, we’ll do our absolute best to find Natsuki and Rem. So I’ll leave it to the rest of you to take the tower story to the capital.”

“…Yeah, that’s fine. If Anne—”

“—This is a sign of our trust.” She interrupted Emilia as she spoke, piercing her chest with a single word. Seeing the seriousness in Anastasia’s gaze, Emilia’s eyelashes and lips trembled.

The Divine Dragon, Volcanica, had been placed atop, but with the Sage, Shaula lost, and the sandstorm gone, the Pleiades Watchtower was now in a vulnerable state. Although the witchbeasts of the desert would obstruct their path, there were several methods to reach the tower. She had also heard rumors that other nefarious individuals as well as the Witch Cult might have set their sights on it, too.

“To prevent them, we’ll need the Kingdom’s assistance,” Julius suggested. “The purpose of our journey was to search for a means to rescue victims of the Witch Cult from the start. The library with the Books of the Dead might help…”

“If you read through them all, it might be possible…” Echidna added. “However, it won’t be easy.”

Indeed, the Pleiades Watchtower was full of possibilities. And whether those possibilities were good or bad depended solely on the individual wielding its power. In order to prevent a worst-case scenario from unfolding, it was necessary for the tower to be managed by the kingdom.

“Travelin’ across the Augria Sand Dunes, and securing the Pleiades Watchtower… You’re hoggin’ all sorts of glorious achievements, ain’tcha?” Anastasia said playfully, stirring the stiff atmosphere.

It was more of a prickly affirmation than discouragement—or rather, that’s how Emilia understood it. Determined not to rely too much on their kindness, she nodded her head sincerely. “Yes, leave it to me. I don’t ever want to do something that would disappoint my friends.”

2

“Betty thought for certain you’d have prepared a way to face the empire, in fact.”

Her words—which were as blunt as usual—resonated sharply with Roswaal.

She folded her short arms arrogantly as if to say she didn’t expect much. But, on the contrary, her obedience was clear from having entrusted him with such an urgent request. The style of her lettering also told of her dwindling expectation that he would resolve her anxiety and impatience.

“I’m sooorry. But there was no way I could have known about the situation with the empire. It seemed like something that could be settled within Lugunica.”

“That seems to be a rather shameful thing for the holder of the Book of Wisdom to say, I suppose. Betty wanted you to show her you were different from herself, whose book has been blank for four hundred years.”

“…”

"Wh-What's with that ominous face?"

Facing him across the desk, Beatrice spoke openly, which rather startled Roswaal. The wounds her blank Book of Wisdom had caused for four hundred years were deep and painful. They were wounds that anyone would fear, avoid, and pretend didn't exist.

And these were the wounds Beatrice was so casually speaking of now.

"…Subaru makes me jealous."

"Betty doesn't understand what you're saying! The one who is in trouble right now is Subaru, I suppose! Roswaal, hop over and see if you can't bring those two back."

"I'd let a flying dragon bite me on the butt, if that's all it tooook," Roswaal replied, laughing sarcastically at the unreasonable request. Still smiling, he called out to Beatrice. "We're working on it as fast as we can—even using Clind. I won't let you disappear, no matter what."

"…An unnecessary concern. The one you need is Subaru, and Betty has no problem with it, I suppose."

"What an extremely stubborn thing to say. Have you been spending too much time with Anastasia, I wooonder? Ah, speaking of which…" Stopping in the middle of his sentence, Roswaal closed one eye and directed the yellow one at Beatrice. "That artificial spirit that Anastasia has with her…"

"…It's just a name," she replied. There was no pause or hesitation in her reply. Gazing at one another, Roswaal and Beatrice's complex feelings swam in their eyes.

The artificial spirit Anastasia had with her was a fox in the form of a scarf, and she had named it Echidna. It was an existence that Roswaal found hard to ignore. And the same should go for Beatrice. So, considering her response, she must believe—

"Betty doesn't think she knows anything about it, I suppose, nor does she think she's pretending not to."

“Couldn’t that just be what she wants you to think?”

“After revealing it’s an artificial spirit? What reason would there be, I suppose?” Beatrice snapped, her gaze mingled with irritation.

Seeing this, Roswaal thought deeply about her answer. What reason would there be to lie about it? In fact, there could be a great number of reasons. But ultimately, those who lie do not need a reason to. Considering it from that perspective, Beatrice’s thoughts are far too kind and gentle. She has a naive honesty uncharacteristic of a spirit who’s been around for so long.

—That was enough.

“I understand. It’s a friend of yours that you’ve gone to great pains to make. Please don’t call me insensitiiiive.”

“Sh-She’s not a friend! Betty wishes you wouldn’t say weird things, I suppose!”

“Yes, yes. Come on, you also need to get ready. You wanted to leave as soon as possible, right?”

Being talked down to, Beatrice made an unamused face and pouted. “Hmph…” Perhaps because she couldn’t find the words to retaliate, her shoulders slumped. “Are you even ready yourself? Your preparations—”

“Frederica will have it ready for me. That’s what it means to be the head of the maaaaansion.”

“…Are you finished?” asked a voice from Roswaal’s lap once Beatrice had left the room. Roswaal glanced down, his gaze clashing with a pair of light pink eyes right beneath him.

Feeling the weight and warmth of that gaze on his knees, Roswaal shrugged. “My feelings are quite complicaaated. If Subaru had returned, then Beatrice would probably have never come to see me alone. However, with Subaru absent, Beatrice is not at all like herself. That is the value of a contractual relationship with an ideal spirit.”

“…Hmm.” Having had their exchange summarized openly, Roswaal’s lips curved. Watching him with a soft gaze, and lying down, using his lap as a pillow was Ram. She had been in this position the whole time he had been talking with Beatrice and had heard it all. Of course, she had a reason for being in this position, and it was a situation Beatrice knew of as well.

“It seems I’ve overdone myself,” Roswaal said. “Even without the situation with Subaru, it seems like it was the right choice to call me back with Clind.”

“The anxiety and stress had piled up,” Ram noted. “The difficulties in commanding Barusu and Emilia were as you’d expect… Ram would have relied on Otto, but she couldn’t.”

“He needed time to recuperate. It’s not his fault. Besides…”

“He proposed an alternate plan. So Ram’ll turn a blind eye to it.”

Roswaal chuckled at Ram’s unsympathetic attitude. It could be said that this was—in her own way—the greatest praise you could receive from her. It was proof of her recognition of Otto. Or perhaps Roswaal simply misunderstood. After all, he had failed to fully understand her in the past, when he thought he had her completely figured out.

“…”

Holding onto the silence, Roswaal placed a finger on Ram’s forehead where her horn had been and poured a delicately adjusted amount of mana in. It was a task he had entrusted to Emilia and Beatrice on the journey, but it proved difficult for Emilia, with her carefree nature, and Beatrice, whose reserves were unreliable. If Subaru had vanished, and Beatrice could no longer manifest, the situation would have been utterly hopeless.

“I’m glad you came back safe.”

“…Roswaal.”

“Ah.”

Roswaal was shocked at himself for letting the words slip out so casually. Then after the surprise, a strong feeling of self-hatred bubbled up inside him. Anger at letting his feelings show was natural, but what dominated Roswaal was the revulsion he felt towards his own shamelessness. What right do I have to spew out words of happiness at Ram’s safety?

And yet—

“…Yes. Like this, Ram has returned.”

Roswaal’s statement elicited a smile from her, one that tore at his chest. It showed her deep compassion. He could only imagine the swirl of grief in her heart at the loss of Subaru and Rem, and yet, he himself was the reason she was smiling like this.

“I’ve realized the reason I sent your younger sister Rem into the mansion,” Roswaal said, responding to the effects of her smile. He tried to confront the fact that he did not have the qualifications to face that smile.

I get the reason, now. The reason I allowed Rem into the mansion, despite Ram being enough. The reason I couldn’t figure out after Rem’s existence was wiped out due to the Authority of Gluttony. The reason I knew was there, considering I’m not the type of person who would ever do something without a cold, calculated reason. That reason was—

“…To be a replacement for Ram’s horn, right?” Ram answered for him.

“…”

“What a shame. Try again.”

Ram’s gaze conveyed an unspoken message: “If you want Ram to hate you, that is.” Roswaal’s breath hitched. What do I have to do to lose this girl’s affection, I wonder? He couldn’t bear the uncertainty, so Roswaal focused on his fingertip and continued to send the life-saving mana to the oni girl.

3

“Anne, I’ll leave Meili and the tower to you. I’ll do my best too!” Waving her hand energetically, Emilia and her companions were transported to their destination.

It was over in the blink of an eye, leaving those who actually experienced it in the same state. Of course, Annerose—who was observing from the sidelines—could only watch them disappear like a puff of smoke.

“That really is a straange power. Very handy, though,” a young girl said as she patted the ground with her shoe, swinging her three-strand braid from side to side. Until that very moment, a dragon carriage towed by two dragons had been present, but that had disappeared with the rest of them. It was understandable why the young girl thought it was such a strange power.

“At any rate, even I could never quite understand Clind.” As the head of the Miload family, it was none other than Clind who had taught Annerose to act in the superior way she did. The steward had maintained his firm posture and sharp intelligence for as long as Annerose could remember. But despite that—

“You should be careful of Clind,” Annerose warned. “He is talented, but he can also be dangerous.”

“I’ve been told that by both Petra and Fang’s older sister, but I still don’t understand whyy. Does it have something to do with him liiking little children?”

“Frankly speaking, yes.”

“Reeeally? That’s all? Doesn’t seem like something to be concerned about,” Meili replied quite calmly, waving a hand. Annerose widened her eyes at that reaction and carefully observed her once more. Meili, moving with an unsteady gait, appeared vulnerable despite being about two or three years older than her. She possessed an unusual combination of both adorable traits and a pessimistic demeanor, which gave off an air of danger.

If what she'd heard before was true, it was understandable.

"Umm, Meili was the child who burned down the old mansion… No, it wasn't just her, but her older sister as well… But she's not a bad kid! She has the power to tame witchbeasts, which put Subaru in danger… But she's not a bad kid!"

Although Emilia had tried her very best to defend her, she was a dangerous person without a shadow of a doubt. However, taking into account the fact she had been entrusted to Annerose, and that she had a job she had to accomplish in Emilia's stead…

"I will protect you," declared Annerose Miload with unfaltering confidence. However, to Annerose's powerful words, Meili turned around with a puzzled expression.

"…"

"Huh. Is my assurance not enough for you?" Annerose said, furrowing her brows at the wholly unexpected response.

"It's not thaat, it's not that it's not enough or anythiing. It's just that, you're younger than me, riiight? Unless you're like Beatrice."

"Beatrice… She's the spirit with Natsuki Subaru, isn't she?" Annerose asked. "No, I'm not like her—I'm a human who just turned ten the other day."

"See? Incidentally, I'm thirteen, so that would make me your older sister."

Meili's gaze fixated on something far away as she re-uttered the word "older sister." It was difficult to guess what was in her heart as she muttered it, but it would be unwise to make a judgment on dependability based on age alone. After all, Emilia isn't dependable at all despite being a half-elf of over one hundred years of age.

"In fact, Emily is quite unreliable without me. Don't you think so?"

"Um… I think mentioning Emilia is a little unfair," Meili mumbled, cheeks stiffening at having her weak spot exposed, much to Annerose's delight. Just as expected, Emilia acted as Annerose's strength even when she wasn't around. If they returned home safely, she'd have to devote herself to thanking her abundantly.

In any case—

"Uncle also entrusted you to me. Do you think that he would choose to do something that would cause even a little bit of concern?"

"…I don't know the margrave very well, but he is very persuasive," Meili said with consideration, placing a finger to her lips. As she did, the collar of her robe quivered, and a small shadow leaped onto her head from the inside of her hood.

It was a small scorpion with a red body that reflected the light. As the scorpion raised its stinger, it shifted its pincers on either arm in a display that appeared like a vow to protect Meili on its own.

"You seemed to have a good enough knight by your side," Annerose commented.

"Right? I'm not worried… So, we'll take good care of you for the time being, my lady."

"Call me Annerose. Ideally, Lady Annerose."

There were quite a number of people who looked down on Annerose because of her age, so she was fairly experienced in responding to it.

Now that I think about it, this is similar to when I first met Emilia. I saw her as nothing more than an elf with poor manners. I never imagined that she would become such an important person in my life.

"I'm looking forward to seeing if we develop a bond, too," Annerose mused, putting her hand over her mouth, faintly smiling.

"…I was told something similaar by Petra. Is this the way this mansion teaches persuaasion?" Meili asked suspiciously.

"…No, I think you've misunderstood. Correction."

"Aiiieee?!" Meili let out a high-pitched shriek as Clind appeared out of nowhere and touched her back. Her startled reaction caused the scorpion to fly from her head, which Clind nimbly caught before it hit the ground.

"Careful," he cautioned. "Rescue."

However, rather than being grateful for the rescue, the scorpion displayed anger at him for causing its fall in the first place.

"It has your finger—serves you right," Annerose retorted.

"What an inconsiderate comment," Clind replied. "However, I will gladly accept it. Delightful."

"I'd prefer it if you didn't treat the scorpion and my criticism as equal!"

Clind had returned as quickly as he'd left—in the blink of an eye. Fed up with the steward—from the finger of which the scorpion dangled—Annerose focused on Meili. Despite having previously insisted that Clind was nothing to be concerned about, the shock had left her wide-eyed, holding her head in her arms.

"As you can see, he has certain mannerisms," Annerose began. "That's why…"

"That's why…?!" Meili interrupted.

"That's why I thought we should become more acquainted," she continued, narrowing her eyes and relaxing her lips into a smile. Meili gulped, holding back her words. Though she might never get the chance to say them again, it was certainly the right decision to leave them unsaid at this moment—because accepting that the repugnant face belonged to a relative of Roswaal's was simply too humiliating.

“Actually I’m a wanted person in my hometown…” Otto confessed apologetically. “Well, it’s not entirely accurate to label me as ‘wanted’, but I can’t exactly walk around in public.”

Frederica couldn’t help feeling a sense of satisfaction, having suspected as much.

As the one in charge of domestic affairs within the Emilia Camp, Otto was considered indispensable by everyone in the mansion. That wisdom and drive were not something that could be replaced, and alongside Subaru and Petra, it could be said he was one of the big three within the camp.

It would be questionable to say I’m happy about that—I’m a little bothered by the fact those two have been placed on the same level as Petra. While Otto was certainly a valuable asset, Frederica was somewhat skeptical about where he’d refined his exceptional courage and acquired his merchant tales from. He was dependable, but being too dependable posed its own challenges. If he had a trustworthy lineage like Roswaal, a polished career like Emilia, or had been a shining gem like Petra, then it would be a different story. However, neither Otto nor Subaru fits those categories, leaving Frederica uncertain how to react to their amiable friendship.

However, for the time being, she could at least quell the doubts she had about Otto.

“I’m relieved,” Frederica replied. “Just as I thought, Mr. Otto. You truly possessed the ability to be a fugitive.”

“Just as you thought?!” Otto exclaimed. “And you’re relieved?! Why?!”

Frederica smoothed down her chest in relief, and Otto stared at her in wonder.

Dropping her long-harbored suspicions, Frederica had subconsciously let her real feelings show and placed her hand to her mouth. “Oops,” she said, covering her sharp fangs. “It’s nothing; don’t worry about it. It’s just my personal opinion.”

“If you say that, I’m definitely going to worry about it!” Otto cried out. “Miss Frederica, did you naturally come to the conclusion that I was a wanted man?!”

“I thought it must be something like that, otherwise… it wouldn’t have made sense,” Frederica said candidly, mouth still covered, averting her eyes.

Otto, on the other hand, appeared utterly flabbergasted, as if the world had just turned upside down. His eyes wandered to the others in the camp traveling with them, mouth opening and closing as he searched for the right words. “The rest of you aren’t going to say the same, are you?” he finally managed to utter.

“Don’t worry, Otto-bro,” Garfiel reassured. “My sis is just exaggeratin’.”

“I’m not sure whether or not Frederica is exaggerating,” Emilia said thoughtfully, “but I’ve heard this before, so I’m not surprised. Don’t worry, everyone in my hometown fears me, too.”

“I think Otto’s circumstances are a little different from yours, Lady Emilia,” Petra chimed in. “Please don’t make that face. Otto just had to go and say something so unnecessary…”

“Now it’s my fault?!” Otto exclaimed.

One by one, Garfiel, Emilia, and Petra replied to Otto. However, after his outburst, he recalled that this conversation had begun with talk of his reputation in his hometown. Immediately covering his face with his palm, he sighed dishearteDly. “This time was a rare example where I truly messed up…”

“Good to see you’ve accepted it yourself,” came another voice. “But what now? It must be difficult to return to your hometown, but how long do you intend to hide from the public?”

Otto stared at the sky. The one who had hit him with such sharp words was Ram, who stood there with her arms crossed. But despite the lack of kindness behind her words, she had a point. Using Clind's power, they had jumped from Roswaal Manor to their destination—the commercial city of Picoutatte. To avoid drawing too much attention by appearing downtown, they instead planned to jump to a forest just outside of town and merge with the traffic of people on the road. However, it was there that Otto made his confession: the reason he was reluctant to return to his hometown was that he was a wanted person.

"But in Picoutatte, we might find a way to enter the Empire," Ram continued. "The one who proposed that was none other than you, Otto. It'd be ridiculous not to include you in it."

"Of course it would…" Otto acknowledged. "But it might cause problems for all of you, and I'm more or less just a normal human, so it would take a lot of courage for me to set foot in a place that has it out for me."

"Just a normal human…"

Leaning against a tree, Otto found his words unexpectedly echoed—proof that everyone, including Frederica, shared the same doubts. Otto wasn't a demi-human, nor were they doubting his belonging to the human race, but—

"To call yourself a normal human is complete hogwash, in fact," Beatrice retorted in exasperation.

"It's not!" Otto shouted, expressing his dismay at the disparity between his own self-assessment and the one people around him gave.

Unfortunately, Frederica—and everyone else in the party—didn't find it appropriate to regard Otto as a normal human.

In any case—

"Otto, if you really don't think you can do it, then please say so, okay?" Emilia reassured him. "It's only natural to want to get Subaru and Rem back, but if it's going to cause you pain, then I'm sure Subaru will end up sobbing as if it's his own tragedy."

“I would like to see Mr. Natsuki sobbing…” Otto retorted.

“Otto, be serious,” Petra said, her adorable eyes growing serious at his complaints.

No one in the Emilia Camp could match her when it came to her commanding presence. The only ones who could resist it were the dauntless Ram and the easygoing Emilia. Everyone else would be crushed by it, even Frederica.

“It’s not because I’m succumbing to pressure,” Otto said, regaining his composure. “But it’s okay, Lady Emilia. In order to move the conversation forward smoothly, I think I should be there. Besides…”

“Besides?” Emilia tilted her head.

“…I think the time has come for me to face my past and my hometown,” Otto said with determination, eyes focused on something distant. In the direction of his sight lay the commercial city, Picoutatte. Otto’s situation might never be called peaceful, but…

“Luckily,” Otto continued, clenching his fists, “I’m accompanied by our entire military force, with the weakest link absent. There won’t be a better opportunity to visit my hometown than this!”

“Otto, be serious,” Petra scolded him sharply.

“Huh?!” Otto reacted.

As a wanted man in his hometown, he regarded their military force as a form of security upon his return. It was exactly this attitude that earned him the title: Militant Internal Affairs Officer.

“For someone so smart, it’s always baffled me how Otto can never see himself properly…” Frederica thought aloud, voicing what appeared to be the honest opinion shared between her and the others.

Passing through the necessary inspection for entering and leaving the city, Garfiel clicked his fangs as he felt the change in atmosphere wash over him. “The atmosphere of such a big city sure is different,” he thought aloud.

Plonking himself down on the roof of the dragon carriage, Garfiel tilted his head as he checked out his surroundings. Having lived in the Sanctuary’s village deep in the forest, the world was everything he had seen in the short year since he set foot outside of it. The population and size of the city of Costuul, which sat near the mansion, had amazed him, but the more recent shock was Priestella—the watergate city.

Despite it also being counted among the Five Great Cities of Lugunica, each had its own distinct features and were completely different from each other. In that regard, Picoutatte was full of new and exciting things.

“Everywhere in the city has a different smell,” Garfiel mumbled to himself. “Normally, cities have just one smell ‘bout ‘em…”

“Ah, I know why!” Emilia responded to his mumbles, looking around restlessly from the inside of the car. “Picoutatte is separated into five different parts—East, West, South, North, and Central. And each part sells completely different things.”

“Really? Ya sure know a lot, Lady Emilia!”

“He-He, right?” Emilia’s studies on the political situation, the state of the kingdom, the organization, and various other things seemed to be going rather well. The knowledge she’d shown in Priestella, she was also demonstrating here in Picoutatte.

Understanding Emilia’s explanation, Garfiel sniffed. “Gotcha.”

Just as she had said, the difference in smells wafting from each part of the city resulted from the variety of goods handled in each district. Countless shops lined the city streets, which exuded all the energy of a bustling market. It was a large, tumultuous city that lived up to its name as a commercial city.

“Now that’s a food I ain’t ever smelled before,” Garfiel continued his mumblings. “Ain’t never seen that fabric before, either. Hey! That knife looks perfect for munchin’! Stop the carriage a sec…”

“Garf,” scolded Ram from inside the carriage, as Garfiel’s eyes sparkled, gaze fixed on one particular stall. “Don’t forget, we have a goal here.”

“Gah…” At Ram’s scathing words, Garfiel felt a deep sense of disappointment, having no choice but to watch as they moved further from the shop.

Garfiel’s fangs never stopped growing as a half-human, half-beast, so he needed to regularly crunch on hard things to shave them down. That knife woulda been perfect for filin’.

“The handle was so cool,” Garfiel said, still fixated on the knife. “Bet you woulda liked it, too.”

“Garf, we’re working right now,” Frederica reprimanded. “Get ahold of yourself,” she added, her hands on the reins as the driver, putting an end to his lingering attachment to the knife.

“Tch. Ya don’t need to tell me,” he scoffed. “I’m doin’ it.” Being somewhat aware of the fact he was supposed to be at work, he stuck out his tongue and withdrew. Then, placing a hand on his crossed legs and narrowing his green eyes, he said, “Otto-bro, people really do seem to have it out for ya.”

Sporadically, he took sniffs of the people gazing at their carriage and scratched his neck. Although Otto couldn’t really be seen from outside the carriage, the city guards had seen his face when they inspected the carriage as they entered the city. They must’ve been the ones who ratted him out. They’ll resort to anything to get what they want, huh.

“Ya must’ve done something really horrible to make ‘em go to such lengths, huh, Otto-bro? To sell ya out the second ya return… What the hell didja do?”

They’d not heard the particulars of the story, but just from the speed of their movements, it seemed clear he'd made an enemy of a very powerful person—to such an extent that they had not let their guard down even after several years. It musta been something huge to make someone so powerful hate him. What he do, disclose some big crime, or unearth some cover-up scandal or somethin'?

"If so, then we're bound ta have nothin' but enemies here," Garfiel speculated, subconsciously opening and closing his fist, and licking his lips. Quite some time had passed since the decision of the watergate city, and it seemed appropriate that his body had begun to ache. Considering Subaru's situation, this wasn't the time for pulling unnecessary weeds. However, if they proved to be an obstacle, harvesting them mercilessly was Garfiel's role. However, Garfiel felt somewhat resentful.

"If I ain't allowed ta punch 'em, I got no choice but to rely on that bastard Roswaal…" It had been decided outside the forest that it would become complicated if they were any person of social standing. In a world where such rules existed, Roswaal would be the strong presence that dealt with them, and that made Garfiel angry. He had been unhappy about Roswaal accompanying them on this journey from the start.

"I mean, yeah, the bastard's status could be handy," Garfiel admitted, "but whether he's actually dangerous is as factual as the existence of the Shy Man Allegro."

The safety of Subaru and Rem, who had been flung to the Sacred Vollachian Empire, remained uncertain, so the camp had to unite as a group in order to save them both. Given the circumstances, they didn't want to embark on a journey with anyone feeling uneasy. Even Garfiel felt sorry that he had not accompanied Emilia, Subaru, and the others when they had headed to the Pleiades Watchtower. Of course, he couldn't deny the fact that he had gained a lot of insights by remaining in the watergate city.

"…It's pretty tough havin' ta go step-by-step, Cap'n."

If Subaru could see Garfiel right now, perhaps he'd tell him not to panic. However, Subaru's reassuring words would be ineffective without his actual presence. Even Garfiel knew that only through persistent effort could he break through this wall of anxiety.

“Garf,” Frederica called out from the driver’s seat. Hearing the severity of her voice, Garfiel immediately followed her line of sight. He focused his attention along the road of the carriage, in the direction of the blue and black heads of the earth dragons. At that moment, he immediately understood Frederica’s reaction.

“What the hell?” Garfiel’s eyebrows furrowed, unsure of whether he should be on guard or not. In the direction of their gaze, the attention of the two half-beast siblings was captivated by a sturdy man, waving his arms in the middle of the road. The man was clearly determined to attract their attention and stop the carriage from moving forward.

The man flashed a charming smile at the perplexed siblings and said, “Don’t worry! Come to the Suwen Trading Company! Friends of my son!”

And with that, Otto was so taken aback by the unexpected greeting from inside the carriage that he bumped his head.

6

“Welcome,” greeted the well-built man, Mazeran, openly welcoming his guests. “You’ve come a long way. I’m Mazeran Suwen, head of the Suwen Trading Company.”

Observing his charming smile, Ram narrowed her light pink eyes and commented, “The apple certainly doesn’t fall so far from the tree.”

“You definitely didn’t mean that in a good way, did you?” Otto noted wryly at Ram’s pithy remark.

To which she only sniffed, “Hah.”

With a few well-chosen words, Ram could have easily crushed Otto’s spirit, but she was too merciful to cruelly torment a child in front of his own father. Even more so since it hadn’t only been his father, but his mother, too.

“Besides, Otto always comes home so abruptly,” remarked Framir Suwen, Otto’s mother. “It’s always been a constant worry for me, having a child who, once they make up their mind, becomes oblivious to everything else around them.”

Emilia, Frederica, and Petra enthusiastically engaged in conversation about Otto as they gathered around the elegant woman.

“Ah, but that might not have changed even now,” commented Emilia. “Otto is always causing a stir by doing crazy things with Subaru.”

“I’ll refrain from being too honest about Otto,” Frederica said flatly.

“My answer is the same as Sister Frederica’s,” Petra chimed in.

“…”

“What’s yer deal, Ram?” Garfiel asked. “Ya’ve been glarin’ daggers at Otto-bro’s folks for a while.”

“Nothing,” Ram said dismissively. “It just seems as though Otto takes after his parents. Ram was just erasing the impression she had that he was found abandoned under a bridge.”

“Is it really necessary to harbor such suspicions?!” Otto protested. “Even though I’m the middle child of three brothers?!”

“Just keeping it in mind,” Ram replied without elaboration.

“What for?!” Whether because he disliked Ram’s answer or was just excited by being home after so long, Otto was two or three times louder than usual.

Amongst the group’s lively chatter, Roswaal raised his hand. “Can I speak?” he asked, and turned his attention to Mazeran, who had been calmly observing the group he had invited into his house. “It appears you came out to greet us before our carriage had even passed by your hooouse. But as your wife said, Otto has returned home quite unexpectedly, without sending any letters.”

Roswaal cut straight to the heart of the suspicions that both Ram and Garfiel had been holding. Just as Roswaal pointed out, Mazeran had stopped their carriage before they could even inform him of their business with the Suwen Trading Company, or Otto's home. In other words, Mazeran somehow knew of his son's return, and of their intentions. Due to Clind's assistance in getting them there, there shouldn't have been any period of time for him to find out.

"Is that what you're asking?" Mazeran asked, snapping his finger at Roswaal's question. "I see. I'm sorry for surprising you. It's so completely common in this city that I didn't think to bring it up."

"Common…?"

"Yes," Mazeran affirmed with a nod. "This is a commercial city—a place where every single thing is considered tradable. That's not limited to cargo or labor; it includes information as well."

"…I see. So that's how it wooorks," Roswaal said, drawing in his chin in satisfaction with the response.

Seeing this, Ram's realization came a little late, and her gaze shifted outside—toward the path their carriage had traversed, and where the city inspection had taken place. It was clear that the inspector had examined not only the cargo but the people, as well. If that information had leaked, Mazeran could have easily caught wind of it.

However—

"Is it not a trust problem that the soldiers at the city's gates are so loose-liiiipped?"

"To consider them loose-lipped would be absurd," Mazeran stated in their defense. "They only tell the facts to the people who should be told. There is a certain trust in that. You could call it a contract."

His statement intertwined the words 'business opportunity' and 'opportunity to win' as if they meant the same thing. In Picoutatte, greedy merchants were cut-throat and prevalent, so sustaining a business for generations demanded favorable results. To meet those demands, Mazeran had chosen to do what he must.

Receiving information of his son's return so promptly indicated that he had been informed through the gate inspection. However, the possibility of Otto riding in the Mathers family carriage couldn't have been anticipated without first knowing where and what he was doing in the first place. In other words, every aspect of this encounter was the result of prior coordination and meticulous preparations.

"Ram is even more convinced that these are the parents of this child," Ram remarked.

"…It will improve our chances, I suppose," Beatrice whispered in response to Ram's mutterings. She sat by herself on the sofa, choosing to spend her time in a state of energy conservation until her reunion with Subaru. She had decided this was the best way to deal with the exhaustion of being unable to draw mana from anywhere else.

Regardless, it was painfully obvious to Ram—who also had someone she wanted to reunite with—that Beatrice's mutterings came from her feelings of impatience.

"Just as Beatrice said, their keen attention to our movements is a bit disconcerting," Ram pointed out. "However, it has raised our hopes for the sake of our goal."

"Goal…" Mazeran gently caressed the mustache under his nose, contemplating Ram's determination.

Ram nodded, sensing the great influence he's had on his son from his gentle tone of voice and soft expressions, and urged: "Otto, please speak."

"Right now?!" Otto responded, surprised at the sudden encouragement to speak. As Ram pressed him on, he continued reluctantly. "Okay, I guess… Father, I have something to discuss. I'm sure you understand that things are tense right now, but it's about the Vollachia Empire."

“Oh, Vollachia?” Mazeran asked, raising his eyebrows. Everything about the gesture seemed exaggerated, as though it were a technique to manipulate the thoughts of the one speaking. However, perhaps this was reading too much into things, considering that he was talking to his own son.

“Sooner or later, we have to enter the Empire,” Otto confided. “All of us, if possible. However, we can’t cross the border using legitimate methods. So…”

“You want a way to cross it illegally. And for that reason, you’re asking for my help?” Mazeran summarized.

“Yes, uh, exactly.” Taking off his hat, Otto disclosed their situation to his father with an honest face. “A way and information—that’s what we need.”

Understanding their goal from his explanation, Mazeran narrowed his eyes in thought. Then as he opened his mouth to speak—

“In other words, you need the help of the Suwen Trading Company, yes? If that’s the case, then it’s not something to discuss, Otto.”

“Mother…”

Before Mazeran could reply, Framir had breached the subject.

The woman who had been speaking with Emilia and the others seemed to also have been listening in on her husband and son’s conversation. Smiling kindly at Otto, he turned to her as she spoke. “I’m certain I taught you how to speak properly, didn’t I?” she said. “The situation remains the same, whether you’re dealing with family or not. Do you remember that, too?”

“Uh… Yes, I remember,” Otto affirmed.

“Good. Then, if it’s not a discussion…” Maintaining a composed posture, Framir kept smiling as she extended her hand to Otto.

Bewilderment swept over Emilia and Frederica. Even Garfiel watched the scene unfold with a look of confusion on his face. The other half—Roswaal, Ram, and Petra—all sensed something was amiss, and Otto’s face seemed to convey a particular realization.

Affirming their suspicions, he heaved a big sigh. “I didn’t come here to discuss, but to negotiate… Let’s talk. A fruitful negotiation between the head of our group—Emilia—and the Suwen Trading Company.” Otto made a show of holding his hat to his chest, to which the married couple burst into smiles.

“Good.”

“That’s my boy.”

The strangeness of this family exchange was beyond description. However, despite Ram’s impression of it, Emilia made a different observation regarding the scene she’d just witnessed. “Otto, you truly are the spitting image of your mother and father,” she said warmly, in response to the wholesome interaction.

Ram simply let out a sigh.

Stand By Me Pleiades III

1

A secret business negotiation was under way at the Suwen Company in the commercial city of Picoutatte. The focus of the negotiation revolved around gaining entry into the Vollachia Empire, which had sealed its borders and prohibited crossings between the two countries. The topic was how to sneak themselves in.S

Needless to say, smuggling was illegal. Getting caught would have severe consequences, especially in a country known for its harsh policies. Accomplices to this crime would also face severe repercussions, should they be caught. To complicate matters further, one of the individuals involved in this risky endeavor was none other than the Kingdom of Lugunica's esteemed Head Court Magician and Margrave of the Western Domain, Roswaal L. Mathers.

The other key player was Emilia, who stood as one of the candidates for the throne in the royal selection, the process by which the next monarch would be determined. While news of Roswaal's attempt to cross the border would indeed cause ripples throughout both the Kingdom and the Empire, the impact of Emilia's presence would be far more dire.

"Had it only been limited to the Master, the consequences would be limited to him getting beheaded. But if word gets out about Sister Emilia, it could spark a full-blown war with the Empire…" Although her words hinted at her bias, Petra understood the graveness of the possible future.

In her earlier life as a simple village girl, Petra's world had been small and limited. But it was Subaru who opened her eyes to her narrow-mindedness. Thanks to him, she had come to know the vastness of the world and the warmth of love. However, setting aside her own personal revelations for the moment, the current issue lies in the stark contrast between the perspectives of Petra the ordinary village girl, and her responsibilities as an attendant to royal selection candidate Emilia.

Petra Leyte was always busy, constantly on the move. Ever since departing Earlham Village, she had become a diligent and responsible person, immersing herself in her daily lessons and tasks. Her duties as a maid, her education as a servant in Margrave Mathers's mansion, her own personal physical and mental training. The list of responsibilities seemed endless, and she hardly had enough fingers to count them.

As she hurried through her hectic days, Petra couldn't help but notice the growing tension between the Kingdom and the Empire. Both countries had engaged in multiple conflicts over trivial matters, exacerbating the already strained relations.

But regardless of the size or significance of these conflicts, they were nonetheless clashes between countries. They held no comparison to the harmless scuffles her childhood friends Lucas and Mild had. These conflicts resulted in countless lives being affected and suffering great harm. According to history, Petra had learned that even the most minor of issues could escalate into something far more destructive. And if a mere spark could ignite a full-blown war, then Emilia's involvement was akin to tossing a drunken Otto into a warehouse full of fire magic stones.

"I need to be careful not to drag down Sister Emilia," Petra murmured, sitting atop her luggage and gathering her resolve.

"Petra, can I have a moment?"

Just then, she sprang up with an "Eek!" upon the sound of a sudden voice. However, it wasn't only the abruptness of the voice that startled her, but also because the individual in question was none other than the person she had just imagined tossing drunkenly into a warehouse full of fire magic stones.

There stood Otto Suwen, raising a brow before her as she turned around to face him. He chuckled at Petra's reaction. "Oh, did I startle you? That was an adorable yelp."

"No, no, I'm fine," reassured Petra. "It's just that I was imagining you in a warehouse full of fire magic stones a moment ago."

"You put me in a warehouse full of fire magic stones?!"

"Oh, just ignore that. No big deal."

"It is a big deal for the me inside your head," Otto lamented, to which Petra lightly waved her hand, dispelling her imagined version of him. He dissipated into a haze, revealing the real Otto, looking on with a tinge of sorrow. "But that is exactly what makes you seem like Frederica's number one apprentice," he continued.

This was perhaps the highest form of praise Petra could get. Frederica was Petra's role model, and her goal in life was to catch up to her. The reason Petra pursued her studies so diligently was undoubtedly to become more worthy of Subaru, the person she loved. However, it was equally important for her not to burden Emilia, whom she served faithfully. She had also vowed to herself to never bring shame upon Frederica, her mentor. For this reason, it delighted her to be told she resembled her.

"However, I'd prefer if you saved your flattery for more significant moments," Petra remarked. "Don't go doing so too casually."

"To be honest," Otto began, "it was not intended as flattery. You are an amazing individual with so much ambition. I think there are many people who could learn from your example."

"Is that so? I thought you were the kind of person who found more satisfaction in rewards positioned as hard-earned achievements." Wouldn't people rather be praised for accomplishing something difficult than for something easy? There'd be a greater sense of accomplishment, not to mention praise from other people.

"Hmm, I suppose there is a degree of truth in that." Otto placed his hand on his chin and nodded in agreement. "Oh, whoops. Our appointment is drawing near. Preparations appear to be going… smoothly, it seems?"

Directing his gaze at Petra, Otto spoke with composure, recalling his original objective. Petra extended her arms and twirled gracefully as she stood, revealing a striking transformation in terms of her attire. Her usual maid's uniform had given way to a captivating ensemble suitable for travel.

She wore an outer layer with ample sleeves and a knee-length skirt, accompanied by trousers underneath for enhanced mobility. Her outfit exuded elegance and practicality for their journey, hinting at Petra's careful contemplation for the role she was expected to play.

"I don't want to draw attention and cause trouble for Sister Emilia… Anyway, what do you think?" Petra asked.

"Yes, it is quite nice," Otto replied. "I have grown used to seeing you in your maid uniform, so the change is rather refreshing."

"Mmm, that's not exactly what I meant," Petra clarified. "I was asking if it looks cute or not."

"Ah, I see. Sorry," Otto apologized. "It is cute. It suits you well."

"I know, right?" Petra said, a satisfied smile playing on her lips having received her desired response. While a maiden would never wish to attract negative attention, neither would she desire fading into the background. This is the result of my pursuit of perfect balance. So wouldn't it be nice to receive genuine praise? I sure wish I could show Subaru… I'd love to hear his opinion.

"Do not worry," Otto said reassuringly. "You will surely be able to see him soon."

Petra fell silent. Otto tilted his head quizzically, sensing her change in attitude. "Huh? Something wrong?" he inquired. His reaction was vexing, seeming oblivious to the strangeness of his words, as if he had an uncanny ability to read her mind.

"You always seem to hit the nail on the head when it comes to things like this," she mumbled.

"Wait," Otto started, "am I being scolded, by any chance?"

"I'm complimenting you, albeit unwillingly."

“I do not feel any satisfaction, despite it being a complement…” Otto whined, his expression tinged with bitterness as he scratched his head. Petra couldn’t help but feel a hint of contentment at his reaction.

“So,” she continued, casting her gaze toward the entrance hall of the manor, “our guide is arriving soon, right?”

The reason Otto had come was to inform Petra of the eagerly anticipated arrival of a certain individual. He closed one of his eyes and nodded in response. “Yes. Thanks to the help of the Regundra family, we’ve acquired the person who will help us sneak into the Empire. Are you adequately prepared for what lies ahead, my lady? I mean, not only in terms of appearance, but on an emotional level, too?” His words carried a teasing edge, as if gauging the extent of Petra’s dedication to her role.

2

“If we be makin’ our way ‘cross the border, I reckon I’ll hafta dig us through the earth beneath,” declared the man who had been designated as their guide.

His face was obscured deeply by his hood. He was short in stature, with visible dirt stains clinging to his hooded robe. Although his face remained hidden, Petra speculated that he might be around the same age as her father.

Few words were exchanged, yet he carried the air of a man of experience. His demeanor was dignified, despite having been summoned by the esteemed Regundra family, who were some of the most prominent merchants in the bustling city of Picoutatte.

“The least I can do is be keepin’ me humility,” he said, “but I ain’t gonna let fear get the best o’ me, ye know? Folks wit’ jobs like ours be outta business if we ain’t taken seriously, miss.”

“Uh…” Petra started.

“Me apologies,” he said. “That be mighty impolite of me, peerin’ into yer faces despite not showin’ ye me own mug…hehehe.”

Petra felt called out, as if she had been caught staring rudely at him. She quickly averted her gaze. At that moment, Garfiel took a decisive step forward, putting himself between Petra and the guide.

Shielding her behind him, he fixed a stern glare at the guide, whose face remained hidden. “I’m sayin’ this for yer own good,” Garfiel threatened. “Quit intimidatin’ our lady. Yer treadin’ dangerous ground if ya don’t.”

“Dangerous ground?” the man inquired. “An’ I reckon yer gonna be the one causin’ a stir wit’ me?”

“Nah, not my amazin’ self. Those guys,” Garfiel stated firmly, arms crossed as he gestured with his chin. The guide looked around, his gaze settling on the two figures Garfiel had pointed out: Frederica and Ram. Similar to Petra, they weren’t donning their maid uniforms, but were clad in practical travel attire. They narrowed their almond-shaped eyes. Despite their dashing looks, an aura of intimidation surrounded them.

Meeting the guide’s eyes, they smiled. Ram spoke up first. “Ram understands that those in your line of work cannot afford to be underestimated. However…”

“We would like to assure you that we are not quite as delicate as we may appear,” Frederica added.

The man conceded. “Me bad. Seems the odds ain’t swingin’ in me favor.”

Yielding under their gaze, he retreated further into the depths of his hood, acknowledging defeat. Petra’s heart swelled with pride at the reliability of her elder sister figures. The surprise she had experienced only a moment ago had faded into the background. She tapped Garfiel’s back, who had stepped in to shield her, and offered her gratitude. “Thank you, Garf.”

“Ha, don’t sweat it,” he replied. “Protectin’ this camp’s my amazin’ self’s job while the cap’n is away. Jus’ quit scamperin’ off so much.”

“Jeez, I didn’t scamper off. Quit treating me like a child,” Petra pouted. Garfiel laughed, revealing his sharp fangs. Regardless, their intention wasn't to make the guide feel bad.

"Ummm," Petra began, "I apologize for staring at you before, Mr. Guide. You are…"

"The name be Musica," the guide interjected.

"Musica, you're going to take us there, right? To the Empire?"

At Petra's query, the guide, Musica, paused briefly before responding with a profound nod. Witnessing that response, Petra felt a quiet surge of hope well up in her chest. Finally, we found the key to our journey to the Empire. To where Subaru is…

A smuggler's intermediary was a perilous occupation. It required significant effort simply to establish contact with such an individual. They had leaned on the Suwen family–Otto's family–ultimately securing an introduction in the form of a business engagement. Yet it was this person with the "contacts" who posed a challenge.

"Miss Diadora, thank you for the referral," Petra said gratefully.

"No need to thank me," the woman responded, turning her back to Petra. "After all, this arrangement serves my interests as well."

This woman, with her opulently coiled hair, was Diadora Regundra, the daughter of the esteemed Regundra family, prominent merchants within the city of Picoutatte. It was she who had forged the link between Petra and Musica. It was also she who had been responsible for hindering Otto's ability to return home, and the mastermind behind Otto's status as a wanted man.

The feud between Otto and Diadora, in which both parties held some fault, found resolution through Otto's apology and his acknowledgment of his own recklessness as that which bore the greater fault. Although certainly, Diadora's hiring of assassins to target Otto could be deemed somewhat excessive.

"If my impulsive actions driven by desperation and my lack of consideration for my surroundings are deemed enough to warrant my life, I cannot argue against it,” Otto confessed. His words were an introspective reflection on his past behavior, thus bringing their conflict to an end.

It had been none other than Petra who proposed that Otto apologize after hearing Diadora’s side of the story. However, she was genuinely taken back by the sincerity of his heartfelt apology not limited to only words. “I must say, Otto is quite odd…” she thought aloud.

Diadora’s attention, however, was elsewhere. “In any case…” she started, hurrying toward Musica. Towering above the comparatively shorter man, the tall, slender Diadora inquired, “Did you come here on your own? Is the chief not joining you?”

“Father ain’t feelin’ too well,” Musica responded. “Gonna take some time to recuperate. I reckon he’s gonna retire. So, bit by bit, I’ll be takin’ over.”

“I see… I wish him a swift recovery. However, work is a separate matter. These individuals are important guests, not only of myself, but of the entire Regundra family. It is critical that they encounter no inconveniences,” Diadora instructed.

“Aye, well aware o’ that,” Musica acknowledged, bowing reverently. His face—or rather, his voice—showed no signs of displeasure at Diadora’s authoritative tone.

Judging by the flow of the conversation, it was evident that this business was overseen by his father, and that Musica would be inheriting his role. A generational business centered around smuggling people was a world entirely foreign to Petra’s previous imaginings.

“Lady Petra,” Diadora spoke. For a brief moment, Petra found herself taken aback by the formality of the address. However, she concealed her anxiety, responding with a gentle smile to Diadora, who had turned to face her. It’s the role that I am expected to play and the script that I must follow…

Ram and Frederica, donning their travel attire, waited alongside

Garfiel and Otto in quiet anticipation for a response from the girl who had been called “Lady” Petra. That’s when another voice spoke up.

“Don’t be so tense, Lady Petra. Relaaaax.” It was Roswaal.

“Yes, that’s right,” Emilia chimed in. “You can count on us for sure!”

Petra felt her face tensing up as the two addressed her, yet she managed to maintain her composure. I have to keep it together. I’m a daughter of nobility in a rather complex situation.

“Thank you,” Petra finally replied, remembering her role as the respectable master of Roswaal and Emilia. “I’m putting my trust in you… Dudley, Emily,” she added, calling the two by their chosen aliases.

3

The primary objective behind their illicit entry into the Vollachia Empire revolved around safeguarding Emilia’s true identity, while also ensuring that Roswaal’s true identity remained concealed. Given the delicate nature of the relationship between the Kingdom and the Empire, the mere revelation of their identities could result in war, as they had previously been made aware. Therefore, it was imperative to maintain utmost secrecy regarding their identities during the illegal border crossing.

To achieve this, they had devised a carefully-orchestrated setup. Petra assumed the role of a noblewoman with complicated circumstances, while the individuals accompanying her took on the roles of her guards and attendants.

“This might sound somewhat insensitive, but it feels reaaally exciting,” Emilia remarked. Going by the alias of Emily, Emilia was to act as Petra’s guard, dressed in her usual cognitive disruption robe. Between Frederica and the other maids, and Garfiel and Otto, assuming the roles of military and civil officers, respectively, there wasn’t anything conspicuously out of place. However, Emilia’s presence felt quite out of place.

Emilia had been rather inept at lying and hiding things to begin with. Being so good natured, straightforward, and honest to her core, she was susceptible to stomach aches whenever she resorted to lying. Of course, her motivation was genuine, however that motivation often backfired, leading those around her to scrutinize her words and actions. On the other hand, in contrast to her heaping mass of insecurities—

“Lady Petra, pray, may I inquire if you find yourself parched?” Roswaal queried. “If there be aught that requires attending, do not hesitate to commaaand me.”

“Your face is annoying me, sir,” Petra groaned.

“Oh, I implore you to desist,” Roswaal responded unperturbed. “Engaging in such formal colloquial discourse with individuals of lower standing is rather inappropriate. Maintaining your customary air of arrogance would scaaaarcely be remiss.”

“Your face is so annoying… Get out of my sight,” Petra insisted, pursing her lips. She spoke in a manner of which she was well aware lacked any semblance of charm, directed at the individual who was earnestly attending to her in the dragon carriage.

Unperturbed by her harsh attitude, Roswaal joyfully backed away, giving her space. His nonchalant demeanor irked her even more. He was visibly enjoying their predicament much as Emilia was. Perhaps, even more.

Assuming the alias of Dudley and acting as Petra’s butler, Roswaal’s attire differed from his eccentric norm. Rather, it was fancy yet practical travel attire befitting of the long journey ahead, tastefully accented rather than excessively expressive so as to not to overshadow his mistress.

His long hair was tied back, and his natural face was unadorned by makeup. This butler character hardly bore any resemblance to Roswaal L. Mathers at all, more so to those who knew him well.

“It really bothers me how effective that makeup is…” Petra remarked to herself.

In the sense of how substantially his impression had changed, the impact of his usual eccentric attire and makeup was clear. He didn't require any form of cognitive disruption like Emilia did, as his usual whimsicalness was more than effective. Petra felt bitter, but refrained from commenting, as she knew full well that this transformation also played a role in rescuing Subaru.

"I know how ya feel, Petra," Garfiel sympathized. "Like they say, 'Appas from Kue look sweet but are sour.'"

Petra smiled wryly at Garfiel, who understood her emotions. He was similar to Petra in that neither of them had a good opinion of Roswaal. In essence, they were part of the "Let's Keep a Harsh Eye on Roswaal" alliance. Otto was another member, along with one more.

"Beatrice…" Petra whispered. The young girl on her lap offered no response to her voice. Beatrice, in a state of energy conservation, slept on her lap as a pillow. She gently stroked the cheek of the young girl's white, doll-like, slumbering visage. It may have appeared quite disrespectful of Beatrice to be in such a position in the presence of an outsider, considering Petra's role as a noblewoman. However, this was not an issue, thanks to the script Petra and Beatrice adhered to. They had explained to Musica that they were sisters. Notably, Petra played the role of the elder sister, while Beatrice assumed that of the younger one.

"She got all angry, saying 'Betty is far older, in fact.'" Petra smiled as she remembered Beatrice's red-faced complaint. It was certainly something Beatrice would say, however, as Petra was taller, the situation couldn't be helped. A year had already passed since she had met Beatrice, and Petra had transformed from a girl to a lady in that span. She was different from the spirit Beatrice, whose adorable appearance remained unchanging.

"The gap between us is going to only get wider while you sleep like that," Petra whispered, gently caressing Beatrice's soft cheek. While Petra deeply yearned to reunite with Subaru, Beatrice remained a dear friend, and her forced sleep proved more agonizing than separation.

"How's yer lil' sis holdin' up?" Petra's concern for Beatrice was met by Musica's inquiry from where he had been riding beside the dragon carriage. Atop his earth dragon, he led the party toward their destination. According to their plan, Petra served as the group's representative. This led her to suspect that Musica's inquiry was either an exercise in courtesy, or a means of ingratiating himself. What a cynical notion, Petra thought, shaking her head.

"Thank you for the consideration. I suppose her condition hasn't changed," Petra said.

"Me apologies 'bout that," Musica apologized. "That be a daft question. If she were to manage recoverin' after gettin' rattled by this here dragon carriage, there'd be no need for a journey like this in the first place."

"Right…" Petra gave a short answer, admonishing herself for her persistent air of caution. Although she thought of Musica's questions as probing, they could also be interpreted as dutiful adherence to Diadora's orders, and consideration for her important guests.

It was often the case that things perceived maliciously tended to become malicious, while those approached with goodwill tended to result in positive outcomes.

"Were you really that concerned about my sister?" Petra asked.

"That be it, too," Musica replied, "but it ain't like I'd go outta my way showin' it, with them guard of yers givin' me them glarey eyes… We be approachin' me workplace soon."

"Workplace…"

Although Musica's expression remained hidden by his hood, Petra understood his gesture, indicating what lay before them. Following his gesture, she peered ahead to where Otto was positioned on the coach box. The highway had long since disappeared, and they were now traversing lands not usually frequented. However, their destination lied straight ahead.

“This be Shamrock Valley. Me workplace,” Musica confirmed. Petra wordlessly squinted her eyes at the location ahead.

Shamrock Valley, situated east of the commercial city of Picoutatte, was one of the most notorious spots in the entire Kingdom of Lugunica, known for its shady stories and ominous tales. The area was shrouded in an ever-present mist and saturated with a high concentration of mana. It was rumored that the souls of the deceased, referred to as hollows, wandered the region. It was an eerie reputation that discouraged most people from venturing into the area.

“Such a shady reputation must be exaaactly what makes it that much more convenient for crossing the border in secret, riiight?” Roswaal asked.

“Aye, ye be right,” Musica responded. “It be a blessin’ from the gods, both for us and fer them guests puttin’ their trust in us, don’t ye reckon?”

“Well, ya ain’t wrong. I jus’ hate how ya put it,” Garfiel said.

Musica shrugged in response to Roswaal and Garfiel’s exchange before shifting his attention to Petra. He appeared to gauge her feelings, considering the foreboding canyon looming ahead. However…

“Just make use of whatever you feel is most convenient. Even if it’s Hollow’s Mecca or whatever. You don’t have to keep checking up on me,” Petra reassured.

“I get it,” Musica remarked. “Ye got guts, I’ll give ye that. Yer reassurin’ answer actually eases me mind a bit.”

His voice carried a note of astonishment at his incorrect assumption, and he reverently bowed. Petra nodded with satisfaction, and Garfiel and Roswaal each acknowledged Petra’s courageousness with a voice low enough that an outsider couldn’t hear them.

“No shock, comin’ from the chillest one in our camp,” Garfiel commented.

Roswaal added, “I made the right decision in recommending you from the staaaart.”

Petra accepted the praise from Garfiel, and half of the praise from Roswaal, as she anticipated their arrival at Shamrock Valley. It wasn’t an act of bravado. Petra simply lacked the fear commonly associated with hollows and unfounded superstitions. She was eager to traverse the misty valley as soon as possible.

However, a slight hint of unease lingered. Divided into two dragon carriages, Petra couldn’t help but worry about the resolve of those in the carriage behind theirs. “I hope Sister Frederica’s side is faring well,” she said to herself.

4

Shamrock Valley was enshrouded in an ever-present mist and a high concentration of mana. It was a literal ‘loophole’, a passage between the Kingdom of Lugunica and the Vollachia Empire, carved deep within the ominous lands.

“It may look spooky, but as long as we have a guide, there is no need to fear,” Otto assured.

“You don’t seem the type to fear hollows, anyway,” added Petra.

“Well, that may change if I ever happen to come in contact with a real one in person,” Otto said, gripping the reins. “But so far, I have yet to encounter anything like that, so I have no reason to be afraid.” Living humans were far more frightening, not to mention experienced merchants–a sentiment to which Petra also agreed.

In fact, even along this bumpy terrain, the earth dragon’s Divine Protection of Wind Evasion allowed Otto’s beloved dragon, Frufoo, to pull the carriage with no issue. Naturally, the same principles would apply to the carriage pulled by Subaru’s dragon, Patrasche. However…

“Eek!” Frederica’s scream pierced the air. “W-Was that a face floating in the mist over there?!”

“It is only the wind stirring up the mist,” Ram said rationally. “It only happened to appear that way.”

“Ah, wait, Ram!” Emilia interjected. “I think I heard someone calling for help in the fog! It sounded like, ‘The only way out is death!’ That’s so distressing! We have to help them!”

“It is the wind,” Ram repeated. “We are in a valley, so it probably just sounded like a human voice.”

Unlike those of us progressing smoothly, Ram’s side seems a bit on edge. Even if Sister Frederica tries to hide it, she’s a bit of a scaredy-cat, and tends to overreact to things like hollows and unexplained phenomena. Now that I think of it, I heard that Sister Emilia was also fearful of hollows before, but in her case, that was because she couldn’t distinguish between hollows and humans. But so long as she perceives cursed words as a call for help, she’s far off from Frederica’s level.

“Ram is content with her never reaching that state for all eternity,” Ram muttered. “Babysitting one person is enough for Ram.”

“I can’t disagree with you there, Sister Ram… I mean, Ram,” agreed Petra.

Nonetheless, thanks to Ram’s physical control of the reins and her role as a leader, they successfully traversed the valley without incident, reaching their destination—the loophole.

“So this is…” Petra began.

“This thing here be what we call the Everlasting Darkness,” Musica explained. “Folks say this tunnel’s been dug out by our grandfolks’ grandfolks, way back when.”

“Dug by your ancestors, Musica?” Petra asked.

“Yep, with these here claws.” Musica slowly removed his hood before Petra, who was overwhelmed by the sight of the cave gaping on a small hillside in front of them. Petra and the others gawked at his previously hidden face, now revealed.

“Sorry ‘bout bein’ so rude all this time,” Musica said. “It’s ‘cause we be hated, plain and simple.” Saying that, he waved his hands—hands with thick, sharp claws that had also been hidden under the robe—and smiled, face covered in short, dark brown hair.

With his round nose, large mouth, and small ears, his face resembled a rat. Despite his slight stature, it was clear that his round body wasn’t fat, but rather packed with dense, powerful muscles. His eyes were obscured by the short hairs, similar in color to the soil, which rendered them invisible even without the cover of the hood. Yet, Petra knew exactly what Musica was.

“Are you a moleman?” she asked.

“Aye, aye. We ain’t an easy bunch to come across, ye know? So, seems to me the only way yer familiar with us is either ‘cause yer well-read and savvy, or ‘cause of our notorious rep.”

“I think it’s because I’m so studious.”

“Tch, tch, how nice of ye,” Musica said with a chuckle that could be taken as either sarcasm or gratitude. Petra speculated that Musica’s self-deprecation was likely connected to the rumors surrounding the mole people and their history of persecution. It wasn’t entirely irrelevant to Emilia’s ideals of winning the royal selection.

“Iris and the King of Thorns,” Petra said, referring to the title of a play. Musica silently affirmed. It was a popular play originating from the Vollachia Empire, said to be based on true historical events.

The story followed a girl named Iris who fell in love with the King of Thorns. To save him from a dire situation, she faced calamity with the help of many people. At first glance, it sounded like a universally beloved tale. However, its enduring impact arose from its tragic ending.

At the end of the play, the protagonist, Iris, perished after driving away the calamity. She had been betrayed by her companions, right before reuniting with her lover. The story ended without her ever meeting her beloved again. And as the play was based on historical facts, the characters also reflected historical figures. Many signs indicated that the King of Thorns represented the Emperor of the Vollachia Empire at the time. Iris, the girl who died before their reunion, was also confirmed to have been real.

"Those who betrayed Iris and brought about the tragedy were the same ones who had helped her counter the calamity—the mole people and wolf people," Petra summarized.

"'Cause o' that, we ain't had no place in the Empire fer generations," Musica said. "Them wolf folk, they ain't be knowin' how to make 'emselves scarce, and got 'emselves wiped out. Then our forefathers dug this here tunnel and…"

"And that's what led to this Everlasting Darkness?" Petra concluded.

He nodded and gave a small smile, clearly impressed, as the darkness loomed behind her. "Ye really got that studious streak in ye."

"Why are you sharing this story with me?"

"There's folks out there who be gettin' all riled up just 'cause the tunnel been dug by a buncha mole people," Musica answered the skeptical Petra. "It'd be a right pain if ye start gripin' once ye get inside, so think if it as givin' ye the chance to bugger off at the entrance if ye fancy."

"You can also think of it as reassurance," Otto added, joining the conversation. He raised a finger in response to Petra's puzzled gaze, also looking out at the Everlasting Darkness. "As Musica mentioned, there may be people who'll become apprehensive after learning about the mole people's notoriety. At the same time, though, once they learn the past about his ancestors escaping from the Empire, it can also serve as a reassurance to prove that this cave does in fact connect the two countries."

"Oh, you mean as a way to prove he has no intention of deceiving us and trapping us inside?" Petra asked.

"That is correct. What do you think? Though I imagine that you would have explained it even if I had not brought it up.” Otto closed his eyes, directing his inquiry at Musica, who raised his arms in surrender.

“Blimey, ye lot can be quite frightenin’, can’t ye?” he said. “‘Fraid I’ll have to kindly ask ye not to hinder me business, mate.” It appeared that Otto’s assumption was indeed correct, and that Otto had indeed disrupted his work.

“My apologies,” Otto said. “Please understand that the impact is not as great on those of us who are already aware.”

“Otto, you probably shouldn’t say that out loud…” Petra cautioned Otto on his critical attitude toward others.

“My apologies,” Otto formally apologized to Musica after Petra’s scolding. He appeared to have been oblivious of his actions. He was undeniably dependable, but whether due to his merchant nature or his own disposition, he tended to interact rather coldly with those outside his inner circle. Despite his competence as a domestic affairs official and adeptness at facts and figures, there were still times in which he fell short.

“It’d sure be great if Subaru were here for moments like these,” Petra reflected.

“Well, I’ll be damned!” Musica said. “Look at that, ye got yerself a mighty tender look there chatterin’ ‘bout that Subaru. Who in tarnation is the feller?”

“He’s my fiancé,” Petra beamed unapologetically.

“Buh—” Otto attempted to suppress his laughter, but burst into a fit of amusement. Petra stuck out her tongue at him and shifted her gaze to the gaping mouth of the Everlasting Darkness. Now fully aware that this immense tunnel led to the Empire and why it had been dug, there was only one task left.

Petra clenched her fists. “We need to pass through here to accomplish our goal.”

“Y’know, even reckonin’ it be all fer the sake of yer sister, ye still one brave lass," Musica commended her determination with a sigh of admiration.

Her companions had informed the impressed Musica that the reason for their journey to the Empire was for Beatrice's sake. They explained that the cure for Beatrice's ailment, stuck in a state of light sleep, was in the Empire.

In fact, the cure for Beatrice's situation was Subaru. Thus, they hadn't lied about anything. They simply worded it differently. And the same went for Petra, who was also in need of the same cure.

"So, what's the deal?" Garfiel asked. "Ya gonna guide us through that tunnel like how ya brought us here?"

"Loosely speakin', yeah," Musica replied. "But wit' a moniker like 'Everlasting Darkness', ye best believe the insides be pitch-black. Ye won't be catchin' a breath if ye bring fire in there…"

"So what?" Garfiel pressed.

"From here on, all 'em folks from me clan gonna go alongside ye," Musica answered straightforwardly. Little by little, a dozen figures emerged from the depths of the tunnel, all mole people like Musica, dressed in similar robes with prominent stains of dirt.

"We'll be headin' in with our Divine Protection of Wind Evasion down, so kindly pay heed an' make yer moves accordingly," Musica instructed. Leading the group of mole people, he maintained his role as their guide through the Everlasting Darkness they would soon face, instructing Petra and her companions to brace themselves for a journey that promised to be anything but pleasant.

5

As Musica had warned them beforehand, the journey through the Everlasting Darkness was full of challenges. For starters, they had been engulfed in an overwhelming pitch-blackness as they moved through the walls of soil.

The passageway through the soil of Shamrock Valley was a place that received scarce sunlight. Lagmite ores positioned at regular intervals along the path provided faint sources of illumination. However, the gaps between them were quite wide, and Petra, who was unaccustomed to such circumstances, found them difficult to rely on. The mental strain of the inability to see one's surroundings far exceeded her expectations.

Despite having been pre-informed of the dark path they would traverse, experiencing it firsthand was an entirely different story, and her initial resolve seemed to have easily dissolved within the oppressive blackness. Reclaiming my courage will be no simple task in this endless expanse of darkness.

The thing making her gloominess further melancholic was the humid air inside the Everlasting Darkness. Maybe it was due to the fog of the canyon entering it, the humidity underground was really strong, and she also felt it being slimy. On top of that, if she began sweating due to the heat then it would have been worse, but she had narrowly escaped that agony. But then cold dampness was bad for your health too and one needed to be careful not to get sick from it. And the greatest difficulty that surpassed the darkness and humidity was…

"My butt hurts…" Petra muttered before lifting her butt off the seat and massaging it. She was trying out different things, like adjusting her position or sitting on luggage, but nothing seemed to work, so it tormented her without end.

As has been previously explained, the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion didn't work within the Everlasting Darkness. To be precise, it couldn't be activated as it didn't meet the requirements for doing so. It was a divine protection that was bestowed upon all species of earth dragon that allowed them to run unhindered by wind resistance or rough terrain, or any other factors that might prevent them from running smoothly. It was a crucial element for long journeys, but in order for it to activate, the earth dragon had to be running; standing still or going at a slow pace didn't count.

Due to the darkness of the Everlasting Darkness, they had to move forward carefully, as they couldn't see ahead of them. It was because of that that Petra's butt was dealt devastating damage.

“Guh, the pain won’t go away no matter how much I massage it…” she complained.

“Are you alright, Lady Petra? Would you like to sit on my lap?” asked Emilia, who was riding in the dragon carriage with Petra, unable to bear seeing her in pain.

“Emily…”

Emilia was treating her as her mistress, acting in the way she should in the role she had been given. They were both in the same boat with the divine protection not being active, but Emilia looked energetic as ever even in the dim light.

“Doesn’t your butt hurt, Emily?”

“It hurts a little, of course, but it’s nothing I can’t manage. Say, I think it would be more comfortable to sit on my lap than in a seat, so how about it?” Emilia asked again, weakening Petra’s frail resolve by patting her thighs.

“I-I’m flattered by the offer, but…” She felt like it would make her feel significantly better if she accepted her attractive offer to let her sit on her lap. But how would Musica and his companions react to seeing this? It would do no good to make them have doubts about us just because my butt hurts. “But it hurts so much that it makes me want to cry…”

“You can just take it easy, Petra. Subaru lies at the end of this dark path, so I can endure it.”

“I’ll endure it as well, then.”

“Huh?! Why?!” Emilia cried, widening her eyes in surprise at Petra’s sudden change of heart. Considering her position, Petra couldn’t lean on her after hearing her say something like that. Emilia had unintentionally changed the pain she was feeling in her butt into a competition to see whose feelings for Subaru were stronger, so now she was determined to win, the trivial pain be damned.

Her resolve to endure the pain, however, was immediately interrupted by a chuckle. “Hah.”

“…What’s so funny, Dudley?” Petra asked, glaring at the one who had laughed—Roswaal—who was sitting across from her. She could barely make out his face due to the dim conditions they were in, but even so, it was clear to her that he was grinning. “That face really makes me sick,” she muttered.

“Oh my, can you see it from all the way ooover there?”

“Yes, but even if I couldn’t, I’d be able to tell since you’re always looking at me like that, Dudley,” Petra seemingly accused without remorse. As expected, despite her stern tone, Roswaal just chuckled as if it amused him.

His casualness was what irritated her in the first place. He was fulfilling his role as a pretend butler with perfection, and even seemed to be enjoying his disguise. We’re on a journey to rescue Subaru and Rem, yet he doesn’t seem to be taking it seriously, she thought. Maybe Ram and Garfiel should give him a good whipping.

“No matter what I say, he just doesn’t listen,” Petra lamented.

“Yeah, you’re right. I think so as well,” Emilia said, agreeing with the offended Petra. “That’s not very nice, Ros—Dudley.”

Roswaal gave her a provocative look. “Hm, whatever do you mean by that? I’m ever curious to see how you plan on correcting me, Emily.”

“Hmph.”

Roswaal normally showed Emilia respect, but their temporary disguises as Dudley and Emily had them in the same class. Petra’s face soured at Roswaal’s taking advantage of it. However…

“Status isn’t what matters here,” Emilia asserted. “You know very well that Lady Petra is working reaaally hard but are still being a meanie… That’s childish and uncool.”

“What are you saying? That you should constantly be worried with a serious frown on your face while traveling?”

"That's not a nice way to put it, either. I'm worried about Subaru and Rem too, but I don't think we should always be gloomy." Emilia pulled Petra closer and hugged her shoulders as she confronted Roswaal.

"Emily…" Petra whispered.

A shadow hung over her face, but her bright amethyst eyes were brimming with energy. She hugged the surprised Petra, then continued. "Isn't this what you were trying to say, Dudley? But you refuse to put it into words and think it's fine that it doesn't get conveyed…and that's childish."

"…"

"If Subaru were here, he'd be upfront about everything he's done and wants to do. I'm not good at picking up on how people feel, so it helps me understand if he's happy or not. Do you understand?" she asked, as if speaking to a child. Then she turned to Petra. "Lady Petra."

Petra stiffened up as Emilia's glittering amethyst bore down on her.

"Dudley acts like that, but he doesn't mean any ill will… Or perhaps he does, but he's not directing it toward you or me but at himself."

"Ill will towards himself?" Petra asked.

"Yes, despite being all grown up, he's still a wee child."

Correction, she thought. Emilia's tone wasn't one she'd use with a child, but rather one she'd use to scold a naughty child. Petra couldn't hold back her laughter at the way Emilia had phrased it. Her worldview is so gentle that even these brutal topics feel as though they're wrapped in silk. She even made Roswaal's mean personality seem like that of a spoiled child.

Roswaal offered no retort to refute her claim. Covered in darkness, he let out a sigh at Emilia's words. "Anyway, Lady Petra. May I suggest engaging in the practice of magic to take your mind off things?" he asked, attempting to divert the center of attention away from himself by introducing a different topic.

“Practicing magic? Here? In the dark like this?” Petra asked.

“You maaay find it easier to concentrate in the dark. Meditating and taking hold of the mana within you is the first step towards mastery.”

“Are you certain it’s not just an excuse to weasel your way out of the difficult situation you find yourself in?”

“I cannot entirely dismiss that notion; however, the mana density here is quite notable, you see. Therefore, it is mooost suitable for detecting mana.”

“…”

I’m not sure what kind of expression Roswaal is making in the dark, but I know he’s serious, and that he wouldn’t lie or use the topic of magic to escape the situation. That was the genuine conclusion she arrived at after being Roswaal’s magic student for the past few months.

“Are you going to give it a try, Petr—Lady Petra?” Emilia asked.

Petra nodded. “Yeah, I will. Though it displeases me that I’m doing as Dudley wishes,” she said, making sure to add a jabbing comment at Roswaal. It would be dark whether she closed her eyes or not, but she closed them nonetheless and looked inward. Whether it be through one’s chest, stomach, limbs, or back, mana circulated through one’s whole body like blood. Unlike blood, though, which circulates through the body with each heartbeat, flowing mana was soundless. That was why the flow of mana was difficult to grasp, but…

“Try to grasp it with color and heat rather than sound,” Roswaal instructed.

“…”

Following his advice, Petra imagined that her body was transparent behind her closed eyes. Inside her transparent body, she could see the ebb and flow of mana, like water being taken up by a plant. Imagining pink mana, a path of mana formed in her body like a blooming flower. The circulating mana flowed through her fingertips, chest, and neck. And then…

“Wow…” As soon as she opened her eyes, Petra was taken aback by the transformed scene within the Everlasting Darkness. She saw the previously pitch-black world where she could barely see her own hands in pink. To be precise, she could see people and things in light shades of pink. It was like they were clad in a pale pink light. Roswaal’s face started turning pink, but his facial expressions were clearly visible as well.

“…”

Roswaal looked at her as if he were looking at a toddler that had just stood up on its own. Realizing that, she averted her gaze, feeling awkward.

She was then startled by a giant lump of pink next to her. “Waah?! Is that you, Emily?!”

“Huh? What? What happened? Did I do something weird?”

“It’s not that you did anything weird, it’s just that you turned into a lump of pink…”

“Pink…seems reaaally sweet,” came an innocent, child-like response by the pink lump, as well as a belated realization that it was indeed Emilia. It was perhaps due to her environment that Petra could see the flow of mana. Whether it be people or things, anything with even a bit of mana could be seen in the darkness.

In short, Emilia was a lump of incredible mana. Petra had always wondered what kind of trick she’d used when she saw her freeze a wide area around her in the mansion while practicing a special move with Subaru. But there wasn’t much to it at the end of the day. It was just that her special move required an enormous amount of mana, which had been provided.

“Just as I surmised, Beatrice is a lump of mana as well…”

Beatrice, who was lying on the seat next to Emilia, was also a lump of mana. Her outline was practically indistinguishable due to the sheer amount. Emilia had the upper hand when it came to volume, but Beatrice had a stronger concentration. I suppose it's the result of her being a spirit, who're made up of mana.

"But this is like… Do you always see the world like this, Dudley?"

Roswaal shook his head. "Not to thaaat extreme, no. It is becaaaause, Lady Petra, the magic element you happen to excel in is the Yang element, which is known for its influence on the body."

"The Yang element…" Petra muttered at his explanation, glancing down.

The Yang element was one of the six magic elements of the magic system. It was a rare affinity, and its counterpart was the Yin element. Petra had learned that people were normally born with the Fire, Water, Wind, or Earth element, but since she received the Yang element, she wasn't the norm.

Once you learned which element you had an affinity with, it changed how you studied going forward. This is a huge step for me as a student of magic, but…

"So I don't have an affinity for the Yin element like Subaru and Beatrice. I'm disappointed…"

"No, no, this one is also rare, you knooow? Having the Yang element isn't something to get disappointed about."

"I don't care if it's rare or not," Petra huffed, giving the pushy Roswaal an ice-cold response. She wasn't trying to put him down or anything, it was just how she really felt. I get that some people want that rare, special power, but what matters is whether I can use it properly or not. With rare affinities, the downside is that few people can wield them, so there's less precedent.

Petra was running around busily, incredibly occupied. She couldn't use youth as an excuse in the fight she was preparing for. She needed power and skill that she could utilize immediately and the assurance that it could keep evolving.

“But that’s amazing,” Emilia praised. “So you can see in the dark?”

“It would seem so, yes,” Petra replied, before looking around in response to Emilia, who was holding her hands together in front of her chest. “I can see the dragon carriage behind us being pulled by Frufoo, and I can see Frederica and everyone else inside pretty well…”

To Petra’s eyes, the darkness known as Everlasting Darkness was clear as day. It wasn’t like she could see through walls or the path ahead, though. At best, she could see what the mole people being led by Musica were up to as they guided the dragon carriages, or Ram lying on Frederica’s lap.

“Other than that, a bit ahead there’s…” She looked ahead towards the end of the path and noticed a spot emanating a radiant mana light. It was 10 or more meters away and seemed much more mana-condensed than its surroundings. I guess that’s what they call a mana pool. Though it wasn’t even close to Emilia’s level, it grabbed Petra’s attention since the pooled-up mana was far more condensed than the mana around it.

“Lady Petra?” Emilia said.

“Oh, sorry. So, the ground in front of us is glowing and…” Petra quickly pointed out.

“…Right in front of us?” Roswaal asked, his voice slightly stiff. He didn’t seem like he was about to start explaining what mana pools were. In fact, he never started to do so. Before he could, things took a turn for the worse.

“Ah-uh,” Petra cried in agony as a sudden impact shot up from beneath the seat. It happened right as they passed over the mana pool. The cause was the dragon carriage getting thrown into the air, but that wasn’t all.

“…Petra!” Emilia shouted, scooping Petra up in her arms and cradling her head. The dragon carriage tilted forward, shaking violently, before rolling down into the depths of the Everlasting Darkness. Yes, it was falling, deeper and deeper into its depths, with great force.

“Dodogyuuun!” You could hear Patrasche’s screams along with the creaking of the dragon carriage. It went without saying that if the carriage was falling, so too would the earth dragon. The dragon carriage carrying Petra, Emilia, Roswaal, and Beatrice was then hit with a violent impact. It was if they were insects in a cage that was being shook around…

The impacts that seemed to last an eternity finally came to an end.

“…D-Did it stop?” Petra muttered, exhausted and out of breath, while her head was being tightly hugged by Emilia. Right after that, she realized what was going on, and was especially concerned about the vulnerable Beatrice.

“Beatrice…” she whispered.

“Please do not worry. I kept her safe.”

“Ah…”

The one who’d responded to Petra’s anxiety was Roswaal, who was kneeling in the tilted dragon carriage. Still being able to discern her surroundings by their amount of pink mana, Petra saw Roswaal holding Beatrice securely in his arms. He had protected her from the fall and the impact.

Relieved and sincerely grateful for this, Petra turned her attention upwards. I wonder what happened. As soon as we passed over the mana pool, the dragon carriage fell, and…

“Are you okay, Musica…?”

“…Apologies fer takin’ extreme measures, miss,” came a rough voice from outside the dragon carriage, interrupting her question. His strong tone of voice was one thing, but the reason she stopped was because of what he said. He said ‘extreme measures’ rather than that he made a mistake.

“Is this your doing? What are you planning?” Emilia pressed after hearing Petra gasp. Her resolute words were full of determination. In short, she was willing to resort to force if necessary.

However, contrary to Emilia’s resolve, Musica gave her a warning in the dark. “Kindly hold off. I’d advise against pickin’ a fight in the Eternal Darkness wit’ us. This here’s a cramped, deep, and damp domain—this be our world.”

“…What are you going to do with us?” Petra inquired. Having gotten to this point, it being an accident was no longer a possibility. Since they did this on purpose, they must have had a good reason.

Musica, who emitted a weak pink light, let out a tired sigh, then let out one last sigh before he made an offer that Petra and her companions would find…inconvenient. “Ain’t lookin’ to cause ya trouble if ye stay put. All we’re after is you and yer companions to use as a kind of hostages fer our negotiations wit’ the kingdom, ya.”

Poltergeist Story

1

—Thunder rumbled.

Lightning flashed outside the window, and the magic lamps lighting the mansion went out all at once.

It was an ill prank pulled by fate that the moment they got covered in darkness, the cupboard fell and the dishes shattered, making a crashing noise.

Swiftly following the blackout and the continuous sound of destruction, a high-pitched scream was let out.

“Noooo—!!”

The one who had screamed was a maid with beautiful long blonde hair. She was slender and tall yet had an attractive figure rich in feminine charms.

Her almond-shaped eyes looked like jade gemstones, and her mouth, the origin of said scream, was adorned with a row of beautiful white teeth.

However, even though some of her teeth were sharp and giving her a rather ferocious look—

“Eek! Eeeek! It’s a hollow! A hollow is here! Hey, Petra?! Are you okay?! Petra! Ram!”

She was shaking with tears flowing down her face. Her appearance was anything but ferocious, but in fact emphasized the fragile, feminine part of herself.

In the darkness, the woman grabbed a piece of cloth within her reach and desperately pulled it close to her body. “Pe-Pe-Pe-Petra…? Or is it you, Ram? Anyway-Anyway, I’m glad you are safe.

We need to get out of here before it’s too late…”

“—Sister Frederica?”

“—Ha! Petra?! Is that you?”

The woman turned around towards the direction of the voice—but said voice came from the opposite direction of the person she was holding.

Her pupils narrowed in the darkness, and what appeared was a young, dainty girl. It was a lovely girl wearing a maid outfit with a big ribbon on her head—Petra—the girl whom Frederica adored the most like a younger sister.

Frederica felt relieved after seeing that Petra hadn’t been harmed in any way.

“Oh, Petra… I’m glad you’re safe. That must mean I have Ram in my arms. She is being quite docile…”

“What are you saying, Frederica? Ram is over here.”

“Huh?”

After hearing an unapologetic voice, the owner of said voice appeared next to Petra. It was a girl with short pink hair and a pretty, plucky face. Standing with perfect posture strangely suited her, and it stood true even in the abyssal darkness.

“Oh, oh my, Ram…so you were with Petra. Well, in that case…”

“Yes, Ram was with her. —What did you mistake Ram with?”

“I was trying not to think about that…!”

Frederica turned her head with a creaking sound in response to Ram’s merciless question. She then looked down at the person she was holding tightly in her arms. Just at that moment, there was a flash of lightning, brightly illuminating a mysterious figure.

“…”

It was a doll around the size of a toddler with a missing eyeball. When the doll's single eye met Frederica's, it relaxed its lips and smiled.

"—Noooooo!!"

Frederica let out a scream, which was just one of many she had let out that day.

2

—It all started two days ago.

"Cleaning the villa and replacing the furniture?" asked Frederica.

"Yes, thaaat's right," Roswaal replied with a gentle smile, his hands clasped together on the desk. "I wanted to aaask you guys to do that."

Roswaal directed his gentle smile at the three maids who worked in this mansion. Lined up by height and ordered by size starting with the largest, the three girls were Frederica, Ram, and Petra.

The three were colleagues that worked at Roswaal Manor, but it was rare for them to be summoned all at once by Roswaal.

—No, it was their first time.

Petra tilted her head while widening her large eyes at the instructions from Roswaal. "Villa… Is that different from the old mansion that burned down?"

"Ah, it's diiiferent. I liked that mansion though, but…"

"Oh, I'm not asking you, Master. I'm asking them."

Petra brushed Roswaal, who tried to answer her question, off with a smile.

"Petra…"

Frederica, who was Petra's mentor, held her forehead at that and

Roswaal, who got rejected by her, snickered.

Even from Frederica’s point of view, Roswaal and Petra’s relationship was shattered into pieces and would be difficult to piece back together. As someone in a subordinate position, her attitude wasn’t all that great, but Roswaal was the one who caused her to behave in such a way to begin with.

It would be a different story if Roswaal showed more remorse for what he did, but their master seemed to enjoy Petra’s bad behavior, so that was not likely to happen.

Therefore, Frederica could do nothing but worry about their relationship, but Ram, who admired Roswaal, wasn’t all too happy about it.

She narrowed her pink eyes and glared at Petra, who had been disrespectful towards her master. “Ram won’t tolerate such an attitude toward Master Roswaal, Petra.”

“I’m sorry, Sister Ram. But even if I get scolded, I want to make our master feel bad…”

“So you’ve already made up your mind. It’s fine, then. Since it also creates a job that only Ram can do, which is to console Master Roswaal whenever you hurt his feelings.”

“Enough with that, you two!” Frederica exclaimed. “Not even I would be able to tolerate it!”

Feeling like the conversation between Ram and Petra was going to take a grave turn if left alone, Frederica finally interrupted them. Then, stepping closer to her disgruntled juniors, she said, “Master, don’t just enjoy yourself, you need to give her a proper warning. Otherwise, it will cause trouble for me by disturbing the public morals of the mansion. To make matters worse…”

“To make matters worse, aaaand then what?”

“To make matters worse, Mister Subaru and Garf are already disturbing it…”

Frederica thought of the black-haired boy that lived in the mansion and her incompetent younger brother. If you added in the young man in charge of internal affairs, that would be all of the men working at Roswaal Manor. They all acted their age, or rather, were a bit immature.

“Mister Otto seems normal,” said Frederica, “but he becomes the most dangerous of the three when the other two get involved…”

“Oh, I get what you mean,” Petra replied. “Otto has a face saying, I’m perfectly normal, but he says the most menacing things out of the blue.”

“Everyone agrees that he is the most dangerous of the bunch,” said Ram.

“Oh myyy, I can’t ever allow Otto know of what was spoken here todaaay.”

The young man, who was being talked about in a place he wasn’t present, sneezed at his workplace.

After getting off track… “Anyway.” …Frederica returned the conversation to the main topic. “It has been a couple of months since we moved to the main residence and we are finally settling in, so what made you want to work on the villa?”

“A most natural question indeed. But the reaaaason isn’t that complicated. It has been several months since the royal selection kicked off officially, and the candidates have each started making their moves, so we can’t afford to get left behind. As for the negotiations with influential people from various areas… I know I am in no position to talk, but there are a looot of nefarious characters in the Western Margrave Domain. Negotiations aren’t going to be easy by any means.”

“—? What does that have to do with the villa…?” Petra wondered.

“It’s simple, Petra,” Ram began. “In short, Master Roswaal and Lady Emilia will soon be going to different places themselves to do things. And for such occasions, it’s better to have as many lodging options as you can get… Fortunately, House Mathers owns villas in various regions, so it's quite convenient."

Ram took over Roswaal's explanation, and Petra nodded after understanding what it meant. "Oh, so that's how it is…"

Glancing at Petra out of the corner of her eye, Frederica continued. "Well then," she said. "Is the reason why we are going to the villa as Ram surmised?"

"Yes, that's correct. I have a few villas in mind, but I want to get Viscount Torion Arus on our side for now. So it would be beeest to start with the one closest to his mansion."

"In that case, would it be the mansion in San Fantrus? It's a little far though…"

Following Roswaal's suggestion, Frederica spread the map on the wall on the desk and tried to locate the villas owned by House Mathers.

However, Ram stopped her there. "—No, not there," she declared, then pointed at a forest not too far from their objective. "Here it is."

"Here?" inquired Petra. "But there is nothing marked there, Sister Ram."

"On a normal map, yes. But an old mansion owned by House Mathers is there. That's correct, right, Master Roswaal?"

"Weeell, it seems it's still fresh in your memory despite it being something from around 10 years ago."

"That's because Ram has memories with you there, Master Roswaal," answered Ram like it was nothing, making Roswaal frown and scratch his head.

Ram has been speaking like that to him for a couple of years now, but it seems like Master's response to it has changed a little, thought Frederica. As someone who has known them personally for a long time, I am deeply moved by this, but…

"I see that it is a mansion that even I do not know about. Well, what is it…"

"Well, it would be a bit of a stretch to call it a villa since it hardly functioned as one," Roswaal explained. "My predecessor used it as a kind of workshop…but it's been abandoned for several years now."

"A workshop, I see," parroted Frederica, touching her cheek and thinking about it.

Roswaal's predecessor—Roswaal K. Mathers—was the genius of the century who devoted himself to the development and practical application of magicreation tools that used magic stones as their source of power.

Since the head of the Mathers family took on the name of Roswaal generation after generation, their names never changed, so it made things a bit complicated.

At any rate, the current Roswaal in front of her eyes—Roswaal L. Mathers—her master, was also without a doubt an unparalleled genius when it came to magic.

"Even though I called it a workshop, it was more or less emptied before it became abandoned, so it would be better to call it an empty mansion. Either waaay, the building will likely need repairs, which is why I need you to go inspect it."

"—. I see, so that is how it is."

When that much was said, Frederica guessed what Roswaal's aim was.

If the job was as Roswaal had just described, there was clearly no reason for all three maids to go there. However, since he wanted them to do this together, the reason was obvious.

—It was to get them to learn how to work together.

Including the contrasting attitudes of Ram and Petra towards Roswaal before, the communication between the three maids working at Roswaal Manor was not yet perfect. However, as mentioned above, the royal selection had already begun. That’s why they couldn’t continue to work inefficiently like they had been until now.

So by completing the task he gave us, the three of us will learn to work together and not be haphazard about our work, thought Frederica. That’s probably what Master is aiming for with this. “I understand, Master. Please leave this task to us. I will fulfill your wishes, both the obvious and the hidden one!”

“The obvious and the hidden…?”

“Yes, you can count on me!”

Roswaal frowned for a moment at Frederica, who had thumped her chest. But the enthusiastic sentence that followed made him say, “I suppose that’s fine,” before nodding. “Alriiight then, I’ll relay your orders once again: you are to investigate the mansion that used to be my predecessor’s workshop, make repairs, and make it habitable by replacing the furniture and tidying it up.”

“—Yes! Leave it to us!”

With these instructions from Roswaal, the three girls quickly finished their preparations and departed for their destination: the workshop.

3

“So this is the previous Master’s mansion?”

Petra blinked as she looked at the completely dilapidated mansion in front of her. It was natural for her to do so, since its appearance starkly contrasted from the other villas owned by House Mathers. The mansion was in the middle of a dense forest, exposed to ivy, weeds, and ravaged by wild animals, and at first glance, it didn’t seem like it was currently fit for human habitation.

However, the three of them would have to spend the night in said mansion.

“It will rain soon, so going back to the nearest town isn’t a realistic option," said Ram as she looked at the mansion's exterior and turned around.

"Uuh, I'm sorry…" replied Petra, hunching over in front of her.

"It is not your fault, Petra," Frederica consoled. "That wild bird's cunningness is to blame."

By the time the three of them arrived at the mansion, night had already fallen, and the world had been plunged into the pitch-black abyss of darkness. They were originally scheduled to arrive during the day, but the reason why this did not happen was the reason why Petra was so completely deflated.

"If only I hadn't let the bird steal the luggage…"

"Talking about "what-ifs" won't change anything. We need to be thankful that you didn't get kidnapped by that cunning bird. Birds like that can easily kidnap children."

"I'm not! I'm not that small! I'm not that much different from you!"

"Ha-Ha, that's right. We're like a speck of dust compared to Frederica."

"A speck of dust is going a bit far! What do you think I am?!"

Frederica raised her voice in response to the absurd claim and then Ram brushed it off with an "Alright, alright."

She knew that that conversation was for Petra to not feel unnecessary remorse, but she thought that there were other ways to do so. "Such things about you haven't changed at all since the olden days…"

"But Sister Ram is right. We can't go back to the town, can we? So, are we going to stay in this mansion…or rather, what used to be one?"

"I guess so. In this place that used to be a mansion, we have to—"

Frederica stopped when she was about to say that they had to spend the night there.

"—? Sister Frederica?" Petra said as she looked up at Frederica by her side, who had become quiet.

Frederica, however, couldn't respond to Petra right away. She looked confused as she stared at the dilapidated mansion in front of her. "…A night in this mansion?"

She didn't want to bring herself to say that she would be spending the night there. Saying it out loud would only seal her reality. She knew that it was a futile resistance, but she refused to bow down to her sealed fate.

"Yes, we have no other option but to stay here," Ram declared. "Let's hurry up and go inside."

"You-You-You-You are such a…!"

"What are you making such a fuss about? Could it be that you're… scared?" Ram said, squinting as she lowered her voice.

That gave Frederica goosebumps. "—Gh!"

As she involuntarily choked—

"Sister?" Petra said, pulling on her sleeve. "Are you really scared? Sister Frederica?"

"I-I am not scared! Not at all, it is not like that! It's just that… Um, I only wanted to say that it does not look very safe."

—It was a lie. She was scared.

Frederica bluffed greatly in front of her beloved sister.

Frederica was basically someone who never sung her own praises or wore a mask in front of others, but when it came to Petra, whom she adored, it was different. She wanted to be an admirable sister figure for her.

Ram and Garfiel were children who weren't cute at all compared to Petra. That's why she wanted the cute Petra to see her cool side.

"I'm just not sure if we can survive a night in a rundown mansion that has been abandoned for decades. It would be wiser to find a cave in the woods that's facing a cliff."

"Searching for a cave that we don't even know exists is wiser?" asked Ram. "Frederica, do you have a fever or something?"

"I-I know! It was just a joke! I didn't mean it! Let's just start chopping the trees over there down and build a cabin for the three of us to live in for a while and…"

"S-Sister? Are you sure you're okay? I think you'll feel better if you sit and rest for a…"

"Arrrgh…!" Her brain, dominated by fear and shame, couldn't come up with a good idea. "It's true that I'm not good at building things. That I couldn't even realize that, is such a…"

"Ram thinks that the problem lies elsewhere, but never mind."

She ignored Frederica reflecting upon her words and stared at the exterior of the mansion. She then shrugged lightly and looked back at Petra, not Frederica.

"After a quick glance, it doesn't look as unfixable as it first appeared. Ram will take care of the luggage, so can you kindly go around back and take a look around?"

"Yes, alright, Sister Ram. Sister Frederica, you can rest here…"

"No-No, I can't let you go alone. I will accompany you."

I am grateful for their concern, but I can't afford to lose heart here, she thought. Neither can I let Petra act alone in a place that gives me such an ominous feeling.

"—. Can you move?"

"I can move. Who do you think I am? I am the head servant of Margrave Mathers, Frederica Baumann!" she proudly declared, a hand on her well-endowed chest.

Petra clapped, exclaiming, “Big Sister, you are so cool!”

For a split second she felt a questioning gaze from Ram as though saying “Was there a reason to introduce yourself like that here…?” Frederica chose to ignore it and rallied herself up.

“Well then, let’s get going, Petra. Let’s hold hands.”

Frederica started walking with Petra, who had grabbed her extended hand and seemed excited. Ram sighed while looking at the two from behind and then started doing her job.

“…”

Trying to go around the mansion proved to be quite challenging due to the overgrown ivy. Since they were heading into the forest, Frederica and the others wore clothing that allowed more movement than their usual maid attire, but they still struggled to cross through the dense vegetation.

“I didn’t think it would be this bad, so I didn’t bring any knives with me.”

Of course, if she wanted to, Frederica could use her beast claws as one, but she did not want to do so in front of Petra, nor did she see the significance of going that far.

“Oh, Sister!” shouted Petra while touching the ivy when they were about to lose their way. “The ivy is soft here, so we can move it and go forward.”

Frederica looked at it and determined that it wasn’t too tangled, so they could make a path by spreading it.

“I am surprised that you were able to notice that.”

“It’s because I used to play in the forest with Lucas and the others… with my friends…before I started working at the mansion.”

"I see… It's been a long time since I last played in a forest."

Unlike Petra, Frederica had become Roswaal's servant more than a decade ago, which was around the time she and her brother played together in their hometown, known as the Sanctuary, so she was more familiar with life in the city than life in the forest now.

"Seems like you know your way around a forest because of that. Ah, but be sure not to touch the ivy or trees with your bare hands…"

"I'll be fine. I made sure to wear gloves," Petra said, presenting her gloved hands to Frederica, who then patted her head.

"Ha-Ha, you are sharp."

With that enthusiasm, Petra moved the ivy out of the way and made a path along the wall of the mansion, and then they proceeded to the back.

"Oh." While they were making their way, Petra noticed something. "…The walls of the mansion got damaged over time, forming a hole here."

"You're right… The size is a little disconcerting."

If you looked at it, the hole in the back of the mansion was as big as a child, so it was large enough for Petra, and even Frederica could get through it if she bent down.

Whether this was simply the result of the building material being damaged or a wild animal being mischievous was unclear.

"The door being locked or not won't matter with this huge hole over here," commented Frederica.

"I think it's a little too late to be worrying about that since the mansion has been abandoned for many years already…" replied Petra.

"There is also a possibility that someone is going in and out of the mansion without permission… Wait, Petra?"

While Frederica was examining the hole in the mansion, Petra suddenly bent down and slipped right through it.

“Wait, are you alright?”

“Don’t worry, Sister Frederica. I’m not stuck or anything. I figured I could fit through this gap,” said Petra.

“Well, in that case, it’s fine… You had me worried there for a second.”

Hearing that from the other side of the hole made Frederica feel relieved. But then she swiftly came to the conclusion that it would be difficult to go any further around the building.

“Come back, Petra…”

“Oh! What was that?!” exclaimed Petra. “I’ll go take a quick look.”

“Ah, Petra, don’t go! Oh, no!” cried Frederica.

Petra went further in. Frederica frowned at Petra’s courage and sighed.

“I guess it can’t be helped. But I can’t let Petra go alone…”

Then, using the hole Petra used to go in, Frederica also went into the mansion. There was no source of light, so it was just as dark as the forest, but…

“—?” The moment she went inside, Frederica instantly felt the temperature change. It was a strange sensation, as if there was a chill in the dusty air. But before she could wrap her head around this anomaly, she heard the sound of the floor creaking. She figured that whatever was making that sound was someone light. She naturally assumed that it was Petra.

“Petra, don’t do anything rash.” Frederica called out. “My heart will not be able to take it.”

“…”

“Petra? What’s the matter? Why aren’t you replyi…”

The creaking sound got closer and closer, but there was no reply from Petra at all. Frederica frowned and quietly stared into the darkness.

Frederica had naturally good night vision, so there was nothing she couldn’t see, even in the dark of night.

Therefore…

“—Huh?”

—She knew in a single glance that the human-shaped figure that appeared vaguely in the darkness was a human-shaped doll.

“…”

For a moment, she thought she was hallucinating.

Right after that, she was blinded by a white light. “—Argh,” she groaned in agony, feeling a numbing pain in her eyes.

The cause was the light, or more specifically, the light from the magic lamp. The magic lamps installed in the mansion turned on all at once, causing Frederica, who was using her night vision, to groan due to the glare.

“Th-This is…”

“Sister Frederica! The lights are on!”

Petra came running to Frederica’s side whose sight was still white due to the dazzle. For a moment she felt a sense of relief knowing Petra was unharmed.

“Petra! Be careful! There was something there!”

“What?!”

Frederica looked around while telling the approaching Petra to be cautious. The brightly lit room seemed to be one of the mansion’s guest rooms.

She glanced around the abandoned room. There was an old, wardrobe that had seen better days and a bed frame and a—

“It-It’s not here! Where did it go?!”

Shocked, Frederica quickly scanned the room for the doll that she was certain she had seen earlier.

Maybe I bumped into it and knocked it over? Perhaps it fell under the bed? Or it slipped behind the wardrobe…?

She tried to search for it with her sense of smell, but she didn’t know its scent. Not to mention the room, but the entire mansion was filled with the smell of dust and mold due to being neglected for so many years. Making her nose stop working, she had to rely on her eyes, so she laid down on her belly and peeked under the bed.

“Si-Sister?!”

“Don’t worry, Petra. I will protect you no matter what happens. Anyway, I need to search for the doll from before and…”

It wasn’t under the bed. Maybe it fell behind the wardrobe or the cupboard—

“—What are you doing?”

“…Ram?”

She pushed herself up from the floor and looked back at where that voice had come from. She saw Ram standing there with her arms crossed. Looking baffled, she looked Frederica up and down. Frederica, her beautiful long hair included, was covered in dust.

And then…

“—What are you doing?” Ram asked, repeating her question.

"It was really there! I saw it with my own two eyes! So, I am absolutely certain that that doll is…"

"Alright, alright, Ram understands. The doll was there. But it's gone now. That solves it."

"That doesn't solve anything!"

After moving towards the hall, Frederica frantically tried to explain what had happened before. Ram listened, but she didn't seem to believe her at all.

"Uuh. Petra… Petra, you believe me, right?"

"Yes, I believe you. But for now, we need to do something about your clothes and hair rather than worry about that doll…"

Petra gently wiped her dirty hair and ran a comb through it. Frederica was glad that she believed her and shot a glare at Ram.

"What was it then?" asked Ram.

"I don't know, but let's assume that I mistook something else for a doll. It was probably a wild animal or a… "

"Or a doll that moves on its own."

"You-are-such-a…!"

Frederica felt frustrated by Ram mocking her and tried taking a swipe at her, but Ram swiftly moved away from her range. "Sister!" exclaimed Petra as she brushed out Frederica's dust-covered hair. "Jeez, stay still. You'll ruin your pretty hair—"

It happened right after Petra said that.

"—Eek?!"

From far away, on the first floor of the mansion, they heard something that sounded like an explosion, making Frederica's shoulders jump.

The noise wasn't the sound of footsteps or a building creaking in the wind. The sound was more clear. It sounded like a burst of air.

"Wh-What was that sound?!" exclaimed Frederica, looking towards where the sound came from.

"It sounded kind of weird," said Petra.

Frederica immediately grabbed Petra's shoulders and stepped back.

"Now do you believe me?" said Frederica with a shaky voice, looking over at Ram "It seems like there is definitely something else here. We need to…"

"—? What are you saying, Frederica? Are you saying that you heard something?"

"Wha…?! St-Stop joking around. At a time like this…"

Ram's words made Frederica doubt herself. Ram, however, was tilting her head. She looked just as indifferent as always, and it didn't seem like she was playing a trick on her.

"Huh-Huh… Petra, you heard it, right?"

"Huh? Ah, yes, I heard it. It was a weird pow sound."

"See! Petra also heard it! Ram, you must've… "

"Ram didn't hear anything like that. Ram doesn't have a reason to tell trivial lies, either. But if you really insist, then we can go check it out."

Saying that, Ram took a short breath and placed her foot on the stairs that led to the first floor from the hall.

"Wait!" Frederica shouted, grabbing her sleeve to stop her from doing something reckless. "We-We have no idea what could be up there. If something happens to you, then what am I going to tell Garf?"

"You may tell Garf that Ram went somewhere far far away. As for Master Roswaal, Ram is still thinking about that… Frederica, you're overreacting."

"It isn't like that! Look, even Petra is shaking a lot!"

"Sister, stop, my arms hurt… Ah. Th-That's better."

Petra complained since she was about to be hugged to death. Frederica reluctantly let go of Petra and hugged Ram instead.

"…What are you doing?"

"There's definitely something in this mansion. The forest is dark at night, but we should get out of here for now. It's necessary for everyone's safety."

"That doesn't answer Ram's question. Why are you hugging Ram?"

"I-I-It's not what you think!" stammered Frederica. "I'm not scared!"

Frederica was unaware that she was spilling the beans herself. While burying Ram in her well-endowed chest, she slowly backed away and headed towards the entrance.

"I'm not scared," said Frederica, trying to convince herself and failing, "but we should head back now. Come on, Petra, there's nothing we can gain from staying here for too long."

As she said this, Frederica pushed the door open with the side of her hips.

And then—

It was raining cats and dogs outside.

"It's really coming down," said Ram.

"…"

"The road to the town is going to be quite muddy in this rain," Ram continued.

"No, we can reach it in a flash if I beastify and run with you two on me.”

“Sister Frederica?!” When Frederica started to unbutton her uniform in preparation for her beastification, Petra grabbed her arm. “No, don’t! Please calm down!”

“Le-Let go of me, Petra. I do not like beastifying without taking my clothes off! It causes problems for me later since I end up having nothing to wear!”

“No, just don’t transform at all! It’s fine, you have nothing to worry about!”

Upon hearing Petra, who was holding on to her tightly, Frederica couldn’t bear to resort to using force. Watching Petra rebutton her clothes, she sighed deeply.

“What should we do…” she wondered.

“Let’s just go ahead and find out what made that noise then,” suggested Petra.

“Th-That noise? Petra, are you serious?”

“Yes!”

Unlike Ram, who seemed to have selective hearing, Petra must have heard the same sound as Frederica. But unlike Frederica, Petra showed no fear.

“I guess this is how it feels to be surpassed by someone younger than you…”

“That’s a really quick declaration of defeat,” said Ram. “Haven’t you only been her mentor for two months?”

“Yes, yes, you are right! There are also those who do not respect their seniors and don’t even try to improve no matter how many years they are taught!” Frederica said, glaring at Ram, before turning to Petra in order to confirm her resolve. “But…are you sure, Petra?”

Petra, however, did not change her mind after getting asked a second time, saying, “Yeah, you can leave it to me,” with an energetic thump of her small chest.

She looked up at the first floor of the mansion with eyes full of enthusiasm. “Did the noise from before come from an animal? Or was it made by a hollow… But it could also be a moving doll. It’d be pretty amazing if it was…”

“Petra? Petra? Hey, what’s with that look in your eyes?”

With a snap of her fingers, Petra deduced that the sound was coming from upstairs, her eyes sparkling with curiosity. Her cheeks slightly red, the girl smiled at Frederica’s query and…

“I’ll go,” she said, making her way up the stairs. “I’ll do something about it no matter what awaits me there!”

“Wait! Don’t do it, Petra! Wh-What are you doing Ram?! Quick, we need to go after her!”

“With you weighing so much, you’ll only slow Ram down, Frederica.”

“No, I don’t! You’re just being mean!”

Following Petra up the stairs, Frederica and an unwilling Ram also headed to the first floor. The uneasiness made Frederica hesitate for a moment, but her love for Petra was stronger. She took forceful steps up the stairs—and then, with a loud crash, the staircase gave in.

“Ha-eek?!” With a scream, Frederica fell through the middle of the stairs.

Frederica’s face instantly turned red, and Ram looked down at her from above. “You weigh too much, Frederica.”

“No, I don’t!!”

An angry voice reverberated once again.

Falling through the floor had made her lag behind Petra, who had swiftly climbed the stairs.

“Haa…”

“You sighed again! I have told you many times that I do not weigh that much!” Frederica screamed, getting red in the face.

“Ram hasn’t said anything,” Ram replied, shrugging her shoulders and brushing her off. “There is a limit to how self-conscious a person can be.”

Frederica looked towards the hallway of the first floor and searched for Petra, who had gotten there before them. But she couldn’t find her. It was possible that she had gone into one of the rooms since she was nowhere to be seen.

“Jeez, is she in one of the rooms?” Petra! Where are…eek?!”

Frederica heard the explosion again the moment she called Petra’s name. It was closer this time, from right behind her. She quickly turned around, and her eyes met Ram’s, who was holding her elbow.

Looking completely unperturbed, she squinted her pink eyes. “—What is it?”

“Yo-Yo-You really can’t hear anything? Or are you acting like that on purpose to make me feel anxious?”

“That’s a false accusation. Ram doesn’t know what you are talking about.”

“Uuh…I don’t know if you’re being serious or not, but this isn’t the time for it!”

Despite knowing her for a long time, she couldn’t tell whether Ram was being honest or was trying to fool her. That made her feel miserable, and she felt a momentary hatred for her.

"—Get out!"

"—Hic?!"

This time, Frederica clearly heard an unfamiliar voice. She slowly turned her neck, so slow that it felt like it was creaking, towards the source of the voice. But all she saw was a window of the mansion exposed to the wind and rain and slightly shaking.

"N-Now! Now!" stammered Frederica. "You heard a weird voice, right?! It said, 'Get out'!"

"…How arrogant of you. In this weather? You want Ram to get soaked?"

"It wasn't me! Something else said that!" cried out Frederica.

"You probably mistook it for wind or something. You are being oversensitive."

"And aren't you being too insensitive? Do I look like I am lying?!"

Despite her best effort to convey her message, Frederica's words failed to change Ram's mind.

Unable to bear Ram's distrustful gaze, Frederica said, "Fine then," giving up. "If you love it so much, you can spend the night here alone! I'm going to leave with Petra as soon as possible!"

"Ram doesn't know what you're so upset about…"

"Hmph! That! Anyway, I need to—"

Fueled by her anger for Ram, Frederica pushed down the growing feeling of anxiety and fear, and opened the door closest to her.

—A tremendous amount of rainwater poured out from within, sweeping Frederica away.

"Eeeeeek?!"

Caught by surprise, Frederica wasn't able to put up any resistance in time and fell into the hallway. She had instantly gotten soaked from head to toe in rainwater.

“Wh-Wh-Wh-What just…”

“Rainwater must’ve leaked in and collected in this room.”

“Is something like that even possible?!”

“What else could it be?”

Ram lent the soaked Frederica a hand and helped her up. While she was standing up, however, she heard the sound of pottery breaking from the room at the end of the hallway.

“Eek?! What is it this time?!”

“Just the wind. It probably knocked over a vase or something,” said Ram.

And then…

“—Curse you.”

A voice passed by Frederica’s ears.

“I-It said ‘curse you’ this time?! Ra-Ra-Ra-Ram! What was that voice…”

“Just the wind. Wind comes in from everywhere since it’s an old building.”

“Wind doesn’t sound like that!!” cried out Frederica

After wringing out the water from her sleeves and skirt, Frederica took to the hallway again, her mind filled with worry for Petra.

Petra might also be going through the same scary experience as Frederica. Thinking that was the case, Frederica couldn’t help but be anxious and think about rescuing her right away.

So, that’s—

"—Hic!!"

The moment thunder rumbled, and when the room became dark, and even when the cupboard fell and the dishes shattered and made a loud noise, which seemed like some sort of an ill-conceived prank, Frederica's first thought was about Petra.

And then…

"—Noooooo!!"

—The story went back to the beginning the moment she screamed while hugging the smiling doll.

6

—The moment that Frederica let out a scream.

"…"

She reflexively let go of the doll, and it seemed like she was about to faint right then and there. However, the moment she let go of it, it thundered yet again, and a flash of lightning lit up her surroundings.

The doll that had gone flying was promptly caught by Petra. In her slender arms, before there could have been any sort of reaction from the doll—

"—I won't let you!!"

Pulling herself together, Frederica unleashed her survival instincts kicked into survival mode. Her maid uniform exploded from within, from which the beautiful golden fur of a leopardess emerged. She transformed into a beast at a frightening speed, and once her hindlegs emerged, it was complete. She then charged forward like the wind and swept Ram and Petra off their feet.

"…"

Dragging their bodies along, the transformed Frederica moved to the other end of the hallway in a single instant. Not even Garfiel could catch up to Frederica when she raced at full speed.

She undoubtedly had the strongest legs in the Emilia camp. However…

"—Get out."

"Eek."

She once again heard the doll she had left in the dust.

Frederica looked back and held back a scream. The doll had grabbed hold of her tail after she beastified.

She chomped her fangs. "Ram! Take care of Petra!"

Not waiting for a reply, Frederica left them in the hallway and then jumped straight up, breaking through the ceiling and going above the roof in one fell swoop. She rose rapidly in the rain, going towards the black clouds. The doll was still holding on to her tail despite now being in midair, but since the two people she wanted to protect were safe in the mansion, she didn't feel like she had to hold anything back. She swung her tail forcefully, making the doll lose its grip and fall and smash into the roof.

"I will for sure—"

Deliver the final blow this time, Frederica thought, turning around in midair. She was about to charge in and sacrifice herself, but then she noticed something: nearly identical dolls were crawling up onto the roof from the mansion one after another.

"Wha—"

Frederica was at a loss for words. At that sight. At the pure horror in front of her. They all looked identical, including some that weren't wearing clothes; nearly a hundred of them had followed her up to the roof. All of their eyes fell on her above their heads. —Their eyes shined brightly.

"—Ah."

Her fear, which had been replaced by her fight-or-flight response, resurfaced in that moment. Her legs trembled, her fangs chattered, her fiery eyes turned moist, and then the strength drained from her entire body. Frederica's beastification was undone, and then she went into free fall right above the dolls.

And just like that, poor Frederica became their prey—

"—Catch her!"

"…"

Just when she was thinking she was about to be beaten to a pulp, Frederica heard a firm voice and then widened her eyes in surprise. Right below her, inches away even, the dolls had their hands extended in her direction, and she imagined herself being torn limb from limb by those tiny hands. However, that didn't happen.

The dolls caught the falling Frederica gently with their extended hands.

"…Huh?"

By using their many arms, the dolls tried to lessen the impact of the fall to the best of their ability. Frederica opened her eyes in surprise since the impact was softer than she had expected. When she turned her head, she met the gaze of the doll with cracks on its face. It was the very doll she had encountered in the hallway—

"You're—"

"…"

Frederica couldn't detect any malice on the doll's face. Right when she noticed that and went to say something to the doll… "Ahgeek?!" …she fell through the roof of the mansion that hadn't been able to handle the impact or the weight of the dolls and then crashed into the hallway.

Ram stood in front of Frederica shaking her head and said, "—This confirms it. You weigh too much, Frederica," repeating it unapologetically for the third time.

7

Petra brought up the topic after roughly sealing the hole in the ceiling that Frederica had made in order to stop water from coming in. Many dolls were lined up on the floor of the entrance in front of her eyes. They were the source of the commotion that Frederica claimed to have seen and appeared about a hundred times more than she had assumed. They were quiet now, but if Frederica’s story was true, they had been vindictive in their attempts to get rid of her, saying and doing things in their attempt to do so.

The dolls—which were a foot shorter than Petra—looked so lifelike that one would definitely be surprised if one came across one in the dark.

“This is a magicreation tool that was left behind in the mansion,” Ram revealed, putting her hand on the heads of the dolls.

Petra muttered, “Magicreation tool,” after hearing that, widening her eyes in surprise.

A magicreation tool is a special tool powered by a magic stone. They can be used in a variety of ways, such as an iron plate that emits heat when cooking, or to help create wind without the use of magic.

However, the fact that a moving doll was a magicreation tool was outside Petra’s common knowledge.

“I didn’t know that such cute magicreation tools existed,” said Petra.

“They aren’t a common type though. Master Roswaal’s predecessor was a pioneer in creating magicreation tools, so he left behind many prototypes like these. Perhaps these are some of them.”

“Oh, Sister Frederica.”

While they were talking about magicreation tools, Frederica returned. She was completely drenched, not to mention naked since her beastification destroyed her clothes, so she gathered whatever fabric she could find in their luggage and around the mansion and created an outfit of some sort.

“Such a shameless appearance.”

“What was I supposed to do?!” said Frederica angrily. “The change of clothes I brought and everything else in there got soaked because of the heavy rain, and there’s no way I could wear anything until it dried…but it wouldn’t have been an issue if you had just dried it all with your magic.”

“You want Ram to use her precious stamina for the sake of drying clothes? At least you can keep working despite your shameless appearance, unlike Ram who’d be unable to move. Endure it.”

“Stop saying shameless over and over,” Frederica said, frowning.

“Geez! Stop fighting!” Petra exclaimed, going in between her two sister figures who were arguing and serving as a mediator. “More importantly…”

She pointed at the dolls that were lined up.

The dolls moved their heads in unison and looked at Frederica menacingly.

“Eek! Wh-Why, why am I the only one being treated like an enemy…!”

“It’s not fair,” complained Petra. “I was more excited by the thought of meeting a hollow, but only Sister Frederica gets favored…”

“It’s not quite like that. Ram admits she doesn’t know much about this magicreation tool, but she can guess why it treated us differently.”

Ram began her explanation, and Frederica and Petra looked at each other and cocked their heads, making them look like real sisters. It was a lovely sight, but Ram didn’t smile at all.

“Listen here,” she said, holding up a finger as she stood in front of the dolls. “This doll’s job is most likely to protect the mansion. Though the mansion has been abandoned for a long time, they are still following the orders they were given. So they just were trying to drive out intruders.”

“B-But, why only me? Leaving Petra aside, it’s unfair that you aren’t soaking wet too!”

“This isn’t a matter of fairness. And the reason we were treated differently wasn’t because of favoritism.”

“What was the reason then, Sister Ram?”

With that said, Ram slowly walked across the entrance hall and stopped in front of the door. It was quite literally the front door that connected the inside of the mansion with the outside—

“—People who enter through the entrance are guests. And people who enter from other places are intruders.”

“—Ah.”

Frederica gasped in surprise upon hearing Ram’s guess. She had certainly not entered from the front door but had indeed entered through a whole in the back of the mansion. But if it that was the condition to draw the dolls’ ire then,

“Question!” quipped Petra. “I entered from the hole too. But they didn’t try to scare me away.”

“But you heard the sound that Ram couldn’t, right? If so, then there is a difference in the way people are treated.”

“A difference in treatment…so do they differentiate between adults and children then?”

“Ram thinks so. Adult intruders are treated like burglars, while child intruders are treated with more leniency… Ram isn’t sure what sort of criteria they use, but she guesses they use something like height.”

“Argggh…”

Things weren’t looking good for Frederica once things like height and build entered the equation.

Anyway, Ram’s hypothesis is probably right, thought Frederica. In fact, the dolls are surprisingly receptive to her orders since she is a guest. And the picture of her ordering them around really suits her.

“I don’t know why, but making the dolls follow you really suits you, Sister Ram.”

As Frederica was thinking that, Petra expressed the same thing.

“Obviously,” Ram replied, running her hand over her pink hair. “The innate qualities Ram was born with are on a different level, and they’re dolls, so their purpose is to follow orders. And they were doing that earlier.”

“You’re way too confident about this, but I’m relieved. If we were being taunted by hollows this time, I would’ve um…”

“What would you have done, Sister Frederica?” asked Petra.

“I would have run as fast as I could in the rain, soaking wet with you and Ram on my back…”

Good thing only one of us got soaking wet, Frederica thought. Though she wasn’t sure if she should think like that, she forced herself to come to terms with it.

“But this is great,” said Petra “If the dolls help out, it’ll take no time at all to fix the mansion up. By the way, you were so cute, Sister Frederica.”

“Pe-Petra?! What do you mean by ‘cute’…”

“She’s referring to the way you tremble and run around like a headless chicken. Looks like Ram isn’t the only one with a twisted personality.”

“My Petra’s personality is nothing like yours!”

Ram ignored Frederica’s furious protest and responded to it with deafening silence. Brushing off Ram’s comment, Petra looked around at the dolls who were seemingly waiting for their master’s orders, and then lightning struck her with an idea.

“Hey, Sister Frederica, I have a favor to ask…”

She turned back to her two sisters and decided to convince them to humor her sudden idea.

8

“I was quite surpriseeeeed. I didn’t expect Petra to caaall me to come down here and see something in person.”

Roswaal chuckled in a good mood when they came to pick him up in the nearest town.

Petra’s expressions were complicated and strange when Roswaal talked to her, so Frederica was anxious with the worry that her younger sister might explode. She really wanted to hold her head at Roswaal’s bad habit of provoking Petra while being fully aware that she would get mad.

“I was wondering what it could be, but from the looks of you all, it seems like it isn’t anything daaangerous, so should I assume that you three found something really interesting then?”

“Yes. It was Petra’s idea, but it will surely live up to your expectations, Master Roswaal,” replied Ram.

“Oh myyy, it’s making me exxxcited.”

“Master, don’t provoke Petra too much or I will get angry,” threatened Frederica.

While they were on their way, Frederica acted as a buffer between Roswaal and Petra and glared at Ram for not helping her out. Ram did not seem to notice it, however, and was just looking straight ahead. She seemed different than usual.

The mansion eventually came into view, and Roswaal squinted his heterochromatic eyes. “Aah…This brings back memories. It’s been so long since I last came here.”

“—? You mean when you were a child, Master?” Petra asked.

“Was I speaking in riddles? Anyway, what’s the thing you wanted to show me?”

Roswaal gave a vague answer to Petra’s question and then impatiently looked around. Seeing his reaction, Frederica and the others looked at each other and nodded, then reverently opened the front door.

Upon stepping into the mansion, Roswaal’s eyes widened in surprise.

“This is…”

“…”

Welcoming him were one hundred and eleven neatly maintained dolls with clothes and makeup on—courtesy of Petra.

“They’ve been guarding the mansion for a long time… It only felt right that they be acknowledged for their work. They must’ve been waiting for their someone’s return for a long time.” said Petra to Roswaal, who just stood there.

That was Petra’s wish which Frederica and Ram had accepted. Petra’s kindness was met with a nod of approval from Frederica from the beginning and even though Ram didn’t say no she acted like it was a drag.

Petra put her heart into improving the dolls’ appearances with a touch of makeup. To her, these dolls were their seniors and had been in service longer than Frederica when she first arrived at Roswaal Manor.

“You guys stayed here all this time?” asked Roswaal, looking at the sea of dolls.

"…"

"I see… You increased your companions in order to fulfill your duty. All this time you have been protecting this manor and yearning for the day that its master would return."

Their eyes were fixed on their master—Roswaal—as if they were hanging on to each and every word. As if moved by their gaze, Roswaal gently stroked the head of the doll in the front. "I'm back now. —I'm sorry for keeping all of you waiting."

The dolls bowed their heads reverently in response to Roswaal's words of gratitude. "—Welcome home, Master."

As Frederica, Ram, and Petra felt various emotions while looking at that scene they suddenly noticed something.

"What…? They aren't-moving…?"

The dolls had stopped moving after lowering their heads. There was no response to the confused Petra's mutter, and Roswaal let out a sigh.

"They have fulfilled their duty to the mansion," he said. "After tirelessly dedicating themselves, they can finally rest now."

"But…"

"—Thank you. For giving me a chance to right a wrong," said Roswaal before turning back around to face a teary Petra and placing his hand on her head.

At that moment, Petra bit her lip hard and pulled away from Roswaal's touch. She hid behind Frederica and glared at him. "Master, you dummy! Selfish! You are always like this!"

"You're right. I am always like this. You can expect to be veeeeery busy now that I'm here."

He ignored Petra's roaring anger and smiled wryly while taking in the scene around him. All he saw were lifeless dolls and a still-unrenovated mansion. In the end, they couldn't rely on the dolls for help, so they had to renovate the mansion themselves. But…

“I think I’ll do something myself for a change… What should we start with?” asked Roswaal.

“Hmmm, are you sure?” replied Frederica, “I am warning you, this won’t be easy.”

“Why, you can most certainly cooount on me.”

Frederica smiled and said, “Alright. Then go ahead and work him like an earth dragon, Petra.”

“Yes! With pleasure!” replied Petra.

The master rolled up his sleeves, which didn’t suit him, and the raging Petra told him what to do. Watching the comical scene unfold before her, Frederica smiled and turned towards Ram.

She was kneeling next to the doll that had completed its duty and whose time had stopped and was gently caressing its cheek.

“Thank you for your service, great seniors. —You can leave Master Roswaal to us now,” Ram said kindly.

To Frederica, seeing Ram do something like that was rarer than a hollow.

Stand By Me Pleiades
(LQ AI Translation)

1

—Natsuki Subaru had vanished from the Pleiades Watchtower.

In short, that was the substance of the letter delivered to the mansion.

Roswaal: "—Lady Emilia has gotten remarkably better at her penmanship, she has."

Narrowing his mismatched eyes as he scanned the letter, Roswaal L. Mathers rested a slender finger on his chin and voiced an observation wholly unrelated to its contents.

At the time they first met, the sender of the letter, Emilia, had been ignorant of the world to an excessive degree.

Living a secluded life with her family's Great Spirit in her home forest, she had lacked common sense, and Roswaal had foreseen the headaches involved in giving her the various lessons required for the Royal Selection.

Yet, thanks to her sincerity and desire to improve, Emilia had produced tangible results.

Of course, she still had plenty of immaturities, but as an instructor he found her growth gratifying. If the Royal Selection were not constrained to three years, cramming even more disciplines into her regimen would have been delightful.

Roswaal: "It seems this is hardly the time to be indulging in such idle musings, however~."

Having bought himself a moment to sort out his thoughts through that bit of escapism, Roswaal closed his eyes.

Some time earlier, Emilia, together with Subaru and the others accompanying her, had set out for the Augria Sand Dunes at the kingdom's eastern edge—the Pleiades Watchtower where the «Sage» resided.

Their aim had been to meet the «Sage» Shaula and rely on her knowledge, famed as being nearly omniscient.

However, the attempt on the tower was expected to involve trials—trials even the «Sword Saint» Reinhard had failed—and Roswaal had judged it utterly impossible without Natsuki Subaru.

In fact, though how Subaru's presence had contributed remained unknown, Emilia and the others had safely reached the Pleiades Watchtower and achieved their goal—leaving only the issue mentioned at the outset still unresolved.

Roswaal: "So dear Subaru-kun has left Lady Emilia's side, hm. —It appears to be an unforeseen circumstance."

Arranging every circumstance into its optimal state—that was the Authority Roswaal knew Subaru to possess.

A problem had arisen that even that power could not fully compensate for. Subaru leaving Emilia's side—nothing else could explain it; and that, to Roswaal, constituted an emergency.

It had to be corrected—no matter what sacrifices it demanded.

Roswaal: "…"

Narrowing both eyes, Roswaal threw open the study window, leapt out, and, his cloak billowing, alighted in the front garden of the mansion.

His landing was flawless, yet there was someone ready to raise a fuss over such sudden behavior.

Frederica: "Master! Whatever are you doing all of a sudden?! Such discourtesy is like Garf's…"

It was the maid Frederica who, having spotted Roswaal after his leap, hurried over and said so.

Shaking her long golden hair, emerald eyes flashing indignantly, she closed the distance at once, ready to deliver a proper scolding regardless of the fact that the target was the master of the estate.

Frederica: “Please refrain from such childish antics. Had Petra been the one to find you, she would have been even more severe with her lecturing—”

Roswaal: “Frederica.”

Frederica: “What is it! I shall have you know, I do this only for your sake, Master—”

Roswaal: “—A bird-letter has arrived from Lady Emilia and the others. The matter seems urgent. Make the preparations.”

Frederica: “—Understood. What will you do, Master?”

Cut off mid-lecture, Frederica straightened at once before Roswaal’s serious tone—the speed of the switch befitting a model maid—and in answer to her question, Roswaal pointed to the sky.

Roswaal: “Given the situation, I need swift legs. —I shall summon Clind. I will be back within a few hours.”

Frederica: “Understood. I shall inform Petra myself.”

For a split second Frederica’s eyes twitched at Clind’s name, but Roswaal made no comment on her aversion.

Frederica and Clind—once inseparable—were now somehow awkward with each other; getting those two capable servants to coordinate smoothly remained a vexing issue.

At any rate—

Roswaal: “These are the details of the bird-letter. I leave the particulars to you—see that you think carefully and make the necessary arrangements.”

He handed Emilia’s letter to Frederica and turned his back on her. Once she read it, Frederica would make the proper arrangements.

Leaving that trust behind, Roswaal lightly kicked off the ground and lifted himself into the air.

A flight magic achieved through a composite of wind, earth, and yang magic—it was prized for allowing a speed rivaling that of migratory birds, yet, surprisingly, few were able to imitate it, for it belonged to the domain of advanced magic.

Because so few could use it, both the royal court and certain old friends had told him not to employ it too freely, and yet—

Roswaal: “—Right now qualifies as nothing less than an emergeeency~.”

Unconsciously casting their warnings aside in that earnest tone, Roswaal tore through the blue sky.

Frederica: “If only you always showed nothing but that earnest side of yourself, those around you might ease their glare a little.”

Raising her head from a deep bow, long hair rippling in the wind stirred by her departing master, Frederica murmured the complaint at once deft yet clumsy Roswaal.

From the speed of his response and his seriousness, it was clear Roswaal’s concern for Emilia and the others was genuine. Naturally, the underlying premise of his own objectives remained, but that did not alter his actions.

If only he would show that side of himself to Petra, Otto, and Garfiel—the ones forever keeping a wary eye on his every move.

Frederica: “Is this, too, merely my debt of gratitude to Master clouding my eyes?”

Letting the corners of her brows droop, Frederica heaved a heavy sigh and lowered her gaze to the letter in her hands.

She reflected on the bird-letter before her—a delivery technique that used birds specially raised and trained to carry correspondence over great distances. It had been devised by Roswaal’s grandmother two generations back; despite the many issues, such as the high cost of raising the birds and the need for concealment runes against theft or crashes, it remained popular among the kingdom’s upper classes.

The very fact it had arrived from the Augria Sand Dunes at the kingdom’s eastern frontier attested to its impressive speed and range—but what exactly was in it that had made Roswaal so serious?

Frederica: “This is…”

Scanning the letter, Frederica even forgot to raise her hand to cover her mouth—an unconscious gesture she would never normally neglect—so shocking was its content, and—

Petra: “Frederica-nee-sama! Just now, didn’t Master go flying off?”

Recently taking magic lessons from the detestable Roswaal, Petra had sensed the disturbance of mana in the manor and rushed into the front garden. Knowing the tender feelings of the girl who was practically her little sister, Frederica grasped what Roswaal had meant by “I leave the rest to you” and silently resented him for it.

Frederica: “…And how am I supposed to explain this to Petra, pray tell?”

Gazing up at the sky where her master had vanished, Frederica murmured feebly, wondering how she could possibly relay Emilia’s note—the note that had sent Roswaal hurrying—to Petra.

2

—Several hours after Frederica’s muttered complaint, Roswaal—who ought to have been the target of that resentment—was confronting his intended counterpart inside the intended mansion.

Annerose: “As always, Uncle, your visits are so sudden.”

Roswaal: “I am aware it is impolite, I knooow. But this is urgent business on my end as well—please forgive me.”

Annerose: “I would be far more troubled if you turned up on the balcony when it was not urgent at all.”

Glaring at Roswaal with young yet stern eyes was Annerose Miload, mistress of the mansion he had clambered onto from the balcony and head of the long-associated Miload family.

Granted, the longstanding relationship belonged to the Miloads; with Annerose herself—now ten years old—Roswaal had known her only since the day she was born.

He felt a deep, fond amazement at how splendidly she had grown into a young lady, and yet—

Annerose: “Uncle, I am no longer nine; I have turned ten. Please do not forget.”

Roswaal: “Oh dear, I do not believe I said anything out loud, thouuugh.”

Annerose: “Your eyes said as much. Please compose yourself. The only reason your behavior, attire, and lifestyle are tolerated is because everyone mistakenly believes you are at least reasonable on the inside.”

Roswaal: “Goodness, if you say so, I have no defense.”

Shaking his head with a wry smile at her words, Roswaal rocked the back of the reception-room sofa. Thankful for her poise in calmly receiving a guardian who had literally flown here, he searched for an opening to broach his main topic—but:

Annerose: “Since you went to the trouble of arriving from the sky, this must be a request for me… or for Clind, perhaps? Or for both of us?”

Roswaal: “How reassuuuring~. Am I really that easy to read?”

Annerose: “Indeed you are. You always choose the quickest, best move. You cannot risk convoluted or roundabout tactics for fear of failure, can you?”

Accepting that the wisest course was not to argue with her childlike provocation, Roswaal yielded—Annerose knew exactly how much he valued her. Snapping her fingers, she said:

Annerose: “Clind, do come in. Or rather—you are already here, are you not?”

Clind: “Indeed, as you say. Your insight is peerless.”

As the thin-faced man in impeccable butler attire stepped through the drawing-room door—one eye hidden behind a monocle—Roswaal relied on Annerose’s efficiency and plunged straight to business.

Roswaal: “A bird-letter has arrived from Lady Emilia. It seems I must head to the Empire over a matter involving Subaru-kun. I wish to borrow the two of you to handle matters here and make the necessary arrangements.”

Annerose: “…Emily and Natsuki Subaru, is it.”

The Miloads were major supporters of Emilia in the Royal Selection, and Annerose—who called her “Emily”—would spare no effort for her sake, even if the issue concerned her complicated rival, Natsuki Subaru.

Annerose: “In short, while you move to resolve the matter yourself, I am to take charge of House Mathers?”

Roswaal: “Precisely. I wish to entrust it to you; there is no one else I can truuust.”

Annerose: “Spare me the flattery. …Will you be leaving anyone behind?”

Roswaal: “I thought of leaving either Ram or Frederica… but that seems difficult. The problem appears to involve not only Subaru-kun but also Rem, who traveled with us."

Emilia's letter had revealed that both Subaru and Rem had vanished; Ram's agitation would be immense. She had joined the journey precisely to find a way to save her sleeping sister—who had now disappeared altogether. Telling her to stay quietly at the mansion was unthinkable.

Roswaal: "Therefore, at best I could leave Frederica alone… naturally, I will chooose carefully."

Annerose: "In any case, a handover from Frederica to Clind is essential. Very well, I accept the task of overseeing the house. As for the rest—"

Her almond-shaped eyes turned toward the butler standing behind her. Prompted by his mistress's gaze, Clind bowed respectfully.

Clind: "Then allow me to enquire. Question: —What is it that you desire of me, Master?"

Roswaal: "There is a problem Subaru-kun is carrying. We cannot keep him separated from Beatrice for long. Our time is limited."

Clind: "The contract between Lord Subaru and Lady Beatrice—its term, its limitations, its deadline."

Roswaal grimaced; master and servant truly were fast talkers. Subaru and Beatrice were a pair whose mutual deficiencies made them perfectly complementary: Subaru's gate was shattered, leaving him no means of expelling the mana his body produced, while Beatrice could accept mana only from her contractor. Their bond was ideal—until separation spelled mutual ruin.

Roswaal: "It is wonderful that they are so close, but once apart they fall into mortal jeopardy. Subaru-kun faces death from an excess build-up of mana, Beatrice faces disappearance from mana deficiency."

Clind: "That loss would be intolerable—to you, Master, and to me as well."

Roswaal: “Indeed. I cannot afford to lose the card that is Subaru-kun.”

Clind: “Forgive me. I was speaking of Lady Beatrice. My apologies.”

Annerose clapped her hands softly.

Annerose: “I understand. So that is why you need Clind’s help, Uncle. …But his ability to shorten distance works only within Lugunica.”

Roswaal: “Of course, I knooow that. Even so, if we are to head for the Empire, many arrangements are required. May I rely on you, Clind?”

Clind: “If it is your wish and Lady Annerose consents—no problem. However—”

Roswaal: “You mean the payment of the price, yes? I am aware—though it pains me deeeply.”

Selling off memories—an ironic act for one who clung to the past—always tore at Roswaal’s heart, yet that very pain was proof of the price paid.

Roswaal: “Three… no, four spells I will offer as payment. In exchange, I wish to borrow the power of your Authority.”

Clind: “Four—such a bold, decisive choice.”

Roswaal: “If I hold back and come up short, I could not bear it. Time is short—for me as well.”

One eye closed, the yellow eye fixed on Clind. Time was precious for every step toward his long-sought goal; Roswaal could not afford a single failure, nor the luxury of waiting for another chance.

Roswaal: “First, go and collect Lady Emilia and the others. Take care not to divulge your Authority.”

Clind: “Understood. Lady Annerose, do you approve?—Acknowledged.”

Annerose: “…It is for Emily’s sake. Do as Uncle says, Clind.”

At her nod, the butler bowed deeply—then vanished. He had quite literally disappeared, not merely hidden himself. By now, his figure was likely in Mirula, the town nearest the Augria Sand Dunes.

Roswaal: “Should he wish, he might even reach the Pleiades Watchtower itself.”

Annerose: “He says that is impossible—there is apparently a reason the tower is hard to approach… though he would not explain further.”

Lowering her eyes as she spoke of Clind’s Authority, Annerose fell silent, then at length:

Annerose: “Was it really all right, Uncle?”

Roswaal: “Isn’t it a bit meen~ to ask only after it becomes irreversible?”

Annerose: “Magic is extremely precious to you, is it not? Very, very precious.”

Roswaal: “…Precisely because it is.”

Her large eyes reminded him irresistibly of her parents’ earnestness. Clutching his chest, Roswaal endured the pang of accusation from his past. To fulfill his long-cherished wish—his reunion with that person—no sacrifice was too great, even if the price was the very blessing bestowed by that person.

Annerose: “Please do not torment yourself too much, Uncle.”

Roswaal: “Quite the opposite, Annerose. There is no reason for me not to keep packing my feelings in.”

Though admonished by one so much younger, Roswaal shook his head. Even recognizing her counsel as heartfelt, he could not accept it—for this was the story Roswaal L. Mathers—no, Roswaal Mathers—had chosen.

"…"

The scenery changed in literally the space of a blink, and Otto Suwen found himself standing in front of the mansion.

A journey that should have spanned several hundred kilometers and taken more than a week had been erased in an instant, leaving Otto to gather his thoughts for a few seconds.

Exactly five seconds later he let out a deep sigh.

Otto: "Well, I'm not about to panic over something like this anymore …"

Garfiel: "Ya sure got thick-skinned, Otto-bro. Or were ya born that way?"

Otto: "I can't remember what I was like a year ago, so either answer works."

Shrugging the shoulder Garfiel had just smacked, Otto tossed the immediate questions aside and glanced at the suave man standing quietly nearby.

Otto: "This is awfully handy, but is it safe for us to hear the details?"

Clind: "As you surmise, any disclosure is forbidden. I can only guarantee it is not to be used lightly and that it causes no harm to the human body. Rest assured."

Otto: "That wording isn't exactly reassuring, but … very well."

Reluctantly nodding at the butler Clind's reply, Otto reminded himself that although Clind was certainly an ally, he was an ally shrouded in mystery. Long acquainted with Roswaal, he had trained Frederica as a maid, taught Subaru whipwork and martial arts, and even tutored Petra—according to the students themselves. In short, he was indispensable to the Emilia camp.

Garfiel: “Hard ta believe we jumped straight from Pristella to here. Is this that ‘Door Crossing’ Beatrice used?”

Clind: “No, it operates on principles utterly different from Lady Beatrice’s yin-magic—vastly so. Regrettably, the particulars must remain sealed. Forgive me.”

Otto: “You don’t sound very determined to hide it …”

Clind: “Forgive me.”

That same elusive quality Otto had always sensed in Clind was clearly present again. Yet what mattered right now was not the “transfer” itself, but why Clind had gone to such lengths to bring them back.

Otto: “So Natsuki-san and Rem-san were blown all the way to the Vollachian Empire … is that correct?”

Garfiel: “Tch … shoulda gone with ’em, after all.”

Garfiel’s face hardened at once. Otto shook his head.

Otto: “We all decided together. Pristella needed hands for the rebuilding, and we couldn’t have located the ‘Witch’s Remains’ without you.”

Garfiel: “Yeah, but still—”

Otto: “If we start playing what-ifs there’s no end. Take every cause away and we end up at ‘it would’ve been best if Natsuki-san hadn’t been hurled off in the first place.’”

Garfiel: “That sounds like somethin’ Ram’d say. Bit rough on the cap’n, ain’t it?”

Otto: “Which is why blaming yourself is pointless.”

Unless it helped prevent a recurrence, assigning responsibility was futile. The fact was simple: Subaru and Rem were gone, and they needed to enter the Empire to retrieve them. Otto and Garfiel had been summoned for precisely that.

Otto: “Still, of all places, they end up in the most troublesome country …”

Garfiel: “That’s the cap’n for ya. Like in that tale—‘The Father-King’s Trials, every last one in Magritza.’”

Otto: “In that story the hero suffers nonstop hardship and dies unrewarded at the end.”

He slumped at the comparison, already dreading the ordeals ahead. In his years of peddling Otto had visited countries beyond Lugunica, yet the one great nation he had never entered was southern Vollachia. Tense relations with the kingdom and the sheer number of border conditions were part of it, but the main reason was simpler:

Otto: “—Because in that nation, a person’s life is lost more easily than anywhere else.”

In Vollachia the strong were revered and the weak oppressed; to anyone ill-suited to that climate it was a living hell. There was no debate which side Subaru belonged to.

Clind: “Lady Emilia and her party are already awaiting you both inside. Anticipation.”

Opening the door just as Otto finished composing himself—Clind truly was thorough. Straightening his naturally hunched back, Otto said:

Otto: “Being ‘anticipated’ is a heavy burden, but Lady Emilia and Beatrice-chan must be in quite a whirl. Let’s go join them.”

Garfiel: “Heh, relax, Otto-bro! If we gotta crash into the Empire, I’ll show my worth!”

Otto: “…I shall do my best to keep it from coming to that.”

He had no intention of sparking an international incident; that would wreck the Royal Selection, and even Subaru might be crushed under such a catastrophe—dragging Otto down with him. He might have escaped the sinking ship long ago, but—

Otto: “I threw away that chance a long time ago.”

If he had truly wished to flee, he would have had to do so back when the snorting youth beside him was still a savage enemy rather than a junior comrade. Since then, Otto had not once considered running.

Anastasia: “Couldn’t Julius learn to use that handy magic of the butler?”

Julius: “…My apologies. If it were an application of yin-magic, perhaps once Nes matures, but—”

Anastasia: “Ah, ya don’t need to take it that seriously. Even magic-ignorant me knows it ain’t simple.”

The knight’s earnest reply made anyone facing him want to sit up straighter; Anastasia Hoshin waved a hand, chastising herself for making Julius worry yet again.

Once more she had needlessly burdened him—how troublesome.

—Since their master-servant bond had been restored at the Pleiades Watchtower, the two remained awkward. Julius was undoubtedly her knight now, but his memories were still missing, and they struggled to grasp the right distance between them.

Eridna: “For my part, it’s pleasant to see such a rare side of you, Ana.”

Anastasia: “Quit sayin’ that every time. How wicked you are.”

Teased about her unease, Anastasia stuck her tongue out at the muffler around her own neck—literally. The white-fox scarf was an artificial spirit and her long-time partner, Echidna. At the sly chuckle of this conspirator, Anastasia pursed her lips; after all the hardships Echidna had borne while she was absent, she could hardly retort—especially since she had undone those efforts at the last moment.

Eridna: “To escape the Sin Archbishop of ‘Gluttony,’ you hid your consciousness inside and left control of your body to me—a dangerous gamble.”

Anastasia: “And I ruined it because I couldn’t hold out. Really got no patience.”

Exasperated with herself, she touched her cheek, but Julius stepped in. Placing a hand to his chest, the elegant knight said,

Julius: “Lady Anastasia’s single word was the decisive blow. Without that final push, my sword would never have reached Reid Astrea.”

Anastasia: “You really think so? Not just talkin’ me up?”

Julius: “It is the plain truth. I swear it on my sword and my loyalty.”

Anastasia: “Well, if ya go that far, then fine.”

His golden eyes held her pale-turquoise ones without wavering, and she shelved her doubts. Still, such deep trust amazed her.

Anastasia: “We must’ve worked mighty well together. What started it?”

Julius: “The reason I came to serve you, my lady?”

Anastasia: “Right. I’m a foreign merchant; you’re a Kingdom knight. I know my motive, but yours?”

Of his background she knew the basics—heir to House Juukulius, Royal Guard knight—yet why had a man of the Kingdom joined hands with a Kararagi merchant?

Julius: “…There are various reasons, but—”

Anastasia: “But?”

Julius: “Above all, I found hope in Lady Anastasia’s capacity.”

After a brief thought, that was his answer. Its unadorned trust widened her eyes; she had expected some grand ideal more typical of him. As she stiffened—

Eridna: “Ah-ha-ha-ha!”

The scarf spirit burst out laughing, startling Anastasia.

Anastasia: “Echidna! Don’t scare me like that.”

Eridna: “Sorry, sorry. It sounded too familiar to ignore.”

Julius: “Familiar? How so?”

Eridna: “I’m another who invested in Ana’s future; can’t see it as someone else’s story.”

Anastasia: “Now that ya say it, maybe I heard that before… Wait?”

She recalled similar words on meeting Echidna—and even earlier, when Ricardo had smiled that he looked forward to her future.

Anastasia: “Does that mean I always woo folks the same way?”

Eridna: “Nothing wrong with that. If Ana has a trump card that works on everyone, all the better.”

Julius: “Nicely put.”

She smiled wryly at his seriousness. Echidna’s tone was as ever, but Julius seemed able to find merit in anything—which made her wonder if leaving him like that was wise, or if such things hadn’t troubled their former selves.

Julius: “I can’t say. I believed nothing stood between us, though how much you labored behind the scenes…”

Anastasia: “Readin’ my mind, are ya?”

Julius: “During your missing time, I was at your side more than anyone.”

Anastasia: “That’s a killer line.”

Hand to her mouth, she laughed softly and let the impudent knight be. There was unease, yes—but he remembered what she did not, and adversity was her strong suit.

Anastasia: “Besides, I suddenly recalled Emilia-san; I might remember Julius any moment too.”

Eridna: “Ideally, yes. She and Julius both suffered ‘Gluttony’; no one knows how to restore what was lost, but…”

Julius: “There is no need to hurry. —Feeling that way now is something I’m proud of.”

Hand over his heart, he smiled without bravado. Anastasia nodded: “That so.”

With their footing regained, stalled business could wait.

Anastasia: “Like we said at the tower, we gotta help find Natsuki-kun and Rem-san. Emilia-san might not remember, but the third ‘Gluttony’ worries me too.”

Julius: “If they were hurled off together, the Empire is in danger as well.”

Eridna: “That great nation won’t heed us easily. Now, how do we find them?”

Once their direction was set, discussion among the three sped along.

Anastasia: “Not every problem’s solved, but the fact we’re here is thanks to Emilia-san and the others… If I don’t repay that favor, my merchant’s name’ll cry.”

Julius: “Then, what will you do?”

Anastasia: “Why, make a pitch—the Hoshin Company way.”

Answering his winked question, she shrugged. Her sales talk’s charm had just been proven—though perhaps:

Anastasia: “Two’s not right—maybe one and one beast is more accurate?”

With that playful tongue-poke, the muffler at her neck danced in a ticklish flutter.

Meili: “Everyone’s scurrying around, trying to bring Big-Brother and the others back, aren’t they…?”

Resting both elbows upon her knees and propping up her cheeks, Meili murmured the words in an even tone.

The air of bustle spreading through the Mathers Mansion felt worlds away from the “old home” she was supposed to have here—though technically, Meili had spent a full year beneath this roof.

Meili: “I mean, the place I stayed was the tatami cell, so having it this lively is kinda refreshing.”

Originally, Meili had been an assassin dispatched to kill Emilia’s party.

She had raised the old manor, failed, and been captured. Ordinarily she would have been tortured—or worse—yet by some twist of fate here she was, left utterly unrestrained.

Meili: “…Do they never worry I’ll suddenly betray them and start a rampage?”

Weapons were unnecessary; should she wish, she could summon the nearby witchbeasts and turn them into pawns. If she felt like it, she could even launch a revenge match for Elsa.

At the notion, Meili gave a small laugh.

Meili: “A revenge match, huh. Elsa would probably think that’s the most pointless thing ever.”

Elsa had never cared a whit about what happened after her death; she had been careless enough when alive, and there was no reason to believe that would change afterward.

Meili had once been offered a chance to learn what her partner had truly thought—but she had missed that chance, and now she felt that was for the best.

Meili: “…After all, somebody already told me I could decide my own future by watching all sorts of people walk ahead.”

Though the one who had said so had flown beyond her sight.

Petra: “Ah! Meili-chan!”

Meili: “Oh?”

Loafing in the lounge, Meili reclined over the chair-back until an upside-down, familiar, cherubic face entered her view—the girl who had visited even during Meili’s captivity alongside Subaru and Emilia.

Meili: “How’ve you been, Petra-chan?”

Petra: “I’m fine! I’m glad you came back safely too, Meili-chan—I was worried, you know.”

Meili: “You worried right after Big-Brother, Big-Sister, and Beatrice-chan, though?”

Petra placed her hands on her hips and puffed out her rosy cheeks.

Petra: “Don’t say that! I never rank the people I worry about.”

Chuckling at her reaction, Meili flipped herself upright to face the girl properly. Petra looked just the same as at their parting a month ago, which was only natural; a return journey should have taken as long as the outward one, yet—

Petra: “You were with Brother Clind, right? What kind of magic did he use?”

Meili: “Beats me. Not being mean—really don’t know. He showed up, chatted a bit with Big-Sister, and pop, both dragon-carriages were in front of the mansion.”

Petra: “Hmm… Must be yin-magic. I hate asking, but I’ll ask the Master later.”

Meili watched the studious Petra nod along. The girl was blooming day by day in countless fields, including magic; given time, she might well unravel the mysterious butler’s spell.

Meili: “You don’t seem as down about Big-Brother as I expected, Petra-chan.”

Petra: “—What do you mean? I’m incredibly anxious, and very angry.”

A smile that never reached her eyes froze Meili’s tongue. She had misread: Petra was furious. Yet the girl in front of her would not explode; she would vent her feelings by means Meili could hardly imagine.

A year ago, when Petra had often visited the tatami cell, the terrifying declaration she had made still sent shivers through Meili whenever she recalled it:

Petra: “I’ll make you love me. Then you’ll never think about killing me again, right? So it’s okay—go ahead and love me.”

That dreadful stratagem had, over the course of a year, utterly disarmed Meili; she no longer entertained the faintest thought of harming Petra.

Meili: “…I-I’m sorry.”

Petra: “Hm? Why are you apologizing? You did your job, didn’t you? They said you helped in that place full of witchbeasts.”

Meili: “That’s true, buuut… I couldn’t save Big-Brother.”

Those words were not driven by fear of Petra, but by Meili’s own regret.

Meili: “I’d stepped away when he was hurled off, but… I’d be lying if I said I never wonder what might’ve happened had I stayed.”

Excuses like “the battle was over” meant nothing; Meili had neglected her vigilance, and everyone had paid. She could not fathom what Subaru and the others now faced in the Empire.

Perhaps sensing her sincerity, Petra’s eyes softened.

Petra: “Thank you for apologizing—and sorry for making you feel you had to. I couldn’t go with them at all, so I’m far worse than you.”

Meili: “That’s not—”

Petra: “—Which is why I will go this time. That’s my absolute resolve.”

Clenching her small fist, Petra declared it. Meili blinked, then laughed as her tension melted away.

Meili: “Big-Brother’s blessed, isn’t he? Having Petra-chan care so much.”

Petra: “He is! Oh, but you’re very important to me too, Meili-chan.”

Meili: “Yeees, yeees.”

Though tacked on, those words brought Meili no displeasure—proof of how thoroughly this determined girl had won her over. Likely Meili was not the only one.

Meili: “Petra-chan, I can’t join the Big-Brother search, you know.”

Petra: “…Right. You, Brother Clind, and Lady Annerose are headed for the Capital, aren’t you?”

Meili: “Uh-huh. Seems we’ve gotta explain how to cross that sand sea.”

She nodded, picturing the drastically changed Augria Sand Dunes. With the ‘Sage’ Shaula’s role finished and the testing sandstorms lifted, the defenses around the Sand Tower holding the Book of the Dead had crumbled. Guarding the Pleiades Watchtower now depended solely on the senile Divine Dragon stationed within and the hordes of witchbeasts in the dunes—both of which Emilia’s camp could command.

Petra: “Lady Emilia became friends with the Divine Dragon, and Meili-chan can control the witchbeasts.”

Meili: “Never thought I’d be mentioned in the same breath as a Divine Dragon, y’know.”

Meili gave a rueful laugh. To secure royal approval of that arrangement, she herself had to appear at the Royal Castle, meaning she would act separately from Petra and Emilia.

Meili: “It’s a bit of a downer, but I’ll entrust Big-Brother to you, Petra-chan.”

Petra: “I’ll do my best. …And you be careful, okay? Brother Clind’s very kind but has a tiny bit of a problem, so watch out.”

Meili: “Please don’t scare me like that. …Still, I’m not alone, am I?”

With that, Meili lightly shook the hood of her robe. Petra’s eyes widened as a crimson shadow popped out, scuttling across Meili’s shoulder to perch atop her head—a crimson scorpion.

Petra: “That creature…”

Meili: “My little bodyguard, I suppose. I’m still debating a name, so for now I call her Crimson-Scorpion-chan.”

Petra mouthed the name and stared; the scorpion puffed itself up and clicked its sharp pincers.

Petra: “Take good care of Meili-chan, Crimson-Scorpion-chan.”

Pinching one tiny pincer as though shaking hands, Petra did not laugh; the scorpion, perhaps accepting the gesture, waved its tail in satisfaction.

Meili: “Let’s both do our jobs properly, okay? That’s surely for the best.”

Petra: “Right! Once Subaru’s back and everything’s settled, let’s all play together again.”

Meili: “Yes, indeed. I’ve got heaps to tell Big-Brother, after all.”

Meili’s smile prompted Petra to tilt her head.

Petra: “Hm? Something about that reaction… Did you maybe see Subaru do something cool?”

Startled, Meili nearly denied it, yet hesitated—perhaps in mischievous payback, or perhaps recalling the events at the Watchtower. Either way—

Meili: “My, my, Petra-chan, how worrywort you are.”

Above Meili’s shy grin, Crimson Scorpion clicked its pincers—neither agreeing nor denying—only deepening Petra’s unease.

6

Ram: “—Lady Emilia, have you calmed down?”

Emilia: “…Yes, a little. I’m sorry for making you worry so much.”

Having finished changing and stepped out of her room, Emilia lowered her brows to Ram, who had been waiting for her. She was glad for the concern, yet painfully aware of how much trouble she was causing.

With Subaru and Rem gone they all had to pull together, and she could not afford to mope.

Emilia: “Subaru and Rem disappeared, so you must be frantic too, Ram.”

Ram: “Barusu aside, I am certainly worried about Rem. Barusu aside.”

Beatrice: “No need to rub it in twice, I suppose. Betty is worrying over Subaru for the both of you… We believe they are both safe, in fact.”

Hearing stubborn Ram’s answer, Beatrice—holding Emilia’s hand—looked down. Her pallor came not only from worry over Subaru but also from the problem of her contract as a spirit.

Ram: “Lady Beatrice, how is your body?”

Beatrice: “Betty is surviving on energy-saving mode, in fact. You should be far more exhausted.”

Ram: “I shall throw myself into Lord Roswaal’s arms after this, so there is no problem.”

Beatrice: “…Betty can’t understand your awful tastes at all, in fact.”

Ram: “I return those words unchanged to you—both of you.”

Emilia: “Eh? Me too? Return what?”

Before she could get an answer, the three stopped in the corridor—they had reached their destination, Roswaal’s study on the top floor.

Emilia: “…Thanks to Clind we got back really fast, but we still have to hurry.”

Calling through the door, she drew Beatrice along and stepped into the study. Inside, their reliable companions were assembled, waiting. Every face here was anxious for Subaru and Rem and ready to lend strength.

Emilia: “—Thank you, everyone, for gathering.”

Feeling Beatrice’s little hand squeeze, Emilia returned the grip and looked each person straight in the eye. Knowing they all shared the same feelings bolstered her; she reminded her rushing heart not to panic and stumble.

Together they would be all right.

Emilia: “Let’s definitely find Subaru and the others who were blown away.”

At her call, the whole group nodded as one—and to Emilia, nothing was more reassuring.

Stand By Me Pleiades: Return of the Good-For-Nothing Son (LQ AI Translation)

1

Anastasia: “We’re gonna head in from the Kararagi side. Compared with Lugunica and Vollachia, who’re locked in a staring contest, Kararagi’s bound ta keep its guard a mite looser, ya see.”

Emilia found Anastasia’s proposal an utterly delightful surprise.

Of course she understood that Anastasia, Julius, and Echidna were worried about Subaru’s party. Even so, they belonged to a different camp.

Originally, all of them had gone to the Pleiades Watchtower for the same reason, yet from different stand-points; now that they had come back safely, none of the three were obliged to help her look for the missing pair.

Julius: “I share Lady Anastasia’s opinion. Beyond the political entanglement between Empire and Kingdom, that city-state happens to be the home base of the Hoshin Company—Lady Anastasia’s own stronghold.”

Anastasia: “Means I can use all my connections. Not what ya’d call a bad gamble, right?”

Emilia: “Anastasia, Julius…!”

And yet they were offering their help as if it were the most natural thing in the world; Emilia felt a surge of gratitude.

Tears welled quietly in her amethyst eyes.

Emilia: “I’m so glad I became friends with you, Anastasia.”

Anastasia: “Well, “friends” might be stretchin’ it a bit. You an’ me are still rival candidates, remember. But—”

Emilia: “But?”

Anastasia: “Once Natsuki-kun’s business and the Royal Selection’re all wrapped up, how ’bout we be friends then? Same as you, I ain’t got many pals.”

Emilia’s heartfelt words drew a gentle, blooming smile from Anastasia.

Eridna: “For the record—that wasn’t bashfulness. Ana really doesn’t have many friends.”

Anastasia: “Quit flappin’ yer gums, will ya.” pinches Echidna’s nose

Watching the bickering pair made Emilia giggle and soothe the flutter of hope and worry in her chest.

Then Anastasia’s tone sharpened slightly.

Anastasia: “But don’t go celebratin’ too soon, okay? Routin’ ourselves through Kararagi means our way’s gonna take time… and Natsuki-kun doesn’t have much of that left, does he?”

Emilia: “Right. We can’t dawdle… So we’ll do our best to enter the Empire by another route, different from yours.”

With a small clenched fist, Emilia met Anastasia’s pale-teal gaze head-on.

While Anastasia’s group searched for a path from the Kararagi frontier, Emilia’s party would aim for Vollachia by their own means.

Determined, Emilia tightened her expression and—

Emilia: “—We’re all going to work hard and sneak in illegally!”

Emilia: “Huh? What’s wrong? You two… no, all three of you are makin’ reaaally weird faces.”

Anastasia waved a hand, half laughing, half exasperated.

Anastasia: “When I talk with ya, Emilia-san, even the bad ideas get soft ’n fluffy. It’s kinda funny.”

Emilia: “Really? I don’t get it, but soft sounds better than hard?”

Anastasia: “Dunno ’bout that. Julius, what d’you think?”

Julius: “Me? …I would call it one of Lady Emilia’s virtues.”

Emilia: “Um, thanks!”

Because it sounded like praise, Emilia thanked him honestly; Julius, however, wore a complicated look, and Anastasia sported a mischievous grin.

Situations like this usually meant there was some deeper meaning Emilia hadn’t noticed.

Emilia: “Nobody ever explains things much to me.”

Eridna: “Well, chances to cheer on an illegal border crossing don’t come often. Yet this may be one of those rare times. Ana and I will both be rooting for you.”

Anastasia: “Sure thing. Emilia-san, ya do know it’s a risky bet, right?”

Emilia: “Uh-huh, everybody’s scolded me thoroughly about it.”

Picking up Echidna’s words, Anastasia’s eyes turned serious, and Emilia nodded back.

Sneaking across a border meant slipping into another country without permission—plain wrongdoing. If they were caught, punishment would be severe, and Emilia herself was a Royal Candidate of Lugunica.

Emilia: “Because of me, relations with the Empire might sour, and they could even strip me of my candidacy."

Anastasia: "And ya still intend to go? Don't ya have goals ya wanna achieve, Emilia-san?"

Anastasia's question was strict, but kind.

Indeed, Emilia had wishes she wanted to grant as queen—people she wished to save, dreams and ideals sprouted since the Selection began.

Emilia: "But I want to realize all of them together with Subaru. That's why—I'm off to do my best."

Julius: "…Subaru is a fortunate man, it seems."

Emilia: "Subaru isn't the fortunate one; I am."

Julius, who had become good friends with Subaru during their journey, looked worried; Emilia gave him a gentle smile. Subaru, ever earnest and hardworking, had helped her countless times. If something had happened to him, she wanted to be the very first to extend a hand.

Anastasia: "All right, all right. Emilia-san, I've heard ya out aplenty—gochisosama."

Emilia: "Gochisosama…?"

Anastasia clapped her hands as if finishing a meal. Of course, they hadn't eaten a thing while talking, so Emilia had no idea why she suddenly said that blessing over food.

Julius: "Ana and I will be leaving before long as well. Luckily, according to Margrave Mathers, we can borrow that butler's power."

Emilia: "You mean Mr Clind? He says the title's not butler but karei, household steward."

Julius: "Either way, it should shorten the time to Kararagi's border—though, personally, I am quite curious about the kind of magic it entails.”

Anastasia: “Curiosity later, Julius.”

Magic-lover Julius looked disappointed, but Emilia herself didn’t know the secret of Clind’s mysterious power. He had never shown it before; she guessed it was a force he could only use under special circumstances, and she was grateful he had chosen to help Subaru’s party.

Perhaps the choice had not been Clind’s alone—but still.

Anastasia: “Emilia-san.”

Emilia: “Ah, sorry—yes?”

Anastasia: “Like ya heard, we’ll put our full weight behind searchin’ for Natsuki-kun and Rem-san. In return, takin’ the matter of the tower back to the Royal Capital—that’s on your people.”

Emilia: “Right. Annerose will—”

Anastasia: “—Consider this our sign of trust.”

The single phrase, cutting off Emilia’s answer, thudded heavy into her chest. Eyes wide, she listened as Anastasia continued solemnly.

Anastasia: “With the Sand Wind and the “Sage” vanished, the Pleiades Watchtower is far more defenceless than before. Sure, there’s a Divine Dragon roostin’ on top, which is amazin’, but that still ain’t anywhere near perfect. If schemers or the Witch Cult set their sights on the tower, it’d be catastrophic.”

Julius: “To guard it from such threats, the Kingdom’s strength will be required. From the start, our journey’s aim was to find a way to save the Witch Cult’s victims; perhaps the Stacks of the “Books of the Dead” are that breakthrough.”

Eridna: “Reading every volume to draw out an answer… It’ll take many hands—an uphill path strewn with thorns.”

Anastasia, Julius, and Echidna each stressed the gravity of the matter.

Just as they said, the tower's possibilities were limitless; depending on its wielder's heart, it could be used for good or for unspeakable evil.

To prevent the latter, the tower had to be placed under the Kingdom's stewardship.

Anastasia added a playful lilt, breaking the tension from a moment before.

Anastasia: "So, conquering the uncharted Augria Sand Dunes and securing a watchtower brimming with unknown potential—pretty big spoils, huh? Don't hog the whole haul, all right? Make sure ya split it nice and neat."

It was less a threat between rival candidates than a friendly, slightly thorn-tipped reminder—or rather, Anastasia was letting it be taken that way. Emilia understood that much.

Therefore—

Emilia: "Leave it to me. I'd never do anything to disappoint a friend."

Resolving not to lean too heavily on Anastasia's kindness, Emilia packed as much sincerity—and a dash of impishness—into her nod.

2

Beatrice: "I honestly assumed someone like you would already have a way to slip in and out of the Empire, I suppose."

Her usual brusque tone came bundled with a transparent show of bravado.

Arms—short for her size—folded tight, chin tilted in a look that screamed I expected nothing from you anyway… and yet that very face betrayed how desperately she was hoping. The girl's straightforwardness laid everything bare.

So, uncharacteristically, Roswaal offered a downright sincere apology.

Roswaal: “Sorry~. Never imagined we’d have to dash off to the Empire right in the middle of the Royal Selection. As far as I knew, the whole affair was supposed to stay neatly inside Lugunica~.”

Beatrice: “Hmph! Some proper owner of an “Tome of Wisdom” you turned out to be. I was hoping to see the difference between you and Betty, who spent four hundred years clutching a blank book, in fact.”

Roswaal: “…My, that jealousy toward Subaru-kun…”

Beatrice: “Don’t be ridiculous! Subaru’s already in big trouble—don’t you dare pile more burdens on him. If you’re so eager, why not fly to the Empire right now and fetch them yourself?”

Roswaal: “If all I had to show for it was a flying dragon nipping my backside, that might be fun in its own way~.”

The outrageous suggestion earned only a wry smile. Keeping that smile, Roswaal spoke her name.

Roswaal: “Beatrice. I’ve taken every measure I can. No matter what, I will not let you be erased.”

Beatrice: “Spare me the needless concern. You need Subaru, not Betty. And Betty has no problem with that.”

Roswaal: “You wound me. Surely you know I love you as well.”

Beatrice: “Enough of that nonsense…!”

Roswaal: “Another sad misunderstanding. What has you so~, that reminds me.”

He broke off, closing one mismatched eye. The yellow iris fixed on Beatrice as he asked, with an air of casual curiosity—yet the topic was one neither of them could dodge.

Roswaal: “—That artificial spirit Lady Anastasia keeps.”

Beatrice: “…Just the name, that’s all. From what Betty could tell, she doesn’t know anything, in fact.”

Exactly as he had expected, her answer held no hesitation.

The fox-fur-collared spirit who called herself Echidna—an artificial spirit—was far too significant for Roswaal and Beatrice to ignore.

Beatrice plainly wished to believe the spirit knew nothing important, but—

Roswaal: “And what if she only pretends so? Perhaps she’s deceiving you.”

Beatrice: “She’s already admitted she’s an artificial spirit. What would be the point of lying?”

Her prickly reply made Roswaal narrow his eyes.

Why lie?—Reasons were endless. In the end, some people lie for no reason at all. By the standards of such ill-natured minds, Beatrice’s view was far too naïve; she hardly seemed a great spirit of four centuries.

And yet, Roswaal let out a small sigh. That naïveté was fine.

Roswaal: “Very well. She’s a spirit friend you finally made; I’ll refrain from bad-mouthing her~.”

Beatrice: “She’s not my friend! Stop saying weird things.”

Roswaal: “All right, all right. Anyway, are your travel preparations done? If you fall behind—”

Beatrice: “I don’t need you telling me, I suppose! Hmph!”

Cheeks reddening, she turned away and pat-pat-patted out of the office—her steps small, yet carrying the weight of someone stomping. The stalwart back refused to show the pain of Subaru’s absence, until it vanished beyond the door.

???: “—Have you taken care of everything, then?”

Once Beatrice had left, a voice rose from Roswaal’s lap. He glanced down; soft pink eyes met his from mere centimetres away. Feeling the weight and warmth of the head pillowed there, he shrugged.

Roswaal: “Just an essential conversation. Asking if I’m satisfied sounds a tad odd~.”

Ram: “Because Roswaal-sama loves Beatrice-sama.”

Roswaal: “…Such a ticklish remark when you bring it back up.”

The teasing twisted his lips. Gazing up at him with gentle eyes was Ram, lying sideways, using his lap as a pillow. She had listened like this through the whole talk with Beatrice. Beatrice, understanding the reason, had said nothing.

Roswaal: “You pushed yourself dreadfully on the journey. Even without Subaru’s plight, hurrying home was the right call.”

Ram: “Mental strain atop physical exhaustion. Shepherding Emilia-sama and Barusu was, as you can imagine… Had Otto been there I’d have made him do it, but he was useless.”

Roswaal: “He was recovering from his own wounds. Forgive him. Besides—”

Ram: “—He offered an alternative. So I shall overlook it.”

Her eyes remained closed, yet Roswaal laughed softly. That, from her, was the highest praise; proof she held Otto in esteem.

While they talked, his fingertips touched the scar where her horn had broken. Carefully regulated mana flowed in, flushing the stagnant circuits inside her body.

Just confirming that turbid, parched circulation was enough to imagine her pain.

Roswaal: “You… made it back safely. Thank you.”

Ram: “…Roswaal-sama.”

The words slipped out on impulse, and Roswaal himself gasped.

At once a fierce self-loathing scorched him. Anger at his lapse of composure—no, anger at the shamelessness of daring to rejoice in her safety.

With what mouth do you dare speak such things?

And yet—

Ram: “…Yes. Ram has returned, just like this.”

Her gentle smile tore at his chest.

Kind-hearted as she was, he could well imagine the storm of worry inside her over vanished Subaru and Rem; still she smiled, for his sake.

Because that smile worked exactly as she intended, Roswaal found it unbearable—so he sought her disappointment instead.

Roswaal: “I have finally understood why I took your sister, why I brought Rem into the mansion.”

He meant to confess a fact that would make him unworthy of her smile—something he had long pondered. In what way could Rem, forgotten by all through Gluttony’s Authority, aid his centuries-old designs? Why keep her, even dormant? Only now had a plausible answer formed—ugly, thoroughly Roswaal-like, sure to earn Ram’s unforgiving wrath.

Roswaal: “It is…”

Ram: “—As a replacement for my horn, correct?”

Roswaal: “Eh—”

Ram: “Too bad. Try again next time.”

If you want Ram to hate you—that was the message between the lines. Closing her eyes, she drifted off, leaving him utterly at her mercy. He could only continue the mana treatment, knowing full well how pathetic he looked.

He no longer knew how to extinguish the fervour Ram held for him.

The “Tome of Wisdom” that ought to show his path had been burned—by none other than the girl resting on his lap—and would never reveal the future to Roswaal again.

Even so, more than ever he craved its words right now, this very moment.

Emilia: “Anne, please look after the tower with Meili. We’ll do our very best!”

With a broad, vigorous wave of her hand, Emilia and her companions shot off toward their destination.

It all happened in the blink of an eye—quite literally so for those who experienced it. To the one left behind, Annerose, they simply vanished like smoke.

Meili: “For real, it’s super handy, but kind of spooky, ya know?”

Saying so, the girl with the swinging braids brushed the ground with the sole of her shoe. Only a moment ago there had been a dragon carriage, drawn by two ground dragons; it had disappeared along with them.

Even though she had seen it with her own eyes, the girl could not help tilting her head at the uncanny sight.

Annerose: “Why, I myself have yet to fathom the true nature of Clind’s abilities.”

It was none other than Clind who had educated Annerose, head of House Miload.

Guardian, tutor, and steward all in one, that unflinching, razor-sharp man had never once changed in attitude or appearance—nor had he ever explained why.

Hence—

Annerose: “You must be careful. He is highly capable, but equally dangerous.”

Meili: “Petra-chan and that fanged big-sis said the same thing, but what does it mean? That he likes little kids or something~?”

Annerose: “Put plainly, yes.”

Meili: “Oh, that’s all? That doesn’t bother me one bit, yaaay.”

Waving her hand with airy nonchalance, the girl—Meili—answered blithely. Annerose closed one eye and fixed her gaze on the girl’s seemingly defenseless back.

She was two or three years older than Annerose, her cute face belying a vaguely worldly air that made her feel precarious. Given what Annerose had heard beforehand, that was only natural.

Emilia: “Um, see, Meili’s the girl who burned down her previous mansion… well, she didn’t do it alone, she did it with her sister. But she’s not a bad kid! And she can control witchbeasts, which put Subaru in danger… but she’s not a bad kid!”

Emilia had defended her earnestly, yet there was no doubt Meili was a perilous individual.

Still, with the girl now entrusted to her care—and with a duty to fulfil in Emilia’s stead—Annerose’s stance was set.

Annerose: “I shall be the one to protect you.”

Meili: “…What’s with that face? As if my safety under your guarantee makes you nervous?”

Annerose’s proud declaration earned Meili’s suspicious look over her shoulder. When pressed, Meili stuck out her lips, muttering:

Meili: “You’re younger than me, aren’t ya? I’m the big-sister here, uh-huh?”

Annerose: “Does reliability hinge on age? By that logic, Emilia would be the most reliable of all.”

Meili: “Ugh… Bringing up Emilia-onee-san is totally cheating, ya know.”

Stung, Meili pouted while Annerose basked in triumph; even absent, Emilia lent her strength.

Annerose: “Besides, my dear uncle also placed you in my charge. Do you imagine he would entrust the future to any situation that worried him, even slightly?”

Meili: “…Can’t really read that margrave, but I guess he does sound convincing.”

Pressing a finger to her lips, Meili pondered. The collar of her robe squirmed; from within the hood, a tiny shadow crawled onto her head—a small red-shell scorpion, brandishing its pincers toward Annerose.

As though insisting it would guard Meili.

Annerose: “My, you have brought a most dependable escort.”

Meili: “Right~? So I’m not worried at all… Fine, I’ll let you protect me for a while, little miss.”

Annerose: “It is Annerose. Ideally, address me as Lady Annerose.”

Many dismissed Annerose due to her youth; she was well-practised at handling such reactions.

She recalled her very first meeting with Emilia—an equally ill-mannered elf girl she had never expected to cherish so dearly someday.

Annerose: “I look forward to seeing whether you can become my friend.”

Meili: “Petra-chan said something similar… Does this mansion teach everyone to sweet-talk like that?”

Hand to her mouth, Annerose smiled; Meili eyed her, dubious.

Then—

Clind: “—No. That is a misconception. Correction.”

Meili: “Kyaaah?!”

Clind appeared out of nowhere, right behind her; Meili shrieked, high-pitched.

Startled into a hop, she sent the scorpion flying. Danger. Rescue. With lightning speed Clind's hand caught it, yet the scorpion's fury was not soothed.

Annerose: "Your finger is being pinched. Serves you right."

Clind: "How heartless. Still, I shall accept the pain—delicious."

Annerose: "Kindly refrain from equating the scorpion's spite with my own sharp tongue!"

Clind had returned as swiftly as he had departed, scorpion dangling from his finger. While she grimaced at her steward, Annerose glanced at Meili.

Hands clutching her head, eyes wide at the sudden event—the very girl who had boasted Clind was nothing to fear.

Annerose: "As you see, his quirks are… pronounced. Therefore—"

Meili: "Th-Therefore?"

Annerose: "I believe it best if we get along, don't you?"

Narrowing her eyes, lips curling in a smile, Annerose spoke; Meili gulped, ever so softly.

She never voiced it, but swallowing those words was the right choice.

—Because admitting that nasty face made perfect sense once she heard he was Roswaal's kin would have been far too humiliating.

Otto: "The truth is, back in my homeland I am … well, calling me "wanted" would not be entirely precise, yet I am in a position where I cannot walk about openly."

When Otto confessed with such a grave expression, Frederica could not help admitting to herself, So I was right after all.

Otto, the internal affairs officer of Emilia's camp, whose intellect and initiative made him indispensable, could, together with Subaru and Petra, be called one of the camp's three greatest finds.

Frederica: "I must say, placing Petra and you two side by side does rub me the wrong way, however…"

At any rate, Frederica had long wondered by what journey and experience this reliable Otto had honed his dependability.

If he had possessed a pedigree as certain as Roswaal's, a polished résumé like Emilia's, or shone as an uncut gem the way Petra did, she would have understood, but for Otto—and Subaru—to fit none of those molds was, frankly, unnerving.

Yet at last the fear she held toward Otto could be laid to rest.

Frederica: "I am relieved. It seems you truly are someone who would become a wanted man, Otto-sama."

Otto: "Truly?! And you are relieved?! Wh-Why?!"

Frederica: "Think nothing of it; it is merely my personal opinion."

Otto: "That makes it more worrying! Frederica-san, did you honestly think it only natural I was on a wanted poster?!"

Frederica: "…Anything less simply would not fit the facts."

Covering the fangs at her mouth with one hand, Frederica averted her eyes and spoke her candid mind.

Otto's jaw flapped like a fish out of water, as though the world had flipped upside down, and he turned for aid to their traveling companions.

Otto: "Surely the rest of you do not agree with her, do you?"

Garfiel: "Don' sweat it, Otto-bro. Sis's makin' it sound worse'n it is."

Emilia: “I cannot tell whether Frederica is exaggerating, but I had heard about it before, so I am not surprised. People were afraid of me back home as well.”

Petra: “Emilia-neesama’s case is a little different from Otto-san’s! Please stop making that face. This is because Otto-san said something unnecessary again…”

Otto: “Am I really the villain here?!”

Garfiel and Emilia, then Petra in turn replied, and only after shouting did Otto remember the cause lay in his own status back home.

He covered his face with a hand and murmured weakly,

Otto: “For once, I truly have only myself to blame…”

Ram, arms folded across her chest, struck the heaven-gazing Otto with a merciless remark.

Ram: “Self-reflection is all well and good, but we cannot stay here forever simply because returning home is difficult.”

Harsh though she sounded, she was correct. By using Clind’s Authority they had leapt from Roswaal Manor to their destination—the commercial city of Picoutatte.

Leaping directly into the city would have drawn too much attention, so they had materialized in a nearby forest, intending to merge onto the highway; it was there that Otto’s confession sprang out.

Because he was wanted in his homeland, he found returning difficult.

Roswaal: “Even so, it was Otto-kun himself who proposed that in Picoutatte we might find a way into the Empire. Leaving you behind is not an option~.”

Otto: “Of course. …It is simply that I will trouble everyone, and, being an ordinary man, marching into a place where I am hunted requires some courage.”

All: ““Ordinary man…”“

Leaning against a tree trunk, Otto spoke toward the ground, and everyone shared the same thought.

Beatrice: “To call yourself an ordinary man… what an amusing boast, I suppose.”

Otto: “It is not boasting!”

He lamented the gulf between his self-image and their appraisal, but setting that aside—

Emilia: “Otto-kun, if it truly becomes impossible, please say so, all right? I definitely want to bring Subaru and Rem back, yet if you suffer for it, Subaru would surely sob as though it were his own pain.”

Otto: “I-I would not mind seeing Natsuki-san sniffling, but…”

Petra: “Otto-san, be serious.”

Petra’s adorable eyes turned sharply stern—an authority none in Emilia’s camp could defy save the bold Ram and easygoing Emilia; Frederica too raised her hands in surrender.

Otto: “I am not bowing to pressure, but rest assured, Emilia-sama. For smooth negotiations, it is better if I am present. And besides—”

Emilia: “Besides?”

Otto: “—It is high time I faced my homeland and my past.”

Tilting her head, Emilia watched Otto fix determined eyes on the distant city.

A triumphant return to the homeland entwined with fate—his feelings could hardly be calm.

Otto: “Fortunately, the most worrisome element of our camp is absent, and all our strength is gathered here. I doubt a better chance for a homecoming will ever arise!”

Petra: “Otto-san, be serious!”

Otto: “H-Hey?!”

Petra’s sharp rebuke flew at Otto as he clenched his fist.

Wanted in his homeland and counting armed force as assurance for his return—such an attitude was precisely why he had earned the epithet “Military Internal Affairs Officer.”

Frederica: “That the clever Otto-sama fails ever to see what lies at his own feet is, to me, the greatest mystery of all…”

So Frederica could only think, with utter sincerity.

5

—After they cleared the checkpoint at the city gate and rolled into the commercial metropolis, Garfiel couldn’t help clacking his fangs at the shift in the air.

Garfiel: “Costuul, Pristella—big as they are, the feel here’s real different, ya know.”

Sitting cross-legged on the roof of the dragon carriage, he craned his neck while taking in the surroundings.

Raised in the closed forest of the “Sanctuary,” Garfiel knew how narrow his own experience was. Even after a year outside the woods, the world still brimmed with unknowns.

Costuul the industrial city, Pristella the water-gate city—both he had seen with his own eyes. Picoutatte, the third great city before him now—each counted among Lugunica’s Five Major Cities, yet every one dazzled him with its unique flavor.

Garfiel: “Whole darn place’s got different smells at every turn… Normally a town’s got some sorta unity goin’.”

Emilia: “Oh, I know this! Picoutatte’s divided into five wards—north, south, east, west, and the center. Each ward sells completely different goods, apparently.”

Garfiel: “Heeey! ’Milia-sama, you’ve been studyin’, huh!”

Emilia puffed up proudly:

Emilia: “Fufu, right?”

Politics, the kingdom’s structure, how cities formed, business policy—Emilia’s studies were evidently on track, and the knowledge she produced at moments like this often drew nods.

Just as she said, the drift of scents throughout the city likely stemmed from the goods each ward handled. Permanent shops lined the avenues side by side with day-only stalls; the whole city throbbed with a market-like energy worthy of the title “commercial metropolis.”

Garfiel: “There’s grub I ain’t smelled before over here… that’s cloth I ain’t never seen… Oh! Knives that look nice t’ bite on! Let’s pull the wagon over—”

Ram: “Garf, do not lose sight of our goal. Stay alert.”

Garfiel: “Gao… I-I’m doin’ it even if ya don’t say so!”

Eyes sparkling at a stall’s knives, Garfiel drooped under Ram’s scolding. With regret he tore his gaze away, resting his cheek on a knee while his emerald eyes narrowed—he could feel eyes on their carriage, and he snorted.

Garfiel: “—Otto-bro is bein’ tailed, ain’t he.”

Scratching his neck, he groused at the overt hostility. They had hidden the “problematic” Otto inside the wagon where he couldn’t be seen, yet ever since they’d entered the city pricking gazes had dogged them.

Garfiel: “Sheesh, can’t believe they’re chasin’ him the second he’s back… Otto-bro’s piled up too many grudges.”

He didn’t know the details, but the enemy was moving fast—like Otto had busted some giant crime or dug up a buried scandal years ago. If Otto had turned a mighty power against him, Garfiel could only sigh. Should the watchers attack all at once and rely on brute force, he’d smash ’em back—but,

Garfiel: “Anybody punchin’ won’t work on, we gotta lean on Roswaal…”

Out here, the world’s rules weren’t decided solely by fistfights, which made things hard. In that world Roswaal’s titles carried terrifying weight—something Garfiel hated. And he hated something else: Roswaal coming along on this trip in the first place.

Garfiel: “Everyone knows “that sociable Allegro” is a downright dangerous bastard, as well as bein’ useful ’cause of his rank.”

Subaru and Rem had been hurled to the Vollachian Empire, their safety unknown; the group needed unity, yet Roswaal was a clear liability. Garfiel already regretted not joining the journey to the Pleiades Watchtower—though he wouldn’t deny what staying in Pristella had gained him.

Garfiel: “…Gotta push forward one step at a time, huh, Captain.”

Subaru would probably tell him “Don’t rush, don’t panic.” But with Subaru absent, those reassuring words were just empty hope. Hard work alone became the pickaxe to chip through the wall of unease.

Frederica: “—Garf.”

Her voice from the driver’s seat snapped him back. Tightening his focus, he followed her gaze straight ahead of the carriage—and froze.

Garfiel: “…What the hell?”

Blocking the road stood a plump gentleman waving broadly, and beside him a refined lady smiling serenely—both middle-aged. Their breezy obstruction left the half-beast siblings baffled until the man boomed:

Gentleman: “No need to worry in the slightest! Friends of our son—welcome to the Suwen Company!”

Within the carriage came a thud and Otto’s shrill “Whaaaat?!” as he smacked his head against the wall—an exclamation that echoed far down the bustling street.

6

Mazeran: “Welcome, and thank you for coming all this way. I am Mazeran Suwen.”

So saying, the head of the trading company—Mazeran Suwen—greeted his unexpected visitors with a smile.

Shown into a reception room, served fragrant tea and delicate sweets, and treated to a genial grin, no one could possibly feel ill-used.

Ram: “Like child, like parent, I see.”

Otto: “That is definitely not meant as praise, is it?”

Ram: “Hmph.”

She could have flayed Otto with far nimbler words, but the merciful Ram would never torment a child in front of his parents—especially when both father and mother were present.

???: “Honestly, Otto turns up with no warning at all. He’s always been the sort who, once he gets an idea, stops seeing the people around him—we had our hands full with him.”

Emilia: “Ah, but that hasn’t changed a bit. Otto-kun still does the most outrageous things with Subaru and leaves us wide-eyed.”

Frederica: “Out of regard for Otto-sama I shall withhold my frank opinion.”

Petra: “I’ll give the same answer as Frederica-nee-sama!”

Thus, the refined lady chatting amiably with Emilia and the others was Otto's mother, Framir Suwen. And so the Emilia camp at last found itself face-to-face with Otto's parents.

Garfiel: "Oi, Ram-nee, what're ya starin' at Otto-bro's folks for?"

Ram: "No reason. Otto seems to have inherited his parents' blood quite strongly, so I merely erased the "found under a bridge" theory from my mind."

Otto: "Was there any need for that suspicion?! I'm the middle of three brothers, you know!"

Ram: "Better safe than sorry."

Otto: "Safe for what?!"

Perhaps buoyed by being home after so long, Otto was even noisier than usual. Excitement before one's parents was understandable, but still—the boy ought to settle down.

Roswaal: "We seem to be enjoying a lively chat; may I—?"

Raising a hand once first impressions were exchanged, Roswaal looked toward Mazeran, who was welcoming them with open arms.

Roswaal: "Allow me, on behalf of everyone, to thank you for your warm reception. All the more so because it surprised us: we sent no letter of return, yet you greeted us even sooner than we could pass by."

He voiced the very question Ram had held: how had Otto's parents managed to await them, although the party, leaping by Clind's mysterious power, had sent no word of Otto's homecoming?

Mazeran: "Ah, if that startled you I apologize. Such things are commonplace in this city, so I thought no special comment needed. —Otto."

Otto: "Y-Yes, sir."

Mazeran: "Explain why you informed none of the people caring for you. Surely you will not claim you simply forgot?"

Otto: “Er… I, uh, let it slip my mind. I repent deeply…”

The father’s quiet reproach left Otto hanging his head, eyes darting. Rare indeed to see Otto bested by sheer reason; Ram watched with mild interest while Mazeran stroked the seasoned beard beneath his gentle face.

Mazeran: “I beg pardon for my ill-mannered son’s lack of explanation. Truly, however, this is nothing special. In this commercial city everything is traded—cargo, people, and information alike.”

Roswaal: “I seeee—so the checkpoint exists partly for that.”

Mazeran: “Precisely.”

Catching up at last, Ram turned her pale-crimson gaze toward the gate where the carriage had passed inspection. Cargo and passengers were examined; when that information flowed outward, both Mazeran’s timely welcome and the shower of thorny stares made perfect sense.

Ram: “But if the city guards gossip so freely, does that not damage their credibility?”

Mazeran: ““Gossip” is a grave misunderstanding. They merely convey the truths that should be conveyed, to those who should hear them. There is firm trust there—call it a contract.”

An utterance that made one feel chance and commerce shared the same sound and near meaning. In Picoutatte, where greedy merchants jostled and clashed, a house that had traded for generations must continually deliver results. To do so, Mazeran had chosen the method of not choosing his methods.

Detecting the son’s return within moments of the checkpoint report—that, too, was proof. Yet even that required knowing what wagon Otto currently rode in, and where he belonged—preparation bordering on obsession.

Ram: “Now more than ever—like child, like parent.”

Beatrice: “…Agreed, I suppose. Still, thanks to that, our odds of getting help look better.”

Beatrice sat deep in the sofa, leaning on Petra’s shoulder; until she rejoined Subaru she had to remain in “low-power mode,” conserving mana she could not replenish. Ram felt her frustration keenly. She herself longed to hug—not Subaru, but Rem—this very instant.

Ram: “It will be worth the risk if we gain aid. —Otto, speak.”

Otto: “All the risk does fall on me, you know… ahem. Father, I need your advice. I know the current climate is severe, but this concerns the Vollachian Empire.”

Mazeran: “Oh? Vollachia.”

He lifted his brows theatrically, altering his tone—a merchant’s trick to guide his listener’s thoughts. Hoping the son would pierce it, Ram waited.

Otto drew a breath, face solemn.

Otto: “We must soon travel to the Empire—ideally with this entire party. But by legitimate means the border cannot be crossed. Therefore—”

Mazeran: “You want a way across, and wish our assistance?”

Otto: “Yes. For your means and knowledge I have come home.”

Removing his hat, Otto laid out his purpose. Mazeran narrowed his eyes in thought—only for another voice to interrupt before he could reply.

Framir: “So you wish to employ the power of the Suwen Company. In that case, Otto, this is no consultation at all.”

Otto: “Mother…”

Framir: “Haven’t I taught you to choose your words precisely? And family is no exception. You remember that.”

Otto: “Y-Yes, ma’am.”

Framir: “Good. Then what you have brought us is not a consultation but—?”

Back straight, smile unbroken, Framir reached out a hand. Unease flickered across Emilia and Frederica; Garfiel’s eyes darted. Ram, Roswaal, and the perceptive Petra all sensed foreboding and focused on Otto.

Under combined gazes, he sighed as though resigned.

Otto: “What I have brought is not a consultation, but a business negotiation.”

The instant he drew that line, Ram felt the room’s atmosphere pivot.

The gentle, kindly faces of Mazeran and Framir did not change—yet their essence shifted dramatically. It was, in a word, the air of a duel. From that moment on, this house was no longer Otto’s home, but the headquarters of their counterpart in trade.

Otto: “—Let us talk, Father, Mother. A fruitful negotiation between our band, led by Emilia-sama, and the Suwen Company.”

Mazeran: “That’s the spirit.”

Framir: “He is our son.”

Hat pressed to his chest, Otto struck a pose; husband and wife both smiled. To outsiders it was a bizarre, even ominous scene beyond description—yet it left no doubt they were blood family.

And once again, an old realization stirred in Ram. Beside her, unperturbed by the tension, Emilia remarked cheerfully:

Emilia: “Otto-kun really does look exactly like both his father and his mother, doesn’t he.”

At that heart-warming observation Ram could only sigh, her head suddenly feeling very heavy.

Stand By Me Pleiades: Petra’s Manly Negotiations (LQ AI Translation)

1

—A hushed business negotiation with the Suwen Company was being held in the Commercial City of Picoutatte.

The representative was Emilia, a Royal Candidate; backing her was Margrave Roswaal, and the posture of Mazeran Suwen and Framir Suwen—who made no allowance at all for the fact that their son Otto had returned home after a long absence—was so thoroughly merchant-like one almost wanted to applaud.

All the same, the “goods” being sought were what they were; caution was only natural.

The crux of the talks was a means of entering the Vollachian Empire to the south, whose borders were sealed and all traffic between the two nations forbidden—in plain terms, arranging an illegal entry.

It went without saying that illegal entry was against the law.

And when the opponent was the Empire, infamous for its harsh policies, discovery would by no means end lightly.

On top of that, the positions of those involved—namely Emilia and Roswaal—were highly problematic.

Because they were so close to her, it never felt real, but the two of them were important dignitaries of the Kingdom. In particular, Emilia was an incomparably important figure, even next to Margrave Roswaal.

Petra: “If it were only the Master, it might end with the Master losing his head, but if Big Sister Emilia were exposed, it could turn into a war with the Empire…”

Even though it was a biased conjecture, Petra knew it was no exaggeration.

—Petra Leyte was busy, terribly busy, and kept on running.

Having left her hometown of Arlam Village, Petra, striving as a responsible individual, had a mountain of things to learn each day: her maid duties, the culture required of one who served the Margrave Mathers, and the training of mind and body toward her own goals—there were not enough fingers to count them on.

According to what Petra had learned in her hectic days, relations between the Kingdom and the Empire were exceedingly poor, and conflicts had flared up many times over the tiniest spark.

Among the numerous records left in history books, there were countless wars that had begun for trifling reasons. Compared with such sparks, Emilia's existence was no mere spark at all.

It was as reckless as throwing a drunken Otto into a warehouse full of fire-magic stones.

Therefore—

Petra: "I absolutely must make sure not to hold Big Sister Emilia back."

Otto: "—Miss Petra, may I?"

Petra: "Eep!"

Seated atop her packed luggage while renewing her resolve, Petra's shoulders jerked violently.

Not because someone had suddenly called out to her. It was because the speaker was Otto—the very Otto she had, in her mind just a moment ago, plied with drink, made drunk, and tossed into a warehouse crammed with magic stones.

Hastily turning around, Petra saw Otto standing in the doorway, and at her exaggerated reaction he gave a light laugh.

Otto: “That was quite the cute little scream. Did I surprise you?”

Petra: “N-No, I am fine. It is just that I had just finished shoving you into a warehouse packed with fire-magic stones.”

Otto: “You shoved me into a warehouse full of fire-magic stones?!”

Petra: “Ah, please do not worry about it. It is nothing significant at all.”

Otto: “It is a huge problem for the me inside Petra-chan’s head… Somehow, that makes you seem exactly like Frederica-san’s star pupil.”

Removing from her head the imaginary Otto together with the whole warehouse, Petra opened her eyes wide at those words.

It was a delightful compliment: Frederica was Petra’s idol and life’s goal.

Petra studied many things, of course to become worthy of her beloved Subaru, but also so as not to trouble her mistress Emilia, and absolutely never to shame her instructor Frederica.

Therefore, being told she resembled Frederica made her happy.

Petra: “But if possible, I would like you to save that compliment for a more important moment.”

Otto: “It was not necessarily a compliment just now… Truly, Petra-chan, your desire for self-improvement is admirable. There are plenty of people who should learn from you…”

Petra: “Really? I feel that you too, Otto-san, are the sort of person who finds it more rewarding when the prize is on a high shelf.”

Otto: “I see. Now that you mention it, that may be so.”

Receiving praise for something easy was less gratifying than being praised for accomplishing something hard.

Nodding at Petra’s opinion, Otto then raised his brows. Otto: “Oh dear.”

Otto: “It is about time for the appointed hour. That is why I came to fetch you, and it looks as though you are ready.”

Petra: “Yes, perfectly.”

Remembering his original purpose, Otto watched as Petra spun lightly on her heel. Her attire had changed completely from her usual maid uniform to freshly prepared travelling clothes.

A jacket with somewhat wide sleeves and a knee-length skirt, with trousers underneath to allow easy movement—her own attempt at co-existing fashion with travel practicality while considering the role required of her.

Petra: “I was careful not to stand out in a strange way—how is it?”

Otto: “Indeed. I believe it looks very nice. Since I always see you in a maid’s uniform, seeing you like this feels refreshing.”

Petra: “Mmm~. I was not looking for admiration; I meant whether it is cute.”

Otto: “Ah, pardon me. It is cute. It suits you.”

Receiving the answer she wanted without delay, Petra smiled in satisfaction. A maiden heart must not stand out badly, yet does not wish to be buried either; having aimed for that exquisite balance, she needed it properly assessed.

If possible, she would have liked to show this get-up to Subaru and hear his thoughts in his own voice—.

Otto: “It will be all right. You will definitely meet him.”

Petra: “…”

Otto: “—? Is something the matter?”

Tilting his head at the silent Petra, Otto did not think his statement odd at all, which made it all the more aggravating—he had read

Petra's feelings completely, and made no show of it.

Petra: "—. Otto-san, in times like this you always get the right answer on the first try."

Otto: "Oh, am I being blamed?"

Petra: "I am praising you—though unwillingly."

Otto: "Even when I am praised, I cannot feel entirely satisfied…"

Grumbling while scratching his head with a wry face, Otto made Petra relax her puffed-up cheeks. Then her round eyes turned toward the mansion's entrance hall.

Just as Otto had said, the appointed time—the long-awaited moment when their guide would arrive—was near.

Petra: "The guide should be arriving soon, correct?"

Otto: "Yes. Thanks to the cooperation of the Regundra family, the smuggler who will take us into the Empire is on his way. —Not only that cute outfit, but have you also readied your valiant heart, milady?"

Petra: "Do not get cheeky, servant boy."

And so, teased by Otto as he verified her "role," Petra laughed haughtily and answered in accordance with her own "role."

2

???: "—To cross the border, you folks will have to slip under the ground."

The guide, face hidden beneath a deeply drawn hood, declared this to the party in a gloomy voice.

Short in stature and wrapped head-to-toe in a robe caked with dried mud, the figure showed no face, yet Petra guessed they were about her father's age.

The person was not talkative, but one could tell they had seen their share of jobs; after all, even when summoned by the great merchant Regrundra Family of the metropolis Picoutatte, they had stood their ground with composure.

???: “Be modest if you must, but do not quake more than necessary. In our line of work, miss, let folk walk over you and the business falls apart.”

Petra: “Ah…”

???: “Pardon me. Rather unfair of me to hide my face while watching yours for every twitch, isn’t it… whoa now.”

Feeling as though her rude stare had been called out, Petra dropped her gaze—only for Garfiel to stride between them, glaring at the guide with a fearsome scowl.

Garfiel: “Listen up, quit menacin’ our princess. Keep it up and you’ll have a bad, bad day.”

???: “A bad day, hm? You saying you lot will give me one?”

Garfiel: “Not just me. All of us.”

Baring fangs, Garfiel jerked his chin, directing the guide’s eyes outward. There stood Frederica and Ram, both in travelling garb rather than their usual maid attire, narrow eyes half-lidded—their beauty only sharpening the pressure they exuded.

To reinforce that pressure, the pair smiled sweetly into the guide’s line of sight,

Ram: “A trade where one must not be looked down on—quite admirable. But,”

Frederica: “Please understand, we are far less delicate customers than appearances suggest.”

???: “…My apologies. Seems I am at the disadvantage.”

Pulling the hood even lower, the guide yielded to their combined gaze. Proud of her two big-sister figures, Petra poked the broad back before her.

Petra: “Thanks, Garf.”

Garfiel: “Hah! Only did what’s right. While the Captain ain’t around, it’s my job to guard the camp’s mates. So don’t you go zippin’ about too much, Lady Petra.”

Petra: “I do not zip about! And stop treating me like a child.”

Cheeks puffed at Garfiel’s teasing, Petra swatted the back she had poked. Then, not wishing to sour relations, she turned to the guide with a small bow.

Petra: “Sorry for staring earlier. Um, Mister Guide, you are…”

???: “Musica—that’s my name.”

Petra: “Musica-san, you will escort us, yes? All the way to the Empire?”

At Petra’s question, the guide—Musica—gave a deep, wordless nod. A quiet swell of hope rose in Petra’s chest: at last they could truly begin the search for the missing Subaru and the others.

—Dealing with a smuggler came bundled with its own difficulties.

The greatest hurdle had been negotiating with the wealthy Regrundra Family, who were connected to Musica; talks had bogged down even with the Suwen Company mediating—or perhaps because the Suwens had mediated.

Petra: “Lady Diadora, thank you for the introduction.”

Diadora: “—Think nothing of it. I stand to profit as well; no thanks are needed.”

So replied Diadora Regrundra, a woman with luxuriant, elegantly curled hair; it was thanks to her that they had met Musica. Yet Petra’s relationship with Diadora was exceedingly complicated: Diadora was the very influential figure whose feud with Otto had so often halted his trips home.

The rift between Otto and Diadora had faults on both sides—though Otto's rash behavior bore the greater blame—and Otto's sincere apology had finally mended it. Of course, hiring assassins to target Otto had been too extreme, but—

Otto: "If one says my past, reckless disregard for those around me merited death back then… well, perhaps my actions did warrant it."

Reflecting on himself, Otto confessed his fault without reserve. It had been Petra who, after learning the circumstances from Diadora, suggested Otto apologize, and because it was no mere lip service, it had moved Diadora's heart. Watching Otto face the problem so earnestly, Petra could only think:

Maybe Otto-san really is a little strange somewhere…

Diadora: "—Lady Petra, are your preparations complete?"

Petra: "Ah…"

Jolted from her musings, Petra blinked. For an instant the form of address felt wrong, but catching Diadora's gaze she recalled her "role," masking herself with a practiced smile.

Travelling-clad Frederica and Ram, along with Garfiel and Otto, awaited Petra's words as naturally as though it were only proper to call her "milady." And not just them—

Roswaal: "Do not be so tense. Rest at eeease, Lady Petra."

Emilia: "Indeed. You can rely on us veeery much."

Hearing the two voices behind her, Petra nearly let her cheeks twitch, yet she held back—the part she played was that of a lady with a complicated background.

Petra: "—Thank you. I'm counting on you, Dudley, Emily."

So she said, to the two who now bore false names—her dignified retainers, Roswaal and Emilia.

3

—When planning an illegal entry into the Vollachian Empire, the greatest concern was, of course, keeping Emilia’s identity—and, secondarily, Roswaal’s—hidden.

Given relations between the Kingdom and the Empire, discovery of either would all but spark a war, as stated earlier. Therefore, during the infiltration, their true identities had to remain concealed throughout.

Thus a “backstory” had been woven: Petra would pose as a young lady with circumstances, while the rest would disguise themselves as her attendants or elite guards.

Emilia: “It feels a little improper, but I’m sooo thrilled.”

That remark came from Emilia, cloaked in her familiar “cognitive obstruction” robe and masquerading as a bodyguard under the alias “Emily.”

Frederica and the other maids, and Garfiel and Otto—the soldier and the bureaucrat—were acting in roles not far removed from their usual stations, so they aroused no sense of incongruity, but Emilia’s presence most certainly did.

Emilia had never been good at lying or keeping secrets to begin with. Good-natured and straightforward to the core, she even had the weakness of getting stomachaches when she lied. Of course she was brimming with eagerness, yet that eagerness often spun its wheels, so everyone kept their nerves on edge at her every move.

By contrast, opposite this bundle of unease—

Roswaal: “—Lady Petraaa, are you not thirsty? Should you need any thing, pleeease~ do not hesitate to command this humble servant.”

Petra: “…That face of yours is really irritating.”

Roswaal: “Oh my, pray refrain. There is no need to use honorifics with the lowly. Feel free to address us as loftily as usuallly~ dooo~, if you pleeease~."

Petra: "…Your face is irritating, so go away."

Inside the dragon carriage, Petra curled her lips at the solicitous fussing and replied in a voice she herself knew lacked all charm. The target of her words withdrew with evident amusement, which only fanned her irritation.

Indeed, the one vexing Petra—enjoying the situation as much as, if not more than, Emilia—was Roswaal.

Under the alias "Dudley," he played Petra's butler. Rather than his usual flamboyant garb, he wore stylish yet travel-ready attire—stylish, that is, only insofar as it served to accent his master, never to outshine her.

His long hair was tied in one; the clown makeup removed. Any who knew Roswaal L. Mathers would hardly connect that image to this butler.

Petra muttered under her breath.

Petra: "It is so unfair how effective that makeup of his is at changing impressions…"

All at once it became clear how his usual garish dress and face paint served as disguise. Unlike Emilia, he could transform without relying on cognitive-obstructing robes—proof that his daily antics were strangely effective. Seeing that while they were scrambling to rescue Subaru left Petra bitterly speechless.

Garfiel: "I feel ya, milady. "A kua fruit looks sweet but tastes sour," as they say."

It was a relief that Garfiel understood Petra's feelings. He, like her, had his own thoughts about Roswaal—in other words, they belonged to the Keep-a-Harsh-Eye-on-Roswaal Alliance. Otto was a member as well, and there was one more—

Petra: "—Beatrice-chan."

Beatrice: "…"

Receiving no answer from the small girl on her lap, Petra gently stroked Beatrice's doll-like white cheek. Beatrice, maintaining her "low-consumption" state, slept using Petra's small lap as a pillow.

In the presence of an outsider, such discourtesy toward "Lady" Petra might have been grave, but it posed no problem: Petra and Beatrice had been explained to Musica as sisters. Incidentally, Petra was the elder and Beatrice the younger.

Petra recalled how Beatrice had flushed red and complained, "Betty is waaay older, in fact," and her lips curved softly. Beatrice's words were so like her; yet Petra had grown taller, and, a year and a little since their first meeting, the girl was becoming a young woman—unlike the spirit Beatrice, whose lovely form never changed.

Petra: "While you're resting like this, time between us is stretching again."

Caressing the soft cheek, Petra lamented to Beatrice's sleeping face. She longed to reunite with Subaru quickly, but Beatrice was a dear friend; being forced into slumber was far harsher than mere separation.

Musica: "How fares your little sister?"

The voice of Musica, riding a ground dragon alongside the carriage, reached Petra's ears. Was his concern for the representative "lady" Petra and the girl on her lap mere courtesy, or an attempt to curry favor? Petra shook her head at the uncharitable thought.

Petra: "Thank you for asking. My sister's condition is unchanged, I think."

Musica: "…Ah, forgive the foolish question. Were a bit of carriage sway enough to revive her, we would not need such a pilgrimage in the first place."

Petra: "—Indeed."

Answering tersely, Petra chided herself for her constant wariness.

Musica might seem probing, yet he was dutifully following Diadora's instructions as a valued supplier and showing concern for guests. Often, ill intent could be found—or not—depending on how one chose to perceive things.

Petra: "Did you go out of your way to worry about my sister?"

Musica: "Partly, yes, but there is no need to draw the guards' glare just for that. —We are nearly at our workplace."

Petra: "Your workplace…"

Though his hood hid his face, the gesture indicating straight ahead was clear. Following it, Petra peered past Otto on the driver's seat. The highway had ended some time ago; they had entered terrain people normally avoided, and their destination lay farther in. That place was—

Musica: "Shamrock Valley—this is where we work."

Hearing Musica's words, Petra narrowed her eyes. Shamrock Valley, east of the Commercial City of Picoutatte, was known even within the wide Kingdom of Lugunica as an ill-omened land, steeped in many dark tales. Perpetual mist hung there, and dense mana pooled; it was said that the souls of the dead, the Hollow, wandered those parts—a demon realm shunned by almost all.

Roswaal: "Which is precisely why it is perrrfect~ for a quiet border crossing, yes-indeed-ee-ee~."

Musica: "Exactly so. For us, and for guests who must rely on us, it is a blessing from the heavens, would you not agree?"

Garfiel: "Ya ain't wrong, but I don't like the way ya put it."

With that exchange between Roswaal and Garfiel, Musica's attention shifted to Petra, gauging her expression before the ill-reputed Valley. Yet—

Petra: "If it works to our advantage, we will use anything—even a Holy Land of the Hollow. No need to keep checking our faces."

Musica: “…I see—bold indeed. Your forthright answer is most reassuring.”

Voice tinged with surprised admiration, Musica bowed deeply. As Petra nodded loftily, Garfiel and Roswaal spoke in tones too soft for outsiders to hear:

Garfiel: “Told ya—she’s got the steadiest nerves in the whole camp.”

Roswaal: “Indeed, recommending her first was the riiight choooice~.”

Petra accepted Garfiel’s praise straight, took Roswaal’s half-seriously, and looked forward to arriving at Shamrock Valley. It was no mere bravado: she lacked the dainty timidity to fear Hollows or hesitate at unbelievable rumors. She was ready to cut through the misty valley at once.

If there was one small worry—

Petra: “I hope Frederica-née-sama and the others are all right…”

Yes—she fretted over the fortitude of those riding in the second dragon carriage trailing behind them.

4

—Shamrock Valley, shrouded in unlifting mist and dense mana.

The literal “escape route” leading from the Kingdom of Lugunica to the Vollachian Empire had been dug deep within that infamous demon realm.

Otto: “Even if it is a demon realm, so long as one has a guide there is nothing to fear.”

Petra: “Otto-san, you are not the sort to be frightened by Hollows anyway.”

Otto: “Well, once I see one in the flesh I may feel differently, but for now I have never encountered anything of the kind, so I find there is nothing to fear.”

The living—especially battle-hardened merchants—were far more terrifying; that was Otto’s opinion as he held the reins, and Petra largely agreed. Even on that rough, uneven road, Frufoo, Otto’s beloved ground dragon, pulled the carriage without trouble under the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion. Of course the other carriage, drawn by Subaru’s Patrasche, enjoyed the same advantage—yet…

Frederica: “Eek! S-Someone’s face just floated on the far side of the mist!”

Ram: “It is only the wind. The mist was stirred and happened to look that way.”

Frederica: “Ah—wait, Ram! It sounds as though someone is calling from the mist! Um… “You will never leave until you die,” they say. Terrible! We must help them!”

Ram: “It is the wind. Voices echoing in the valley merely sound like people.”

While Petra’s carriage advanced in quiet order, Ram’s side clattered noisily. Frederica, though she tried to hide it, was in truth timid, reacting far too sharply to Hollows and uncanny phenomena. Emilia had once feared Hollows as well, but in her case she first had to learn to tell people from Hollows. So long as Frederica could mistake a curse for a distress signal, that state of serenity was distant indeed.

Ram: “No need ever to reach that state. One child to mind is plenty.”

Frederica: “Sister Ram… no, I cannot argue with you, Ram…”

Thanks to Ram, who held the reins both literally and as mediator, the trailing carriage too traversed the Valley without incident and arrived at the intended escape route.

Petra: “So this is…”

Musica: “—We call it the Everlasting Darkness. They say the passage was dug over a hundred years ago, by my grandfather's grandfather."

Petra: "Your ancestors dug it, Musica-san…?"

Musica: "Aye—using these claws."

Facing the cave mouth that yawned midway up a low hill, Musica removed his hood. The face he had kept hidden at last lay bare, and everyone's eyes widened.

Musica: "My earlier discourtesy, forgive me. We, you see, are widely disliked."

He waved the stout, sharp-clawed hands that had been concealed beneath the robe, the short face covered in dark-brown fur splitting in a grin. A round nose, a wide mouth, small ears—he resembled a mole. Though small he was solid, packed with dense muscle. Even without the hood his eyes were lost beneath fur the color of earth, yet Petra immediately grasped what he was.

Petra: "Mole-people?"

Musica: "Indeed, indeed. One seldom meets us in person; I wonder, did you recognise me because you are learned, or because our ill fame is so well known?"

Petra: "I imagine it is because I study diligently."

Musica: "Tch tch tch—how kind you are."

His small laugh could be heard as either irony or gratitude. The self-mockery at its root was easy enough to imagine: tales and long persecution of the "mole-people" he had named. Those tales were not unconnected to the ideals Emilia pursued in her quest for the throne.

Petra: “Iris and the King of Thorns—”

Musica’s silence affirmed her point. That celebrated play, drawn from history, had originated in the Vollachian Empire. Iris, the heroine, fell in love with the one called “the King,” and to save him from peril gathered many allies to confront disaster—a grand epic. It lingered in the public heart above all because the ending was tragic. At the climax, Iris, about to reunite with her lover after averting the catastrophe, was betrayed by an ally and died; the story closed before the lovers could meet. Records indicated “the King” was the Vollachian Emperor of the time, and Iris herself had truly lived. In that tale—

Petra: “It was the mole-people and the wolf-people, who ought to have driven back the disaster with her, that betrayed Iris and caused the tragedy.”

Musica: “Which left my folk forever without a place in the Empire. The wolf-folk, who did not know how to flee, were destroyed, and my ancestors took to digging…”

Petra: “And so the Everlasting Darkness was made?”

With the pitch-black void spread behind him, Musica nodded, then gave a small laugh.

Musica: “Truly, you are industrious in your studies.”

Petra: “Why tell such a story now?”

Musica: “Some balk the instant they hear a passage was dug by mole-people. Better they turn back at the entrance than grumble within—an old woman’s precaution, so to speak.”

Otto: “And in a sense, selling reassurance as well, perhaps.”

Raising an eyebrow, Otto joined the exchange, still gazing into the Everlasting Darkness.

Petra: “Ah—so you are not luring us in only to trap us inside?”

Otto: “Precisely. Had we not asked, I suspect Musica-san would have explained for us anyway.”

Musica: “Heavens, you folk are fearsome. Pray do not hinder my trade.”

Otto’s single-eyed observation struck true; Musica threw up both hands in surrender. Otto was trustworthy, yet whether by nature or as a travelling merchant, he was all too severe with outsiders—a flaw, and doubtless the reason Diadora had once taken offense.

Petra: “That is why having Subaru here would be just right.”

Musica: “Oh? A gentle smile—that Subaru is…?”

Petra: “My fiancé.”

Otto: “Bff!”

Otto spluttered magnificently at Petra’s calm declaration. Sticking out her tongue at him, Petra peered into the gaping Everlasting Darkness. She had learned why the tunnel existed and gained confidence that it did indeed reach the Empire.

Petra: “We pass through here, enter the Empire, and achieve our aim.”

Musica: “Brave words, young lady—especially when it is to save your little sister.”

He believed the secret purpose of this infiltration was to cure Beatrice; Petra had told him Beatrice’s “sickness” required a special medicine found only in the Empire. It was not, strictly speaking, a lie—Petra herself needed that cure just as much.

Garfiel: “So—whaddaya say? You’re guiding us inside too, yeah?”

Musica: “In general, yes. But as the name Everlasting Darkness suggests, once inside is pitch-black, no light at all. Bring in flame and you will soon be unable to breathe, so…”

Garfiel: “And?”

Musica: “From here on, the whole of my clan shall accompany you.”

His answer became plain at once: footsteps sounded on the earth, and from the darkness emerged a dozen Figures—all clad in robes stained with the same earthen mud—more mole-people.

Musica: “Within, the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion ceases to function. I must ask you to obey our instructions to the letter. Otherwise—”

Petra: “Otherwise, what happens?”

Musica turned to Petra, lowering his voice. Though the location of his eyes was still impossible to discern, Petra’s cheeks grew taut as she met his unseen gaze. He smiled, and finished the thought.

Musica: “Otherwise you may wander forever in the deep, deep Everlasting Darkness.”

5

—Just as they had been warned beforehand, the journey through the “Everlasting Darkness” proved exceptionally arduous.

First came the overwhelming darkness of a tunnel hemmed in by earthen walls. Dug beneath Shamrock Valley—where daylight scarcely reached—this passage admitted not a single ray from the outside. Glow-stones set at intervals provided light, yet the gaps between them were so wide that, to an unaccustomed Petra, they were of little use. The mental strain of seeing nothing at all was far greater than one might imagine.

Even knowing in advance that the road would be dark, actually experiencing it swallowed any resolve in shadow. Worse still was the clammy air: perhaps due to the valley’s perpetual mist, the humidity underground was high, the air almost viscous. At least the chill spared them perspiration, but that was only avoiding the very worst of discomfort; the damp and cold could still ruin one’s health.

Yet those hardships were merely the beginning. The greatest trial of the Everlasting Darkness was—

Petra: “My butt hurts…”

She stroked the seat-sore spot with a hand, shifting position and wedging baggage beneath herself, but nothing solved the problem: Petra suffered endlessly from the pain. The ground-dragons’ Divine Protection of Wind Evasion was indispensable on long journeys, yet inside the Everlasting Darkness its conditions could not be met. It required a certain speed and that the dragon never halt—an impossible demand on the pitch-black, uneven road.

Emilia: “Petra-sama, are you all right? Would you like to sit on my lap?”

Petra: “Emily…”

Emilia—faithfully playing her role and treating Petra as mistress—seemed perfectly lively even in the gloom.

Petra: “Your butt doesn’t hurt?”

Emilia: “Of course it stings a little, but I can still bear it. I thought my lap might be easier than the seat—how about it?”

Petra: “I-I’m flattered, but…”

She patted her own thigh, tempting Petra’s weakening heart. Accepting would surely be easier, yet how would that look to Musica and his people? Being suspected over a sore backside would defeat the purpose of secrecy.

Petra: “But it hurts so much I could cry…”

Emilia: “Don’t overdo it, Petra-sama. I’m fine. This dark road leads to Subaru—so I can bear anything.”

Petra: “Then I’ll bear it too!”

Emilia: “Eh?! Why?!”

Roswaal’s soft chuckle drifted through the murk the instant Petra made her stand.

Petra: “…What’s so funny, Dudley?”

Roswaal: “—Surely, Lady Petra cannot see my face in this darkness?”

Petra: “Even without seeing I know it. You always make the same face at me.”

She could scarcely see beyond her hands, yet she knew he was smiling.

Emilia: “That isn’t nice, you know, Dudley.”

Roswaal: “Oh? And why ever not? I find it fascinating what you wish to say to me, Emily.”

Enjoying the lack of rank between “Emily” and “Dudley,” he baited her. Petra pursed her lips—

Emilia: “Because Petra-sama is doing her very best, and you pretend otherwise. That’s childish and uncool.”

Roswaal: “Then you would have us all travel with stern faces, steeped in anxiety?”

Emilia: “There you go again. I am worried for Subaru and Rem, but that doesn’t mean we must brood the whole way.”

Petra: “Emily…”

Emily drew Petra to her side, glaring across at Roswaal. Her violet eyes glimmered even in shadow.

Emilia: “You feel the same, don’t you? But you won’t say it—you think it needn’t be conveyed. That’s childish.”

Roswaal: “…”

Emilia: “Subaru tells us what he’s done and what he wants to do. I’m not very perceptive, so that makes me happy—understand?”

Having scolded him like a troublesome child, she turned gentle eyes downward.

Emilia: “Dudley acts that way not out of malice toward us—well, maybe a little—but mostly toward himself.”

Petra: “Malice toward… himself?”

Emilia: “Mm-hmm. He may be an adult, but he’s still a little spoiled.”

Petra couldn’t help but let out a small giggle. Emilia had wrapped even Roswaal’s nastiness in soft cloth. Proof enough was his lack of rebuttal; instead he sighed and—

Roswaal: “Lady Petra, to distract yourself, why not practice magic?”

Petra: “Magic? Here? In this darkness?”

Roswaal: “Darkness may help you focus. Meditation—grasping the flow of mana within—is basic training.”

Petra: “You’re only changing the subject.”

Roswaal: “I would not deny that… but the mana density here is high; conditions are ideal.”

He would never spout nonsense about magic merely to deflect. Having studied under him these months, Petra knew that. Reluctantly, she closed her eyes and turned inward. Sight made no difference here, yet forcing her vision shut did help her sense the mana within—blood flowed with heartbeats, but mana flowed soundlessly. Tracing it was difficult—until—

Roswaal: “Do not listen for it; see it with colour or warmth.”

The perfect advice changed her world before she could bristle. She tinted the coursing mana her favourite colour—pink—and it spread like water through a plant: chest, head, limbs—

Roswaal: “Now, open your eyes.”

Petra opened them—and gasped. The Everlasting Darkness, once pitch-black, now appeared in shades of pink: people and objects distinguished by variations of light, everything faintly aglow. Even Dudley's expression, washed in pink, was clear. He looked at her as one might at a baby standing for the first time, and she averted her gaze—only to startle at a huge pink mass beside her.

Petra: "E-Emily?!"

Emilia: "Eh? What? Did I do something weird?"

Petra: "You're a great big pink lump…"

Emilia: "A pink—mm, sounds sweet."

So much mana! Emilia truly was extraordinary. Even Beatrice, sleeping nearby, was a dense core of mana; Emilia's quantity dwarfed hers, but Beatrice's concentration was tighter—evidence of a spirit's body of pure mana.

Petra: "So this is how the world looks to you all the time, Dudley?"

Roswaal: "Not quite so extreme. It is because your affinity is Yang—mana that acts upon the body."

Petra: "Yang…"

Of the six attributes of magic—Fire, Water, Wind, Earth, and the rarer Yin and Yang—she belonged to Yang. Discovering one's attribute was a great step, yet—

Petra: "I wanted Yin, like Subaru and Beatrice…"

Roswaal: "How extravagant. Yang is rare—a real treasure."

Petra: "Rarity isn't what matters."

Rare meant few guides, a narrow path to mastery. She could not afford such handicap.

Emilia: "Still, amazing, Petra-sama. You can see even in this dark?"

Petra: "Seems so. I can see the other carriage behind us, and Frederica-née-sama inside… and the road ahead is glowing a bit?”

She peered forward and noticed a patch of ground thick with mana some ten-odd metres away. Dudley murmured, “The road…?”—but had no time for a lecture. Events changed too quickly.

Petra: “—Ah!”

The seat lurched upward; the moment the carriage rolled over the mana patch, it bounced violently, then tilted, rocking front and back, side to side.

Emilia: “Petra-chan!”

Arms wrapped around her, shielding her head. As the carriage bucked, Petra realised they were falling—the entire carriage, ground dragon and all, dropping deeper into the earth. Patrasche shrieked, wood groaned, and still they fell—until suddenly they stopped.

Breath ragged, Petra whispered:

Petra: “…It… stopped?”

Remembering Beatrice, she tried to rise—

Roswaal: “She is secure—see?”

Roswaal, kneeling in the tilted cabin, cradled Beatrice. Relief came first; then questions. The ground had seemed to vanish the instant they hit that mana pool.

Petra: “Musica-san! What happened? Are you safe—”

Musica: “—My apologies for rough treatment, young ladies.”

His voice from outside brought not relief but alarm—too calm for one caught unawares. He had said rough treatment, not an accident.

Emilia: “Was this your doing?”

Determination burned in her voice: if necessary, she would act by force. Musica seemed to recognise that.

Musica: “Best not pick a fight here. Narrow, dark, damp—this world is ours.”

Petra: “What do you intend to do with us?”

Her question dispelled any hope of chance mishap. A purpose lay behind this. In Petra’s pink-tinted sight Musica sighed, looking oddly tired for one who held the advantage.

Musica: “Stay docile and no harm will come. We merely need hostages—bargaining chips with the Kingdom, nothing more.”

6

—Forced to endure hardships: that had been the preface to their illegal entry via Everlasting Darkness.

Told they would have to slip past prying eyes and proceed through a dark, clammy cavern, Petra had steeled herself to face Everlasting Darkness, resolved not to bend to any inconvenience if it meant winning Subaru and the others back.

Of course, she had not expected even a shred of comfort on the journey—

Petra: “…I hadn’t reaaally thought about inconveniences like this, you know.”

Musica: “That’s how you react to our situation? Truly, you’re some young lady.”

Musica let out a low laugh at Petra’s unmeant remark. The muffled gloom of that voice, on top of their shut-in predicament, made Petra’s shoulders sink.

The mana pool Petra had spotted was apparently a pitfall prepared by Musica’s party. Though there had been room to see through it beforehand, she had missed it in her inexperience, and that vexed her.

Because of it, they had been dropped to a depth below the subterranean, and their dragon carriage now lay toppled on its side.

Petra: "Our girl… Is Patrasche safe?"

Musica: "—Hm? Ah, this lovely ground dragon of yours? She was startled, sure, but we softened the soil. She's dirty, yet unhurt."

Petra: "hk!"

Musica: "There, see for yourself."

As if Musica's words were not reassurance enough, Patrasche's cry echoed in the dark. Unlike Otto, Petra had no way to converse with a ground dragon, but she sensed the cry held no distress. Relieved a little—Patrasche was an important comrade, after all.

Worrying over Subaru and the others, spirited away to the Empire, was hardly the concern of humans alone.

Petra: "I'm glad Patrasche is safe, but… it means we've been split from the carriage behind us—with Frederica-nee-sama and the others, right?"

At present the two dragon carriages inside Everlasting Darkness were cut off from one another: Petra's group below, Frederica's above, contact severed. That arrangement too must have been contrived by Musica's party to pin down their movements. To this point, everything rested in her palm.

And the reason they had gone so far was—

Roswaal: "—Negotiations with the Kingdom; that, it seems, is what you claimed to want."

With a voice kept quiet and as emotionless as possible, Roswaal—unconscious Beatrice at his side—spoke while his gaze tracked with precision the positions of Musica's party outside the carriage.

Roswaal: "Did I mishear you? Negotiating with the Kingdom from the dim bottom of a hole?"

Musica: “You heard right. We’ve taken you young ladies hostage. Nobles of good standing, yes? Then the Kingdom should be willing to listen.”

Petra: “Y-You’re going to tell the Kingdom about us?”

Musica: “Exactly. …Oh, worried your illegal entry might leak? You’ll have to chalk that up to bad luck. The fact you ladies asked to pass through our home today can only be called destiny.”

Musica’s group misread the agitation in Petra’s voice.

Judging their poor perception would be cruel—Petra’s party were hiding their identities. Musica had no path to the truth.

Still, whether Musica’s grasp matched reality or not, contacting the Kingdom would unquestionably spell trouble for Petra—and by extension, the Emilia camp.

Petra: “Emilia-nee-sama’s illegal entry will be exposed…”

This incursion would be disastrous enough if the Empire found out; if the Kingdom did, it was equally ruinous.

Should a Royal-Selection candidate be caught breaking the law, the election would not remain untouched, and they would likely be watched and barred from leaving the Kingdom.

Emilia: “We are doing something wrong, so we’ve no right to get mad about being tattled on… but it would reaaally hurt us.”

Musica: “We hold no grudge against you ladies, so my heart aches for your little sister there. Yet, taking that into account, you will still obey us.”

Emilia: “Must we, absolutely?”

Musica: “Yes. We’re not playing around. I wouldn’t recommend resisting.”

Emilia sought a peaceful solution, but Musica offered not even a foothold. In response, the cold air of Everlasting Darkness seemed to grow still colder—no, Emilia herself was lowering the temperature.

Emilia: "—I see. That's reaaally unfortunate."

Facing Musica's reply, Emilia let her brows droop, and the air literally chilled.

Emilia, surprisingly quick-tempered, was nearing her limit; Petra noticed, and Roswaal surely did too, yet he did nothing to stop her. The reason was obvious—he was confident the matter could be settled in an instant by force.

Petra: "I do feel sorry for you, Miss Musica and company, but…"

Thinking of the pit above, Petra knew Garfiel was aboard the separated carriage. With Frederica, Ram, and Otto's quick wits there too, that side could hardly be called desperate.

The first pitfall had surprised them, but Musica had chosen prey he never should have; thus, his aim would not be achieved.

Petra: "Why go that far? What did you want to discuss with the Kingdom?"

Roswaal: "Lady Petra? There is no point in speaking with them further—"

Petra: "Dudley, it's fine."

Cutting Roswaal off, Petra pressed Musica for his motive. She did not intend to negotiate—she was simply curious. Ransom demanded too great a gamble; surely another purpose existed.

Musica fell silent for a moment, then—

Musica: "—You young ladies know about the Royal Selection, don't you?"

Emilia: "—Eh?"

The unexpected direction made Emilia catch her breath, and Petra too was stunned. She had guessed Musica had some special reason, yet connecting it to the Selection was unforeseen.

As though perfectly aimed, the topic left Petra's group rigid. Whether Musica noticed or not, he continued from outside the carriage.

Musica: "It will shake the whole nation. Do you ladies have a favorite candidate?"

Emilia: "Um… well, we're still right in the middle of deciding, I suppose."

Musica: "A cautious, modest answer—in a good sense. Naturally, we're watching the Selection too… only, in a bad sense."

Emilia: "…What do you mean? Watching it in a bad sense?"

Musica's suggestive tone was frustrating; Emilia inevitably pressed for the truth.

Ignoring Petra's silent doubt, Musica answered Emilia's question. It was—

Musica: "We intend to petition the Kingdom to make the half-elf candidate—Emilia—withdraw from the Selection. You ladies are to be the hostages for that."

It was, indeed, an admission of purpose catastrophically ill-suited to the Emilia camp.

7

???: "Emilia's withdrawal…"

Hearing the softly-murmured words, Petra was struck by fierce regret.

She should never have lent an ear to Musica's talk. She should have pushed the ruthless Roswaal forward and smashed the scheme without debate.

Because she had not, she had carelessly ended up hurting Emilia.

Petra: "—What does this mean?"

No sooner had she regretted it than Petra decided to drag Musica's true intentions out of him.

Having him explain his reasoning in detail might wound Emilia even more. But the spear already loosed had pierced her chest; they had to know whether its tip was poisoned and how much force was behind it.

Without knowing the wound's depth, they could not know how to treat it.

Petra: "Mister Musica, you yourself said the Royal Selection is extremely important to the kingdom, didn't you? And its rules won't change that easily. Even if you take us hostage…"

Musica: "You mean the kingdom wouldn't be shaken over the lives of a few young ladies?"

Petra: "…Yes."

After that cool exchange, Petra's chest filled with doubt.

Both she and Musica spoke logically; his answers never faltered, nor did he try to silence her.

He was calm—yet that calmness made his act bristle with contradictions.

Petra: "In status alone, we're on the wealthy side. But that's only from a broad view; I believe the people at the kingdom's very center think differently."

Musica: "You claim this is pointless. So, young miss, you intend to persuade us?"

Petra: "If you'll let me."

Musica gave a wry smile; his judgment was clearly intact.

He surely knew that, on the surface, Petra's presence was no decisive blow that could force Emilia from the Selection.

In truth it was far more than decisive—and that complexity was the problem.

Roswaal's silent eyes flicked over; Petra jerked her chin toward Emilia, and the perceptive Roswaal would grasp her aim at once.

Emilia's heart, already crushed by fear for Subaru and the others, could not bear another sudden weight. That weight had to be removed—for Emilia's future.

Petra: "You save emergency measures for a real emergency."

If things became truly hopeless, they could always choose the method that erased everything.

Yet Subaru would reach for that only after thinking it through to the end, sacrificing something, and finding no other path.

Petra felt she had grown, yet she wanted Subaru's philosophy at her core—and to practice his convictions.

So she refused to abandon dialogue with Musica here.

Petra: "Please tell me how you feel, Mister Musica. I need material to persuade you."

Musica: "…What a demand. We intend to negotiate with the kingdom, not satisfy you, young miss."

Petra: "If your argument can't even defeat a little girl like me, I doubt the kingdom will listen."

Musica: "—If you're stalling for time, it's meaningless."

Petra: "That isn't my intent."

Under the steady gaze from outside the dragon carriage, Petra lied boldly.

It was time-buying, yes—but the time she bought was for Musica and his group, not herself.

End the talk and Roswaal would sweep them away, letting Petra and Emilia escape.

But then the thorn in Emilia's heart would stay.

Petra: "That's absolutely no good."

Time might solve thorn and pain, yet they were heading into the Empire's danger and unknown.

Taking a heartsick Emilia there frightened Petra—and she hated leaving Emilia to suffer.

Petra: "Why do you want Lady Emilia to quit the Selection? Is it because she's a half-elf?"

Musica: "What else is there? That alone is reason enough for her to step back."

Her first question hit home; Petra pursed her lips.

It was an all-too-familiar logic. Most who disliked Emilia cited her birth; Petra knew how deep that problem ran.

Still, each time she heard it she smarted—at the reality that strangers' "half-elf" and her beloved "Emilia" were lumped together.

Petra: "I've heard that claim so often I'm sick of it."

Musica: "Doesn't that prove how many feel the same? A would-be ruler can't succeed if the masses turn their backs."

Petra: "Even so—"

—no one else used strong-arm tactics like Musica.

She bit off the words, not from fear but because they sounded too right.

Indeed, most people saw Emilia as Musica did, yet they didn't riot to make her withdraw.

A silver-haired half-elf could never be chosen as king—that was common sentiment. So why had Musica acted?

Because those with no voice and Musica's group stood in different positions.

Petra: "Is Lady Emilia's candidacy inconvenient for the mole-folk?"

Musica: "—hk"

His sharp reaction told Petra her guess was not far off.

Why was Emilia's rise bad for the mole-folk?

As they had said en route, the mole-folk were exiles from the Empire; the tale Iris and the King of Thorns, drawn from history, robbed them of their homeland.

Musica's ancestors fled that Empire; their descendants still live in Shamrock Valley, eking out a living by aiding illegal entry and the like.

Petra: "—Why?"

This was not the Empire; Musica need not cower.

Iris and the King was famous in the kingdom, yet its treatment here differed vastly, and still the mole-folk hid.

Refusing the outside world, living as one clan, was just like—

Petra: "…like the Sanctuary."

The Sanctuary—hometown of Frederica and Garfiel, a demi-human settlement with tangled circumstances.

Petra visited once when the Sanctuary affair ended; the closed village was dismantled, its people moved to domain villages.

Now only a few—beginning with Ryuzu, Frederica's grandmother—remain as guardians of a forbidden tomb.

The Sanctuary's life and the mole-folk's in Shamrock Valley both closed themselves off.

If so, the trigger for that choice might also be the same.

Petra: "Could your wish to pull Lady Emilia from the Selection relate to the Demi-Human War?"

Musica: "…Young miss, can you read minds?"

Petra: "I can't—though sometimes I wish I could."

Ram or Otto sometimes seemed to read hearts; leaving Otto's tact aside, Petra wished to emulate Ram's keen eyes.

Her goal was to absorb everyone's good points and be better tomorrow.

At any rate, Musica's reaction proved her reasoning right.

Petra: "…Demi-Human War."

—A vast civil conflict that erupted in Lugunica several decades earlier.

Humans and demi-humans clashed fiercely, countless died, and it lasted nearly ten years. A small spark lit it, but long resentment between the races fueled it.

And the root of that resentment was—

Musica: "—the Witch of Envy, and by extension, ill feeling toward demi-humans, elves included."

Musica himself concluded Petra's thoughts.

At the words Witch of Envy, Emilia's face clouded further, and Petra saw how personal Musica's act was.

As he said, the Demi-Human War sprang from hatred of demi-humans—especially in the kingdom, where damage from the Witch was great, persecution of elves was thorough.

It spread to other races, rising into a great civil conflagration.

Hearing all this, Petra finally grasped Musica's motive.

A dreadful war that wounded, tormented, and took countless lives —

Musica: "The world has spent four hundred years carefully healing those old scars. If a half-elf with no hope pokes them open again and blood flows, that would be a fine mess, wouldn't it?"

It was fear of that calamity's return that drove Musica and his companions to act.

8

Musica's low voice sounded as though it had been worn thin by fear and exhaustion both.

Petra could not fully digest the tangled feelings packed into that voice. Of course she couldn't; in her brief life she could hardly hope to weigh the thoughts of someone Musica's age—roughly that of her parents.

Besides, those thoughts did not belong to Musica alone; they bore the weight of four hundred years.

Musica: "We'd rather not shoulder any more collateral damage. We've already had more than enough of it, thank you."

Petra: "Collateral… damage…"

Musica: "That's right—the fallout from something our great-grandfathers' generation set in motion. A studious young lady like you should know that well enough."

Musica: "If our parents or siblings had been the ones who did wrong, we could at least resign ourselves. But a great-grandfather we've never even seen? And because of someone like that we're supposed to live our whole lives burrowed underground?"

Petra had no answer for Musica's words.

She herself had enjoyed Iris and the King of Thorns simply as a single book. But there were indeed people who, as parties directly concerned, were not allowed to view it objectively as a tragic tale.

Those people were Musica and his folk, forced to bear the sins of ancestors who lay generations beyond a "grandfather's grandfather."

Petra: "But in that case, isn't it the same for half-elves? There isn't another person alive who's the same as the Witch of Envy, and yet —"

Musica: "And yet you'd get in the way of someone who's doing their best? I told you: we're done being collateral damage."

In sharp contrast to Petra's quavering tone, Musica's voice was being drained of feeling. His matter-of-fact delivery laid bare how much grim reality he had already witnessed.

Musica: "I may have put it bluntly, but we've already come to terms with our lot. Just as some people are born rich and some poor, there are people like us—mole-folk—destined to live in the dark, to dwell in the shadows. That's our fate."

Petra: "That's such a horrible way to put it…"

Musica: "Harsh, isn't it? Yet even we who've accepted that lot don't want things to get worse than they are now."

Emilia, listening in, breathed the words: "Worse… than now?"

Remembering that there were listeners besides Petra, Musica turned the dryness of his voice into a heat meant to carry a little farther.

Musica: "A half-elf royal candidate—especially one with the very same silver hair and amethyst eyes as the Witch of Envy… There's no telling what she or the people propping her up are thinking, but to us it's nothing but an eyesore."

Petra glanced toward Roswaal, the very mastermind behind that support. Naturally, Roswaal offered no reply, and Petra did not expect one.

Yet whatever Roswaal's motives, Emilia's intentions had been made public.

Petra: "Lady Emilia's thoughts have been clearly announced, Musica. Surely even you—"

Musica: "Improving the standing of those born without options and forced into hardship… Yes, that noble sentiment has reached our ears. A completely unwanted act of charity, if you ask me."

Emilia: "Un… wanted…"

Musica: "Exactly, little bodyguard."

Unable to stomach the weary sarcasm, Emilia tried to chew through the words—at which point Musica's spear of accusation turned on her.

Musica: "A half-elf—of all things, one who looks exactly like the Witch of Envy. Tell me, who in their right mind wishes for such a person to become king?"

Emilia: "Y-You can't be sure! For example, what if I do?"

Musica: "Then I'd like to whisper in the ear of that supporter and warn them how precarious their backer truly is."

Emilia: "Mmh…"

Every time Emilia spoke, Musica countered; there was no chink in his stubborn armor. Petra felt herself driven back, yet beside her Emilia cried "Wait," raising her voice once more.

With earnestness she could not hide blazing in her violet eyes, Emilia said, Emilia: “Please, tell us a little more. About this ‘unwanted charity’ and this ‘collateral damage’ of yours.”

Musica: “…You’re really not stalling for time? Waiting for those people in the dragon carriage behind you to make a move?”

Emilia: “That’s not—!”

Petra, in her place, answered clearly: “They aren’t banking on that.”

It was the truth. Petra did not expect Frederica and the others who had been separated to break the deadlock—a task that, if it were merely to seize Musica and his fellows, could be done at once.

The carriage behind surely shared that judgment. That they still made no move was proof they had chosen to observe. The decision had been left to Petra and the rest.

Petra: “So please, feel free to tell us everything you’re thinking.”

Musica: “Brazen words. I’ve no reason at all to trust them… but about that ‘charity’ and ‘collateral damage,’ was it?”

Indeed Petra offered no grounds on which Musica should believe her. Even so, he maintained a solemn air and showed a willingness to answer Emilia’s question; perhaps it was his own way of showing sincerity to those he had dragged into this.

Musica: “Do I need to explain why it’s ‘standing out in the wrong way’? A half-elf doesn’t stand a chance. Simply entering the Royal Selection means drawing attention in the worst sense.”

Petra: “That’s just prejudice!”

Musica: “It would be laughable if one so diligent were ignorant only there. You know full well how feared the Witch of Envy is. And the gravest problem is that Lady Emilia makes everyone remember they know.”

Petra tilted her head. “Makes them remember…?”

It was odd phrasing. Word of the Witch of Envy’s deeds was universal common knowledge; no one could forget it, so remembrance should not be necessary.

Musica clicked his tongue softly at Petra's doubt.

Musica: "People do remember, miss. When a half-elf appears in public, everyone recalls that the being they've been pretending not to notice actually exists."

Petra: "…I don't really understand."

Musica: "For us it's common sense. That the Witch of Envy is terrifying, that having dealings with half-elves who produced her is nothing but ill omen."

Musica: "But common sense can also mean something you can forget so long as you never look at it directly. They had finally managed to forget. Yet the royal candidate Emilia forces them to remember—that we were afraid of it."

His cold, dark words hung damply in the unlit "Hollow."

Listening, Petra remembered—for the first time in a long while—that she too was nothing but a village girl who feared the Witch of Envy.

She could not recall when she had first heard of that Witch. But by the time she was aware of things she already knew: the very words Witch of Envy were enough to keep her awake at night, sobbing in terror.

A primitive fear had been driven deep into the heart of the young girl.

Petra: "…I was… really scared."

She had truly feared that unseen Witch, whom she had neither met nor spoken with. She had spent sleepless nights brooding over a taboo she must never touch.

In time that fear dulled; the Witch ceased to surface at sunset; she was pushed to the corner of Petra's mind. But it had never been conquered; at odd moments the slightest trigger brought it back.

—Such as the appearance of a half-elf royal candidate.

Petra: "…Everyone in the village was terrible, too."

She still remembered the changes that swept Arlam Village when the start of the Royal Selection was formally proclaimed. The moment it became known that the mysterious silver-haired girl coming and going from the lord's mansion was that half-elf, villagers began treating her with marked reserve—even when she pleaded desperately to protect them, they would not listen.

Emilia: "And how does that connect to the trouble you're afraid of?"

In the same clear bell-like voice she had used when the villagers rejected her, Emilia sought the true motive driving Musica.

Emilia: "If people think of the Witch because Emilia enter the Selection, yes, I can see that. But why does that hurt you?"

Musica: "It won't cause anything right away. But just as every gentle river flows downstream, problems drift until they reach the lower banks sooner or later."

Emilia: "?"

Musica slowly shook his head, raising the heavy issue.

Musica: "If focus turns from a half-elf to the Witch, the past might repeat itself. I fear that will descend upon us."

Musica: "Helping the weak—how lofty. But that's no different from some child bragging he'll beat the Sword Saint: a promise that can't be kept. If it were mere childish lips it could be ignored. Unfortunately…"

Emilia: "…Because they can't ignore Emilia, it's really troublesome…"

Musica: “Well, to put it sweetly, yes.”

Feeling the path to a conclusion finally clear, Musica nodded. His point reached Emilia, whose shapely brows knit in anguish.

Of course Petra, too, understood him all too well.

Yet that understanding—

Musica: “We won’t have it. Another Demi-Human War.”

Petra: “That’s—!”

It was pessimism layered upon pessimism; nothing more than a dismal fantasy, almost paranoia. Petra’s reflexive objection, however, was halted by the chill in Musica’s voice as he asked, “Really?”

Musica: “Are we truly being overly pessimistic? Back when the Demi-Human War began, didn’t everyone think, ‘No way, that’ll never happen’?”

Musica: “Call us pessimistic if you like. But perhaps it’s just in the nature of us mole-folk, always digging in the dirt—we feel it, the rumbling of the earth.”

Petra: “Rumbling…?”

Musica: “Yes. The tremor that warns something huge is about to collapse.”

Though it sounded like superstition, it weighed heavily on Petra’s chest.

Having heard Musica at length, Petra cursed her own shallowness. She had not only failed to pull the thorn from Emilia’s heart; she had skewered her own as well. The barb fitted with hooks would only tear wider if pulled. Perhaps she should have cut the talk short while the wound was shallow enough to hope.

Because—

Petra: “I… I don’t want to doubt Sister Emilia…”

Petra could not deny Musica’s reasoning; aside from being too pessimistic, it had no faulty logic. Hostility toward the Witch had sparked civil war once before; no one could guarantee it would not happen again. You cannot prove a negative.

Petra knows Emilia; therefore she can trust her. But how could she make those who cannot tell Emilia from the imagined half-elf believe in her—when she could not even persuade Musica without hiding Emilia’s identity?

Petra: “E-Emi— I…””

She nearly called her Emilia out of agitation but bit it back. Petra’s helplessness at failing to ease Emilia’s pain was unbearable—

Emilia hugged Petra, pulling her into a warm embrace. From right above came her gentle voice.

The steady heartbeat in that warm breast sounded calm, like an emblem of Emilia’s kindness.

Emilia: “I’ve been thinking. There must be many more people like Musica. What can I do to put them at ease?”

Petra: “Wh-What will you…?”

That was precisely the answer Petra most wanted. How would Emilia persuade, admonish, and convince someone like Musica, mired in a gloomy future?

Emilia smiled: “I think the best way is to talk and let them know Emilia is nothing like the Witch of Envy. So I guess I—no, Emilia will run.”

Petra: “R-Run…?”

Emilia: “Yes! Whenever things get tough because of misunderstandings or differences, Emilia runs to that person and talks. She keeps talking until they understand. If they won't listen, she keeps trying until they will!"

Petra was left speechless by the sheer force of that statement—so very like Emilia's philosophy, but was it really the right method here? Even if Petra, who knows her, accepted it, would Musica?

Emilia: "May I say something about your story, too, Musica?"

Musica: "…What is it, little bodyguard?"

Emilia: "I completely understand not wanting another Demi-Human War; I feel exactly the same. But there's one part of your tale I just can't accept."

Emilia: "You said no one thought the first war would happen, and that's why it did. But now we all know it happened, and we all know nobody wants to repeat it."

Musica had buttressed his case with precedent, arguing Emilia was dangerous. That precedent gave him persuasive power—enough to shake Petra. But Emilia turned that same precedent on its head—no, she probably wasn't being crafty at all; she was simply, earnestly taking the past as a lesson to brighten the future.

Emilia: "Since everyone hates the idea and knows it, that rumble you heard is just your imagination. That's how Emilia sees it."

Musica: "Strange… Talking to you feels as though I'm speaking with the very person I'm trying to make withdraw. Are you truly just a supporter of hers?"

Musica's suspicion was natural given Emilia's words and Petra's reactions. Their disguise was in tatters. Petra could neither deny nor affirm.

Petra loved Emilia's out-and-out, almost reckless declaration. But it was hard to share such hope so easily—

Emilia: "It's all right. I'm not the Witch of Envy, and I'm not alone."

Boldly citing Petra's existence and that of her other friends as proof, Emilia's words struck Petra's chest harder than all of Musica's gloom.

At the same time she remembered—how the villagers who once shunned Emilia had come to accept her: by talking with her, knowing her, touching her; by realizing Emilia was not frightening at all, but a gentle, lovely half-elf, nothing like the silver-haired, amethyst-eyed half-devil of legend.

Suddenly Petra noticed something odd. Recalling all that had been said in this dark Hollow, something stuck out. What did it mean? Her thoughts quickened. Perhaps their gaze had been led astray all along.

Seeking an answer to that budding doubt, Petra lifted her head from Emilia's chest and looked toward Musica outside the carriage.

Petra: "Musica, you haven't called Lady Emilia a half-devil even once, have you?"

With that, she tugged on the little catch she had found.

9

Most of the people who hate Emilia, just like Musica and her companions, do so because of her lineage.

That point is almost shockingly uniform, and the majority of such people call Emilia "half-devil," a term Petra absolutely loathes.

Petra: "But Mister Musica has never once called her that. I remember it for sure."

Although Musica wished for Emilia to be disqualified from the Royal Selection and warned at length of the danger she posed, he consistently referred to Emilia as "half-elf."

That constancy was not some convenient sign that Musica did not actually hate Emilia; it was surely connected to his own lineage—not Emilia’s, but Musica’s.

Petra: “Mister Musica is one of the mole-folk who have been looked at with the same unpleasant eyes by those around them.”

Because Musica himself had long been subjected to prejudice, he must have hesitated to brand Emilia as a “half-devil.”

To Petra, that very stance seemed to be the linchpin of this whole plan.

Petra: “Mister Musica, how are you going to negotiate with the Kingdom while holding us hostage?”

Musica: “—. It is not complicated. The Regundra Family is aware that we are with you young ladies. We merely relay that fact to the Regundras and have them inform the Royal Capital—”

Petra: “But you already know the plan will not work, right?”

Musica: “…”

Petra: “Even if you take us hostage, the Kingdom’s bigwigs will never listen, and you and your people must have known that from the start.”

The presence of the real Emilia still complicated matters, yet if Petra’s group really were only a party of noble young ladies, as Musica believed, the objective would never succeed—assuming Musica’s true aim was to make Emilia withdraw.

Musica: “…We simply believe there is meaning in casting a single stone.”

Petra: “And you wanted to be the first to throw that stone, didn’t you?”

Musica: “Wh-What…?”

Petra: “Because then the mole-folk could become the brave people who first stood up to remind everyone of the terror of the Witch of Envy.”

Those words truly shook Musica's voice for the first time. That reaction made it clear that all his earlier responses had been a scripted harmony.

Petra: "I should have found it odd that you protected Pattrash-chan from being hurt by the pitfall trap and that you have stayed here talking with us like this."

They had safeguarded the ground dragon they themselves had snared and patiently conversed with their captives. Though Musica said he would not indulge in stalling, he had gladly gone along with Petra's own stalling for time.

As the talk progressed, the anxiety Petra felt toward the rumors about half-elves—all of it was groundwork for when their appeal failed. Once Petra's party was safely released, they expected today's story to spread by word of mouth.

—That allowing Emilia into the Royal Selection might ignite a second Demi-human War, and that the mole-folk, to prevent that catastrophe, had bravely raised the first cry even at great risk to themselves.

Roswaal: "Taking royal nobles hostage is for publicity toooo~. The greater the crime, the more people want to know. —The mole-folk's heroically barbaric act, grieved for the world."

Musica: "G-Gh…!"

Choosing those razor-sharp words, Roswaal's statement gouged deep into Musica's heart.

Hearing that, Petra made a sour face—not only at his nasty method, but also at realizing Roswaal had reached the same conclusion far earlier than she had. Proof of that lay in how markedly quiet he had become through the latter half of the discussion; who knew at what point he had seen through Musica's design, yet he had watched in silence all along, and the reason for that was irritatingly obvious.

Petra: "But I am even angrier. …This is the same as mass suicide for all the mole-folk."

Emilia: “Eh…?!”

Emilia, unable to keep up with the subtle turns of the discussion, widened her eyes at Petra’s words. That was unavoidable; such a line of thinking would never occur to her.

Musica and her people had resigned themselves to dying as the courageous ones who worried for the Kingdom’s future.

That was probably—

Roswaal: “A rebellion against persecution rooted in history, against a fate condemned to absurdity… Your own battle to erase the prejudiced gaze fixed upon the mole-folk, is that it?”

Petra: “…I also think they truly do not wish for another Demi-human War.”

Roswaal: “Ho, as expected of Lady Petra, how kind you aaare~.”

Petra stuck out her tongue at the unpleasant flavor of his added sarcasm, deepening her dislike of Roswaal.

Musica’s deeds were hardly praiseworthy, and they were a terrible nuisance to Petra’s party. Even so, dismissing all of their motives and schemes as base was a one-sided view—no different from refusing to see Emilia as anything but a “half-elf.”

Petra: “Miss Musica and the others, which is it?”

Musica: “…Seems we’re truly cursed by fate to have nothing go right.”

Her voice, mixed with a dry laugh, conjured the image of slumped shoulders.

Musica: “Just as you young ladies surmised, that wretched plan was our design… the foolish wish of descendants who betrayed Iris and incurred the wrath of the King of Thorns.”

After laughing himself out, Musica spoke as though he were resigned.

Petra and Roswaal’s conjecture had been correct: they were fighting the specter of their ancestors’ deeds.

Emilia: “Um, Mister Musica, I—”

Petra: “Emily, wait.”

Unable to bear the anguish in Musica’s voice, Emilia’s words took on a tone of resolve, yet Petra stopped her just in time, halting her decision. Emilia was about to reveal her own identity and face Musica head-on. That intention was noble and very like Emilia, but if she did so, confusion and darker ideas might once again take root in Musica’s mind.

Thus, this was not the moment for Emily the escort, but for Lady Petra who led the party.

To those who sought a future in which the mole-folk would be hailed as the brave souls who prevented a second Demi-human War—

Petra: “—Mister Musica, rather than negotiating with the Kingdom, will you negotiate with me?”

10

—As the passage through the Everlasting Darkness leading toward the Vollachian Empire reopened, the dragon carriage rocked.

Petra: “My butt hurts…”

Perched on the swaying seat of the carriage, Petra kept shifting her hips as she muttered.

Hearing Petra’s words, the person seated beside her was about to offer some gentle words—

Ram: “Think of it as punishment for your recklessness—suffer the pain quietly.”

—but they never came.

Petra: “…Ram-nee-sama, that’s not very kind.”

Ram: “I’m not kind. Besides, I’m not your nee-sama to begin with. Am I, Lady Petra?”

Pierced by Ram’s light-crimson eyes, devoid of mercy, Petra slumped her shoulders with a small “Uu…”.

Frederica: “Ram, please stop teasing Lady Petra.”

Petra: “Frederica-nee-sama…”

However, before Petra and Ram could continue, a rescuing hand was extended—

Frederica: “I am not your nee-sama, Lady Petra. And while I shall chide Ram, I am angry as well. Hmph, I’m absolutely fuming.”

—yet it never quite reached her.

Across from them, Frederica folded her arms and turned her face away, leaving Petra flustered. Just then, a merry “kuhahaha!” echoed from the roof above.

Garfiel: “Fer a bit, ya just gotta live with it, Lady Petra. My amazin’ self gets why Sis and Ram wanna speak their minds. Still, spookin’ that bastard Roswaal sure felt good!”

Frederica: “Garf, please don’t speak so lightly! Lady Petra, if you notice any change in your condition, say so at once.”

Petra: “I-I understand. And… I’m sorry for worrying you, Frederica—Frederica.”

At Petra’s bowed apology, Frederica let out a “Good grief,” her eyebrows drooping. Her face showed reprimand, but even more, deep concern.

Ever since she’d been placed aboard this follow-up carriage after regrouping, Petra had been apologizing nonstop.

But that was only natural.

Otto: “To think Lady Petra conducted the negotiations to win them over… Leaving Emily aside, what exactly was Dudley doing?”

Petra: “He just grinned and watched, wondering whether I’d fail. How tasteless.”

Otto: “That doesn’t sound far from the truth, but your bias misses the crucial point…!”

Up on the driver’s stand, Otto’s cheek twitched at Petra’s caustic answer. Her slightly warped preconception was at work, yet it was not entirely a lie.

Having seen through Musica and his companions’ ulterior motives so quickly, Roswaal had left the subsequent talks to Petra and the others and watched in silence; Otto could think of no other reason.

Of course, he understood Roswaal hadn’t been silently hoping for their failure.

With an increasingly disgruntled Petra in the corner of his eye, Otto adjusted his hat with a weary “good grief,” and said,

Otto: “So, are you truly all right, Lady Petra?—Any effects from the Oath?”

Petra: “…There’s nothing at all. Honestly.”

Adding anything more would make it sound like a lie, but it was the truth.

In fact, there was no problem with her physical condition. Mentally, she felt a twinge of remorse for acting rashly, but the sense of accomplishment was stronger.

At last, she felt she’d been of real help to Emilia’s camp as one of its members.

Otto: “That feeling is dangerous if you get hooked on it, so please be careful.”

Petra: “It’s already too late for you, isn’t it, Otto-san?”

Otto: “I’m painfully aware, so I’d rather you not say it!”

Listening to Otto’s falsetto squeak, Petra looked down at her own body and focused on the mark of the Oath carved on the skin beneath her clothes.

That was the price Petra had negotiated and paid for all of them—including Musica and his group—to escape the Everlasting Darkness safely.

Proof of a vow that could never be broken, a promise of the future.

Having their plan exposed and with Petra’s group standing in their way, Musica and his companions might have lost patience, so Petra opened negotiations before that could happen.

The contents were—

Petra: “Not through something like this, but by proper means, I want people to know that the mole-folk worked hard so the Demi-human War would never happen again.”

Ram: “And in exchange, you promised to prepare an opportunity for them to meet and speak with Lady Emilia directly. …Placing the very person right next to them—such a wicked promise.”

Frederica: “What the mole-folk seek is to wipe away their ancestors’ disgrace. In that case, the current generation can repaint it with a fresh appraisal. I believe it’s a fine compromise.”

Ram’s judgment was harsh, Frederica’s gentle, as they each assessed Petra’s Oath and its aim.

However—

Frederica: “Even so, I question the wisdom of risking the same danger as Master.”

Frederica’s added glare was severe, leaving Petra to shrink and offer a meek apology.

Over her little sister’s bold act, Frederica was angrier than ever before, and Petra had no idea how to quell her wrath.

Petra: "…Garf-san, Garf-san, do you have any good ideas?"

Garfiel: "Huh? Dunno, but maybe ya oughta give her somethin' real hard ta chew on? When my amazin' self's teeth get itchy, gnawin' helps calm me down, ya know."

Petra: "Mm, got it. I won't ask you again, Garf-san."

Garfiel: "Gao…?!"

Leaving the unsurprising evaluation to shock Garfiel unattended, Petra touched her own chest, reaffirming the source of everyone's concern.

—Petra's decision, which had angered Frederica—and likely Ram as well—was the Oath that bound the fulfillment of her promise to Musica and his companions to her very soul.

If she broke that Oath, Petra would not escape unscathed.

Its terms were simply a dialogue between Musica's group and Emilia, so the conditions were lax.

Petra: "As long as we all get back to Lugunica safely, there's no problem."

In that sense, the existence of the Oath was Petra's declaration of resolve.

A vow that she would reunite with Subaru and return to the kingdom with everyone.

Still, she admitted there was one childish part of her that deserved Frederica's anger.

Petra: "I just wanted to wipe that "I know everything" look off Master's face, so I stubbornly made the Oath for that. Maybe that was a little childish…"

—And thanks to that, Roswaal's face when I suggested it had been priceless, though.

11

—And so, while Petra was being scolded by the friends she had rejoined.

Emilia: “…I realized I’m reaaally blessed.”

Dudley: “Blessed, you say? Even though your very existence as Lady Emilia drives people like them into such desperation?”

Emilia: “Yes, that’s right. I can’t agree with what Mr. Musica and the others were thinking or trying to do, but… Petra-chan’s feelings made me happy. Unlike Dudley, Petra-chan tried to put my feelings first.”

Emilia: “Oh, but I’m still angry that she went ahead with the Oath on her own!”

Dudley: “An Oath, huh…”

Emilia: “Roz… Dudley?”

Roswaal: “No, that truly astonished me—both the idea itself and the firmness of her resolve. Above all, her willingness to save even someone who had harmed her. It’s just like…”

Emilia: “Just like Subaru, right?”

Roswaal: “Indeed, though Emily’s influence seems present as well. Good grief, at this rate…”

Emilia: “Hm? Why are you speaking as if it’s someone else’s problem?”

Roswaal: “…What is it?”

Emilia: “You’re the one teaching Petra-chan magic and everything else, Dudley. So it’s your influence too. Don’t forget that.”

Emilia: “Ah, I’m going to check on Patrasche-chan. I also have to ask Mr. Musica and the others how much longer until they can leave the Everlasting Darkness.”

Beatrice: “…Ya know, you’re wearing quite the solemn face, I suppose.”

Dudley: “Oh, you’re awake?”

Beatrice: “Just for a bit, in fact. …While Betty was sleeping, did something happen, I suppose?”

Dudley: “Yes, while you were asleep…”

Beatrice: “—?”

Dudley: “Something occurred—an experience that leaves one with a feeling far, far too difficult to put into words.”

Stand By Me Pleiades:
Frederica’s Blood Bride
(LQ AI Translation)

1

—The instant the long-imprisoning darkness lifted, Frederica felt her heart soar.

She did not especially remember ever longing for the sun, yet after more than a full day without its light she could not quell the poignancy of finally bathing in it again.

Indeed, she keenly felt that human beings were kept alive by the sun.

Petra: “I am so relieved we finally got out of “Everlasting Darkness,” nee-sama.”

Whispering so to Frederica, mindful of those around them, was Petra.

Dressed like a noble young lady, the little sister-figure whose pitifulness and cuteness were bursting forth was currently giving a splendid performance as the central figure of the traveling party. Frederica’s true feelings were to answer that fact with praise, applause, and an embrace, but circumstances prevented it.

One was the need for both Petra and Frederica to remember the differences in the roles they were playing.

Petra was a noble lady, and Frederica her attendant-guard. A servant embracing her lady in praise would be unseemly for any normal master-servant pair.

Any element that might arouse suspicion or doubt had to be eliminated as far as possible.

And the other was—

Frederica: "—Lady Petra, are you experiencing any after-effects from the Oath?"

Petra: "U-U… I-I am fine. I am happy, but you worry too much, nee-sama."

Frederica: "It is a servant's duty to look after her mistress's body. Also, please refrain from calling me nee-sama, Lady Petra."

Petra: "Uu~"

Moistening her round eyes at Frederica's rebuke, Petra gripped the seat of the dragon carriage tightly and hung her head.

Petra may have been sulking, but Frederica was not being unkind without reason. No matter how cute a teary-eyed Petra was, that alone would never make her act mean.

Frederica: "Besides, Petra, you are far cuter when you are smiling."

Thus the thorniness in Frederica's tone was for another matter—the Oath they had just mentioned, and the circumstances under which the girl had carved it into her young body.

A band of mole-people who ruled the "Everlasting Darkness" and ferried illegal traffic between kingdom and empire had tried to hold the party hostage to negotiate with the Kingdom. It was none other than Petra who had persuaded them head-on.

The deed itself deserved praise, but the method was hardly commendable.

In exchange for a certain promise, Petra had secured both a change in the mole-people's plan and the continuation of their guidance through the clandestine route. As proof she would keep the promise, she had chosen to brand herself with an Oath that would inflict severe punishment should she break it.

The promise she had sworn to fulfil would not be difficult if Emilia were present, but—

Frederica: "—What I cannot approve of is that your method was precisely like the Master's."

Petra: "…Yes, I am reflecting on it."

Casting a side-long glance at the dejected Petra, Frederica quietly shut the lid on her urge to comfort her.

Unless Petra felt the sting here, she would not change her mindset. It would be troublesome if she continued thinking that exposing herself to needless danger was the best course.

For that reason Frederica had to steel her heart and make her feelings plain.

Frederica: "If you do not, we will be unable to deal safely with the Empire's ways from here on…"

Passing through the long, long tunnel known as the "Everlasting Darkness" toward the incoming light, they emerged to a slowly opening vista of fertile green land.

The Kingdom of Lugunica could hold its own, yet a closer look showed a clearly different flora, proof that the world awaiting them beyond the tunnel had changed completely.

It was a dignified—no,

Frederica: "Since we are entering illegally, our arrival is anything but above-board."

With that modest appraisal, Frederica at last described their arrival upon the road to the Sacred Vollachian Empire.

2

Musica: "Once you are through the tunnel, travel for a while and you will meet a large road. Stay on it and you should reach a town. I recommend deciding what to do there."

???: "Yes, thank you. You and the others have taken good care of us, Musica."

Musica: “Please, think nothing of it. We were the discourteous ones. …We want you young ladies to return safely, so you can fulfil your promise.”

Leaving those considerate words behind, the guide Musica and the rest of the mole-folk slipped back into the Everlasting Darkness.

Because of her promise to Petra, they must have wanted to watch over the journey, yet mole-folk had no place in the Empire. Musica had half-jokingly said they would be cut down on sight, but Frederica did not think that was an exaggeration.

The Empire’s harsh national character, combined with its prejudice against mole-folk, made merciless treatment all too likely.

Human beings could become terrifyingly cruel toward those who differed from themselves.

At any rate—

Roswaal: “It is delightful that we have entered the Empire like this. However, our objective does not end here; it lies further ahead. Everyone understands that, riiight～?”

Garfiel: “Ya don’t gotta tell me that. Quit askin’ us every damn thing—what’re ya schemin’, huh?”

Ram: “Watch your mouth, Garf. Dudley is warning us not to lower our guard.”

Garfiel: “Tch, I know that without bein’ told.”

Clicking his tongue, Garfiel averted his eyes from Ram’s warning. Narrowing her pale-crimson eyes at his foul language and brusque attitude, Ram offered Dudley—no, Roswaal—an apology with her gaze. Roswaal himself seemed unconcerned, merely shrugging.

After parting from Musica and the others, before heading for the town they had mentioned, the party gathered inside the two halted dragon carriages to discuss their next steps—the reason they had entered the Empire, the rescue of Subaru and Rem.

Roswaal: "“Rescue” may be overstating it, but let us assume the worst. Of course, if it amounts to simply “reuniting,” we could hardly wish for more."

Petra: "…It's hard to imagine Subaru not jumping straight into danger."

Otto: "I feel the same."

With a worried droop of her brows, Petra spoke, and Otto, hand to his forehead, nodded. Frederica—and indeed everyone present—shared their view.

In truth, they had hurried into Vollachia largely because, if they did not, they could not know what trouble Subaru might encounter. Even aside from that, there were many urgent reasons—such as Beatrice's contract—for reuniting quickly.

Thus, swift action was required even after entering the Empire—

Emilia: "But Vollachia is sooo huge. I've heard it's bigger than Lugunica, so how are we supposed to find Subaru and the others…?"

Roswaal: "There are, broadly speaking, two measures we can take regarding that. —Otto-kun."

Otto: "Yes, yes, I presumed as much; allow me to explain."

At Emilia's question, delivered with a finger to her lips, Roswaal nodded and prompted Otto. Adjusting his hat, Otto looked around the group and asked, "Shall I?"

Otto: "The two measures Dudley mentioned are, simply put, gathering information and hiring manpower."

Emilia: "Manpower…? You mean paying people to look for Subaru and the others?"

Otto: "That would be prudent. Searching this vast Empire with only the eight of us is hardly realistic. Still, that too will not be easy."

Emilia: “Eh… will it cost a looot of money?”

Otto: “Well, I doubt it will be cheap.”

Hearing the expense, Emilia drooped, muttering, “I thought so…”

When it came to finances, it was not Emilia’s place to speak. Of course, the cost of this journey was borne by House Mathers. Including hush money, a suitable sum had been paid to Musica and the others who guided them through the Everlasting Darkness.

Emilia: “By the way, can I ask how much?”

Ram: “You’re better off not knowing, Emily. Your eyes would pop out in shock.”

Emilia: “Eek, scary…”

Frederica: “So, what did you mean by saying it is difficult to hire people?”

At Emilia’s pale-faced shudder, Frederica pressed Otto for his true meaning.

In response, Otto said, “Just what I said.”

Otto: “First, our status carries no weight in the Empire. Since we are neither nobles nor royal candidates here, we cannot expect special treatment. On top of that, relying on connections is hard.”

Garfiel: “Connections, meaning acquaintances, yeah? Otto-bro, ya ain’t got anybody in the Empire?”

Otto: “Regrettably, entering the Empire would have meant approaching my homeland, so I always avoided it. Thus, I have no one here I can rely on. …In Gusteko or Kararagi, perhaps, but not here.”

Slowly shaking his head, Otto bit the inside of his cheek in frustration. Though knowledgeable and well-connected, his merchant-era network did not function in the Empire.

Just then—

Roswaal: “Regarding the problem Otto-kun just raised, I may be able to address it. We are not bosom friends, but I do have an acquaintance in the Empire, you seeee~”

Emilia: “—! Then we might be able to borrow some help?”

Roswaal: “I cannot guarantee it. Still, they are not someone incapable of reason. However, I cannot lie about our identity even to them, so I will have to tell the truth. Therefore—”

Ram: “Dudley will go alone? Unacceptable. I am coming with you.”

Roswaal: “Mm…”

Roswaal, who had interrupted Otto’s misgivings, was in turn interrupted by Ram. His one-eyed blink proved her point.

Frederica: “Surely you were not planning to depart alone? That is far too much…”

Roswaal: “Given the situation, however, that is the optimal course. Whether they listen or not, the only thing required is my presence… there is no need to expose Emily and the rest to danger.”

Ram: “—. In any case, if I part from Dudley, my body will not last long. I see no reason to refuse my company.”

Roswaal: “Good grief… I thought that decision was mine to make, fuuuture~”

With Ram calmly blocking every escape route, Roswaal gave a wry smile and muttered.

From Frederica’s perspective, both Roswaal’s idea and Ram’s opinion made sense. If anything, the problem was Roswaal’s hesitation to be alone with Ram.

Petra: “There really isn’t anyone who would side with Master over Sister Ram in this matter.”

Garfiel: “…For the record, I’ll say I ain’t thrilled.”

Pressing her hands together before her chest, Petra smiled; Garfiel responded with a sour face.

Yet, setting sentiment aside, Garfiel understood what was reasonable. Roswaal would have to obey the majority, the price of past deeds.

Emilia: “If there’s someone we can rely on, we can leave the talks to Dudley, right? Then do your best with Ram helping you.”

Ram: “Understood. Dudley, you have no objections, do you?”

Roswaal: “—. None, I suppooose.”

Given the final push from the guileless Emilia, Roswaal surrendered under Ram’s gaze.

Thus, the matter of securing manpower was entrusted to Roswaal and Ram—

Garfiel: “Otto-bro, what d’ya mean by information gathering?”

Otto: “Just what the words say—pursuing information about Natsuki-san’s whereabouts and movements. However, this side brings its own difficulties.”

Frederica: “And what might those be?”

Otto: “Surely, once Natsuki-san realized he was in Vollachia, he would not introduce himself as “Natsuki Subaru”.”

Emilia: “Ah, you mean like me and Dudley using other names?”

Eyes widening, Emilia spoke, and Otto nodded, “Yes.” Frederica likewise grasped the obvious precaution.

Though thrown into the Empire by unforeseen events, once he got his bearings Subaru would immediately recognize the instability of his position.

Naturally, he would also realize the danger of his name spreading within the Empire.

Frederica: “Then, even if we search for Lord Subaru, rather than the name Natsuki Subaru…”

Otto: “If he does anything noticeable, he is likely using an alias. I only hope it is something obvious enough.”

Garfiel: “The Captain’s alias, huh…”

Folding his arms, Garfiel tilted his head, but little hope existed of producing the answer. Only Subaru knew Subaru’s mind.

To Frederica, Subaru’s ideas seemed to sprout from another dimension.

Petra: “Then what we need to ask about is not Subaru’s name but his features—his hair color, eye color, clothes, his sharp look.”

Emilia: “Right. …If only Subaru had kept wearing that “jersey,” he would stand out more and be easier to spot.”

Ram: “In that case, Barusu’s identity would be exposed and he would not escape the stake.”

Frederica: “Burned at the stake is rather much… r-right?”

Clutching her elbow, Frederica asked the others, but regardless of their depth of knowledge about the Empire, no comforting answer came.

At any rate—

Emilia: “Dudley and Ram will go ask that acquaintance for help, and we’ll head to the nearby town and see if there are any rumors about Subaru and the others… is that okay?”

No one voiced objections to Emilia’s summary.

Being separated in an unfamiliar land was unsettling, but—

Frederica: “Master… with Dudley and Ram together, they will not do anything reckless, will they?”

Ram: “Rest easy. Even if there is a bit of recklessness, Dudley and I will force our way through.”

Frederica: “Please do not be reckless?”

Whether reassuring or not, Ram’s answer made Frederica’s cheek twitch. Ram’s dismissive “Hmph” might be taken as proof of calm.

Otto: “Since we will split up, how shall we meet again?”

Roswaal: “If I were alone, I would simply raise some conspicuous signal, but with Ram here I can catch up using Clairvoyance however I like. No need for concern.”

Garfiel: “We ain’t worried ’bout you, we’re worried ’bout Ram.”

Meanwhile, Roswaal was being grilled by Otto and Garfiel, responding nonchalantly with his makeup-less face.

Once everyone’s tasks were clarified—

Roswaal: “—Well then, we shall be off. Let us hope for good news on both sides. Should some problem arise and you need to reunite with us…”

Emilia: “Um, we should head for Dudley’s friend… Miss Dracroy, right?”

Roswaal: “Yes, that is correct. She is rather temperamental, though.”

At Emilia’s confirmation Roswaal nodded loftily, then quietly reached out. Ram, seeming to need no instruction, stepped into his arms.

Nestled against Roswaal’s chest, Ram turned while being lifted.

Ram: “Frederica, I am counting on you.”

Frederica: "—. Yes, without being told."

Chosen by name and entrusted, Frederica bowed deeply.

With that, Roswaal and Ram began to rise, floating higher and higher until they slipped into the clouds.

The moment had come for Roswaal's flight magic to display its overwhelming mobility.

Garfiel: "Tch, flyin' higher than usual… tryna pull that "Hanfan's courtship soars higher than anyone" crap?"

Otto: "It is the Empire. If someone spots him flying, they won't just say, "Oh, the Margrave Mathers," and leave it. Keeping out of sight is unavoidable."

Garfiel: "Yeah, yeah. So what now, Emily?"

Seeing Roswaal and Ram vanish into the clouds, Garfiel turned with poor manners. At his words, Emilia clenched her fists.

Emilia: "Let's start moving so we don't fall behind them. First, we find a place to stay in the nearby town, then we gather information."

Thus, their very first plan of action within the Empire was set in motion.

3

—The nearest town beyond the «Everlasting Darkness», «Mozotto», left a decidedly lifeless impression.

The Empire was reputed to possess fertile soil and, aided by its warm climate, to be a land blessed with plentiful harvests all year round. Although her own time trekking through the Empire since leaving the cave had been brief, the lush forests, the sweeping grasslands, and the pleasantly humid air all reinforced that preconception.

Yet, in stark contrast to the warmth inherent in that nature, the man-made streets felt somehow desolate and inorganic, impossible not to view as arid.

Bare, unpaved ground packed hard by countless feet, buildings whose cracks and damage had been left unrepaired, and a palette that seemed to have abandoned any intent to please the eye—only gray scenes stretched on.

She had never been especially conscious of it before, but the effect of color on the heart was, without her realizing it, this great.

Uniformity alone fostered an acute sense of constraint. Whether deliberate or arbitrary, Frederica could not tell, but—

Emilia: “It feels reaaally lonely, somehow.”

Apparently the sentiment was not hers alone; she felt a small relief at Emilia’s comment, but it could well impede their aim, so she could not rejoice.

What Frederica and the others sought in Mozotto was information that would lead to Subaru’s trail.

However—

Petra: “If the town doesn’t have much pep, the comings and goings of people and rumors are kinda suspicious, aren’t they…?”

Garfiel: “They shoulda run that cave a lil’ farther to someplace with more spirit, ya know.”

Petra: “That’s asking way too much of Mr Musica and the others… but I agree with Garf-san.”

While darting her eyes about the streets, Petra exchanged words with Garfiel. The wrinkles on Garfiel’s nose made it clear that his growing frustration was written all over his face.

Originally, Garfiel’s role lay largely in the application of force; on this journey, where decisive action was difficult, there were many occasions for his resentment to build—no, the fact he had few chances to be useful surely bred his own impatience and powerlessness at worrying for Subaru.

Frederica: “Garf, impatience is forbidden. There will certainly come a time when your strength is needed.”

Garfiel: “I get it without ya tellin’ me, Sis… I get it, I do.”

Garfiel turned his gaze aside, forcing down his irritation. Seeing her younger brother clearly understood the point, Frederica answered, “I know.”

Even so, they had at last reached the long-desired Vollachia.

All of them shared the same urge to suppress their itch and begin searching in earnest for the missing party.

Otto: “We can’t expect much information, but in any case we should secure an inn. We need a place to leave the dragon carriage, and I’d like to avoid camping outside town if possible.”

Emilia: “Everyone’s bodies are all stiff from sleeping in the carriage.”

Otto: “It is certainly better to rest properly in beds—and we need a base of operations. We will also need Petra-chan to watch over Beatrice-chan.”

Petra: “Eh?”

Hearing Otto say this while handling the reins, Petra’s eyes rounded.

To look after Beatrice at the inn meant she could not join the canvassing. For the girl who worried deeply for Subaru, that was a cruel blow.

However—

Frederica: “Lady Petra, I share Master Otto’s view. Given our roles, it would be odd for you to take the lead in gathering information… you do understand.”

Petra: “U… that’s true, but…”

Garfiel: “See, our amazin’ selves’re the guards for Lady Petra and Lady Beatrice. If our wards go wanderin’ around, we can’t ever relax, ya see.”

Petra’s enthusiasm was clear, but this journey had its division of duties. Besides—and Petra would surely resent hearing it—the Empire’s ways were still a mystery to them, and they wished to avoid exposing the young girl to danger as far as possible. No matter how precociously wise or courageous she might be, a girl was still a girl.

Emilia: “I understand how frustrating it is, but leave this to us, Lady Petra.”

Petra: “Emily…”

Emilia: “Betty can’t wake up many times a day, and if she opened her eyes with no one around she’d feel reaaally lonely. Since Subaru can’t be with her now, staying by Betty’s side is an important part of our job too.”

Petra: “…That’s unfair.”

Even if Emilia had no such intention, invoking Beatrice left Petra no choice. The feelings she cherished for Beatrice were every bit as dear as those she held for that black-haired boy; hence her strong resolve for this journey—enough that she would gladly carve a Oath sigil into her own body.

Otto: “Horses for courses. Besides, Petra-chan has already accomplished a major task. It is about time we adults earned our keep—please grant us the chance to redeem ourselves.”

Petra: “Unlike Emily, I don’t like how insinuating you sound, Otto-san.”

Otto: “Did I say something wrong?!”

Petra: “You didn’t. It’s the way you say it.”

Petra puffed out her reddened cheeks, turning away in protest. But the clever girl could immediately verify the justice of their words—no doubt she also saw through Frederica's deeper intent of keeping her from harm.

Petra: "…I don't want to understand, but I do. I'll wait at the inn with Beatrice-chan. But make sure you bring back good information, all right?"

Frederica: "With you staying with Beatrice, Lady Petra, we can go without worry. We will definitely pin down Subaru's whereabouts!"

Otto: "Striking the main prize at once may be expecting a little too much, though."

Yet without at least that much determination, finding just two people in this vast Empire could hardly be easy.

While Frederica smiled at Emilia's resolve—

Otto: "Frederica-san, may I have a moment?"

He called softly, so the others would not hear. Whenever Otto did this, the matter was usually important; once again, that impression proved true.

Otto: "In our canvassing ahead, we will of course ask about Natsuki-san's appearance and any recent events in the country."

Frederica: "Yes, that is correct. And?"

Otto: "I would rather not think of it, but… please also keep an ear out for signs of damage caused by "Gluttony."

The single word "Gluttony," distasteful as the preface had been, was indeed enough to make Frederica knit her brows—but she understood well the validity of his concern.

Frederica: "Subaru-sama and Rem were not the only ones to disappear from the tower."

According to Emilia's report, the Sin Archbishops of Gluttony had attacked the Pleiades Watchtower they had visited seeking an audience with the «Sage» Shaula. Though Emilia's group had defeated and captured more than one of them, a third Archbishop had suddenly appeared at the end, and vanished together with Subaru and the rest—

Frederica: "Since we did not witness the scene, it is not impossible someone vanished for reasons unrelated to Subaru-sama and the others, but…"

Otto: "That Natsuki-san could be free of trouble? Impossible."

Frederica: "Indeed, impossible…"

Contrary to his own wish, Subaru could never remain unconnected to calamity. If a seed of disaster had been nearby, thinking it had clung to his clothes as he flew off was only natural—though the fact that seed was a Sin Archbishop was no joke.

Otto: "Had Natsuki-san fallen victim to Gluttony, we would have been spared the trouble of coming to the Empire, for we could not search for someone no one remembers."

Frederica: "Otto-sama…"

Otto: "I will not let Emilia-sama or Petra-chan hear that. I dislike being scolded."

Frederica: "I would scold you as well."

Otto's somewhat off-hand tone earned Frederica's warning. He could act cynically at times, but it was his way of coping, and he did choose his audience carefully—arguably a rational approach.

Frederica: "At any rate, we should listen for damage caused by Gluttony—whatever form it takes—since it may well be gruesome."

Otto: "Precisely. We do not wish for it, yet it is better than having zero leads; difficult, then, to say whether we should hope for it."

Whenever the Witch Cult rampaged, there was always harm one wished to turn away from. As Otto said, lacking clues was undesirable, but one could never voice a wish that a disaster occur to obtain them.

Emilia: “What are you two whispering about?”

Otto: “Oh, just confirming a few things. Anyway, let’s arrange our teams. This is not a large town, so—”

As Otto said, Mozotto was a small town, likely with fewer than five hundred inhabitants—adequate as a way-station for provisioning a long journey, but hardly dependable as a hub for gathering information from across the Empire.

Otto: “Petra-chan and Beatrice-chan—the two young ladies will stay at the inn, and the remaining four of us will canvass for information. Frederica-san, could I ask you to accompany Emily?”

Emilia: “Eh, aren’t we splitting into four separate groups?”

Otto: “A lone woman walking in an unfamiliar land is dangerous. I would rather not furnish Natsuki-san with a reason to yell at me when we reunite.”

At Otto’s smooth reply, Emilia reluctantly nodded, “I see…” Of course, that was Otto’s pretext; the truth was his anxiety over letting Emilia move alone—not for fear she might be hurt, but quite the opposite.

Frederica: “Emily, since this is our first time here, let us protect one another. I am sorry that it is my unease that prompts this…”

Emilia: “Ah, no, I’m totally fine. You’re right; I haven’t been watching my surroundings properly. I’ll make sure to protect you, Frederica.”

Frederica: “That is most reassuring. —Garf, do your job properly.”

Garfiel flexed his knuckles with enthusiasm at being assigned solo work, so she nailed him down with that caution.

Garfiel: “I said I got it, didn’t I?”

Garfiel: “Then, Otto-bro, what now?”

Otto: “Very well. Once the young ladies are settled at the inn, three hours from now—precisely at the end of Fire Time—we gather in the middle of town.”

Garfiel: “Ohh, gotcha.”

All of them, starting with Garfiel, nodded at Otto’s raised finger.

Then, as a final word before they set out—

Emilia: “Alright everyone, let’s be careful. If our true identities get exposed it’ll be reaaally bad, so make sure nothing dangerous happens.”

With that caution from Emilia, each of them set about their tasks.

4

???: “A traveler with black hair and black eyes…? No, I haven't heard anything special. But if we're talking about appearances, you girls better be careful. After all—”

???: “Two girls, one with blue hair…? I don't know anything about that, try someone else. However, with looks like yours, you should remember this—”

???: “Something unusual? Nothing particular has come to my ears. Ah, but since you're quite the beauty, let me warn you—”

Frederica: “—Everyone warned me about the same thing. Be careful of kidnapping marriages.”

Garfiel: “Kidnapping marriages, huh?”

The center of town, where they had agreed to regroup, was little more than an open space. Despite being called a square, it was merely an area in the middle of town, where a small market was being held.

Standing at a distance from the market, Frederica, Emilia, and Garfiel met up after three hours of gathering information, exchanging their findings.

Otto had yet to join them, but everyone had an oddly high trust in him to dig deeper into the information Frederica's group had collected, so his lateness was considered a minor issue.

Unfortunately, nothing definitive had been discovered regarding Subaru's features, such as his black hair and black eyes, or any girl resembling Rem. They had also inquired about damages from Gluttony, but received no notable information there either—whether that was good or bad remained uncertain.

Nevertheless, Frederica agreed that the most concerning information they'd learned was the initial topic.

Frederica: "Kidnapping marriages… Apparently, it's a custom where one forcibly abducts someone they've fallen for and brings them home to marry…"

Garfiel: "Scary tradition… Does it only happen to women?"

Frederica: "No, it seems men can be kidnapped as well. In those cases, apparently, groups of women or the woman's family and friends help out."

Garfiel: "That ain't a scene ya can jus' laugh off. Didn't expect ta hear somethin' so imperial-style outta nowhere."

Garfiel folded his arms, and though inappropriate, Frederica found herself agreeing with him.

The idea of a group of women teaming up to kidnap a single man was an extraordinary sight. If encountered, Frederica felt she would likely freeze, unable to act.

However, Garfiel then tilted his head,

Garfiel: "Emily 'n Sis got warned by everyone, but no one said anythin' ta me. Why'd they keep it from me?"

Emilia: "Now that you mention it, you're right. I wonder why?"

Frederica: “…Perhaps simply because they couldn't imagine a reason someone would kidnap Garf. Those who warned us probably thought we were, well, beautiful.”

Garfiel: “Sis? C’mon, what kinda eyes did those folks— Ouch! I didn’t finish!”

Frederica: “You nearly finished that sentence! Such a rude child!”

Frederica, red-faced, pulled on Garfiel’s ear as he looked dumbfounded.

Of course, Frederica wasn't bold enough to call herself a beauty. Emilia was right there beside her, and there were adorable girls like Ram and Petra around as well.

Compared to them, Frederica was tall, with sharp fangs. She thought her eye color and facial expressions weren’t bad. In fact, she'd often been complimented on them in the past.

Though that had stopped as she grew older, making her suspect it had all been mere flattery.

Frederica: “…”

Garfiel: “Ouch, ouch, ouch! How long ya gonna pull my ear?!”

Frederica: “Oh dear, I'm sorry. I put too much strength into it.”

She'd been dwelling on unpleasant memories, unintentionally tightening her grip. As soon as she released him, Garfiel hid behind Emilia, holding his ear.

Emilia, observing this, giggled quietly,

Emilia: “It’s okay, Frederica is cute. Garfiel just finds it hard to compliment his older sister.”

Frederica: “Th-Thank you… Although, the word 'cute' doesn’t quite suit me. It's a special term, after all.”

Emilia: “Is that so? Then beautiful works just fine!”

Frederica: “Uuh… I-I wonder what's keeping Otto-sama. He's awfully late!”

Frederica fanned her face with her hand, flushed by Emilia's sincere and innocent compliment. Emilia looked around, saying “You’re right,”

Emilia: “I wonder if he's gotten caught up chatting with someone… Otto-kun does get very talkative when he's had a drink.”

Garfiel: “Only Emily’d call Otto-bro's drunken rambles like that… But yeah, I’m worried ‘bout him bein' late.”

Garfiel clicked his teeth, agreeing with Emilia, who was biting her lip in concern. Even Frederica, standing next to Emilia, felt uneasy as she considered Otto’s lateness.

Frederica casually mentioned it, but it was truly unusual for Otto. Emilia had a point—Otto sometimes made mistakes with alcohol, but only in places where he could relax without caution. It was unlikely he'd make such a mistake in enemy territory.

A growing, unpleasant feeling arose that something might've happened—

Garfiel: “Speakin' o' that, that kidnappin' marriage thing ya mentioned before?”

Emilia: “Yes, kidnapping marriage. Now that I think about it, Regulus almost forced me into marriage… I wonder if that was a kidnapping marriage too…”

Frederica: “The situation you were in was indeed unfortunate, but… Garf?”

The conversation was derailing, but Frederica gently called Garfiel back on topic. He shook his short blond hair roughly,

Garfiel: “Might jus' be overthinkin', but didn't ya say earlier even guys could get kidnapped?”

Emilia: “That's how everyone described it, yes.”

Garfiel: “Ya don’t think Otto-bro was targeted, do ya?”

“…”

Garfiel's words brought a momentary, awkward silence.

But quickly, that silence was broken by the relaxed thought of “it can't be.”

Frederica: “N-No way, that's impossible, Garf. You’re overthinking it; it's too far-fetched.”

Garfiel: “R-Right? Otto-bro ain’t reckless ‘nuff ta get caught easily, and even if targeted, he ain't that careless…”

Emilia: “Th-This is terrible! We can't let Otto-kun be in danger!”

Frederica & Garfiel: “Emily?!”

However, Emilia, completely ignoring their assurances, rushed off, panic on her face.

Frederica and Garfiel chased after her after a moment’s hesitation.

Frederica: “Emily! That's just overly cautious…”

Emilia: “If it’s just me worrying too much, then that's fine! But if I'm right, we can't afford to be wrong!”

Frederica felt struck by Emilia's words.

She was right—it was better to overreact than to regret later. If their fears were unfounded, they could simply apologize. But if Otto really was in danger, they had to move immediately.

Frederica: “Garf, can you smell Otto-sama…?”

Garfiel: “Sis, ya know Otto-bro’s scent’s faint ta begin with. Even worse, neither of our noses are workin’ right on imperial soil yet.”

As half-beasts, Frederica and Garfiel had superior sense of smell compared to humans, but both their senses were dulled due to unfamiliarity with the Empire's unique environment.

With frustration, they finally caught up with Emilia, who stopped at the stall they'd previously visited.

Emilia: “Shopkeeper-san!”

Shopkeeper: “Oh? Ah, you girls again. Why the panic?”

Emilia: “It’s about the kidnapping marriage you mentioned before! Can you tell us more?”

Shopkeeper: “More details? Well, there's nothing more than what I already told…”

Garfiel: “Tell us anythin’ ya know! Our friend might be in danger!”

The shopkeeper, alarmed by Garfiel's urgency, lowered his voice slightly,

Shopkeeper: “When you say your friend might be in danger, are you sayin’ they got kidnapped?”

Emilia: “We don’t know. But he hasn’t arrived at our meeting place, even though the agreed time has already passed… He’s normally ve~ry punctual, so it’s unusual.”

Shopkeeper: “I hate to ask this, but is this friend of yours attractive?”

Emilia: “Attractive… Yes, I think he’s good-looking. Right?”

Frederica: “It’s true that he’s good-looking. Although he doesn’t usually give off that impression…”

Frederica faltered slightly, having to respond directly to Emilia.

Frederica considered the most accurate way to describe Otto would be “good-looking when quiet.” If he gave a different impression, it was due to everyday interactions. With Subaru or Garfiel around, his expressive personality overshadowed his good looks, making “funny” a stronger impression than handsome.

At any rate—

Shopkeeper: “Good-looking, huh…? Then there’s a strong chance he was taken by the Batfolk.”

Emilia: “Batfolk…?”

Shopkeeper: “They’re the ones doing these kidnapping marriages. It’s happening not just in this town, but in towns all over the area.”

With a hand pressed to his forehead, the shopkeeper gave them a sympathetic look. Frederica, Emilia, and Garfiel exchanged tense glances.

Frederica: “B-But even if they’re experienced, I doubt Otto-sama would easily…”

Garfiel: “How do these kidnappers operate?”

Shopkeeper: “From what I hear, they hit from behind without warning and tie you up.”

Frederica: “Of all things, the one method he’d struggle most against…!”

Otto was adept at dealing with most situations, but his weakness was undoubtedly a scenario where there was no room for negotiation.

Garfiel: “Even Otto-bro wouldn’t stand a chance if they caught ‘im off guard…”

Frederica: “Neither Subaru-sama nor Otto-sama are the type to win in a straightforward fight…”

Their worst fears were being confirmed one after another, turning Frederica’s and Garfiel’s faces pale.

Since the kidnappers’ goal was marriage, it might not be life-threatening. Still, accidents happen—people sometimes lose their lives through unintended outcomes.

It had only been a few hours since entering the Vollachian Empire. Encountering a situation unheard of in the Kingdom of Lugunica in such a short span went beyond mere bad luck.

Frederica: “What should we do…”

Emilia: “Um, shopkeeper-san, how do you know the kidnappers are Batfolk?”

Frederica: “Emily…?”

While Frederica was overwhelmed by thoughts of Otto’s danger, Emilia stared intently at the shopkeeper. Even through her robe’s cognitive disruption, Frederica felt Emilia’s intensity.

The shopkeeper, clearly pressured by Emilia’s gaze rather than her identity, stammered,

Shopkeeper: “W-Well, the reason it’s obvious is simple. It’s the blood.”

Emilia: “—Blood?”

Shopkeeper: “Right, blood. The Batfolk drink human blood. They choose their targets based on the quality of their blood, and…”

The shopkeeper hesitated briefly, but Frederica could guess what he was about to say.

If blood quality was the deciding factor, then naturally they’d first test it. Thus, the kidnappers would taste blood at the scene, leaving unmistakable evidence pointing to the Batfolk.

Shopkeeper: “The Batfolk move around the country looking for suitable targets. This town and its neighbors are their current hunting grounds. That’s why I warned you girls earlier.”

Emilia: “Can’t those people be stopped?”

Shopkeeper: “The Batfolk? Trying to fight them head-on is a terrible idea. If no one resists, only as much blood as they drink will flow. But if someone defies them, a lot more blood will spill. It’s obvious which is preferable.”

The shopkeeper slowly shook his head, cautioning Emilia against doing something foolish. He returned to his work, clearly advising that sacrificing one person was wiser than picking a fight with the Batfolk.

It was practical advice from someone who lived here, genuinely meant to help, yet—

Emilia: "—Even if he says that, I have a reason why I can't back down."

Emilia thanked the shopkeeper deeply, expressing gratitude while firmly stating she had reached a different conclusion.

Then, turning away from the shop, Emilia asked Frederica and Garfiel,

Emilia: "What do you two think? Do you think Otto-kun was kidnapped?"

Garfiel: "—I don't wanna think so, but him bein' late 'n hearin' how these guys operate, even Otto-bro might've been caught."

Frederica: "Different lands have different customs. Otto-sama's usual skills might not be enough here… That possibility certainly exists. But…"

Emilia: "—We can't just cause trouble for the people here."

Frederica hesitantly nodded to Emilia's cautious addition.

If the shopkeeper's information was correct, the Batfolk who potentially kidnapped Otto were clearly dangerous. If outsiders like Frederica's group stirred things up, the Batfolk's anger might shift onto the townspeople instead.

Emilia: "I understand that worry. I really do…"

Frederica: "Emily…?"

Emilia: "I understand… But right now, I'm reaally angry. Is it wrong to feel this way?"

Frederica: "…"

Emilia: "I think marriage is reaaally wonderful and important. So using force to kidnap someone and making them marry… I hate that method. And if Otto-kun is in danger, I want to do something even more."

Though Emilia spoke gently, her anger was clear.

Frederica had felt overwhelmed by the term "kidnapping marriage," but she agreed that it was intolerable. Emilia had almost experienced something similar in the Watergate City, from a Sin Archbishop.

Emilia: "Back then, Subaru came to rescue me, and I was reaaally happy. Now it's my turn to do the rescuing. Though it's not Subaru—it's Otto-kun."

Frederica: "…You're serious? Making enemies could hinder our search for Subaru-sama and the others."

Garfiel: "But Sis, that's—"

Frederica: "Garf."

Frederica firmly silenced her brother with one word.

She understood Garfiel's concern. But she had asked because she wanted Emilia to acknowledge the risk.

In response, Emilia's amethyst eyes sparkled resolutely,

Emilia: "We just arrived, and we might already make things noisy. But even if that makes it harder to move later, it's still much better than losing Otto-kun, right?"

Frederica: "…If you're prepared, I can't object. Though I'm sure Ram will scold us severely later."

Ram had entrusted them to behave responsibly, so she had every right to be angry. Though Otto would probably bear the brunt of her scolding.

Garfiel: “Looks like we’re decided. So, whaddya wanna do?”

Garfiel bared his fangs eagerly, ready to act. Emilia pondered for a moment,

Emilia: “According to the shopkeeper-san, the Batfolk target people whose blood tastes good… How do we make blood tasty?”

Garfiel: “I like meat, but blood’s definitely not my specialty…”

Frederica interrupted, rolling up her sleeve slightly,

Frederica: “Emily, Garf, I have a proposal.”

Emilia: “You thought of something?”

Frederica: “Yes. It’s not a method I’m fond of, but…”

Frederica traced her finger over her pale skin, revealing faint veins.

Frederica: “I don’t know good blood from bad. But I do have a guess regarding blood considered tasty—my own.”

Emilia: “Frederica’s blood…?”

Garfiel: “—Sis, ya can’t mean…”

Garfiel’s face turned grim as he grabbed Frederica’s shoulder, gripping it tightly with anxiety. Frederica gently peeled away his hand, touched by her brother’s genuine concern.

Garfiel’s worry was justified.

Frederica: “Emily, the blood running through my veins is special. It’s called ‘Rareblood’.”

Emilia: “Rareblood…?”

Frederica: “I personally don’t have any strong feelings about it, but…”

It was Clind who had informed Frederica that her blood was unique.

More precisely, she’d learned this from Clind after an incident caused by people seeking her blood. Clind had resolved the incident and explained it to her afterward.

Frederica herself had never felt any benefit from her blood’s uniqueness. In fact, she vividly remembered it causing trouble more than once.

Still—

Frederica: “If what we’ve heard is true, then my blood should certainly attract the Batfolk. At least it’s a clue to find Otto-sama.”

Garfiel: “Clind specifically said not ta let anyone taste yer blood, Sis.”

Garfiel spoke urgently, his demeanor shifting from eagerness for a fight to deep concern for his sister’s safety. Frederica was grateful and deeply touched.

Frederica: “But if my blood can ever be useful, there might never be another chance. Clind’s warning was about the risk, correct?”

Garfiel: “Ya think it’ll be fine as long as it’s for Otto-bro…?”

Frederica: “Yes, I do. —Emily.”

Frederica turned to Emilia, who had been carefully considering Frederica’s arm—and by extension, the blood beneath her skin. Emilia’s eyes reflected the same concern as Garfiel’s.

The final decision rested with Emilia. If she prioritized Frederica’s safety, they'd have to find another way. But Frederica held a certain belief—no, a certain hope:

Emilia: “—Let’s do it. Garfiel and I will absolutely protect you.”

When faced with necessary decisions, Emilia possessed the strength to make them.

5

—Pressing down on his throbbing head, Otto bitterly reproached himself for his blunder.

Otto: “I was being careful, or at least I thought I was…”

He had deliberately avoided deserted alleys and refrained as much as possible from interacting with suspicious characters. In an unfamiliar place, his ability to respond to trouble was limited. Avoiding danger from the start was crucial.

However, all of Otto’s carefulness had been effortlessly shattered by his opponent’s boldness. —If he had to choose another word, it might have been closer to recklessness or aggression rather than boldness.

Either way, it was during a brief moment when no one was around that he had been struck on the head.

Otto: “Looks like I’m the only one here.”

Holding back the pain, Otto observed his surroundings and muttered to himself.

Having been knocked out and transported somewhere, Otto was now locked inside an iron cage. It was just barely large enough to lie down in, far from what one might call comfortable.

Apparently, aside from Otto, there were several others in similar predicaments. From all around came sobs and moans, everyone engulfed in despair.

However, seeing that none of his close acquaintances—such as Emilia or Frederica—were among them was, at least, a small comfort for Otto.

Otto: “But kidnappers again, huh… Honestly, it seems I have a real knack for getting bought and sold.”

When kidnappers were involved, the goal was probably human trafficking. Otto had already experienced being kidnapped once before; perhaps he truly was cursed.

Then again, if he started thinking along those lines, he would have to reconsider his life of constant trouble—

Otto: "—?"

Suddenly, Otto shivered at the sensation of the air growing colder, squinting at the space outside his cage.

Given the dim surroundings and cold air, Otto assumed he was somewhere underground or inside a cave, but the sudden chill did not bode well.

And indeed, Otto's instincts proved correct.

???: "—Gentlemen, I apologize for keeping you waiting so long."

With those words, the space outside distorted—and a black silhouette appeared.

Standing there was a tall, slender man in black clothes, his green hair slicked back. At first glance, he seemed cold, but he was strikingly beautiful in a way that sent chills down Otto's spine.

But perhaps due to the dim lighting, his complexion appeared eerily pale, like that of a corpse.

As Otto was reflecting on this eerie impression, the man bowed deeply and spoke again,

Jacques-Rosé: "I am Jacques-Rosé Blau. My methods may seem somewhat uncouth, but there is a reason why I have gathered you here. Indeed, an unavoidable reason."

Speaking solemnly, the man—Jacques-Rosé, as he introduced himself—continued.

If by "uncouth" he meant knocking people out and abducting them without warning, Otto would have preferred a more sincere apology.

But making unnecessary wisecracks and incurring hostility wouldn't do him any good.

First, he should hear out the man's demands and then decide how to respond. Otto congratulated himself inwardly for holding his tongue, a decision he was immediately thankful for.

After all, the words Jacques-Rosé uttered next, as he raised his head, were—

Jacques-Rosé: "—The reason I've gathered you all is that you are candidates to become my Blood Bride. As one who inherits ancient blood, I seek a partner with suitable bloodline."

Captives: "…"

Jacques-Rosé's melodic voice resonated through the air, freezing the sobbing voices and creating a momentary silence, as if time itself had stopped.

Making the most of this moment, Otto carefully reconsidered Jacques-Rosé's words and observed his surroundings—and finally noticed.

—Every other person confined in the cages was female.

Otto: "…Then why am I here?"

Otto was deeply puzzled but managed to keep the question to himself.

Had he voiced his confusion, drawing attention, who knew what might have happened? But whether or not his silence would actually improve his circumstances, Otto couldn't be sure.

The only thing he was sure of was—

Otto: "—Ram-san and Petra-chan are definitely going to scold me later."

That he would most certainly get an earful from the two scariest women in his camp.

—A tall woman was walking along a dark alleyway in the town of Mozotto.

Walking quietly, with gentle footsteps, was a woman with long golden hair cascading down her perfectly straight back.

The glimpses of her neck and ears through the gaps in her hair, and her slightly exposed skin, were so fair they seemed almost translucent. Even just from her back, one could imagine a beauty that made one gulp involuntarily.

However, for those who gazed at her from behind, who almost gulped at her sight, the woman's greatest allure was the fragrant scent of blood tickling their nostrils.

Apparently, the woman had suffered a wound on her left arm, as evidenced by the bandage glimpsed at her wrist through her sleeve. The bleeding had already stopped, and the injury was not serious.

Yet even if the wound posed no danger, the fragrant aroma of blood was something that could not be hidden.

Therefore—

“…”

Holding their breaths, two hunters exchanged glances within the shadows, communicating their mutual intent.

All reasons for hesitation, all excuses to refrain, vanished before the alluring scent of blood. Tasting the shuddering sensation running through their bodies, the two slowly stepped out from the shadows.

They silently slipped behind their prey, without sound or presence. To be out alone amidst the sunset gloom, despite rumors surely having spread, was the height of carelessness.

Still, they wanted to thank her deeply for remaining so careless until today. It was worth enduring all the humiliation and scolding they'd suffered for failing to provide tributes.

They would attack from behind and knock her unconscious in an instant—even if, when catching her, their claws inadvertently scratched and drew blood.

Yes, just as they were licking their lips,

???: “—You've gotten greedy, haven't ya? That ain't allowed.”

???: ““Huh?”“

Startled, the two whirled around as a rough voice's owner tapped their shoulders from behind. There, standing behind them who had supposedly gotten behind the woman, was someone else.

In the alleyway darkened by dusk, a figure with emerald eyes and sharp fangs emerged—.

???: “—hk!”

A chill of terror raced up their spines, and their bodies moved instinctively.

It had been instinct that had drawn them towards the sweet scent of blood, and instinct again that made them reflexively raise their claws. However, neither of the actions commanded by instinct came true.

???: “Up ya go.”

Their raised arms were effortlessly seized by their opponent's casually raised hands.

Not just one, but both arms were seized. The two who had reflexively moved found themselves simultaneously restrained. Shocked and frozen by this, their opponent twisted their arms forcefully upward.

???: “Behave yerselves!”

Their vision spun wildly, and they crashed helplessly onto their backs. Struck by the sensation of losing their breath, unable even to groan, their consciousness faded in a flash of white.

Literally unaware of front or back, unable to grasp what had just happened, their consciousness drifted far away—.

???: “Garf, that was too much!”

Garfiel: “Couldn't be helped! My amazin’ self didn't think it'd end up like this either!”

???: “Wait, you two! Ah, no! They're passing out!”

As their consciousness faded, they heard the comically pointless argument at the edge of awareness.

While pessimistic thoughts about possibly dying passed through their mind, they found it unbearably distasteful that these might be the last voices they'd hear.

And so, desperately wishing that it wouldn't be so, they continued praying right up until their consciousness slipped away.

7

Otto: “—I see, kidnapping marriage, is it?”

After calming down the weeping women trapped within the iron cage and managing to gather information from them, Otto quietly stroked his chin with his hand.

He had suddenly been struck in an alleyway, tied up, and brought here—this place apparently served as the hideout for individuals who carried out the rumored “kidnapping marriage,” a hot topic in Mozotto and nearby towns.

The tall man from earlier who had introduced himself with exaggerated gestures and tone as Jacques-Rosé Blau was apparently the ringleader, the representative of the Bat People who were the culprits behind this act.

Otto: “…”

Sorting out the situation in his mind, Otto first cursed his own poor luck.

He was aware of his predisposition for repeatedly getting involved in unfortunate incidents everywhere he went. But recently, having settled with Emilia's camp, he might have grown slightly careless.

Moreover, this was the Vollachian Empire, where Otto's common sense didn't apply. Reflecting, he acknowledged he should have been more cautious about the possible risks of acting alone.

Otto: "Still, if I overly blame myself, even the incident at Pristella might end up being considered my bad luck, so I'd like to keep that in moderation."

In the first place, if it came to misfortune wherever he went, Subaru and Emilia had equally troublesome predispositions. It was somewhat depressing to think that their misfortunes combined, including his own, led to their current bonds. Still, without this bad luck, he would never have encountered them in the first place.

In any case—

Otto: "Considering the circumstances, did they mistake me for a woman…?"

It wasn't something he wanted to think about, but circumstantial evidence strongly suggested that this was indeed the case.

Around twenty prisoners were confined within these decidedly uncomfortable iron cages, and all of them were women. Given that the groom for this "kidnapping marriage" was Jacques-Rosé, that scenario would be logical.

The only inconsistency here was none other than Otto himself.

In fact, Otto intentionally chose clothing that obscured his build. With his admittedly androgynous features, he understood how he might be mistaken for a woman. His less-than-intimidating face and build had sometimes served him well in negotiations.

Otto: "When things like this happen, I become jealous of Natsuki-san and Garfiel's intimidating gazes…"

Though intimidating gazes weren't ideal for negotiations, they had their advantages when it came to avoiding troublesome incidents. Of course, intimidating appearances could also invite trouble of another kind, so not everything was ideal.

In the end, people could only play the cards they were dealt.

If only one could freely swap their gaze, face, voice, or height to suit the situation perfectly—but that was overly ambitious. Perhaps it was even a loss to one's valuable personal capital.

Otto: "—The appointed meeting time must've passed by now."

According to the women, rumors of the "kidnapping marriage" had spread even to Mozotto. Emilia and the others could easily link Otto's disappearance to those rumors.

Normally, it would be dismissed as nonsense, but Frederica and Petra knew Otto had cross-dressed before, making the idea not too far-fetched.

However, he disliked that Subaru and Roswaal's frivolous imaginations might actually be useful here.

Otto: "Blaming the Margrave for that would be too cruel, I suppose. After all, it was Natsuki-san who set that bad precedent."

In any case, Otto concluded it was wisest not to escalate matters and to await rescue from Emilia and the others.

Attempting an escape could endanger not just himself, but also the other kidnapped women. It was frustrating, but patience was the best option here.

As long as no one discovered he was male, observing the situation shouldn't be too problematic.

Otto: "To avoid attracting attention, perhaps I should try to speak in a higher pitch…"

If Subaru were in his position, Otto was sure he'd perfectly impersonate a woman to an alarming degree. Garfiel, even if discovered, could resort to brute force to resolve the matter.

Essentially, the problem was that Otto, the most middling among them, had gotten caught.

All he could do was hope Jacques-Rosé and his companions would take their time selecting a bride—

Jacques-Rosé: "—The time has come! It's time to choose my Blood Bride!"

Otto: "Wait, whaaat?!"

The moment he had prepared himself for a prolonged wait, that enthusiastic voice rang out, and Otto inadvertently reacted. He quickly covered his mouth, but it was already too late after such a dramatic reaction.

Jacques-Rosé appeared, his footsteps echoing across the hard ground of the eerie cave filled with iron cages holding the abducted women, cold air, and darkness.

The imposing man with a piercing gaze fixed his purple eyes upon Otto, who still covered his mouth.

Jacques-Rosé: "What is the matter, my bride candidate? To think you'd raise your voice in surprise."

Otto: "Ah, well… I just thought it was quite hasty. I was under the impression you'd take more time, carefully choosing a bride suitable for your ancient blood."

Otto shook his head slightly, hiding his mouth with his sleeve as he spoke.

He deliberately pitched his voice slightly higher, lowering his gaze as if frightened, assuming a posture intended to obscure his gender.

He'd preferred not to converse much, but given the situation, he had no choice.

However, ignoring Otto's inner reluctance, Jacques-Rosé crossed his muscular arms with a nod.

Jacques-Rosé: “Bride candidate, your words make sense. However, neither I nor my brethren have much time left.”

Otto: “But, surely choosing a Blood Bride shouldn't be done so easily? Given the dignity of ancient blood, you shouldn’t be able to find a suitable partner casually…”

Jacques-Rosé: “What you say is correct. However, I never expected to find someone worthy of ancient blood easily from the start. That would be unrealistic. Rather, it is essential to elevate the chosen bride to match the ancient blood, isn't it?”

Otto: “Ah, well, that’s certainly a commendable idea, but…”

Otto was confused, having received a much more rational response than expected.

Jacques-Rosé’s reply was surprisingly sensible, showing he was more realistic than Otto had assumed. Indeed, viewing ancient blood as lineage and not setting overly ambitious expectations for a bride was logical.

The problem, however, lay in their method of bride selection being kidnapping in the first place, and the impossibility, at least in Otto’s cultural understanding, of fostering friendly relations with brides chosen that way.

In short, Jacques-Rosé’s approach stumbled at the starting line.

If this was the custom of Jacques-Rosé and the Bat People in selecting their mates, Otto could feel the cultural gap keenly.

Jacques-Rosé: “However, you seem genuinely concerned about my brethren and me.”

Otto: “Excuse me?”

Jacques-Rosé: “Most girls we abduct grieve and refuse even conversation. But you, even with a trembling voice, maintain a different attitude. Perhaps…”

Listening to Jacques-Rosé’s impressed tone, Otto felt a very, very bad premonition. But even if his soul burned with dread, he couldn't control Jacques-Rosé’s intentions.

Hence, Otto had no means to stop it—

Jacques-Rosé: “Perhaps you truly are suitable to become my bride.”

Otto: “…”

Otto thought to himself: “He really said it.”

Whether it was narcissism or not was highly questionable, but he had felt the conversation taking that direction. It was a sense of inevitability.

Jacques-Rosé’s gaze penetrated Otto through the iron bars. The surrounding women stopped weeping, their eyes filled with faint hope and curiosity.

Otto understood their hope—once a bride was chosen, the other captives might be freed. But their curiosity? That he did not want to know.

Jacques-Rosé: “What is your name?”

Otto briefly considered impulsively replying with his real name, but knew emotional actions often led to reflection and deep regret later. He held himself back.

Suppressing his impulse, Otto decided he had to maximize the situation to his advantage.

And thus, making his decision, he answered,

Otto: “—My name is Audrey Souffle.”

8

Emilia: “Then, Jagi and Moses's older brother is the groom for the «Kidnapping Marriage», right?”

Jagi & Moses: “Y-Yeah…” “That's right.”

Emilia: “I see… But if he's looking for his own bride, I think your brother should search for her himself. Instead of making his younger brothers or friends do it.”

Lowering her eyebrows, Emilia made a somewhat off-target remark. The two boys who were being scolded by her, their limbs restrained by ice—Jagi and Moses, the bat people—wore bitter expressions.

From their perspective, they were not only beaten down but also lectured. Naturally, they wouldn’t feel like obediently listening or repenting.

Moreover, if their actions followed their tribe's laws, feeling remorse would be even harder.

Frederica: “I understand Emily's argument, but the gap between races is difficult to bridge…”

Garfiel: “Even then, we can’t let these guys off. Otto-bro’s chastity’s at stake here, y'know?”

Frederica: “…I understand already.”

Slowly shaking her head, Frederica shot a reprimanding glance at the outspoken Garfiel.

It was a blunt remark, but considering Otto's situation, they couldn't laugh it off. Frederica even went out of her way to play the decoy role because of such anxiety.

—The decoy operation, aimed at luring out the bat people who were performing the «Kidnapping Marriage», had Frederica as its bait. The deciding factor was the “rare blood” flowing in her veins.

It was dangerous enough for a lone woman to be in a deserted alley. Given that the culprit's objective was a woman and the blood flowing through her veins, Frederica was undoubtedly the ideal candidate.

In reality, they easily lured out their target.

Frederica: “Although, considering our opponents are children, perhaps I wasn't necessary after all.”

Her gaze fell to Jagi and Moses, who were restrained and sitting on the ground. They looked like boys around Petra's age.

Their way of hiding their presence and footsteps was sloppy, making Frederica nervous as she waited for an attack, suspecting some kind of trap, until Garfiel finally captured them.

Frederica: “In reality, they were just inexperienced children…”

Jagi & Moses: “That's not true! Your blood smelled delicious!” “That's right!”

Frederica: “That's not a compliment!”

Frederica's voice rose sharply at the irrelevant consolation.

In any case, they'd successfully captured their targets. According to the two boys, the purpose of the «Kidnapping Marriage» was to find a Blood Bride for their older brother—the Chieftain of the bat people.

Apparently, for the bat people, it was a noble endeavor to pass down their ancient and precious bloodline.

Garfiel: “So your noble endeavor involves forcibly kidnapping someone, huh? Some great noble endeavor that is.”

Jagi & Moses: “It’s our tribe’s traditional way. Big bro isn’t wrong!” “That’s right!”

Emilia: “…I suppose your tribe has its own problems and struggles that outsiders like me can't easily interfere with.”

The boys argued back at the exasperated Garfiel. Emilia, with a serious look, cut into their exchange, gazing intently at them with her clear, amethyst eyes.

That earnest gaze made Jagi and Moses choke up with an “uh.”

Emilia: “If that method only feels good to you and hurts everyone else, I think you should find a better way. At least, we feel reaaally sad about this.”

Jagi & Moses: “…”

Emilia: “Do you always look for brides this way?”

Jagi & Moses: “…Usually, it's different.” “That's right…”

Jagi and Moses answered Emilia's question with lowered heads. Emilia murmured, "I see," while Frederica raised her eyebrows in surprise.

She had assumed this method was deeply ingrained among the empire’s bat people.

Frederica: “If it’s usually different, then why use this method for finding a bride?”

Jagi & Moses: “Because big bro said it was necessary.” “That's right.”

Garfiel: “Your brother’s reasoning, so you guys don’t know the details, huh? I don’t like the sound of that.”

Garfiel growled unhappily, making the brothers shrink their shoulders.

Was Garfiel irritated at the two for obediently following their brother’s words, or at their brother who commanded the «Kidnapping Marriage»?

Just as Frederica was pondering Garfiel's inner thoughts,

Emilia: “—Can you take us to your brother?”

Jagi & Moses: “Eh?!”

Looking straight ahead, Emilia boldly stated her request, surprising the brothers.

Frederica rubbed her brow at Emilia’s characteristically straightforward approach. Frederica had intended to propose the same thing but had been searching for an appropriate way to ask.

She thought deceit or conciliation might be necessary. Emilia's straightforward request surely wouldn’t get them to agree—

However—

Emilia: “You two also think this method is strange, right? That's why earlier you looked so uncomfortable and dispirited.”

Garfiel: “Could just be 'cause they got easily beaten and feel depressed, right?”

Emilia: “Maybe. But, I feel that's not the case.”

Emilia answered Garfiel, then squatted down to meet Jagi and Moses's eyes and repeated her question,

Emilia: “How about it?”

At Emilia’s repeated question and earnest amethyst eyes, the brothers hesitated, and eventually—

Jagi & Moses: “Big bro seems a bit rushed lately…” “That's right…”

Emilia: “Rushed? Is he hurrying to marry? Is that why he resorted to kidnapping?”

Jagi & Moses: “Yeah…” “That's right…”

Emilia: “Did your brother tell you why he’s rushed?”

When Emilia tilted her head slightly, the two shook their heads.

They didn't know why their brother seemed off. But they agreed something felt wrong, and they didn’t appear to be lying.

Why had their brother resorted to «Kidnapping Marriage»? To know the reason—

Emilia: “—Please let us meet your brother after all. Let's hear his true feelings.”

Jagi & Moses: “But… it'd feel like betraying big bro.” “That's right…”

Emilia: “You two were looking for a bride for your brother’s sake. But knowing if this really is for his sake is also because you care about him. If that's the case—”

Pausing for a moment, Emilia gently placed her hands on Jagi and Moses’s shoulders.

Then, nodding at them seriously,

Emilia: “Don't hesitate. You should learn the truth so you can really stand by your brother. I don't think that feeling is betrayal at all.”

Jagi & Moses: “…”

Receiving Emilia’s words, the doubt in Jagi and Moses’s eyes wavered. Frederica could clearly see that Emilia’s words resonated deeply in the hearts of these young boys.

If Roswaal or Otto had said this, one might suspect underlying motives. But Emilia spoke earnestly, and no such motives existed.

That was why Frederica thought Emilia’s presence and ideals had great meaning.

Thus—

Jagi & Moses: “Will you talk to big bro with us?” “…That's right.”

Emilia: “Yes, of course!”

Hearing the young brothers' timid request, Emilia agreed cheerfully. Seeing her attitude, Garfiel proudly puffed out his chest, and Frederica couldn’t help but feel admiration as well.

9

Jacques-Rosé: “This tranquility is but a fleeting one. Eventually, the thin ice shall surely crack, and the frigid waters beneath shall seep out. Before that happens, we must regain our strength.”

Jacques-Rosé emphasized this, tightly clenching his large hand characterized by notably long fingers.

Listening to the man’s voice colored heavily by concern, Otto’s shoulders slumped in utter dejection at his own extraordinarily ill-fated talent for attracting misfortune.

Of course, it was a necessary act. He was compelled by necessity; an excuse he had no choice but to utter.

However—

Jacques-Rosé: “You understand, don’t you, Audrey?”

It would be a lie to say Subaru’s bad influence had nothing to do with his decision to adopt that name.

The name he’d introduced himself with to Jacques-Rosé, "Audrey Souffle," was intricately linked to complicated memories, essentially filled with predominantly unpleasant recollections for Otto.

But to keep Jacques-Rosé under the misunderstanding that he was a woman, he couldn’t afford to give a man’s name. Hence, Otto had no choice but to reopen unpleasant memories.

Jacques-Rosé continued passionately, oblivious to Otto’s introspection.

Jacques-Rosé: “With the ascension of Emperor Vincent Vollachia, the previously war-torn Empire has attained temporary peace. But I can see clearly. That peace shall inevitably awaken or be cast aside, and erupt in flames. That’s why—”

Otto: “…Following your tradition of kidnapping brides, you’ve selected us as bride candidates?”

Jacques-Rosé: “As I’ve told you, I fully acknowledge this is a selfish request. Since this imposes inconvenience and restriction, I intend to grant as many of the bride’s wishes as possible. Of course, duties must still be fulfilled.”

Otto: “And by duties, you mean…”

Jacques-Rosé: “Naturally, the role of the Blood Bride—that is, to accept the blood that flows through your pure bodies.”

Standing beyond the iron bars, Jacques-Rosé proudly puffed out his sturdy chest.

The black attire wrapping his mighty frame resembled formal wear, perhaps his way of dressing up for the occasion, carefully chosen to honor the assembled bride candidates.

Though his methods were exceedingly poor, Jacques-Rosé appeared innately earnest by nature. It seemed his actions were not motivated by personal desire, but genuinely out of concern for his clan’s future.

Whether or not his anxieties were grounded in reality, Otto, who had been in the Vollachian Empire for less than half a day, couldn’t be certain.

Otto recognized the current Emperor, Vincent Vollachia, as someone who skillfully managed the Empire, notorious for constant conflict, to forge the present tranquility.

Naturally, perspectives between insiders and outsiders would differ.

If the Empire’s citizens claimed the Emperor’s reign had reached its limit and showed signs of collapse, such a possibility couldn’t be ruled out.

However, Jacques-Rosé’s paranoia was also a significant possibility.

Otto: “Is the Empire’s future really so bleak?”

Jacques-Rosé: “His Excellency the Emperor is remarkably capable. However, our senses as beings who willingly dwell in darkness, even during daylight, are acute. The curtain of night approaches.”

Otto: “Thus, the Bat People must unite. Hence the Blood Bride?”

Jacques-Rosé: “Long ago, when fierce winds of war ravaged the Empire, our ancestors, the Bat People, boasted unparalleled strength. That strength was only possible due to the presence of the Blood Master, who led our bloodline, and the Blood Bride who supported him. We shall reclaim the strength of those ancient times."

Jacques-Rosé declared powerfully, pupils narrowing within his purple eyes.

The faint creaking sound of bones indicated the sharpening of two prominent canine teeth inside his mouth. This shift toward a body adapted for combat, distinct from beastification, represented individual differences among demi-humans. In other words, Otto could confidently state—

Regardless of the Empire's actual state, Jacques-Rosé's strength alone was undoubtedly genuine.

Otto: "That's even worse…"

He couldn't entirely deny the possibility of paranoia, yet clearly understood the speaker was powerful.

Since attempting to deceive him posed the danger of violence, Otto hesitated to spin any more elaborate lies.

"…"

Fortunately, Jacques-Rosé's penchant for talking allowed Otto to prolong the conversation unintentionally. However, Otto's ingrained merchant instincts accurately grasped Jacques-Rosé's strength and had already raised a white flag concerning any chance of escape.

Considering the Bat People's nature, their excellent night vision and extraordinarily acute hearing made things even worse.

Even Otto, who typically devised solutions using his Divine Protection of the Soul of Language, couldn't risk carelessly opening his mouth—even if speaking incomprehensible words—due to the risk involved.

His capture was unfortunate, but his inability to escape was purely due to the strength of his opponent. The worst possible compatibility.

At this rate, if unluckily forced into marriage, the marriage would certainly end disastrously.

Otto: “…Incidentally, how do you select a bride?”

Jacques-Rosé: “When I see someone suitable, I’ll naturally know… or so I’ve heard. Right now, I’m waiting for my younger brothers to return with candidates, but I’ve already set my heart on someone.”

Otto: “…Might I hear more details?”

Jacques-Rosé: “Don’t behave so shamelessly.”

Jacques-Rosé’s heated gaze from beyond the bars made Otto envision a marital life destined to collapse on the wedding night.

Otto desperately hoped Jacques-Rosé’s brothers would delay returning, thus postponing any decision. But as soon as he wished for it, Otto realized his mistake.

In the first place, when he had first caught Jacques-Rosé’s eye, it was right after praying for no further trouble—.

Bat Guard: “—Jacques-Rosé.”

Almost simultaneously, as Otto cursed his luck, a bat-person guard arrived at the location where the kidnapped victims were gathered. Hearing the call, Jacques-Rosé raised his head.

Jacques-Rosé: “Call me Blood Master.”

Bat Guard: “Understood. Blood Master, Jaggi and the others have returned. They’ve brought brides.”

Jacques-Rosé: “I see, they've returned. However, use your words correctly. They're merely bride candidates, not brides yet. Though I doubt they’ll meet my standards, my brothers finally seem to be recognizing their duties as siblings of the Blood Master…”

Bat Guard: “And they've brought back three.”

Jacques-Rosé: “Three?! W-Well, they’ve developed a greater sense of duty than I’d expected. I’m delighted.”

Jacques-Rosé cleared his throat, calming himself after receiving a report exceeding his expectations.

Jacques-Rosé: “But I won’t give preferential treatment just because my brothers chose them. What matters is whether they match our ancient blood. The quality of a Blood Bride depends not on numbers, but on blood and resolve.”

Bat Guard: “Indeed. …Be careful, Jacques-Rosé.”

Jacques-Rosé: “I told you, call me Blood Master. …What do you mean, careful?”

Jacques-Rosé corrected him, tilting his head at his companion’s vague words. The guard, who had already seen the bride candidates, lowered his voice.

Guard: “Earlier, you told me to use correct terms.”

Jacques-Rosé: “Yes, I did. But—”

Guard: “I was using correct terms. …What’s coming is a bride.”

At those clearly definitive words, Jacques-Rosé knitted his thick eyebrows.

Jacques-Rosé: “—Ah.”

Jacques-Rosé slightly twitched his nose, immediately raising his head in shock. His expression conveyed amazement, astonishment, and finally joy.

Otto couldn’t grasp the meaning of Jacques-Rosé’s reaction. However, the answer soon became clear even to Otto.

That was—

Jagi & Moses: “—Big bro, we’re back.” “That's right.”

Two young boys, still young yet bearing some resemblance to Jacques-Rosé, appeared, accompanied by three figures behind them—especially catching the attention of Jacques-Rosé and the Bat People was a tall woman.

A beautiful woman with long, golden hair and jewel-like emerald eyes. Seeing her, Jacques-Rosé's purple eyes instantly turned bloodshot.

Jacques-Rosé: "You… are…"

Frederica: "It is my pleasure to meet you. —My name is Frederica."

With a graceful bow in an unfamiliar attire yet familiar elegant posture, Frederica Baumann's appearance completely changed the atmosphere in the cave.

Otto breathed a deep sigh of relief at this change, even if it wasn't wholly clear whether it was entirely welcome or not.

Otto: "After continuously drawing bad hands, has my luck finally turned…?"

He weakly relaxed the corners of his mouth, feeling the collapse of his doomed marriage recede.

10

Led by the brothers Jaggi and Moses, the group arrived at a cave cleverly hidden within a rocky cliff, deep in a forest not far from the town of Mozotto.

Jagi & Moses: "Finding natural caves like these is a specialty of eight or nine outta every ten batfolk." "Damn straight."

Emilia: "Another cave…"

As the brothers proudly boasted, Emilia muttered anxiously while looking at the cave.

Her reaction was understandable. After all, not even half a day had passed since they entered the Empire guided by the molefolk.

Considering they had spent more than two days traversing through the Everlasting Darkness, being reluctant to dive back into another cave so soon was perfectly reasonable.

Emilia: “Ah, no, it's fine. During Musica and everyone else's situation, we made Lady Petra push herself too hard. This time, I'll make sure it doesn’t happen again.”

However, Emilia didn't try to hide the cause of her anxiety, earnestly addressing Frederica and the others.

Frederica shared Emilia’s sentiment, deeply reflecting upon how Petra—who had remained at the inn with Beatrice—had pushed herself.

Their immediate goal now was rescuing Otto, who was prone to reckless actions just as much as Petra, before he inadvertently became the third person to be marked by an Oath Curse.

Garfiel: “Relax. No matter what happens, I won’t let nobody lay a finger on ya.”

Frederica: “…Yes, that’s reassuring.”

Frederica nodded to her younger brother, who was confidently pounding his fists together in front of his chest.

Truthfully, Frederica had strong reservations about this plan. Still, they had the enthusiastic endorsement of Jaggi and the others, as well as the pressing need to avoid unnecessary chaos.

Ironically, the very measures taken to ensure that had led Frederica to regard Garfiel with a complicated look—

Garfiel: “—It's Garnet.”

Declaring that without a hint of hesitation or change in his tone, Garnet—or rather, Garfiel introduced himself proudly.

Frederica had given her own name, Emilia had introduced herself as

"Emily," and when it came to Garfiel’s turn, he confidently gave this name.

Currently, Garfiel was wearing an overcoat provided by Frederica, attempting to hide his physique and face as much as possible. Honestly speaking, aside from his small stature and pretty eyes, his appearance couldn’t convincingly be called crossdressing or even feminine. Nonetheless, he had managed to bluff his way here.

Normally, such a disguise wouldn't hold up. They should have convinced Emilia—who proposed this idea—to reconsider. But just this once, it worked.

—Because Frederica's Rareblood was depriving the batfolk of their normal judgment.

Jacques-Rosé: “…”

Jacques-Rosé, the large man staring fixedly at Frederica, had to be the representative of their kin in this cave—judging by how Jaggi and Moses had called him "brother."

His gaze completely ignored Emilia and Garfiel, who had just introduced themselves, instead remaining locked intently upon Frederica.

Though it was fortunate that Garfiel's amateur disguise wasn’t discovered—

Jacques-Rosé: “…”

The way Jacques-Rosé’s stare penetrated Frederica felt unpleasantly like he was scrutinizing the blood flowing beneath her skin. Frederica understood well enough that her appearance wasn't merely cute or pretty, but she didn’t dislike compliments about her looks or attire.

Of course, compliments on her work ethic or character weren’t unwelcome either.

However, being valued for her blood gave her a sensation entirely different from being praised for her long hair or her beautiful emerald-green eyes.

Jacques-Rosé: “—Incredible, just as I heard! I knew that once I encountered the right person, I would recognize her at first glance…!”

Frederica: “Umm, is…that so?”

Jacques-Rosé: “Frederica, the blood flowing within you is fragrant and fresh. Without a doubt, you are the Blood Bride that we, my kin, have been searching for all this time!”

Dropping onto one knee, Jacques-Rosé proclaimed passionately, his eyes bloodshot.

From Jaggi, Moses, and the other batfolk covering their mouths in surprise, Frederica vaguely realized how passionate Jacques-Rosé’s proposal had been.

He’d probably praised her immensely. However, none of it resonated with her.

It felt oddly like being complimented for having breath that turned white in the cold—a trait certainly related to her, yet one for which she couldn’t claim any personal credit.

Of course, given the batfolk’s cultural habit of licking blood, Frederica understood this was likely considered the greatest possible expression of love.

Frederica: “Um, Jacques-Rosé-sama, I…”

Jacques-Rosé: “Then, let us send the other bride candidates back. Jaggi, Moses, help return them home. Treat them courteously. They are now our important guests.”

Jaggi & Moses: “Jacques-Rosé-sama!”

Jacques-Rosé: “Naturally, Frederica, you are special. You're not a guest, but my Blood Bride to be welcomed… Ah, yes, Audrey. Sorry for getting your hopes up.”

Swiftly rising, Jacques-Rosé moved things along briskly. The moment he set his eyes on Frederica, he immediately acted to send back the other kidnapped victims.

Frederica raised her voice at Jacques-Rosé's stubbornness, but upon hearing his remark towards the jail behind him, she, Emilia, and the others tilted their heads simultaneously and said: “"Audrey?"“

In the cage behind Jacques-Rosé, a figure was captured similarly to the other abductees. That "Audrey" turned out to be—

Frederica: “O-Otto-sama?!”

Otto: “…No, I’m Audrey.”

Frederica: “How can you say that so calmly! …Ah, I see, that's what’s going on here?”

Within the cage, waving weakly, was Otto—the very reason Frederica’s group had come here.

Realizing Otto’s safety—and the fact he had indeed been kidnapped—Frederica sagged with relief, quickly comprehending why Otto referred to himself as "Audrey."

He'd clearly been kidnapped by mistake as a woman and had been carefully hiding his true identity.

Frederica: “But really, Garf calling himself Garnet, and now Otto-sama calling himself Audrey…”

Otto: “Ha ha ha, what an unpleasant coincidence. Let’s all forget this the moment we escape.”

Otto responded to Frederica's astonishment with a dry laugh and earnest pleading.

Previously, Garfiel and Otto had used these aliases when crossdressing for certain complicated circumstances. Now they’d again resorted to those same disguises. Imagining Subaru joining them again in crossdressing was a disturbing joke to entertain.

At any rate—

Jacques-Rosé: “According to tradition, the Blood Bride has been found. Now, all that remains is to perform the wedding between myself—the Bloodlord—and my bride…”

Emilia: “—That's enough.”

Jacques-Rosé: “Mh?”

Interrupting Jacques-Rosé's determined speech, Emilia, slender and resolute, stepped between them and stared up at him fiercely.

Clad in a robe that disrupted recognition, her hood mimicking cat ears making her adorably charming, Emilia’s serious gaze caused Jacques-Rosé to furrow his thick brows.

Jacques-Rosé: “Frederica's companion, hm? If you're with Frederica, then perhaps you should participate in the ceremony.”

Emilia: “Yes, I'd reaaally love to attend a wedding. But only if the bride and groom are looking towards the same future, promising to be happy together.”

Jacques-Rosé: “That is…”

Emilia: “Are your brides truly satisfied with your methods? Before Frederica arrived, the others were constantly weeping. Even Otto-kun…”

Otto: “Audrey!”

Emilia: “Even Audrey!”

Jacques-Rosé stroked his chin thoughtfully, displeased by Emilia's forcefulness.

Emilia: “I don't like traditions that hurt others, and I’m not alone in that. Jaggi and Moses, your brothers, think the same.”

Jacques-Rosé: “What? You two, is that true?”

Jacques-Rosé’s fierce glare intimidated Jaggi and Mose, who were supported from behind by Garfiel.

Jaggi & Moses: “Th-That's right, big bro. This ain't right after all!” “Yeah, seriously…”

Jacques-Rosé: “…Was this your doing?”

Emilia: “Don’t call it plotting. We properly talked it out!”

Jacques-Rosé: “Silence—!!”

Jacques-Rosé's roar bore down on Emilia, but she stood firm, bravely meeting his oppressive presence head-on.

Emilia: “You can't intimidate me like that. If I backed down now, I'd be letting Jaggi and Moses down after they worked up their courage.”

Jacques-Rosé: “—Kh.”

Emilia: “Instead of shouting and pushing us away, let's talk it through properly. Jaggi and Moses said they were helping you find a bride because you needed one. That's…”

Otto: “—To prepare for the impending collapse of the Empire, apparently.”

Emilia's earnest inquiry was answered by Otto, who had spent the most time conversing with Jacques-Rosé here.

Having seemingly spent considerable time with Jacques-Rosé as "Audrey," Otto lifted his chin from within the cage and spoke:

Otto: “A major upheaval is approaching the Empire. For that time, they want to regain the strength the batfolk once possessed. That's what he said he believes.”

Emilia: “The batfolk’s past strength… Ah, that’s why you restarted the old custom of marriage by abduction?”

Jacques-Rosé: “—Traditions become traditions for a reason, and they have their benefits.”

Emilia widened her eyes at the realization, and Jacques-Rosé didn't deny her conclusion. The large man acknowledged the reason behind commanding his brothers and fellow batfolk to gather candidates for the Blood Bride.

Emilia: “But, I heard the Empire is reaaally peaceful now. There hasn’t been any major conflict for years.”

Jacques-Rosé: “I said the collapse draws near. An imbalanced scale will inevitably lose equilibrium. When that happens, the water in the suspended vessel will overflow.”

Garfiel: “That's why ya want a Blood Bride, huh?”

Jacques-Rosé’s aim was preparation for the impending collapse of the Empire—actions taken to protect his clan.

Had it been a shallow excuse, Frederica would’ve dismissed it as nonsense. Ironically, the sheer absurdity of the claim gave it an odd credibility.

Jacques-Rosé’s intentions might genuinely be sincere.

But still—

Frederica: “On what basis do you believe the Empire’s order will collapse?”

Jacques-Rosé: “A batfolk's intuition.”

Frederica: “…Intuition?”

Jacques-Rosé: “Don’t underestimate it, Frederica. Especially my intuition—it’s incredibly keen.”

Emilia: “But Jaggi and Moses were caught pretty easily…”

Jacques-Rosé: “That’s because my brothers are only half-fledged batfolk!”

When he began adding exceptions, it became unclear how much to trust Jacques-Rosé's words.

But it seemed the stubborn Jacques-Rosé had no intention of retracting his opinion or reconsidering through discussion. His convictions were exceedingly strong.

If this continued, Frederica feared Emilia might settle the matter by freezing the entire cave along with the batfolk.

But that quiet worry of Frederica's—

Garfiel: "—Batfolk intuition and traditions, huh? Sounds like a load of vague stuff yer holdin' onto dearly."

—was cut off by Garfiel, who clicked his fangs together and shed the coat he wore.

Though barely qualifying as crossdressing, his clearly masculine form now revealed caused Jacques-Rosé's eyes to flicker with surprise. But the true shock came immediately after.

Garfiel pointed at Jacques-Rosé with a "Yo",

Garfiel: "Why ya so attached ta traditions? What good comes from clingin' to 'em?"

Jacques-Rosé: "…Once, the batfolk were feared warriors worth a thousand men. That was when we were strongest. By observing past traditions and welcoming the Blood Bride—"

Garfiel: "Ya think ya can reclaim yer glory days and become invincible again? —Sounds interestin'."

Again clicking his fangs, Garfiel squared off with the taller Jacques-Rosé, glaring fiercely. Despite claiming interest, Garfiel showed no amusement on his face.

The two men faced off fiercely, primal ferocity radiating from both.

Garfiel: "Ya lick her blood, and that makes ya a super-strong batfolk?"

Jacques-Rosé: “Not just anyone’s blood. It must be the Blood Bride's—specifically, Frederica’s in this case. A blood beauty like her is exactly the existence I've been searching for.”

Frederica: “Ugh, that feels subtly unpleasant…”

Jacques-Rosé spread his arms, attempting a gesture of warmth, but clearly misunderstanding direction. Garfiel, standing before Frederica, let out a scoff.

Garfiel: “Fine then. I'll give ya the blood ya want so badly.”

Emilia: “Garfiel?”

Frederica: “Hold on, Garf! What are you saying? I…”

Emilia and Frederica immediately reacted to Garfiel’s rash declaration.

They had already been uneasy using Frederica’s blood as bait to lure Jaggi and Moses. The idea of directly having it licked—even indirectly—was deeply uncomfortable.

Yet—

Otto: “—You must have some kind of plan, correct?”

Quietly, Otto, still confined within the cage, questioned Garfiel.

Receiving the inquiry, Garfiel shrugged and replied “‘Course I do”,

Garfiel: “Once someone realizes they’ve been relyin’ on the wrong thing, they'll start listenin' ta others. “Thus Spoke Garfiel Tinzel,” as they say.”

11

—Garfiel's actions and their outcome were clear and straightforward, and thus impossible to distort.

Persuaded by Emilia and Otto, Frederica offered her blood to Jacques-Rosé—her own blood, called Rareblood—thus fulfilling Garfiel's wish.

To be frank, Frederica cared little for the special value attributed to her blood.

But seeing Jacques-Rosé’s vigor surge through his body after licking the blood, visibly enlarging his tall frame, she could understand the reasoning behind his insistence that the legendary, invincible Bat People required a Bride of Blood to fulfill their potential.

However—

Jacques-Rosé: “—Gah, guh!”

His face pummeled by a fist, Jacques-Rosé lay collapsed on his back, thoroughly defeated.

The Bat People's Blood Lord, whose face now bore the imprint of Garfiel’s fist, and whose proud nose and fangs were broken, had fully activated his body by absorbing the Rareblood, reaching a state surpassing perfection.

Jacques-Rosé himself had proudly declared he felt lighter than ever before in his life. He surely must have believed himself to have reached the legendary level of the Blood Lord spoken of among Bat People.

Yet, it took just a single punch from Garfiel, who had requested the fight, to silence him.

Garfiel: “If just followin' tradition gave ya power strong enough to weather the Empire’s chaos, the world wouldn't be half as complicated as it is.”

Garfiel, who’d defeated his opponent in one strike, spoke these words without any of the joy typical of a victor.

The Bat People, who'd gone so far as to attempt a "kidnap marriage" to recreate their legend, witnessed firsthand both the revival and the crushing of their legendary strength. Garfiel’s fist had delivered the ultimate rebuttal.

Frederica, too, found herself speechless at her younger brother’s astonishing growth.

Frederica: “He claimed strength was all he had going for him, but…”

During the commotion around the Sanctuary, Frederica had been greatly impressed by Garfiel’s prowess when he repelled the attackers at the mansion. Yet, at that time, she'd been more overwhelmed by their reunion after more than a decade, and even during subsequent training as a warrior in their camp, she hadn’t seen such drastic growth.

However, in the deadly battles in the Watergate City she’d heard about, Garfiel had clearly broken through his limits.

Frankly, Frederica knew she stood no chance against Jacques-Rosé after he’d tasted the blood.

Yet Garfiel had effortlessly defeated that same Jacques-Rosé, literally with one hand.

Jaggi & Moses: “Brooo! Are you alive?!” “Yeah, hang in there!”

For several seconds, everyone was dumbfounded by the result. Then, snapping out of it, Jaggi and Moses frantically rushed toward their fallen brother. Lifting him, they desperately called out to Jacques-Rosé, who groaned, blood dripping from his broken nose and teeth, eyes unfocused.

Jacques-Rosé: “I… I am…”

Garfiel: “It’s my win.”

Jacques-Rosé: “—Ah.”

His consciousness, fractured by the devastating blow, returned to reality upon hearing this declaration. His violet eyes focused on Garfiel standing over him, fist outstretched.

Seeing that fist, Jacques-Rosé understood clearly his own and his ideals’ defeat.

Jacques-Rosé: “…Was my capacity insufficient? Or perhaps strength is always doomed to be crushed by greater strength?”

He’d followed tradition, found the Bride of Blood, and became the strongest among the Bat People—only to suffer defeat. To Jacques-Rosé, who worried deeply about the future of his bloodline and had sought power, this defeat must have felt like the deepest despair.

In response to Jacques-Rosé’s muttered words, Garfiel narrowed his eyes slightly.

Garfiel: “No matter how much ya cling ta tradition, there's a limit. Don’t rely on shortcuts or easy paths. — My fists didn’t get this strong by takin' it easy.”

Jacques-Rosé: “Ah…”

Saying this, Garfiel opened his clenched fist, placing his hand above Jacques-Rosé. A soft glow flowed from it, beginning to heal Jacques-Rosé’s injuries.

Feeling the pain fade due to the healing magic, Jacques-Rosé blinked in disbelief.

Jacques-Rosé: “Why… are you…?”

Garfiel: “My name’s Garfiel Tinzel. Same as you, I was once a fool who got smacked down for tryin' ta shoulder everything alone.”

Jacques-Rosé: “A fool…”

Jacques-Rosé whispered weakly, being healed. Gazing at his hands, he faced the reality of his ideals and envisioned future crumbling before his eyes.

For someone who sought strength for his race to the point of relying on superstitious tradition, this defeat had undoubtedly carved a permanent wound upon his soul.

Cruelly, though, it meant the kidnappings would cease. In exchange, the Bat People’s future appeared bleak. The Empire’s uncertain future loomed large, and the path forward had vanished like dew.

And yet—

Jacques-Rosé: “This is all because I… was weak…”

Garfiel: “Yeah, yer weak. — So just get stronger.”

As Jacques-Rosé cursed himself, Garfiel’s voice overlapped with his. The Blood Lord’s eyes widened at these words.

Jacques-Rosé looked up at Garfiel, eyes wide with surprise, unable to believe what he'd just heard.

Jacques-Rosé: “Get stronger? Even with the Bride of Blood’s help, I couldn’t beat you…”

Garfiel: “Strength ain't just about raw muscle, ya know? If it were, the strongest guy I know would be absolute garbage.”

Emilia: “Garfiel, you shouldn't speak like that. Subaru would cry if he heard you.”

Chided gently for his comment, Garfiel shrugged his shoulders with a slight grimace. But the fierce irritation he'd shown earlier had vanished from his rough smile.

His gaze at Jacques-Rosé held the warmth reserved for a kindred spirit.

Garfiel: “I already said, didn’t I? I used ta be just like you. But now my muscles're pretty good, and the kind of strength the cap'n measures ain't so bad either. There's more than one kind of strength.”

Jacques-Rosé: “…”

Garfiel: “You've got the futures of your brothers and your bloodline on your shoulders. I get why you're desperate. Not wantin' ta rely on anyone, feelin' ya can't trust anybody with it—all that crap.”

There was a risk Jacques-Rosé might be overwhelmed by the harshness of Garfiel's blunt words. But Frederica, along with Emilia and Otto, didn't interrupt.

Because Garfiel’s words held no intent to demean Jacques-Rosé.

Those words undeniably came from Garfiel’s own heart. Words born from his own struggles, doubts, suffering, and determination, culminating in a single answer.

At the moment that answer was conveyed, Garfiel’s expression mixed embarrassment with pride.

After all—

Jacques-Rosé: “The strongest guy I know asks for help when he's in trouble. He reaches out to help when someone else is hurtin’. He never leaves anyone alone, never lets anyone be left alone.

Recently, I finally figured out how ta put that into words."

Jacques-Rosé: "That's…"

Garfiel: "It might not fit the Empire's way. But what's the point clingin' ta an Empire's tradition that's about ta break anyway?"

With a wink, Garfiel withdrew his outstretched hand. Jacques-Rosé's face was healed, his broken nose repaired and small new fangs growing back in.

His eyes regained focus, and his brothers wiped away the blood from their astonished leader's face.

Jaggi & Moses: "Bro, we might not be the most reliable, but…"
"Yeah, that's right."

Jaggi and Moses grabbed hold of Jacques-Rosé's sleeves, shame-faced over how they'd abandoned thought, believing obedience was for their brother's sake.

The other Bat People, too, gathered around their Blood Lord as he sat on the ground, calling his name—"Jacques-Rosé".

Looking around at the faces of his blood kin, Jacques-Rosé sucked in a breath, and then—

Jacques-Rosé: "…I told you to call me Blood Lord."

Spoken in a tone that regarded his earlier defeat and bleak outlook just a bit more lightly, Jacques-Rosé proclaimed his pride as their Blood Lord once more.

From Jacques-Rosé's words, and the Bat People's response, Frederica could tell that what Garfiel had wanted to convey had gotten through.

Jacques-Rosé: "Garfiel, was it? My defeat… no, all of us have lost. We'll return the women we brought safely to their homes. Let's call off the resurrection of the ancient Bat People."

With his kin at his back, Jacques-Rosé knelt on one knee and looked up at Garfiel.

Unlike when he'd been intoxicated by the discovery of a Bride of Blood, this time, he'd reaffirmed his stance and decided himself to return the candidates of "kidnap marriage" back to their homes.

And on top of that, Jacques-Rosé's eyes gleamed as he continued,

Jacques-Rosé: "In place of our traditions, I wish to accept Frederica as my bride. …I can hardly imagine meeting a woman surpassing her in the future."

Frederica: "That is, of course, a great honor. However…"

Though his declaration wasn't laced with desperation or neediness, it did touch Frederica's heart more than before. Still, it wasn't enough to sway her into sincere consideration.

Frederica: "There are surely many women greater than myself. Though I am flattered by how highly you regard me based on your values…"

This wasn't something Frederica sought to be praised for. Moreover, she had more pressing duties with those she loved than to choose a partner from some dramatic encounter.

And so, Frederica politely declined his proposal, prompting Garfiel to step up beside her and speak bluntly as he grabbed her shoulder, roughly positioned at his head's height.

Garfiel: "This here's my Sis. I ain't handin' her over to some half-assed guy. At the very least, not to anyone weaker than my amazin' self."

Frederica: "Garf!"

Grinding his fangs, Garfiel threw that challenge at Jacques-Rosé and the others. Frederica, flashing her sharp fangs in protest, scolded her unreasonable little brother.

As she had already stated, she had no intention of accepting Jacques-Rosé's proposal. But after witnessing the earlier fight, Garfiel’s terms were far too demanding.

Frederica: “Are you trying to doom me to a life of eternal singleness?”

Garfiel: “Hah! Better that than lettin’ some weakling marry my Sis.”

At Garfiel’s shameless reply, Frederica rubbed her brow with her fingers. And as she did, it didn’t feel all that unpleasant—just a bit complex, mixed with relief that things had finally settled.

12

Emilia: “Garfiel is at that age where he wants to rely on his big sister. He’s reaaally cute.”

It had been quite a harrowing incident, but, according to Emilia, that was how she summed it up.

In truth, they really had been lucky. The goal of the “bridal kidnapping” had been earnest; the bat-folk led by Jacques-Rosé possessed at least a modicum of decency; there had been someone able to calm the abducted women so they did not plunge into utter chaos; and there had been a pair of strong arms willing to crush tradition underfoot.

If even one of those gears had slipped, none of this would have come together.

Frederica: “I did not take offense at Garf’s words, but the outcome is not cute at all.”

The decisive blow that put an end to Jacques-Rosé’s courtship had been Garfiel’s remark, but were Frederica to take Emilia’s impression at face value and remain unmarried for life, it would be truly pitiable.

Frederica, too, wished for a happy marriage—though no specific partner sprang to mind.

Frederica: “At the very least, I would prefer they look at me, not at my blood.”

Otto: “For someone like you, Miss Frederica, I do not believe you would have any trouble finding a partner.”

Frederica: “I wonder. I am hesitant to take a gentleman’s flattery at face value.”

Like many of the women, Otto had been rescued from the bat-folk’s clutches. Frederica responded to his praise with an ambiguous smile, smoothing her long blond hair.

Embarrassing though it was to admit, Frederica had been courted before. Yet, as a maid serving Roswaal and Annerose, her dealings with outsiders were frequent, and lately she had often been targeted for her Rareblood.

Frankly, if she could swap out her blood and be rid of that “Rareblood,” she would.

Emilia: “But you used the blood you don’t really like and rescued Otto. I’m thinking that…”

Otto: “You are thinking, ma’am?”

Emilia: “I’ve suffered because of my hair, my eye colour, because of how I was born. But if I didn’t have those, I don’t think I could be with Subaru and… with everyone now.”

Emilia fumbled for words as she tried to convey what she meant.

It was the pleasant worry born of her wish not to trouble anyone and her straightforward desire to share her feelings properly.

It was a considerate, delightful thought—far too good an ending for an affair whose closing act had been Garfiel knocking out bat-folk who had mistaken Otto for a woman and despaired of the future.

Garfiel: “Buut it’s good, Otto-bro. Ya almost got made somebody’s bride by mistake. Would’ve been crazy, comin’ lookin’ for the cap'n and endin’ up like that.”

Otto: “Indeed, truly so. I could already foresee the collapse of that married life, so your arrival saved me, Garfiel.”

Emilia: “Right, really. If Subaru heard that Otto-kun was almost made into a bride, he’d be reaaally shocked, too.”

Otto: “Er, the one who was clearly proposed to was Miss Frederica, so rather than making this about me, should we not call it Miss Frederica’s bride commotion?”

Emilia: “Eh? But…”

With his inherent mental toughness, Otto was ready to forget the wrong done to him. Yet, trying to switch the story that would be told later would surely never fly.

After all, it had begun with Otto’s abduction and their move to rescue him.

Still, of those present, only Frederica could spare a thought for Otto’s feelings.

Frederica: “Very well—when we re-join Master Dudley and the others, I shall report it thus. Naturally, when we meet Lord Subaru as well.”

Otto: “I am indebted to you, Miss Frederica.”

Frederica: “Yes, do feel indebted to your heart’s content.”

When Frederica gathered up the blame, Otto’s shoulders visibly lightened.

Emilia still looked puzzled—“It feels kinda weird, though…”—but with repetition she would surely accept it. Garfiel might tease Otto about it from time to time, however.

Frederica: “However, regarding the calamity of the Empire Jacques-Rosé mentioned—”

Otto: “Should we consider it merely a pessimistic forecast, or…? Given the circumstances, I was unable to ask the women in the other cages."

Garfiel: "Even before Otto-bro vanished, when I went askin' around town, I couldn't dig up any story like that, ya know?"

Changing the subject brought them back to the question: Jacques-Rosé and the bat-folk had been driven to crime by a vague anxiety about the Empire's future.

Jacques-Rosé had said it would be soon—yet was it truly close at hand? If so, Frederica and the others would not remain untouched.

Jacques-Rosé: "When the coming calamity arrives, we bat-folk will overcome it together as one. If necessary, call on us anytime—us bat-folk will rush to your side."

Those had been Jacques-Rosé's words, not to curry favor with Frederica, but brimming with gratitude for having his twisted nature literally beaten straight.

Frederica thought it best that they never have to rely on that strength.

Even so, the future was not bright for Jacques-Rosé and his people, reformed though they were.

Given the scale of their deeds, even if the victims returned home safely, matters would hardly end neatly. The Vollachian Empire's way of dealing with crime was unknown, but harsh punishment was a real possibility.

Yet—

Emilia: "The Emperor of Vollachia is working hard to keep the country peaceful, right? Then I'm sure he'll listen to Jacques-Rosé and the others' story, too."

Seeing Emilia believe so firmly in a bright future made Frederica want to believe as well.

True, the Empire's long-standing peace might have been maintained by blood-soaked methods Emilia could never imagine…

Otto: "However, while we are searching for Natsuki-san, we have no need to fear that right now."

Though he reached the same conclusion, Otto had no intention of sharing it with Emilia. His words were cool yet reassuring—enough to make one forgive today's blunder.

Not that the blunder belonged only to Otto; in truth, it was shared by everyone present.

Garfiel: "Still, bringin' Otto-bro back safe is great, but I ain't lookin' forward ta tellin' Petra and Beatrice. My head hurts just thinkin' about it, ya know."

Frederica felt the same as Garfiel, who scratched his head roughly.

Petra, who had repressed her impatience and stayed at the inn, must be trusting that they would bring back some clue to Subaru's whereabouts.

If they returned late and with no leads, how crushed would she be?

With such worries weighing on them, they headed back to the inn—

Petra: "—Everyone, it's terrible! "Natsumi Schwartz" has appeared!"

Petra, who had been waiting at the front desk for their return, blurted this the moment she saw them, freezing everyone's thoughts.

Emilia: "Eh? Natsumi's in the Empire? Why?"

—No, only Emilia tilted her head in a different kind of surprise.

Because she alone did not know the true meaning of that name, but first they had to confirm Petra's statement.

Frederica: “Natsumi Schwartz, you say? What does that—”

Beatrice: “There is apparently a city called Guaral some way west of here, in fact. The commotion there seems to involve the “black-haired maiden,” Natsumi Schwartz, I suppose.”

Emilia: “Beatrice! Is it all right for you to be awake?”

Beatrice’s explanation shocked the group, especially as she had to “store energy” while separated from Subaru.

Beatrice: “I cannot simply sleep soundly after hearing a story like this, in fact.”

Garfiel: “Yeah, makes sense… But how’d a tale like that reach ya ears, Lady Petra?”

Petra: “I wanted to know even a little about Subaru… but it’s not just that.”

When Garfiel patted Petra’s head in praise, she usually brushed his hand away, yet now she glanced around restlessly.

It felt like a preface to some very bad news.

Frederica: “To begin with, the name Natsumi Schwartz coupled with the epithet “black-haired maiden” is producing a migraine-inducing atmosphere, yet what exactly has happened?”

Petra: “Um, it seems this “black-haired maiden” has captured that city, Guaral.”

Otto: “Captured… a city?”

Petra had chosen her words carefully to soften the blow, but they were too soft; their meaning did not quite reach Frederica and the others.

One normally did not say someone “captured” a city unless—

Garfiel: “I didn’t think he’d stay quiet, but…”

Otto: “What in the world is he doing…?”

Frederica, Garfiel, and Otto all arrived at the same stunned state. Petra and Beatrice must have, too.

Subaru, thought to be in grave trouble after being hurled into the Empire, with luck simply keeping Rem safe—such a simple picture shattered to pieces.

Moreover, capturing a city was outright rebellion against the established order.

Frederica: “Could it be that what Jacques-Rosé spoke of was…?”

Jacques-Rosé had keenly sensed the imminent collapse of Imperial order. Whether it was true or not had been uncertain, yet now it took on sudden reality.

And all because of someone they knew only too well—

Emilia: “Natsumi’s name is…”

Beatrice: “It is Subaru we are talking about, Emilia, I suppose.”

Emilia: “Subaru is?”

Beatrice informed the only one who had not yet caught up—Emilia.

Learning that Natsumi Schwartz was Subaru in disguise would be shocking for Emilia. Though no one had been hiding it, Frederica felt an unreasonable guilt, as though she had shared in the deception.

Yet Emilia clapped her hands. “Oh, I see,” she said, and—

Emilia: “So Subaru is using a different name so he won’t become famous in the Empire. It’s like what Otto-kun and Garfiel did.”

Otto: “Eh?”

Emilia: “Because you two borrowed the names Audrey and Garnet, right? That’s the same as Subaru borrowing the name Natsumi.”

Emilia nodded vigorously, reaching that conclusion with only the information she possessed.

Frederica and the rest exchanged looks—indeed, with Emilia's data, her answer was natural.

And there was little reason to unravel that tangled rope and reveal the truth.

What mattered was—

Emilia: "—Subaru is using a name we can recognise. I think he's telling us where he is."

Frederica, Otto, and the others agreed with her nod.

To be honest, after racing about to rescue the soon-abducted Otto in the Empire they reached by passing through Everlasting Darkness, they were exhausted in body and soul—but—

Emilia: "Tomorrow, once morning comes, let's set out. Umm…"

Beatrice: "Guaral, the fortress city, in fact."

Emilia: "—Yes, to Guaral!"

Emilia clenched her fist and declared.

At last they had information that might bring them closer to the vanished Subaru and Rem. The ominous atmosphere and smell of gunpowder clinging to the Empire made it hard to stay calm, but—

Emilia: "Everything will be fine! We'll all make it back together."

No one had the heart to deny Emilia's powerful declaration.

The rumor they obtained here of the "black-haired maiden" Natsumi Schwartz was indeed about Natsuki Subaru.

However, the fortress city they reached was in the throes of the greatest crisis since its founding, and reunion with Subaru's party was not easily won.

The collapse of Imperial order feared by Jacques-Rosé Blau truly began, shattering the peace of the Vollachian Empire and leading to unrest unparalleled in its history.

Yet—

Emilia: “Wait for us, Subaru, Rem. —We’re all coming!”

The eyes of the party supporting Emilia, who stared firmly ahead, wavered not in the least.

Poltergeist Story

1

Thunder rumbled.

Lightning flashed outside the window, and the magic lamps lighting the mansion went out all at once. It was an ill prank pulled by fate that the moment they got covered in darkness, the cupboard fell and the dishes shattered, making a crashing noise.

Swiftly following the blackout and the continuous sound of destruction, a high-pitched scream was let out.

“Noooo—!!”

The one who had screamed after hearing the final death throes of the dishes was a maid with beautiful long blonde hair. She was slender and tall yet had an attractive figure rich in feminine charms. Her almond-shaped eyes looked like jade gemstones, and her mouth, the origin of said scream, was adorned with a row of beautiful white teeth. However, even though some of her teeth were sharp and giving her a rather ferocious look—

“Eek! Eeeek! It’s a hollow! A hollow is here! Hey, Petra?! Are you okay?! Petra! Ram!”

She was shaking with tears flowing down her face. Her appearance was anything but ferocious, but in fact emphasized the fragile, feminine part of herself.

In the darkness, the woman grabbed a piece of cloth within her reach and desperately pulled it close to her body. “Pe-Pe-Pe-Petra…? Or is it you, Ram? Anyway-Anyway, I’m glad you are safe. We need to get out of here before it’s too late…”

“Sister Frederica?”

“Ha! Petra?! Is that you?”

The woman—Frederica—turned around towards the direction of the voice—but said voice had come from the opposite direction of the person she was holding.

Her pupils narrowed in the darkness, and what appeared was a young, dainty girl. It was a lovely girl wearing a maid outfit with a big ribbon on her head—Petra—the girl whom Frederica adored the most like a younger sister.

Frederica felt relieved after seeing that Petra hadn't been harmed in any way. "Oh, Petra… I'm glad you're safe," she said. "That must mean I have Ram in my arms. She is being quite docile…"

"What are you saying, Frederica? Ram is over here."

"Huh?"

After hearing an unapologetic voice, the owner of said voice appeared next to Petra. It was a girl with short pink hair and a pretty, plucky face. Standing with perfect posture strangely suited her, and it stood true even in the abyssal darkness.

"Oh, oh my, Ram…so you were with Petra. Well, in that case…"

"Yes, Ram was with her—what did you mistake Ram for?"

"I was trying not to think about that…!"

Frederica turned her head with a creaking sound in response to Ram's merciless question. She then looked down at the person she was holding tightly in her arms. Just at that moment, there was a flash of lightning, brightly illuminating a mysterious figure.

It was a doll around the size of a toddler with a missing eyeball. When the doll's single eye met Frederica's, it relaxed its lips and smiled.

"Noooooo!!" Frederica let out a scream, which was just one of many she had let out that day.

It all started two days ago…

“Cleaning the villa and replacing the furniture?” asked Frederica.

“Yes, thaaat’s right,” Roswaal replied with a gentle smile, his hands clasped together on the desk. “I wanted to aaask you three to do that.”

Roswaal directed his gentle smile at the three maids who worked in the mansion. Lined up by height and ordered by size starting with the largest, the three girls were Frederica, Ram, and Petra.

Amongst the three that he had summoned to his room, it was Petra who raised her hand. “A villa… Is that different from the old mansion that burned down?”

“Ah, it’s diiifferent. I liked that mansion though, but…”

“Oh, I’m not asking you, Master. I’m asking them.”

Petra brushed Roswaal, who tried to answer her question, off with a smile, causing Frederica to hold a hand to her forehead. “Petra…”

Even from Frederica’s point of view, Roswaal and Petra’s relationship was shattered into pieces and would be difficult to piece back together. As someone in a subordinate position, her attitude wasn’t all that great, but Roswaal was the one who’d caused her to behave in such a way to begin with.

Roswaal tended to forgive Petra’s attitude and was in a good mood despite her rude response just now. Meaning Frederica could do nothing to correct her behavior.

Even so, Ram, who admired Roswaal, wasn’t all too happy about it, but…

“Ram won’t tolerate such an attitude toward Master Roswaal, Petra.”

“I’m sorry, Sister Ram. But even if I get scolded, I want to make our master feel bad…”

"So you've already made up your mind. It's fine, then. Since it also creates a job that only Ram can do, which is to console Master Roswaal whenever you hurt his feelings."

"Enough with that, you two! Not even I would be able to tolerate it!" scolded Frederica.

Despite their opposing responses to Roswaal, who stood between them, they somehow get along quite well.

Stepping closer to her disgruntled juniors, Frederica said, "Master, don't just enjoy yourself, you need to give her a proper warning. Otherwise, it will cause trouble for me by disturbing the public morals of the mansion. To make matters worse…"

"To make matters worse, aaaand then what?"

"To make matters worse, Sir Subaru and Garf are already disturbing it…"

Frederica thought of the black-haired boy that lived in the mansion and her incompetent younger brother. If you added in the young man in charge of internal affairs, that would be all the men working at Roswaal Manor. They all acted their age, or rather, were a bit immature.

"Mister Otto seems normal," said Frederica, "but he becomes the most dangerous of the three when the other two get involved…"

"Oh, I get what you mean," Petra replied. "Otto has a face saying, I'm perfectly normal, but he says the most menacing things out of the blue."

"Everyone agrees that he is the most dangerous of the bunch," added Ram.

"Oh myyy, I can't ever allow Otto know of what was spoken here todaaay."

The young man, who was being talked about in a place he wasn't present, sneezed at his workplace.

After getting off track… “Anyway.” …Frederica brought the conversation back to the main topic. “It has been a couple of months since we moved to the main residence and we are finally settling in, so what made you want to work on the villa?”

“A most natural question indeed. But the reaaaason isn’t that complicated. It has been several months since the royal selection officially began, and the candidates have each started making their moves, so we can’t afford to get left behind. As for the negotiations with influential people from various areas… I know I am in no position to talk, but there are a looot of nefarious characters in the Western Margrave Domain. Negotiations aren’t going to be easy by any means.”

“—? What does that have to do with the villa…?” Petra wondered.

“It’s simple, Petra,” Ram began. “In short, Master Roswaal and Lady Emilia will soon be going to different places themselves to do things. And for such occasions, it’s better to have as many lodging options as you can get… Fortunately, House Mathers owns villas in various regions, so it’s quite convenient.”

Ram took over Roswaal’s explanation, and Petra nodded after understanding what it meant. “Oh, so that’s how it is…”

Glancing at Petra out of the corner of her eye, Frederica continued. “Well then,” she said. “We’ll start communicating with the various villas in order. Am I correct?”

“Yes, that’s right. For now, I want to get Viscount Torion Arus on our side. So it would be beeest to start with the one closest to his mansion.”

“In that case, would it be the mansion in San Fantrus? It’s a little far though…”

Following Roswaal’s suggestion, Frederica spread the map on the wall on the desk and tried to confirm the villa Roswaal had indicated, but Ram, who was watching from the side, raised an eyebrow. “No, not there,” she declared, then pointed at a forest not too far from their objective. “Here it is.”

“Here?” asked Petra. “But it’s just a forest with nothing marked there, Sister Ram.”

“On a normal map, yes. But an old mansion owned by House Mathers is there. That’s correct, right, Master Roswaal?”

“…Oh myyy, it seems it’s still fresh in your memory despite it being something from around 10 years ago.”

“That’s because Ram has memories of being there with you, Master Roswaal,” answered Ram in her frank manner of speaking, causing Roswaal to lower his eyebrows and give a faint wry smile.

Ram’s speech and conduct haven’t changed over the years, but it seems like Master’s response to it has, thought Frederica. As someone who has known them personally for a long time, I am deeply moved by this, but…we should be talking about the mansion that isn’t on the map.

“I see that it is a mansion that even I do not know about. Well, what is it…”

“You wouldn’t know of it, of course—it’s not a villa, it’s a workshop,” Roswaal explained. “My predecessor used it…but it’s been abandoned for several years now.”

“A workshop, I see,” parroted Frederica, touching her cheek and thinking about it.

Roswaal’s predecessor—Roswaal K. Mathers—was the genius of the century who devoted himself to the development and practical application of magicreation tools that used magic stones as their source of power. Since the head of the Mathers family took on the name of Roswaal generation after generation, their names never changed, and each of them was a genius that displayed remarkable abilities.

“If that’s the case, was anything left behind by your predecessors?” asked Frederica.

“No, anything useful will have been taken ooouut, so it should be completely empty. But its positioning is ideal. I’d be very grateful if I could use it."

"I see, but then we don't really need three peop—" Just as she was about to say that, Frederica guessed what Roswaal's aim was.

If the job was merely cleaning and repairing the old villa, there was clearly no reason for all three maids to go there, Frederica could do it all by herself. However, since he wanted them to do this together, the reason was obvious: it was to get them to learn how to work together.

Including the contrasting attitudes of Ram and Petra towards Roswaal before, the communication between the three maids working at Roswaal Manor was not yet perfect. However, as mentioned above, the royal selection had already begun, so they couldn't just wait around for their trust to deepen.

So by completing the task he gave us, the three of us will learn to work together and strengthen our communication, thought Frederica. "I understand, Master. Please leave this task to us. I will fulfill your wishes, both the obvious and the hidden one!"

"The obvious and the hidden…?"

"Yes, you can count on me!"

Roswaal frowned for a moment at Frederica, who had thumped her chest. But the enthusiastic sentence that followed made him say, "I suppose that's fine," before nodding. "Alriiight then, I'll relay my orders once again: you are to investigate the mansion that used to be my predecessor's workshop, make repairs, and make it habitable by replacing the furniture and tidying it up."

"Yes, sir! Leave it to us!"

With these instructions from Roswaal, the three girls quickly finished their preparations and departed for their destination: the workshop.

3

"So this is the previous Master's mansion?"

Petra blinked as she looked at the completely dilapidated mansion in front of her. It was natural for her to do so, since its appearance starkly contrasted with the other villas owned by House Mathers. The mansion was in the middle of a dense forest, exposed to ivy, weeds, and ravaged by wild animals, and at first glance, it didn't seem like it was currently fit for human habitation.

Nonetheless, the three of them would have to spend the night in said mansion.

"It will rain soon, so going back to the nearest town isn't a realistic option," said Ram.

"Uuh, I'm sorry…" replied Petra sulkily.

"It is not your fault, Petra," Frederica consoled, patting her shoulders to limit the extent of her depression. "That wild bird's cunningness is to blame."

By the time the three of them arrived at the mansion, the sun had already set and it had become dark. They were originally scheduled to arrive during the day, but the reason why this did not happen was written on Petra's downcast face.

"If only I hadn't let the bird steal the luggage…" she lamented.

"Talking about "what-ifs" won't change anything," asserted Ram. "We need to be thankful that you didn't get kidnapped by that cunning bird. Birds like that can easily kidnap children."

"I'm not! I'm not that small! I'm not that much different from you!"

"Ha-Ha, that's right. We're like a speck of dust compared to Frederica."

"A speck of dust is going a bit far! What do you think I am?!"

Frederica raised her voice in response to the absurd claim, which Ram brushed off with an "Alright, alright."

I know that that conversation was to get Petra to not feel unnecessary remorse, but I still think there were other ways to handle it. “Such things about you haven’t changed at all since the olden days…”

“But Sister Ram is right. We can’t go back to the town, can we? So, are we going to stay in this mansion…or rather, what used to be one?”

“I guess so. In this place that used to be a mansion, we have to—” Frederica stopped when she was about to say that they had to spend the night there.

“—? Sister Frederica?” Petra said as she looked up at Frederica by her side, who had become quiet.

Frederica, however, couldn’t respond to Petra right away. She had suddenly come back to her senses as she stared at the dilapidated mansion in front of her. “…A night in this mansion?”

So I have to spend the night here. Frederica faced the reality that she didn’t want to face and froze. Thinking that saying it out loud would only set it in stone, she swallowed, bitterness mixed in with her saliva.

“Yes, we have no other option but to stay here,” Ram declared. “Let’s hurry up and go inside.”

“…R-Ram…How can you just say it so bluntly…”

“What are you making such a fuss about? Could it be that you’re… scared?” Ram quipped, squinting as she lowered her voice.

That gave Frederica goosebumps. “Gh!”

As she involuntarily choked—

“Sister?” Petra said, pulling on her sleeve. “You aren’t scared, are you? Sister Frederica?”

“I-I am not scared! Not at all, it isn’t like that! It’s just that… Um, I only wanted to say that it does not look very safe.”

—It was a lie. She was scared.

Frederica bluffed greatly in front of her beloved sister.

Frederica was basically someone who avoided singing her own praises or pretending to be someone she isn't, but when it came to Petra, whom she adored, it was different. She wanted to be an admirable sister figure for her.

Ram and Garfiel are children who aren't cute at all compared to Petra, she thought. That's why she wanted the cute Petra to see her cool side.

"I'm just not sure if we can survive a night in a rundown mansion that has been abandoned for decades. It would be wiser to find a cave in the woods that's facing a cliff."

"Searching for a cave that we don't even know exists is wiser?" questioned Ram. "Frederica, do you have a fever or something?"

"I-I know! It was just a joke! I didn't mean it! Let's just start chopping the trees over there down and build a cabin for the three of us to live in for a while and…"

"S-Sister? Are you sure you're okay? I think you'll feel better if you sit and rest for a…"

"Arrrgh…!" Her brain, dominated by fear and shame, couldn't come up with a good idea. "It's true that I'm not good at building things. That I couldn't even realize that, is such a…"

"Ram thinks that the problem lies elsewhere, but never mind." She ignored Frederica reflecting upon her words and stared at the exterior of the mansion. She then shrugged lightly and looked back at Petra, not Frederica, who was useless. "After a quick glance, it doesn't look as unfixable as it first appeared. Ram will take care of the luggage, so can you kindly go around back and take a look around?"

"Yes, alright, Sister Ram. So are you going to stay here and rest, Sister Frederica…?"

"No-No, I can't let you go alone. I will accompany you."

I am grateful for their concern, but I can't afford to lose heart here, she thought. Neither can I let Petra act alone in a place that gives me such an ominous feeling.

"—. Can you move?"

"I can move. Who do you think I am? I am the head servant of Margrave Mathers, Frederica Baumann!" she proudly declared, a hand on her well-endowed chest.

Petra clapped, exclaiming, "Big Sister, you are so cool!"

For a split second she felt a questioning gaze from Ram as though saying, "Was there a reason to introduce yourself like that here…?" but Frederica chose to ignore it and rallied herself up.

"Well then, let's get going, Petra. Let's hold hands."

"Huh? Ah, ok, that's right. Let's go, Sister Frederica."

Frederica started walking with Petra, who had grabbed her extended hand and seemed excited. Ram sighed while looking at the two from behind and then got to work.

So, having left Ram at the front, the two headed around the back, only to find themselves in a difficult spot. The back of the villa was several times more eroded than the front, and Frederica's clothing was only intended for cleaning the vacant villa—it was in no way fit for this.

"I didn't think it would be this bad. What should we do…"

"Oh, Sister! Sister!" shouted Petra. "The ivy is soft here, so we can push it aside and get through."

"Oh my, I am surprised that you were able to notice that."

Petra was incredibly proud of herself for checking her surroundings just as they were on the verge of losing their way. "Ehehehe," she giggled cutely at the praise. "It's because I used to play in the forest with Lucas and the others…with my friends…when I was in the village."

“It’s such a different experience… It’s been a long time since I last played in a forest.”

Frederica had left the Sanctuary and started working under Roswaal more than a decade ago. She used to play in the forest with her younger brother Garfiel before that, but that was now a distant memory. I used to throw him around and play with him when all he could do was toddle.

“We shouldn’t be reminiscing right now. Let’s move the ivy and make a path through. Ah, but be sure not to touch the ivy or trees with your bare hands…”

“I’ll be fine. I made sure to wear gloves,” Petra said, presenting her gloved hands to Frederica, who then patted her head.

“You are sharp. I’m impressed.”

With that enthusiasm, Petra swiftly moved the ivy out of the way and created a path to the back of the mansion. “Ah,” she exclaimed upon reaching the back. “…The walls of the mansion got damaged over time, forming a hole here.”

If you looked at it, the hole in the back of the mansion was as big as a child, so it was large enough for Petra, and even Frederica could get through it if she bent down. Whether this was simply the result of the building material being damaged or because wild animals used it to get inside was unclear.

“It’s a house in the middle of the woods, so surely no one is using it… Wait, Petra?”

While Frederica was examining the hole in the mansion, Petra suddenly bent down and slipped right through it.

“Wait, are you alright, Petra?!”

“I’m sorry, Sister Frederica,” apologized Petra. “I’m okay! I just got an urge to go through…”

"Just got an urge… Jeez, this isn't a game."

Hearing that from the other side of the hole made Frederica feel relieved. But it was problematic of her to disappear out of sight.

"We'll close the hole up later, so come back for now…"

"Oh! What was that?!" exclaimed Petra. "I'll go take a quick look."

"Ah, Petra, don't go! Oh, no!" cried Frederica.

Upon finding something of interest, Petra made an exclamation of surprise and then disappeared further in. Frederica admired her courage, but it was an issue that she forgot she was working.

"I guess it can't be helped. But I can't let anything happen to Petra…"

If it had been any smaller, she'd have had to just accept the situation, but the hole was of the right size, so that Frederica could also enter it. After a slight hesitation, she made up her mind and followed Petra through the hole. There was no source of light, so it was just as dark as the forest, but…

"—? What's up with this?" The moment she went inside, Frederica instantly felt the temperature change and tilted her head. It was a strange sensation, as if there was a chill in the dusty air. She couldn't wrap her head around the anomaly since she heard the sound of the floor creaking before she had a chance to investigate it. She figured that whatever was making that sound was someone light and thus naturally assumed that it was Petra.

"Petra, don't do anything rash," Frederica called out. "My heart will not be able to take it."

"…"

"Can you hear me, Petra? Why aren't you replyi…"

The creaking sound got closer and closer, but there was no reply from Petra at all. Frederica frowned and quietly stared into the darkness.

Frederica had cat-people ancestry, meaning she naturally had good night vision. There was nothing she couldn't see—even in the dark of night—if she focused. Therefore, she could clearly see that the thing making the footsteps was not Petra, but another being entirely.

"Huh?"

"..."

For a moment, she thought she was hallucinating—or rather, she hoped she was.

Right after that, she was blinded by a white light. "Argh," she groaned in agony, feeling a numbing pain in her eyes.

The cause was the light, or more specifically, the light from the magic lamps. The magic lamps installed in the mansion had turned on all at once.

"Th-This is..."

"Sister Frederica! The lights are on!"

As Frederica rubbed her eyes due to the sudden brightness, Petra came running towards her. She felt relieved for a moment upon hearing her voice, but then immediately returned to a state of caution. "Petra! Be careful! There was something inside the mansion!"

"What?!"

Petra, who had come running towards her, opened her eyes wide in surprise. Frederica wrapped her arms around her shoulders and pulled her close, then scanned the brightly lit room. It seemed like the hole in the wall was connected to the guest room.

She glanced around the abandoned room. There was an old wardrobe that had seen better days and a bed frame, but what she was searching for was the figure she had just seen. "A doll... It must have been a doll! A doll walking around on its own..."

“Sister? A doll…?”

“There was a doll walking about! Did you not see it?! exclaimed Frederica while shaking Petra, who answered with a shake of her head. That’s impossible, she thought to herself. Shocked, Frederica quickly scanned the room for the doll that she was certain she had seen earlier. She had definitely seen a doll around where she’d heard the footsteps. She couldn’t convince herself that she’d been mistaken.

“Could it have hidden itself somewhere? Under the bed? Or behind the wardrobe?”

Frederica tried to search for it with her sense of smell, but she didn’t know its scent. Not to mention the room, but the entire mansion was filled with the smell of dust. But there was no way to forget seeing such a thing. In an effort to find the doll, she searched haphazardly around the room.

“Sister Frederica, there’s so much dust!” Petra spluttered while coughing.

“Just endure it for now! More importantly, stay close. I’ll protect you no matter—”

“What are you doing?”

In the midst of explaining the importance of the situation to Petra, whose eyes were still watering from her coughing, she was interrupted by a familiar voice. Looking over towards the entrance, her eyes met Ram’s. Baffled, she looked Frederica up and down. Not understanding her puzzled stare, Frederica looked down at herself and let out a gasp. During her panicked search of the room, she’d gotten covered in a thick layer of dust and dirt.

“Seriously, what are you doing, Frederica?” Ram asked, repeating her question.

“Umm… Well…”

“You’re supposed to be setting an example for Petra. How embarrassing.”

At a loss for words due to her sound reasoning, Frederica's face reddened, and then she cast her eyes downwards.

4

"It was really there! I saw it with my own two eyes! So, I am absolutely certain that that doll is…"

"Alright, alright, Ram understands. The doll was there. But it's gone now. That solves it."

"You don't believe me! You don't believe me at all!"

After moving towards the hall, Frederica frantically tried to explain what had happened before. Ram listened, but she didn't seem to believe her at all.

"Uuh. Petra… Petra, you believe me, right?"

"Yes, I believe you. But for now, we need to do something about your clothes and hair rather than worry about that doll…"

Petra gently wiped her dirty hair and ran a comb through it. Frederica was glad that she believed her and shot a glare at Ram.

"What was it then?" asked Ram.

"I don't know, but let's assume that I mistook something else for a doll. It was probably a wild animal or a…"

"Or a doll that moves on its own."

"You-are-such-a…!"

Frederica felt frustrated by Ram mocking her and tried taking a swipe at her, but Ram swiftly moved out of her range. "Sister!" exclaimed Petra as she brushed Frederica's dust-covered hair. "Jeez, stay still. You'll ruin your pretty hair—"

It happened right after Petra said that.

"—Eek?!"

From far away, on the first floor of the mansion, they heard something that sounded like an explosion, making Frederica's shoulders jump.

The noise wasn't the sound of footsteps or a building creaking in the wind. The sound was more clear. It sounded like a burst of air.

"Wh-What was that sound?!" exclaimed Frederica, looking towards where the sound came from.

"It sounded kind of weird," said Petra.

Frederica immediately grabbed Petra's shoulders and stepped back. "Now do you believe me?" she said with a shaky voice, looking over at Ram. "It seems like there is definitely something else here. We need to…"

"—? What are you saying, Frederica? Stop joking."

"Wha…?! You st-stop joking around. At a time like this…"

Ram's words made Frederica doubt herself. Ram, however, was tilting her head. She looked just as indifferent as always, and it didn't seem like she was playing a trick on her.

"Huh-Huh… Petra, you heard it, right?"

"Huh? Ah, yes, I heard it. It was a weird pow sound."

"See! Petra also heard it! Ram, you must've…"

"Ram didn't hear anything like that. Ram doesn't have a reason to tell trivial lies, either. But if you really insist, then we can go check it out." Saying that, Ram took a short breath and placed her foot on the stairs that led to the first floor from the hall.

"Wait!" Frederica shouted, grabbing her sleeve to stop her from doing something reckless. "We-We have no idea what could be up there. If something happens to you, then what am I going to tell Garf?"

"You may tell Garf that Ram went somewhere far far away. As for Master Roswaal, Ram is still thinking about that… Frederica, you're just overreacting."

"No I'm not! Look, even Petra is shaking a lot!"

"Sister, stop, my arms hurt… Ah. Th-That's better."

Petra complained since she was about to be hugged to death. Frederica reluctantly let go of her and hugged Ram instead.

"…What are you doing?"

"There's definitely something in this mansion. The forest is dark at night, but we should get out of here for now. It's necessary for everyone's safety."

"That doesn't answer Ram's question. Why are you hugging Ram?"

"I-I-It's not what you think!" stammered Frederica. "I'm not scared!"

Frederica was unaware that she was spilling the beans herself. While burying Ram in her well-endowed chest, she slowly backed away and headed towards the entrance.

"I'm not scared," said Frederica, trying to convince herself and failing, "but we should head back now. Come on, Petra, there's nothing we can gain from staying here for too long."

As she said this, Frederica pushed the door open in an improper way by using the side of her hips.

And then—

"…"

It was raining cats and dogs outside.

"It's really coming down," Ram observed.

"…"

"The road to the town is going to be quite muddy in this rain," she added.

“No, we can reach it in a flash if I beastify and run with you two on me.”

“Sister Frederica?!” When Frederica started to unbutton her uniform in preparation for her beastification, Petra grabbed her arm. “No, don’t! Please calm down!”

“L-Let go of me, Petra. I do not like beastifying without taking my clothes off! It causes problems for me later since I end up having nothing to wear!”

“No, just don’t transform at all! It’s fine, you have nothing to worry about!”

Upon hearing Petra, who was holding on to her tightly, Frederica couldn’t bear to resort to using force. Watching Petra rebutton her clothes, she sighed deeply. “What should we do…” she wondered.

“Let’s just go ahead and find out what made that noise then,” suggested Petra.

“Th-That noise? Petra, are you serious?”

“Yes!”

Unlike Ram, who seemed to have selective hearing, Petra must have heard the same sound as Frederica. But unlike her, Petra showed no fear.

“I guess this is how it feels to be surpassed by someone younger than you…”

“That’s a really quick declaration of defeat,” said Ram. “Haven’t you only been her mentor for two months?”

“Yes, yes, you are right! There are also those who do not respect their seniors and don’t even try to improve no matter how many years they are taught!” Frederica retorted, glaring at Ram, before turning to Petra in order to confirm her resolve. “But…are you sure, Petra?”

Petra, however, did not change her mind after getting asked a second time, saying, “Yeah, you can leave it to me,” with an energetic thump of her small chest.

She looked up at the first floor of the mansion with eyes full of enthusiasm. “Did the noise from before come from an animal? Or was it made by a hollow… But it could also be a moving doll. It’d be pretty amazing if it was…”

“Petra? Petra? Hey, what’s with that look in your eyes?”

Petra’s eyes sparkled with curiosity as she deduced that the sound was coming from upstairs.

“Wait! Don’t do it, Petra! Wh-What are you doing Ram?! Quick, we need to go after her!”

“With you weighing so much, you’ll only slow Ram down, Frederica.”

“No I don’t! You’re just being mean!”

Following Petra up the stairs, Frederica and an unwilling Ram also headed for the first floor. The uneasiness made Frederica hesitate for a moment, but her love for Petra was stronger. She took forceful steps up the stairs—and then, with a loud crash, the staircase gave in.

“Ha-eek?!” With a scream, Frederica fell through the middle of the stairs.

Frederica’s face instantly turned red, and Ram looked down at her from above. “You weigh too much, Frederica.”

“No, I don’t!!” she yelled, her face red, at Ram, who was looking up at her, before violently pulling herself out.

But falling through the floor had made her lag behind Petra, who had swiftly climbed the stairs.

“All of this and that is happening because… Haa…”

“You sighed again! I have told you many times that I do not weigh that much!" Frederica screamed, getting red in the face.

"Ram has said no such thing," Ram replied, shrugging her shoulders and brushing her off. "There is a limit to how self-conscious a person can be."

Frederica looked towards the hallway of the first floor and searched for Petra, who had gotten there before them. But she couldn't find her. It was possible that she had gone into one of the rooms since she was nowhere to be seen.

"Jeez, is she in one of the rooms?" Petra! Where are…eek?!"

Frederica heard the explosion again the moment she called Petra's name. It was closer this time, from right behind her. She quickly turned around, and her eyes met Ram's, who was holding her elbow.

Looking completely unperturbed, she squinted her pink eyes. "What is it?"

"Yo-Yo-You really can't hear anything? Or are you acting like that on purpose to make me feel anxious?"

"That's a false accusation. Ram doesn't know what you're talking about."

"Uuh…I don't know if you're being serious or not since you usually act this way!"

Despite knowing her for a long time, she couldn't tell whether Ram was being honest or was trying to fool her. That made her feel miserable, and she felt a momentary hatred for her.

"Get out!"

"Eek!"

This time, Frederica clearly heard an unfamiliar voice right after complaining to Ram. She slowly turned her neck, so slow that it felt like it was creaking, towards the source of the voice. But all she saw was a window of the mansion exposed to the wind and rain and slightly shaking.

“N-Now! Now!” stammered Frederica. “You heard a weird voice, right?! It said ‘Get out’!”

“…How arrogant of you. In this weather? You want Ram to get soaked?”

“It wasn’t me! Something else said that!”

“You probably mistook it for wind or something. You are being oversensitive.”

“And aren’t you being too insensitive? Do I look like I’m lying?!”

Despite her best effort to convey her message, Frederica’s words failed to change Ram’s mind.

Unable to bear Ram’s distrustful gaze, Frederica said, “Fine then,” giving up. “If you love it so much, you can spend the night here alone! I’m going to leave with Petra as soon as possible!”

“Ram doesn’t know what you’re so upset about…”

“Hmph! That! Anyway, I need to—Kyaaaaaeee?!”

Fueled by her anger for Ram, Frederica pushed down the growing fear and opened the door closest to her. A tremendous amount of rainwater had poured out from within, sweeping her away.

Caught by surprise, Frederica hadn’t been able to put up any resistance in time and fell into the hallway, instantly getting soaked from head to toe in rainwater.

“Wh-Wh-Wh-What just…”

“Rainwater must’ve leaked in and collected in this room.”

“Is something like that even possible?!”

“What else could it be?”

Ram lent the soaked Frederica a hand and helped her up. While she was standing up, however, she heard the sound of pottery breaking from the room at the end of the hallway. “Eek?! What is it this time?!”

“Just the wind. It probably knocked over a vase or something,” said Ram.

And then…

“Curse you.”

A voice passed by Frederica’s ears.

“I-It said ‘curse you’ this time?! Ra-Ra-Ra-Ram! What was that voice…”

“Just the wind. Wind comes in from everywhere since it’s an old building.”

“Wind doesn’t sound like that!!” cried Frederica.

After wringing out the water from her sleeves and skirt, Frederica took to the hallway again, her mind filled with worry for Petra. Petra might also be going through the same scary experience as me. Thinking that was the case, she couldn’t help but be anxious and think about rescuing her right away. So, that’s—

“Hic!!”

The moment thunder rumbled, and when the room became dark, and even when the cupboard fell and the dishes shattered and made a loud noise, which seemed like some sort of ill-conceived prank, Frederica’s first thought was about Petra.

And then…

“Noooooo!!”

—The story went back to the beginning the moment she screamed while hugging the smiling doll.

—The moment Frederica let out a scream, she felt her consciousness slipping away.

"…"

She reflexively let go of the doll, and it seemed like she was about to faint right then and there. However, the moment she let go of it, it thundered yet again, and a flash of lightning lit up her surroundings.

The doll that had gone flying was promptly caught by Petra. In her slender arms, before there could have been any sort of reaction from the doll—

"I won't let you!!"

Pulling herself together, Frederica unleashed her survival instincts and went into survival mode. In that moment, her maid uniform exploded from within, from which the beautiful golden fur of a leopardess emerged. She transformed into a beast at a frightening speed, and once her hindlegs emerged, it was complete. She then charged forward like the wind and swept Ram and Petra off their feet.

"…"

Dragging their light bodies along, the transformed Frederica moved to the other end of the hallway in a single instant. Not even Garfiel could catch up to her when she raced at full speed.

She undoubtedly had the strongest legs in the Emilia camp. However…

"—Get out."

"Eek."

She once again heard the doll she had left in the dust.

Frederica looked back and held back a scream. The doll had grabbed hold of her tail after she'd beastified.

She chomped her fangs. “Ram! Take care of Petra!”

“Hey!”

Not waiting for a reply, Frederica left them in the hallway and then jumped straight up, breaking through the ceiling and going above the roof in one fell swoop. She rose rapidly in the rain, going towards the black clouds. The doll was still holding on to her tail despite now being in midair, but since the two people she wanted to protect were safe in the mansion, she didn’t feel like she had to hold anything back. She swung her tail with force, making the doll lose its grip and fall and smash into the roof.

“I will for sure—”

Deliver the final blow this time, Frederica thought, turning around in midair. She was about to charge in and sacrifice herself, but then she noticed something: practically identical dolls were crawling up onto the roof of the mansion one after another.

“Wha—”

Frederica was at a loss for words. At that sight. At the pure horror in front of her. They all looked identical, including some that weren’t wearing clothes; nearly a hundred of them had followed her up to the roof. All their eyes fell on her above their heads—their eyes shined brightly.

“—Ah.”

Her fear, which had been replaced by her fight-or-flight response, resurfaced in that moment. Her legs trembled, her fangs chattered, her fiery eyes turned moist, and then the strength drained from her entire body. Frederica’s beastification was undone, and then she went into freefall right into the swarm of dolls.

And just like that, poor Frederica became their prey—

“Catch her!”

“…”

Just when she was thinking she was about to be beaten to a pulp, Frederica heard a firm voice and then widened her eyes in surprise. Right below her, inches away even, the dolls had their hands extended in her direction, and she imagined herself being torn limb from limb by those tiny hands. However, that didn't happen.

The dolls caught the falling Frederica gently with their extended hands.

"…Huh?"

By using their many arms, the dolls tried to lessen the impact of the fall to the best of their ability. Frederica opened her eyes in surprise since the impact was softer than she had expected. When she turned her head, she met the gaze of the doll with cracks on its face. It was the very doll she had encountered in the hallway—

"You're—"

"…"

Frederica couldn't detect any malice on the doll's face. Right when she noticed that and went to say something to the doll… "Ahgeek?!" …she fell through the roof of the mansion that hadn't been able to handle the impact or the weight of the dolls and then crashed into the hallway.

Ram stood in front of Frederica shaking her head and said, "This confirms it. You weigh too much, Frederica," repeating it unapologetically for the third time.

6

"So, what are all these dolls anyway?"

Petra brought up the topic after roughly sealing the hole in the ceiling that Frederica had made in order to stop water from coming in. Many dolls were lined up on the floor of the entrance in front of her eyes. They were the source of the commotion that Frederica claimed to have seen and looked to be about a hundred times more than she had assumed. They were quiet now, but if Frederica's story was true, they had been vindictive in their attempts to get rid of her, saying and doing things in their attempt to do so.

The dolls—which were a foot shorter than Petra—looked so lifelike that you would definitely be surprised if you came across one in the dark.

“This is a magicreation tool that was left behind in the mansion,” Ram revealed, putting her hand on the heads of the dolls.

Petra muttered, “Magicreation tool,” after hearing that, widening her eyes in surprise.

A magicreation tool is a special tool powered by a magic stone. They can be used in a variety of ways, such as an iron plate that emits heat when cooking, or to help create wind without the use of magic.

However, the fact that a moving doll was a magicreation tool was outside Petra’s common knowledge. “I didn’t know that such cute magicreation tools existed,” she said.

“They aren’t a common type though. Master Roswaal’s predecessor was a pioneer in creating magicreation tools, so he left behind many prototypes like these. Perhaps these are some of them.”

“They are ma-magicreation tools…?”

“Oh, Sister Frederica.”

While they were talking about magicreation tools, Frederica returned. She was completely drenched, not to mention naked since her beastification destroyed her clothes, so she gathered whatever fabric she could find in their luggage and around the mansion and created an outfit of sorts.

“Such a shameless appearance.”

“What was I supposed to do?!” cried Frederica in anger. “The change of clothes I brought and everything else in there got soaked because of the heavy rain, so I can’t wear any of them…but it wouldn’t have been an issue if you had just dried it all with your magic.”

“You want Ram to use her precious stamina just to dry some clothes? At least you can keep working despite your shameless appearance, unlike Ram who’d be unable to move. Endure it.”

“Stop saying shameless over and over,” Frederica said, frowning.

“Geez! Stop fighting!” Petra exclaimed, going in between her two sister figures who were arguing and serving as a mediator. “More importantly…”

She pointed at the dolls that were lined up.

The dolls moved their heads in unison and looked at Frederica menacingly.

“Eek! Wh-Why, why am I the only one being treated like an enemy…!”

“It’s not fair,” complained Petra. “I was more excited by the thought of meeting a hollow, but only Sister Frederica gets favored…”

“It’s not quite like that. Ram admits she doesn’t know much about this magicreation tool, but she can guess why it treated us differently.”

Ram began her explanation, and Frederica and Petra looked at each other and cocked their heads, making them look like real sisters. It was a lovely sight, but Ram didn’t smile at all. “Listen here,” she said, holding up a finger as she stood in front of the dolls. “This doll’s job is most likely to protect the mansion. Though the mansion has been abandoned for a long time, they are still following the orders they were given. So they were just trying to drive out intruders.”

“B-But, why only me? Leaving Petra aside, it’s unfair that you aren’t soaking wet too!”

“This isn’t a matter of fairness. And the reason we were treated differently wasn’t because of favoritism.”

With that said, Ram slowly walked across the entrance hall and stopped in front of the door. It was quite literally the front door that connected the inside of the mansion with the outside—

"People who enter through the entrance are guests. And people who enter from other places are intruders."

"Ah." Frederica gasped in surprise upon hearing Ram's guess. She had certainly not entered through the front door but had indeed entered through a hole in the back of the mansion. But if that was the condition to draw the dolls' ire then…

"Question!" quipped Petra. "I entered from the hole too. But they didn't try to scare me away."

"But you heard the sound that Ram couldn't, right? If so, then there is a difference in the way people are treated."

"A difference in treatment…so do they differentiate between adults and children then?"

"Ram thinks so. Adult intruders are treated like burglars, while child intruders are treated with more leniency… Perhaps they use something like height difference."

"Argggh…" Things weren't looking good for Frederica once things like height and build entered the equation. Anyway, Ram's hypothesis is probably right, she thought. In fact, the dolls are surprisingly receptive to her orders since she is a guest. And the picture of her ordering them around really suits her.

"I don't know why, but making the dolls follow you really suits you, Sister Ram."

As Frederica was thinking that, Petra expressed the same thing.

"Obviously," Ram replied, running her hand over her pink hair with a somewhat pleased look on her face.

"But I'm relieved. If we were being taunted by hollows this time, I would've run as fast as I could in the rain, soaking wet with you and Ram on my back…"

Good thing only one of us got soaking wet, she thought. Though she wasn't sure if she should think like that, she forced herself to come to terms with it.

“But this is great,” said Petra. “If the dolls help out, it’ll take no time at all to fix the mansion up. By the way, you were so cute, Sister Frederica.”

“Pe-Petra?! What do you mean by ‘cute’…”

“She’s referring to the way you tremble and run around like a headless chicken. Looks like Ram isn’t the only one with a twisted personality.”

“My Petra’s personality is nothing like yours!”

Ram ignored Frederica’s furious protest and responded to it by covering her ears. On the other hand, the conversation went off track, so Petra didn’t go out of her way to answer. She looked at the dolls who looked as if they were waiting for their master’s orders, and with a twinkle in her eyes, said, “Hey, Sister Frederica, Sister Ram, I have a favor to ask…”

She turned to her two sisters and decided to convince them to humor her sudden idea.

7

“Ahh, this takes me back. I wonder how long it’s been since I was last heeere,” Roswaal muttered with deep emotions while squinting his bi-colored eyes.

After telling him they had something they wanted to show him, the usually busy Roswaal flew—quite literally—over to the villa to see them.

Frederica was bitter about his twisted personality, thinking that Petra would most likely soften up a little if he were to show that side of him more often.

Anyway…

“We have something to show you inside the villa.”

“Hmm, it was Petra who made the effort to call me. I wooonder if it’s okay to get excited?”

"How annoying, it was my idea. But from here on out we're only supporting characters."

"Supporting characters?" Roswaal repeated her words, tilting his head at her prickly expression.

Being forced to stand in front of the broken entrance, Frederica respectfully opened the door for him. Inside, Ram was waiting for his arrival, but that was not all.

Roswaal's eyes widened at the sight of so many figures who came to greet him.

"This is…"

"…"

Welcoming him were one hundred and eleven neatly maintained dolls with clothes and makeup on—courtesy of Petra.

"They've been guarding the mansion for a long time… It only felt right that they be acknowledged for their work. They must've been waiting for their someone's return for a long time, "said Petra to Roswaal, who just stood there.

That was Petra's wish, which Frederica and Ram had accepted. Petra's kindness was met with a nod of approval from Frederica from the beginning, and even though Ram didn't say no she acted like it was a drag.

The three of them all shared the burden of changing the dolls' clothes and make-up. None of them even considered cutting corners. Because, of course every doll was created by the previous Roswaal K. Mathers. And when it came to serving the Mathers family, they had fulfilled their duties for far longer than Frederica and the others. They were their seniors.

Taking in the warm welcome of the dolls, Roswaal took a step closer. "You guys stayed here all this time?" he asked, looking at the sea of dolls.

"…"

"I see… You increased your numbers in order to fulfill your duty. All this time you have been protecting this mansion and yearning for the day that its master would return."

Their eyes were fixed on their master—Roswaal—as if they were hanging on to each and every word. As if moved by their gaze, Roswaal gently stroked the head of the doll in the front. "I'm back now—I'm sorry for keeping all of you waiting."

The dolls bowed their heads reverently in response to Roswaal's words of gratitude. "—Welcome home, Master."

As Frederica, Ram, and Petra felt various emotions while looking at that scene, they suddenly noticed something.

"What…? They aren't…moving…?"

The dolls had stopped moving after lowering their heads. Seeing this, Petra grumbled, and Roswaal shook his head slowly at her. "They have fulfilled their duty to the mansion. After tirelessly dedicating themselves to their duty, they can finally rest now."

"But…"

"Thank you. For giving me a chance to right a wrong," he continued, before turning back around to face a teary Petra and placing his hand on her shoulder.

At that moment, Petra bit her lip hard and pulled away from Roswaal's touch. She hid behind Frederica. And while hiding behind Frederica, she leaned to the side and glared at him. "Master, you dummy! Selfish! You're always like this!"

"You're right. I am always like this. You can expect to be veeeeery busy now that I'm here."

He ignored Petra's roaring anger and smiled wryly while taking in the scene around him. All he saw were lifeless dolls and a still-unrenovated mansion. In the end, they couldn't rely on the dolls for help, so they had to renovate the mansion themselves.

But… "I think I'll do something myself for a change… What should we start with?” asked Roswaal.

“Hmmm, are you sure?” questioned Frederica. “I am warning you; this won’t be easy.”

“Why, you can most certainly cooount on me.”

Frederica smiled and said, “Alright. Then go ahead and work him like an earth dragon, Petra.”

“Yes, ma’am! With pleasure!” she replied.

Their master rolled up his sleeves, which didn’t suit him, and the raging Petra told him what to do. Watching the comical scene unfold before her, Frederica smiled and turned to Ram. She was kneeling next to the doll that had completed its duty and whose time had stopped and was gently caressing its cheek.

“Thank you for your service, great senior—you can leave Master Roswaal to us now,” Ram said kindly.

To Frederica, seeing Ram do something like that was rarer than a hollow.

Poltergeist Story Extra

“Master, what exactly are you going to do with those dolls?” Frederica asked, forcing the window with stiff hinges open to let some fresh air in. Behind her, Roswaal was organizing a bookshelf.

The villa had been unearthed in order to be used as a base while traveling during the royal selection. Originally, having been the residence of previous generations of House Mathers, it was the personal workshop of Roswaal K. Mathers, who was a celebrated genius in the creation of magicreation tools. Despite him having passed away, magic dolls had continued to protect the residence of their previous master.

In all honesty, Frederica’s first meeting with the dolls hadn’t been the most positive. But since they both served the same Mathers household, if she thought about it from an alternative perspective, they could be called colleagues.

Going along with the one who came up with that idea—Petra—both Frederica and Ram had cooperated in order to help the dolls achieve their deepest desires.

Although he was of a separate generation, the dolls had welcomed the head of the Mathers household, and, after having finally achieved their goal, ceased all movement. The one-hundred and eleven dolls had been placed in the villa, primarily for safekeeping purposes, but—

“That doesn’t mean they should be left here forever, and it would be pitiful to put them into storage,” said Frederica. “We should bury them with respect or something along those lines.”

There exists a superstition that hollows can easily reside in dolls that are made into images of people or animals.

It wasn’t that she had chosen to believe such a thing deliberately, but the dolls were a type of magicreation tool, and as such needed to be inscribed with formulas that made it easy for mana to circulate within. In other words, it was the kind of thing that was likely to attract evil spirits and the like.

If they were to come alive like that, it would certainly be humiliating for the dolls themselves. “Besides… Yeah, Petra might get scared. Emilia and Beatrice could also be in for a shock when they find out… Yes, we should definitely deal with them.”

“Sorry for getting you so wooorked up, but you didn’t think I would just get rid of them, did you? In fact, I plan on reuuusing them.”

“Reusing…them?” Frederica, who had been intently focusing on the feather duster in her hands, turned around. Her green eyes widened at Roswaal’s response.

“That’s right,” he replied, tracing a line in the dust on an old book with his finger. “After all, you and the others put so much effort into tidying them up. A lot of the dolls have broken and aged parts, but if we replace those then we should be able to mend them. It might even be possible to replicate a gate in a pseudo-fashion if we can fiddle with the formula or improve the quality of the magic stone used inside them.”

“H-H-Hold on a second. When you started speaking I was like ‘Master…!’, but by the end I was like ‘Master…?!’.”

“I don’t understand what kind of change of heart you’re alluding to here.”

“Suddenly deciding to try and recreate an artificial gate is absurd!” The feather duster she had been gripping so tightly suddenly started creaking in her hand. It was, however, only natural that she was as surprised as she was.

Originally, gates were organs that were said to direct the circulation of the mana that existed inside every living thing. The quality of a gate was said to have a direct link to the abilities a magic user possessed. It was something you were born with, not something you could train.

The important point here is the fact that this was an organ that living things inherently possessed.

“Creating an artificial gate would be almost like adding a heart…”

“Of course, it won’t be comparable to an organ like the heeaart. But magic is my specialty, so this shouldn’t surpriiise you,” Roswaal replied, shrugging his shoulders.

“Even if it was half as difficult as a heart, it’s still completely implausible.”

His nonchalant response was unbelievable. Despite having the titles of Margrave and Court Mage of the Kingdom of Lugunica, he doesn’t take it as serious proof of his competency, thought Frederica. If you look at him in a positive light, he is a genius, but if you look at him in a negative light, he seems to have a sincere lack of interest in anything but himself.

“You may say it’s easy enough to do, but they’re the creations of your predecessor—a rare genius inventor… Even for you, Master, it isn’t that simple…”

“Ooh, it sounds like you’re saying my knowledge of magicreation tools is inferior to that of my preeedecessor. How unexpected, Frederica.”

“…A statement overflowing with confidence. How typical of you, Master.”

However, that she didn’t wave it off as a joke or a bluff was proof of Roswaal’s true potential.

Roswaal doesn’t make showy statements about himself without grounds to do so. In other words, the remark he had just made could be taken as absolute fact, and it was very possible that he could restore the magic dolls without a problem. That in itself was very pleasing. But the aforementioned surprise at his unexpected remark had not disappeared.

“They say that if you study, there is nothing you cannot achieve… And if you believe something like that, someday you’ll probably be able to make the impossibles of this world completely possible with magic…”

“…? Of course I will. That’s the true objective of magic.”

Overwhelmed, Frederica had mumbled a sort of philosophical statement that rather sounded more like resignation. Roswaal heard it, however, and answered as if to say that it was completely natural. It was very clearly the behavior of someone who had made it their purpose to ponder upon and challenge what she had muttered about time and time again.

Making every impossibility in the world possible—that was something that could be possible with magic.

“Ultimately, magic exists to fulfill one’s wishes.” Roswaal gave a childish smile, unbefitting of his age, making Frederica go silent.

She wondered to herself if that was the ideal for the use of magic that Roswaal L. Mathers had decided upon. Or rather, the ideal that those of the Mathers family, who had continued the Roswaal name for generations, had decided upon as their goal.

“That is the most important reason behind continuing our bloodline, Frederica. Distinguished families with a long history exist to pass on ideals and knowledge.”

“The reason to continue your bloodline? I don’t understand, personally…”

“That’s understandable. To you and Garfiel, the concept of passing down your bloodline might not make much sense. You may be able to understand sibling relationships, but as for parent-child ones…”

“Normally, you should hesitate a little more before starting this kind of conversation!”

Despite avoiding specific examples, Roswaal had deliberately trampled over that thoughtfulness.

“Sorry, sorry.” To Frederica’s objection, Roswaal gave a smile with a face that showed little remorse.

Sighing at his attitude, Frederica attempted to use the duster, having lost sight of the conversation. "Even if that's the case, trying a big experiment like creating an artificial gate and trying it out on the dolls that were abandoned and forgotten is very like you , Master. I can't tell if you are attached to them or don't care much for them."

"You're hitting me where it hurts, but if I succeed, the burden on you all will be somewhat lifted, no? If I put dolls in every villa, then maintenance will be done automatically even when no one is there."

"Mainta—what?"

"Maintenance. It means repairing or adjusting. It's Subaru-speaaak," Roswaal unapologetically explained to Frederica, who had furrowed her brows at the unfamiliar word.

Subaru-speak was a term they had coined on their own, referring to words or phrases that were unique to one of their camp members—Natsuki Subaru's—hometown, which he used from time to time. Roswaal and Garfiel in particular seemed to enjoy it, and they were occasionally found copying him here and there. Garfiel would probably really hate it if he found out, though.

"Good heavens, I need to warn Sir Subaru. That it will be a problem if I can't understand even more of the Master's words…"

Frederica was thinking of complaining to Subaru, although it wasn't his fault at all, when her breath suddenly caught in her throat after having realized something in the middle of that thought. Lifting her head, she looked over at Roswaal. "By any chance, you wouldn't be recreating the artificial gate…for the sake of Subaru and Beatrice, would you?"

"…"

"Sir Subaru's gate is broken, and doesn't function properly without Miss Beatrice. The two are quite close, and I think it's lovely that they're always together, but…" Things are always accompanied by exceptions and unavoidable circumstances, thought Frederica. For example, it might become the worst possible scenario for the both of them if they are separated, and their separation goes on for too long. “Isn’t that why you went out of your way to look into such an unnecessary technology? Since your gate is probably the best in the whole kingdom.”

“I want to both deny and correct you on thiiiis. First, my gate is of course outstanding, but the best gate in the kingdom lies elsewhere. Also, the one who researched the unnecessary technology was not me, but the generation before last.”

“The generation before last…”

“I heard that Roswaal J. Mathers had the most inferior gate amongst my distinguished bloodline. She was probably researching it because she desired some kind of external means of doing things. She did not succeed within her lifetime, however.”

“…”

“I just continued the basics of her work from there… Of course, if it functions correctly, there’s a possibility it may work as a treatment as you descriiiibed,” Roswaal explained with a shrug of his shoulders, having delivered both the denial and correction he declared he would.

Eying his deliberate ignorance—or possible mockery—Frederica let out a long sigh.

“So for the sake of one of our own… No, with Beatrice that’s two. If you’ve secretly been taking measures for the sake of those two, then you should show us more of what you are doing.”

“It’s a shame, but I can’t get on board with your proposal, Frederica. I diiislike showing my efforts. I like to look as though I’m doing everything smartly, without any issue.”

“Smaartly?” Coming across another word she did not know, Frederica was quietly baffled.

It was Roswaal’s personal way of making amends. Having tried to bring about a rather lethal, and decisive disservice to the camp, everyone expected him to make up for his mistakes.

On the other hand, the one who couldn't forgive Roswaal the most, was Roswaal himself.

So he didn't want to do it in a way that would show anyone that he was doing things for the sake of the party, nor the opportunity to recover. Frederica didn't think it would be strange at all even if Roswaal had already completed the technology for the artificial gate and given it to Subaru in some form.

The effectiveness and difficulty would most likely be incredibly different depending on whether it was amongst Subaru's belongings, or etched into his body itself. But for Roswaal, he would not be concerned no matter how challenging.

That was just who Frederica's master was, the kingdom's most powerful magic user, Roswaal L. Mathers.

"…I understand, Master. I may think otherwise, but I'm just a maid at the end of the day. I have no complaints about your opinions. Although, I do wonder about them," Frederica said, prickly.

"What a splendid way of giving an opinion. It seems I'm blessed with good servants… Far too blessed, actually," Roswaal added with a smile, as if he was having fun.

From the tone in his voice, Roswaal seemed to be talking of the magic dolls. It was definitely convenient to keep them, but it was more likely that he wanted to repay them. Remaining in the villa after being left alone for so long, they had demonstrated invaluable loyalty; they were his precious servants.

"Please don't be too hard on yourself," warned Frederica. "Of course, if the dolls could move, then it would certainly be helpful just as you said. But your body is far more important."

Frederica did not say that out of competitiveness or a sense of rivalry, but in response to the attitude of the magic dolls. While she hoped the magic dolls would have a bright future, it would be meaningless if Roswaal collapsed to make it happen.

So Frederica decided that they would work hard until the day those magic dolls could move once more…

"Ah, no need to worry. As we've been talking, I've put the formulas together inside my head. It may take time to create them, but they should be able to work as expected in two or three daaaays."

"You're immediately undermining my resolve and concern!"

"I thought it would be better to do things quickly. I don't understaaand," replied Roswaal, expressing that Frederica was being unfair by shrugging his shoulders.

It was certainly an issue to be suffering such hardship so frequently in the face of having such a substandard master. But she also considered him to be worth serving, so it had both its advantages and disadvantages.

"Regarding such things as this, both myself, Petra, and Ram, all have different opinions."

Ram didn't consider it a master and servant type relationship, but adored Roswaal as a man. She was devoted to him in a similar way to Frederica, but her passion was of a different kind. On the other hand, Petra saw it as a master and servant relationship, and so repressed her emotions to quite an extent. If there were no employment-based relationship, there would be nothing to stop Petra from exploding.

Frederica was different from both of them. She had made an oath of servitude to Roswaal, and her personal feelings of gratitude were strong. In a different way from Ram, she would probably go so far as to risk her own life for him.

It's thanks to him that I can be together with Garfiel and Ryuzu, who is like a grandmother to me.

Roswaal suddenly cut into her inner thoughts. "Frederica, this may be none of my business, but…"

"…What is it?" Looking over her shoulder, Frederica raised her eyebrows in surprise. It was a rare sight to see Roswaal be hesitant.

At her response, Roswaal closed one eye—and spoke with his blue eye open. “We were just talking about the meaning of continuing one’s bloodline, right? …If you or Garfiel ever wish to look into your blood relatives, please let me know. I’ll help you.”

“…”

Frederica stared in wonder at the unexpected proposition, and after a brief silence, said, “I’ll never wish that. My family consists of only Garf, my grandmother, and my deceased mother. That’s it.”

“So, what abooout Garfield?” Roswaal asked, the instant Frederica shook her head.

She looked disappointed for a moment, but already had an answer. “That’s something you should ask Garf, Master.”

“…Ask Garfiel directly? Is that a joke? It’d be like trampling over his heart with dirty shoes. He’d never forgive me.”

“You didn’t seem to have a problem with trampling over my heart!” Frederica snapped, flashing her sharp fangs in resentment, after figuring out that he had done it on purpose.

Of course, she knew that Roswaal didn’t propose that out of spite—he was just thinking of Frederica and Garfiel in his own way. She knew it was done out of consideration as to whether or not they were both ready to face a situation they’d been avoiding.

However, there should be both those who need it, and those who don’t.

“You don’t need to be worried, I’m okay. Plus, they say that hesitating to do a good deed is a bad deed. I’ll finish tidying the bookshelf, so you see to the dolls, Master.” Collecting herself, Frederica took over Roswaal’s work for him.

When she stretched out and snatched the book away from him, Roswaal expressed reluctance. “Can’t we just continue with the bookcaaase? There’s so much to do, and so many books to see…”

“You’re under the influence of the cleaning and tidying demon! The act of reading is like a witchbeast that steals time when you are trying to clean things. So, please go!” Clutching the book she’d snatched to her chest with one hand, she drove Roswaal away with the duster in the other. Afterwards, she realized that Petra was having an influence on her.

“My my.” Roswaal thought so too, sweeping away the dust with a sigh. “If Petra’s supporters increase any more than this, I won’t be able to act freely here… I won’t happen to create even more enemies once I revive all those dolls, will I?”

“If you don’t like the sound of that, how about correcting their personalities in the formula?”

“I see, what a great idea. Do you have a specific ex—”

“I was joking! It’s cruel to try and change the way someone is, even if they’re just dolls.” Not to mention the fact that the dolls had served the Mathers family for so long without trying to change a single thing.

As Frederica pointed this out, Roswaal waved his arms, saying, “I understand. I understand,” in a dismissive manner. “Well, I’m not sure whether you can consider them your seniors or juniors, but I’ll contribute to increasing our workforce. I’m quite the hard worker, myself.”

“That’s only something you can boast about once you can demonstrate it in front of Ram and Petra.”

“That’s harsh…”

Accepting his defeat, Roswaal took his leave meekly with slumped shoulders. Or so she thought, until he paused in the doorway. “Frederica,” he called. “This is my bad habit of pestering reemerging—I’ll leave it to you guys to prepare one-hundred and eleven names.”

“…Understood. I’ll prepare some wonderful names.” Placing both the duster and the book on a cabinet nearby, Frederica held her skirt and gave a curtsy.

After seeing that, he left, and Frederica gave a little sigh as she watched him go.

Roswaal was too kind for his own good, but if she found it worthwhile to support him, then she couldn’t be that different.

Very Very Rough Justice
(LQ AI Translation)

1

—On that day, an unusual incident was occurring at the Roswaal Mansion.

Subaru: “Eh, you’re telling me Emilia-tan’s going out without me…?!”

Emilia: “Honestly, Subaru, don’t be so surprised over something like that. I can manage a little outing even if you’re not with me.”

Surprised, Subaru’s knees quivered, and Emilia puffed out her cheeks in protest.

The two of them were speaking in the mansion’s entrance hall. Emilia, already dressed for going out, had stopped Subaru when he tried to tag along, and that was how it all started.

Since the knighting ceremony, Subaru had officially become Emilia’s knight, and thanks to that he usually accompanied her whenever she left the mansion.

Emilia truly appreciated that in itself, but—

Subaru: “And yet Emilia-tan’s going to leave me behind… Did I mess something up?!”

Emilia: “Ah, n-no, that’s not it. See, Subaru, you’ve been with me nonstop lately, haven’t you? So I thought you might like to rest once in a while…”

Subaru: “Ehh?! There’s nothing more restful than absorbing pure Emilia-ese right at Emilia-tan’s side though?!”

Emilia: “Sorry, I’ve got no idea what you’re talking about.”

Flustered, Subaru gulped, and Emilia answered with her eyebrows drooping.

Really, she only wanted Subaru to take a break for once, but how could she make him listen?

While Emilia was worrying over that—

Ram: “Hah! What a pathetic fuss you’re making, Barusu.”

Subaru: “N-Neesama…!”

The dependable Ram arrived, her heels clicking briskly across the floor. After looking Subaru up and down, she raised a finger and said,

Ram: “Honestly, worrying about whether you’ve displeased Emilia-sama at this point is far too late. If you’re anxious about your own blunders, Barusu, start searching back to when you were still tied to your mother by the umbilical cord.”

Subaru: “Ah—crap! So I’d have to regret kicking Mom’s belly too much from the inside! I’m not repenting for anything I did while soaking in amniotic fluid!”

Ram: “A man who refuses self-reflection… he will not rise high, surely.”

Subaru: “Quit stabbing me in the heart like that!”

Watching Ram and Subaru’s friendly back-and-forth, Emilia let out a small laugh. From the moment they first met, the two had been perfectly in sync, and their exchange was heart-warming even to an onlooker.

She could have watched them forever until their talk ran dry, but—

Ram: “All right, conversation’s over. Subaru, didn’t you promise Petra-chan and Frederica something today? ‘Applique’, was it? You said you’d teach them.”

Subaru: “Ughh! My missionary zeal as an apostle of embroidery has backfired…!”

Raising the needle and thread in his hand, Subaru dropped to his knees. Even as he hung his head, the cloth in his hands quickly filled with a cute stitched cat.

Subaru had always been dexterous, but his recent improvement was enough to make one gape.

That hardworking side was something Emilia could boast about in her knight, yet seeing him so dejected left her at a loss for words.

At any rate—

Emilia: “Really, there’s nothing to worry about. Remember that lightbug uproar the other day? I’m just going to talk with the city chief of Costuul to see how things have settled down.”

Subaru: “The Costuul city chief—that huge guy with the scary face, right? He stared down at me from way up there and scared me pretty bad, but you’ll be fine, Emilia-tan?”

Emilia: “Eh, I’ll be totally fine. He’s reaaally a kind person, after all.”

Hearing Subaru’s reason for anxiety yet unable to sympathize, Emilia knit her brows quizzically.

Leno Rex, the city chief of Costuul—the industrial city nearest the new Roswaal Mansion—was tall and looked frightening at first glance, but he was an admirable man who put the citizens’ lives first.

Recently, naturally occurring pests called “lightbugs” had rampaged in Costuul, causing enormous damage. Emilia and the others had helped quell the disturbance, but she was curious about the aftermath, and today’s outing was to hear how things were progressing.

Emilia: “So there’s really nothing to fret about. Ram’s coming with me, and…”

Garfiel: “—’Cause your amazin’ selves are bored ta tears, I’ve decided ta tag along too!”

While Emilia was explaining to Subaru, the final member of the party arrived—a boy with short blond hair, a well-trained body, and impressively sharp fangs: Garfiel.

As the Military Officer of Emilia’s camp, he would act as her escort today, though no one thought such pomp was truly necessary.

Ram: “Unlike Barusu, the riffraff around here wouldn’t stand a chance against Emilia-sama.”

Subaru: “Nngh, can’t argue with that, which makes it hard to retort…!”

Garfiel: “Hah! Relax, Captain. It’s the next town over, yeah? Whatever happens, my amazin’ self’ll guard Ram and Emilia-sama proper.”

Subaru: “Well, that lightbug mess in that ‘next town over’ ended with Frederica getting kidnapped behind the scenes… Ahh, saying it’s pointless! I’m counting on you, Garfiel!”

Garfiel thumped his chest with a broad grin, and Subaru patted the boy’s shoulder before turning back to Emilia.

Subaru: “I’m sure you’ll be fine, but be extra careful, okay? About carriages and men. And bad guys, too.”

Emilia: “Geez, Subaru, you’re such a worrywart. But it’s all right. Carriages and men aside, if we meet any bad people I’ll beat them fair and square!”

Subaru: “Mmm, that’s not exactly what I meant, but E-M-T.”

—And so, seeing Subaru’s complicated expression, Emilia and the others departed the mansion.

Until they were out of sight, Subaru kept waving to the three of them from in front of the mansion.

2

After that exchange before setting out, the three of them finally left the mansion—yet…

Garfiel: “Saay, ain’t it rare fer the three of us ta be movin’ around together?”

Emilia: “Ah, you might be right. Ram and Garfiel are always such good friends, but I’m usually with Subaru, so this is unusual.”

Ram: “That is an impression Ram would rather amend, however…”

With a grim-faced Ram sandwiched between them, Emilia and Garfiel chatted happily.

Just as Garfiel had said, this truly was an uncommon trio. It happened to be the same day Roswaal had business outside and Subaru had promised to spend time with Petra and the others—meaning Otto, who had not been mentioned at all, was surely being dragged around by Roswaal even now.

Emilia: “Roswaal seems awfully fond of Otto, doesn’t he?”

Ram: “—Aggravating as it is, Otto is unexpectedly useful. Among Barusu’s strays, he is quite the find. Aggravating as it is.”

Garfiel: “Callin’ Ottobro a stray—does that mean the Cap’n’s picked up other stuff too?”

Ram: “Petra could also be called one of Barusu’s strays.”

Garfiel: “Aa, Petra sure dotes on the Cap’n…”

Scratching his own head roughly, Garfiel nodded along with Ram’s words.

Thanks to Subaru, both Otto and Petra had ended up joining the camp. Because the two of them got along reaaally well with Subaru, they were welcome allies in Emilia’s eyes as well.

Emilia: “If Subaru brings back even more friends at this rate, things will get so lively!”

Ram: “Ram does not find that especially advisable. Increase the sample size, and pebbles mix in among gems. Ram very much doubts such good fortune will continue."

Garfiel: "So Ram's admittin' Ottobro an' Petra were good picks after all, eh? Bet Ottobro'd be thrilled ta hear—ouch!"

Emilia: "Ram?! Why did you just yank out Garfiel's hair?!"

Talking like this as they went, Emilia and the others arrived at their destination, Costuul.

As planned, they met the mayor inside a temporary building substituting for City Hall—the original having collapsed in the recent lightbug incident and still awaiting reconstruction.

Leno: "—I am grateful that you came all this way."

Greeting them without a change of expression in the reception room, Leno Rex said this flatly.

Leno was so large that, at first glance, he looked more suited to life as a mercenary than as a mayor. But one mustn't judge by appearances. Despite his size he was capable of delicate consideration, and Emilia thought it a good thing that Leno was the one serving as mayor.

Paying Emilia's impression no mind, Leno immediately broached the business for which they had come.

Leno: "Regarding the affair the other day, the turmoil within the city has finally settled, and reconstruction has begun in various places."

Emilia: "That's good to hear. We wish we could've come to help sooner, though."

Leno: "Perish the thought. Rather, your chief warrior over there was of immense help to us."

It had been Garfiel and Frederica who rescued Leno and the city staff from the collapsing City Hall during the recent uproar. Having his deeds praised head-on, Garfiel rubbed his nose, not altogether displeased.

Garfiel: “Still, gettin’ the rebuild goin’ only now… ya sure took yer sweet time, huh? Ain’t like some “Catch-the-Brahavac” race. Why’d it take that long?”

Leno: “There are several reasons. First, even after that, exterminating the lightbug took time. The other main reason—”

Ram: “—would be that the workshops for magicreation tools suffered damage, and rebuilding them will cost both time and money.”

Leno: “Spot-on.”

Magicreation tools—that very technology was the greatest reason Costuul bore the name of the Industrial City, a strength no other city possessed. Powered by magic stones, those tools allowed tasks impossible by human hands; they were, one could say, modern Meteors.

However, the workshops that used those tools, and the factories that produced them, had taken heavy damage in the lightbug incident, dealing a severe blow to Costuul’s industry. With the lightbugs finally eradicated, the work of restoration to regain the title of Industrial City had begun.

Yet—

Leno: “A serious problem has come to light.”

Emilia: “Eh? A serious problem?”

Leno: “While the damaged workshops were closed, their craftsmen naturally had no work. Many without employment therefore went to other towns to earn their keep, but…”

Garfiel: “Well, ya gotta work ta eat. That’s not the problem, right?”

Leno: “Working elsewhere is no issue—provided they come back. If they do not…”

Emilia: “They… aren’t coming back? Those craftsmen who went out?”

Indeed, if that were true, it would be a huge trouble. It was normal for craftsmen to seek jobs elsewhere while their workshops were closed, but unless those craftsmen returned—

Emilia: “Even if the workshops are restored, there won’t be any skilled hands to run them, right?”

Leno: “Handling magicreation tools requires considerable experience. With most seasoned craftsmen gone, and if we must train new ones from scratch…”

Ram: “The losses during that time would be immense. At worst, Costuul, once called the Industrial City, could collapse entirely.”

Emilia: “Ram, that’s a bit harsh…”

Leno: “It is the truth. At this rate, the city cannot sustain itself.”

Ram: “So, what is it you want us to do? Let me remind you: even the Mathers family cannot cover a city’s financial shortfall, nor are we obliged to.”

Leno: “This city is within the Margrave’s western domain, is it not?”

Ram: “The administration of his own lands is Lord Roswaal’s responsibility, but the running of the city itself tests the mayor’s skill. Do you intend to set aside your own incompetence and blame Lord Roswaal?”

Garfiel: “Come on, Ram!”

Emilia: “Please don’t be so on edge. The mayor is in a tough spot too. Besides…”

Leno: “Besides?”

Emilia: “We should hear him out to the end. He wouldn’t just ask us to open our purse with no thought behind it, right?”

Leno bowed deeply.

Leno: “Allow me to apologize for any misunderstanding. As Lady Emilia says, I do not intend to ask the Margrave to fill our coffers; that is indeed my duty.”

Garfiel: “Then what do ya want from us?”

Leno: “—From the Margrave Mathers, I would like manpower.”

Emilia: “Manpower, as in… household help?”

It was clear the shortage of hands was serious, but could that be covered by extra servants? Moreover, the mansion had its own work, so sending Ram and the others out would be difficult. Frankly, the only one they could loan was Subaru.

Emilia: “Even Subaru might not be able to fix a manpower shortage in such a big city…”

Garfiel: “Heh, what’re ya sayin’, Emilia-sama? We’re talkin’ about the Cap’n!”

Emilia: “Garfiel… you’re right! If it’s Subaru, maybe he really could do something.”

Ram: “Emilia-sama, Garf, kindly stop expecting dreams from Barusu.”

Ram turned back to Leno.

Ram: “Ram’s head has cooled a little. The manpower you want is—”

Leno: “—for searching. I wish to know the whereabouts of those craftsmen who have not returned.”

Ram: “If there is a criminal element, maintaining order in the domain falls under the lord’s duties—Lord Roswaal’s purview.”

Emilia: “But what if the people who went out found reaaally good jobs and are working so hard they lost track of time?”

Ram: “Even so, any adult should at least send a word home. And the problem is they haven’t contacted even their families. Correct?”

Leno: “—Precisely.”

Having heard this much, Emilia wanted to solve the problem somehow and send those missing craftsmen back to their families.

Emilia: “After all, families ought to be together whenever possible.”

Garfiel: “Aa, got no argument from my amazin’ self there. All right! Let’s do this, Emilia-sama!”

Buoyed by Garfiel’s forceful agreement, Emilia stood up.

Emilia: “All right, Mr. Mayor. We’ll help look for the craftsmen who disappeared. No—we insist on helping.”

Leno: “If you would be so kind…”

Emilia: “Then let’s start searching right away! Garfiel, you’ve got a reaaally keen nose, don’t you? Can we count on you?”

Garfiel: “Hm?”

Garfiel, however, noticed nothing of Leno’s bafflement and answered Emilia with vigor.

Garfiel: “My amazin’ self’s half a tiger, y’see, and I ain’t losin’ ta any mutt or kitty when it comes ta sniffin’. No matter who’s missin’, I’ll track ’em down in a flash!”

Emilia: “That’s reaaally reassuring! All right, then—”

Garfiel: “Yeah—let’s get this started!”

Garfiel bared his fangs in a grin; Emilia clenched her fist with determination. Then, as though released from a spring, the two spun around, fixing Leno with spirited gazes.

Emilia: “Wait for us—we’ll definitely find the missing people!”

Garfiel: “The Wings of Mokkalka outstrip the wind!”

Leaving those words behind, Emilia and Garfiel nodded to each other and dashed out of the reception room.

Overwhelmed by their momentum, Leno could only stare after them in blank astonishment. Once the initial shock passed, he glanced toward Ram, who had been left behind.

Leno: “…Honestly, all we needed was for them to arrange some manpower.”

Ram: “Ram thinks so as well, so Ram will inform Lord Roswaal later. Until then—”

Leno: “Until then?”

Ram: “It would be wise to humor those two until they tire themselves out.”

Savoring the tea that had been served, Ram let out a quiet good grief and shook her head in elegant resignation.

3

Emilia: “Ah, you’re late, Ram. I was about to leave you behind, you know?”

Ram: “My apologies, Lady Emilia. The tea and confections were far too good to abandon half-finished… And, the results?”

Ram caught up with Emilia and the others only after they had dashed out of the substitute City Hall and some time had passed.

Just as she had told Emilia, Ram had left the building only after fully enjoying the welcome tea and sweets, but in that time Emilia and the others had apparently been darting all around the city.

When she asked about their results, Emilia leaned forward and cried, “That!”—

Emilia: “Garfiel and I talked to all sorts of people. They kept thanking us for fighting during that lightbug uproar the other day…”

Ram: “I see. That is good to hear. It seems Garf’s rampage was not in vain.”

Garfiel: “Well, that whole mess was kicked up by some perverted bastard gunnin’ for Sis in the first place, so I dunno how much we oughta be celebratin’.”

Ram and Garfiel traded impressions while Emilia, looking a little embarrassed, listened.

Digging too deeply into the truth of that incident would entangle all sorts of troublesome circumstances for Emilia’s camp, so they could not speak openly about it. Even so, the fact that solving the uproar had earned Emilia the townspeople’s goodwill was something to be simply pleased about.

Ram: “In other words, your results are zero. Very well, let us return. We must once again request Lord Roswaal to arrange reinforcements.”

Emilia: “Hehe, that’s what you’d think, right? But that isn’t the case at all. Isn’t that so, Garfiel?”

Garfiel: “Hell yeah. My amazin’ nose and Lady Emilia’s canvassin’ paid off. This is what ya call Jōten-and-Geten tag-team sumo, y’know.”

Emilia: “Is that what that is?”

Emilia and Garfiel puffed out their chests side by side; watching them, Ram remained silent. Seeing her silence, the two tilted their heads in puzzlement, but undaunted they continued.

According to the results of their inquiries—

Ram: “A brokerage that finds work for migrant laborers, is it…?”

Emilia: “We don’t know if those people are suspicious, but it sounds like they were talking jobs with the townsfolk who have disappeared.”

Garfiel: “If those punks turn out ta be the kidnappers, then things’ll move fast, yeah?”

Emilia: “That’s what I think, but what about you, Ram?”

Garfiel, looking triumphant, and Emilia, glancing up at Ram for her opinion—listening to the two, Ram fought the urge to clutch her head.

Truth be told, Ram had not expected anything at all from their canvassing, but judging from what she had just heard, they had achieved more than she had imagined.

—Migrant laborers who never return, and a shady brokerage.

Ram: “…Suspicious.”

Emilia: “—! I knew it! You think so too, Ram?”

At Ram’s involuntary mutter, Emilia’s eyes sparkled. Beside her, Garfiel folded his arms with a satisfied “See?” plastered across his face.

Ram: “You are in quite high spirits, Garf. It is certainly a fine achievement, but…”

Garfiel: “Whoa there, Ram, thinkin’ we’re done here’d be far too sweet. Sweet as sugar.”

Emilia: “Super sweet. If those people really are the kidnappers, we’d be in trouble if they get away, right? That’s why I asked Garfiel…”

Garfiel: “An’ my amazin’ nose pinned down the direction their dragon carriage headed, see.”

Emilia: “That’s what he did.”

Saying so, Garfiel, with a snort, pointed outside the city. Presumably, that was the direction the shady brokers’ dragon carriage had gone.

Ram: “You two are being far too efficient… Are you really Lady Emilia and Garf?”

Emilia: “What’s that supposed to mean? Are you praising us?”

Ram: “No. Yes, I suppose so. The two of you were thinking much more than I expected, and Ram is quite surprised. You have grown, it seems.”

Garfiel: “Isn’t it weird ta doubt that we will grow instead of admit we have grown?”

Ram’s true feelings slipped out, but the crucial Emilia did not seem to catch on, so Ram merely tugged Garfiel’s cheek to silence him.

At any rate, if the investigation had stalled it would be one thing, but seeing as it was progressing smoothly, it was hard to call it off here.

Therefore—

Ram: “For now, let us follow the carriage’s trail as far as we can.

The scent might cut off somewhere; if that happens, we can pull back.”

Emilia: “Mm, got it. Don’t worry, I’m sure it will lead us right to their destination. Garfiel, it’ll be hard work, but please.”

Garfiel: “Ya can leave it ta me. The Captain an’ Ottobro both told me, over and over, ta take care o’ Lady Emilia. I won’t be slackin’ off.”

Emilia: “Subaru and the others said that… Ah, but in this case the thing that won’t slack off is your nose, right?”

Garfiel: “Whoa, that’s true! Wahaha!”

Emilia: “Hehe, that’s funny.”

Garfiel burst into hearty laughter, while Emilia laughed softly.

Accompanying those two carefree investigators, Ram racked her brain over how to arrange a graceful exit.

Ram also felt that the brokerage the two had tracked down was highly suspicious, but events were proceeding far too smoothly. It was unthinkable that the other side was leaking information, so the only explanation was that Emilia and Garfiel had simply been too lucky.

Personally, Ram believed she had already fulfilled her obligation to Leno at this point, and that leaving the rest to the Costuul side would be perfectly acceptable. If they happened to solve the entire problem at this pace, there was a risk of embarrassing Leno, the city’s mayor.

Thus, while Ram thought it best to hand the investigation over to the Costuul side at some stage, bringing along the strangely enthusiastic Emilia and Garfiel—

Emilia: “Look, Ram! That dragon carriage—could it be the one we’re chasing?”

And so, when Garfiel’s nose-guided pursuit had neatly sniffed out what seemed to be the kidnappers' base, Ram felt an even stronger urge to clutch her head.

4

—Things had gone so smoothly, one good break after another, that stepping back was no longer an option.

Dragged into such an unusual situation, Ram's stern expression showed no sign of softening.

Emilia: "That dragon carriage seems to be creeping into that mountain… Is that a magic-ore mine?"

Garfiel: "Looks like it. Seems they're gatherin' folks from all over. The scent of the carriage we were chasin' got mixed up with the others, but that's the place for sure."

Emilia and Garfiel crouched low, peering from the bushes at the scene below.

Following the lingering scent of the broker's dragon carriage that had left Costuul, the three of them—Ram's wish to turn back ignored—had arrived squarely at their destination: a magic-ore excavation site.

Ram: "However, as far as Ram knows, there is no registered magic-stone mine in this area."

Garfiel: "Maybe it's just that ya don't know about it, Ram—ow ow ow!"

Ram: "Do you imagine there is anything concerning Lord Roswaal's domain that could escape Ram's notice?"

Emilia: "W-Wow, that's incredibly convincing…"

Pinching Garfiel's ear to silence him, Ram turned her gaze back to the same scene as the other two.

As Ram had just said, no declaration for a magic-ore mine existed in this area. In other words, this was an illegal, hidden dig—grounds enough for a raid by itself.

Yet the problem did not stop there.

Garfiel: “Dragon carriages keep showin’ up one after another outta nowhere.”

Emilia: “Really, they’re nonstop.”

That was the problem.

Just as the pair had observed, dragon carriages were slipping into the mine one after another, each one modified so its windows were sealed from the outside. It was practically an open admission that something shady was happening within.

Ram: “…Sloppy.”

Their work, their concealment—perhaps even their entire plan—could only be called sloppy. The fact that Ram’s party had come this far was not the fruit of any painstaking investigation.

To put it bluntly, both Emilia and Garfiel tended to act with broad strokes.

That held true here as well; with pursuers as unsubtle as those two closing this distance, it had only been a matter of time before the culprits were exposed.

However, the sloppier the enemy’s operation appeared, the harder it became to decide whether to pull back.

Unlike a methodical foe, a planless one was impossible to read; if they made a misstep, the other side might blunder even worse.

Ram: “I’d like to see what’s happening inside, but… I suppose there’s no helping it.”

Emilia: “Ram? What are you planning to do?”

Ram: “Ram wished to avoid the strain, but I am considering using Clairvoyance. If Ram can find someone inside whose wavelength matches, we can confirm the situation without effort.”

Emilia: “Uh… but Clairvoyance makes you reaaally tired, right? Are you sure you’ll be okay?”

At Ram’s self-sacrificing proposal, Emilia voiced her misgivings.

Emilia: “If it comes to that, couldn’t we just stop one of those carriages and ask directly? If they’re up to no good, they’ll show it right away.”

Ram: “If Lady Emilia were the only person in this world, that might resolve the issue, but things do not proceed so simply. Please think carefully.”

Emilia: “A world with only me in it…”

Garfiel: “The Captain’d probably be over the moon at that idea, though.”

Having her suggestion rejected, Emilia fell silent, while beside her Garfiel tilted his head. Keeping it at that angle, he went on, “But ya know—”

Garfiel: “This amazin’ self of mine agrees with ya on not pushin’ Ram too hard. And just so it’s clear, it ain’t ’cause I’ve got a crush on ya. Even though I do.”

Ram: “Quiet. In that case, what do you intend to do?”

Garfiel: “We can’t just storm the place, right? No tellin’ what those folks inside might pull.”

Surprisingly showing more insight than Emilia, Garfiel said as much. Receiving that, Ram narrowed her light-crimson eyes, and he turned his emerald gaze toward the mine’s entrance.

What his eyes followed were the dragon carriages coming and going —

Ram: “—Garf, surely you don’t mean…”

Garfiel: “Oh, I sure do. “Plates, water, and Gezigelei,” ya know?”

Emilia: “Um, what are we going to do?”

Understanding his intent, Ram exhaled. Unlike Ram, Emilia had no idea what he meant. Flashing his fangs in a grin at her, Garfiel declared,

Garfiel: “No point jawin’ about it from out here. —Let’s sneak inside.”

5

Ram: “…Sloppy.”

While pulling her hood down lower and surveying her surroundings, Ram could not help but mutter that.

The infiltration plan into a dragon carriage that Garfiel had proposed had succeeded far more easily than expected.

They had simply slipped into the bed of one of the dragon carriages going in and out of the mine, yet none of the look-outs had checked, so they passed straight through and made it inside.

Just in case they were discovered, they had put on workers’ robes as a disguise, but no one’s eyes stopped on them, so the measure came to nothing.

Anyway—

Emilia: “We made it inside without a hitch. I’m reaaally starting to get nervous…”

Saying so, Emilia looked around the inside of the mine with quick glances.

It could not be seen from outside, but despite being an illegal digging site, excavation work was proceeding smoothly, and quite a spacious passage had been made inside the tunnel. The dragon carriages passing back and forth were also used to carry out the excavated earth, and that might have been why inspections were lax.

Even so, there was no excusing such carelessness and gaps in security.

Ram: “To think they did all this right under Roswaal-sama’s nose.”

What welled up in Ram’s chest was anger at the discourtesy done to Roswaal.

Ordinarily, now that the situation was clear to this extent, Ram would promptly contact Leno, have guards dispatched to close the mine, and then strictly punish the people involved—that was the formal procedure.

There was only one reason Ram was not doing that: she wanted to punish this discourteous person with her own hands.

And—

Emilia: “We’re only one step away from the culprit now, right?”

Garfiel: “Oi oi, Emilia-sama. That ‘one step’ is the dang’rous bit, ya hear? From here on, treat it like the ‘Treasure of Karakari Pass,’ got it?”

Emilia: “You mean ‘be careful no matter what’? Mm, got it.”

With faces full of fighting spirit, Emilia and Garfiel pressed on; their presence and momentum pushed at Ram’s back. —In any endeavor there is such a thing as momentum.

In terms of problem-solving ability, Ram neither overestimated nor underestimated Emilia and Garfiel. Leaving aside roughhousing, their ability to deal with other problems was average.

However, at times momentum could link to results beyond one’s ability.

In that sense, the two of them now had tremendous momentum. Otherwise how could everything have gone so smoothly up to this point?

Ram: “Fortunately, no guards are passing by… Let’s head deeper.”

Garfiel: “Ha! Ram, you’re keen too, ain’tcha. A’right, let’s do it.”

Ram: “Indeed, we’ll kill them all.”

Garfiel: “Didn’t say we’d go that far?!”

Leading the two who had all that momentum, Ram merrily advanced into the depths of the mine.

Perhaps the effect of their good fortune, for on the way they did not run into even a single guard. Relying on the faint sounds echoing from within, the three of them drew close to the core of the mine.

And—

Emilia: “This is…!”

Too surprised for words, Emilia opened her amethyst eyes wide.

Spread out below them was a multi-tiered excavation space, and there stood people swinging pickaxes at the walls, engaged in mining work.

Of course, if it were merely excavation work, it would not be so surprising. However, if those workers were clad in shabby clothes, and if crude collars were fastened around their necks, that was another matter.

Ram: “—Those are ‘Collars of Subjugation.’”

Emilia: “‘Collars of Subjugation,’ the kind that were put on slaves in the distant past?”

Ram: “They were abolished in Lugunica quite long ago, but in Vollachia and Kararagi the practice still lingers. Even in Lugunica and Gusteko, it likely survives in the underworld.”

Hearing Ram’s answer, Emilia fell silent.

The ‘Collar of Subjugation’ was a kind of “Meteor” that forced the person wearing it into servitude. It was said that disobeying the master caused terrible pain; this was Ram's first time seeing one in person.

In any case, an environment where people were made to work with 'Collars of Subjugation' could hardly be called an ideal workplace.

Emilia: "More rotten than I imagined…"

Garfiel: "Bet some of the folks in that crowd are the Costuul guys. What d'we do? Break in, smash things up, and let 'em all escape…?"

Emilia: "No, we can't. If the 'Collar of Subjugation' activates, it'll hurt reaaally badly. If they use that as leverage, some people might refuse to run away with us."

Garfiel clicked his tongue, but said nothing more.

Emilia's concern could indeed become reality. Even if Garfiel rampaged here, that would not give them control over the collars. The slaves were also hostages.

The enemy might even drive the slaves at them on condition the collars wouldn't be triggered. That would be putting the cart before the horse.

Emilia: "So we have to find a way to deal with the collars. Umm, maybe we should talk to the person in charge here?"

Ram: "Please don't suddenly revert to being useless when we were making such good progress."

Emilia: "…Useless."

Ram: "As I said earlier, not everyone in the world is like Emilia-sama. Don't expect to resolve everything through discussion."

Emilia: "…Useless."

Garfiel: "Then we keep lookin' for a key fer the collars, yeah?"

Ram: “That would be wise. For that we must—”

Ram was about to say, “remove the slaves’ collars and then string up the ringleader,” when—

???: “Huh? What’re you lot doin’ here?”

At the gruff voice from behind, Ram and the others slowly turned around. Looking, they saw a rough-looking man peering at them from the far end of the passage they had come.

One glance at his neck made it obvious: the man was not on the used side but the using side. He was surely one of the group forcing the workers to wear ‘Collars of Subjugation’ and making them toil.

Beating this man alone would be no trouble, but if they did that, they would circle back to the earlier problem.

While Ram knit her brow slightly, wondering what to do—

Emilia: “Um! The truth is, we were just brought here as newcomers!”

Before Ram could choose any breakthrough, Emilia raised her voice. Turning to the man with some tension, she continued, “Umm—”

Emilia: “Right! The collars! We can’t work here unless we put on those collars, right? But this person couldn’t find a spare, so he’s in trouble.”

Garfiel: “Huh? Me?! …Y-Yeah, that’s right. Without a collar, I’m in deep trouble, but I’m new here. So I couldn’t find one.”

Man: “New, huh?”

At the little play put on by Emilia and Garfiel, the man’s face twisted nastily.

Seeing that, Ram slipped a hand toward the staff hidden under her skirt. If the man showed an opening, she would bury him in the wall at once.

Man: “Tch, useless bastard. This here is the work site; the collars are kept in the storehouse, obviously. This is what happens ’cause ya don’t remember after bein’ told once.”

But ignoring Ram’s resolve, the man easily swallowed Emilia’s story.

For a moment Ram suspected a high-level psychological ploy, but since he turned his back on them without hesitation, she judged it wasn’t.

Man: “C’mon, this way.”

Emilia: “Okay, thank you. Let’s go.”

Answering their guide, Emilia winked at Ram. Her look seemed to say, “It worked,” and Ram found herself too weary to reply.

But Ram’s headaches did not end there—

Man: “Yeah, y’know, when I first came outta the sticks I wanted to be somethin’ big. And now look at me, doin’ scut work in a place like this…”

Emilia: “I see. …But if that’s the case, then you can look forward to it.”

Man: “Look forward? Look forward to what…”

Emilia: “If you’re reaaally down right now, that means tomorrow you can be better than today. If this is the bottom, all that’s left is to climb uphill.”

Man: “…Little miss…! Yeah, you’re right. Guess I’ll give it a try…”

Thus ended the conversation between the man ahead and Emilia, pledging mutual effort for the future.

Emilia had fearlessly struck up conversation with him on the way, and thanks to an oddly good match of personalities the talk remained peaceful to the end.

It was good that he did not get suspicious, but there was no particular harvest either.

Emilia: “I was hoping to get some information…”

Ram: “What you learned is that Mr. Zaksen here has four younger sisters back home and struggles to send money to them.”

Emilia: “That’s not the information I meant.”

All Emilia had gained was knowledge of the man—Zaksen—his personality, and his family situation, which only made it harder to knock him out.

Zaksen: “Here. This is the collar storehouse.”

Guided by Zaksen, the three of them arrived in front of the warehouse where collars were stored.

In the usual flow newcomers were probably brought here, fitted with collars, and thereafter forced into endless hard labor.

However—

Ram: —

Emilia: “Mr. Zaksen? What’s wrong?”

Zaksen turned around, gripped Emilia’s shoulders, and spoke seriously.

Zaksen: “Run! Right now, this instant!”

Emilia: “But—”

Zaksen: “No buts! If you stay here, you’ll be worked to the bone too. Once a collar’s on, there’s no escape. So run while you can. Yeah—take this, whack me and get away!”

Emilia: “Eh?!”

As he spoke, Zaksen pressed the baton at his waist into Emilia’s hands.

Emilia: “If I do that, you’ll be—!”

Zaksen: “If you hit me and run, it’ll just mean I was a fool who let you escape. So—”

Ram: “Hmph!”

Zaksen: “Gwah!”

Since things were about to get complicated, Ram snatched the baton midway and struck Zaksen once. With that single blow he collapsed unconscious onto the passage floor.

Emilia: “R-Ram! What are you doing all of a sudden! Oh, that bump looks painful…”

Ram: “This is no time to be getting friendly. Yes, it is true your actions produced considerable effect, but that and this are separate issues. Garf!”

Garfiel: “Yeah, the warehouse’s contents. If we find a key for the collars, that’d make things quick…”

While Emilia tended to the fallen Zaksen, Ram and Garfiel searched the warehouse.

As Garfiel said, finding a way to unlock the collars would be best. Even failing that, some kind of bargaining chip would do—

Garfiel: “Oi, Ram. Aren’t these the collars?”

Saying that, Garfiel hauled a large box down from a shelf. Inside the rough box were objects that certainly looked like collars, which was strange.

Ram: “Though not especially rare, the ‘Collar of Subjugation’ is still a ‘Meteor.’ To think they’d store them so carelessly… I can’t say it’s impossible, considering how slipshod everything has been.”

Recalling the sloppiness up to this point, Ram denied her own preconception. Hearing her reply, Garfiel took one collar from the box.

Garfiel: “But these don’t look like the collars those folks were wearin’, do they?”

Ram: “I’m beginning to think that might be the case. Yet… Wait, hold on.”

Garfiel: “Huh?”

Ram grabbed the collar Garfiel was dangling from his finger, stared at it intently—and then,

Ram: “…This is—”

6

Bald Foreman: “—What’s going on, what happened?!”

Having heard the racket in the quarry, a middle-aged, bald-headed man bellowed in anger.

He was the owner of the mine, the mastermind who had been forcing a great many people to toil here. That vile scheme of his was now on the verge of collapsing right before his eyes.

Subordinate: “Boss! The labor force is bolting! Not a single one of ’em will listen!”

Another Subordinate: “Then let’s just fire up the “subjugation collars!” Make an example of—no, hell, make every last one of ’em suffer! Once they feel the pain, they won’t have any fight left!”

Unable to reign in the turmoil, the underlings gave up on pacification and made that proposal.

Their reaction was only natural: the quarry held slaves brought in from all over—on the order of a hundred. If they all rose up at once, their sheer momentum would swallow the overseers whole. That, after all, was why the “subjugation collars” existed.

Subordinate: “Boss, we’ve gotta hurry!”

The laborers were throwing down their pickaxes and swarming toward the mine entrance. Watching them, an underling urged the activation of the collars.

The mastermind drew a breath, raised an old staff ostentatiously, and barked,

Bald Foreman: “Oi, you lot, quit movin’! Stop right now or you’ll be sorry!”

Those laborers who had been shoving and scrambling to escape froze at the foreman’s roar. In the eyes they turned back on him flickered anxiety, fear—and doubt.

That glint of doubt made the mastermind’s mouth go dry.

Voice in Hood: “…You certainly do talk big.”

Three figures stepped out from the line of laborers, drawing his gaze: two people with hoods pulled low and a boy with spiky golden hair who radiated a strange intensity. The speaker was one of the hooded pair, and from the voice he knew it was a woman.

Bald Foreman: “I don’t keep no women in my crew. A slave talkin’ big to me—now that’s rich.”

Hooded Woman: “Given the situation, it’s amazing you can still act high and mighty. Need I remind you the numbers are overwhelmingly on our side?”

Bald Foreman: “Numbers, maybe, but quality’s different. Take a look at the collars around their necks.”

He jabbed a finger at the laborers’ shackles. At that, the workers traded uneasy glances.

Bald Foreman: “The power of a “subjugation collar” is somethin’ else, y’know? Once you get hit, you’ll never wanna defy me again.

Bones creak, flesh bursts, yer piss turns bright red with blood. Unless you fancy that—"

Hooded Woman: "And unless we do?"

Bald Foreman: "Then take your pals and get back to your posts. But first, lose the hoods."

Hooded Woman: "…Our hoods? Why?"

Bald Foreman: "Depending on the looks, you might be worth more sellin' elsewhere than diggin' rock, that's why."

Sighing at his demand, the hooded woman spoke over her shoulder.

Hooded Woman: "It seems he insists, Lady Emilia."

Second Hooded Woman: "Eh? If you say so, then… all right."

Bald Foreman: "—Huh?"

Slowly, the two women removed their white coverings, and the foreman could only gape.

Not only the foreman—his underlings and even the laborers stared, petrified.

Standing there were a girl with peach-pink hair and a girl with silvery hair—both stunningly beautiful. But that was not all.

Bald Foreman: "Silver hair… amethyst eyes… a half-elf… and did you say Emilia…?"

Emilia: "Yes, that's right. Oh, you know who I am?"

Bald Foreman: "Know ya? Yer one of the loudest troublemakers in the whole kingdom! What's a royal candidate doin' here as a slave? Talk about busy!"

Emilia: "He-He, actually I'm not a slave. I was only pretending to be one!"

Tossing back her silver hair, Emilia declared it with fearless confidence. Inside, the mastermind screamed: “This is bad—really bad!”

He had managed to deceive many and work them like mules, but taking on a royal candidate was far beyond his pay grade. Someone entrusted with the kingdom’s future was far too much for a petty villain like him to handle.

Emilia: “You should give up already. You can see you have no chance of winning.”

Bald Foreman: “N-No chance? And what’s that based on…? We still have the collars! H-Hey! If you lot don’t wanna be punished, grab these three—”

Peach-Haired Girl: “Enough. The trick’s already been exposed.”

Bald Foreman: “What did you say?”

Peach-Haired Girl: “Still don’t get it? Then how about this?”

With a chill in her voice, the peach-haired girl withdrew her arm from her cloak.

Before the foreman’s wary eyes, she produced a collar—identical to those on the laborers’ necks, likely taken from storage—and fastened it around her own throat without hesitation.

Peach-Haired Girl: “There. I’ve put one on. Why don’t you activate the “subjugation collar”?”

The Foreman swallowed hard.

Ram: “Right now you could hurt poor, delicate Ram as much as you like. If Emilia or Garf sees me suffering, they’ll be powerless to resist you, no?”

She flicked the collar with a finger while calmly laying out the foreman’s victory scenario.

It was probably true. Emilia watched her with anxious eyes, and the golden-haired boy’s fury warped the very air around him. Yet both respected the girl's resolve and made no rash move.

Subordinate (whispering): "B-Boss… the girl's right. It's now or never…!"

But the mastermind, slick with cold sweat, could not answer.

Of course not—the girl's action had proven it. The trick was blown.

Ram: "You stockpiled a heap of collars and slapped them on slaves, then made them believe they were "subjugation collars." And lo and behold—"

Subordinate: "Ah…"

Ram: "They thought they might win in revolt, but someone would be the first to suffer. No one wished to be that first victim. You exploited that fear beautifully."

Her cold gaze pierced the mastermind's entire scheme.

Hope filled the laborers' eyes, while his subordinates turned on him in shock and anger—yet amid that storm of stares, the foreman barked a laugh.

Bald Foreman: "So ya've uncovered my plan and feel satisfied? What a petty thing to be proud of, royal candidate!"

Emilia: "Eh? Me?"

Bald Foreman: "That girl's words—you put her up to 'em, didn't ya? Impressive. But I ain't wrong, y'hear? The world's full of swindlers and the swindled. Live without thinkin' and you'll get used—that's how it goes! So what's wrong with me usin' that fact?!"

Emilia stepped forward and jabbed a finger at him.

Emilia: "Obviously the one who lies is the bad one!"

The extreme retort met with an extreme rebuttal, yet the mastermind did not back down; he stepped forward instead.

Bald Foreman: “Listen! This kinda thing happens everywhere. You royal candidates may be stirrin’ up the kingdom, but whoever gets the throne, our lives won’t change. Somebody’s always payin’ the price. No king can see every corner of the realm!”

Emilia’s eyes widened at his roar.

From behind, the peach-haired girl laid a hand on Emilia’s shoulder and shook her head.

Ram: “Please, Lady Emilia, don’t listen. It’s mere sour grapes—words meant only to cloud your heart.”

Emilia: “Even if it is… I can’t ignore it!”

Gently removing the hand, Emilia’s lovely face hardened with firm resolve.

Her amethyst gaze struck the mastermind breathless. Then she pressed him.

Emilia: “You’re right: even a king would find it hard to look after every corner. But if I become queen, I’ll remember today. I’ll do my best so I can hear everyone’s voices.”

Bald Foreman: “From that lofty throne? Don’t make me laugh!”

Emilia: “Then I’ll come down from the throne and speak to people—just like today!”

Bald Foreman: “Guh…”

She thrust a finger right under his nose, silencing him. He groped for a retort, but before he could—

Man with Knowing Smile: “—Looks like we’ve lost, boss.”

A man with a knowing expression lightly patted the foreman’s shoulder from behind.

Emilia: “Mr. Zaksen!”

Emilia called his name before the foreman could. The man nodded brightly at her recognition.

Something snapped inside the mastermind. Like hell he would accept defeat here.

Bald Foreman: “Don’t be absurd! I ain’t finished yet! Not in a dump like thi—”

Ram: “…I see. Lady Emilia spoke at length, yet you persist. Then there’s nothing more to say.”

At the sight of the trembling, furious foreman, the peach-haired girl’s voice held pity.

Stepping forward now was the golden-haired boy who had watched events unfold. Cracking the bones in his fists, baring sharp fangs, he asked,

Golden-Haired Boy: “Hey, Ram. We good ta go?”

Ram: “Yes. Lady Emilia, Garf—finish it.”

The instant that final order was given, the golden-haired youth became a savage gale that tore through the quarry, while Emilia unleashed freezing air from her hands to restrain the underlings.

Overwhelmed by their power, the mastermind realized the vast gulf between them and himself.

Yet—

Bald Foreman: “Even a villain’s got his pride—raaah!”

Knowing he could not win, he still clenched his fists and leapt at the boy—

—and in the very next moment, the mastermind’s body was sent flying, high and light, with ridiculous ease.

Zaksen: “I’m gonna get myself a brand-new, spotless body and come back home. Till then, stay healthy, Lil’ Miss.”

???: “Sure. You take care too, Mister Zaksen.”

And with that humble meeting and parting, the illegal mining site was shut down.

The mastermind and his cronies who had turned a blind eye to everything were apprehended, while the people tricked into wearing collars were safely liberated and sent back to their respective hometowns.

Of course, that included the missing persons from Costuul as well—

Leno Rex: “…I never imagined it would be wrapped up in a single day.”

Ram: “They were louts who chose to commit evil in Lord Roswaal’s domain. Naturally, they were disposed of swiftly.”

Leno Rex, the city mayor, peered at Ram and the others who had finished the grand roundup, wearing a rare look of stupefaction. If Roswaal heard about it, it would surely make for a delightful souvenir story.

Thus, the large-scale fraud case that had embroiled the Industrial City of Costuul and its surrounding towns came to a close—so smoothly, in fact, that it scarcely felt real.

Garfiel: “Still, there sure were some real nutjobs cookin’ up crazy schemes, huh?”

Ram: “Indeed… To plot something that foolish in Lord Roswaal’s territory.”

Garfiel: “Nah, I ain’t talkin’ ’bout where they did it but what they did, my amazin’ self is. Guess the world outside the forest’s chock-full o’ more danger than I figured.”

Scratching his head vigorously, Garfiel reflected on the day’s events as they made their way home. For him, who had spent his life within the Sanctuary, every custom and happening in the outside world was fresh; today's experience would surely be recorded as yet another new page in his story.

If possible, he deserved brighter, more uplifting experiences as well.

Garfiel: "Hm? Ram, somethin' on my amazin' face?"

Ram: "Your eyes, nose, and fangs are all stuck on in the most ridiculous places."

Garfiel: "There ain't nothin' ridiculous about 'em!"

Ram dodged the question about having been staring at his profile, and Garfiel let out a deep sigh. Then he went on,

Garfiel: "…Still, Lady Emilia's last bit back there was pretty good, yeah?"

Ram: "…True. That declaration of hers was not bad at all."

Garfiel: "Comin' down off the throne like that's great. A king like that's real interestin', if ya ask my amazin' self."

At the sight of Garfiel baring his fangs in a grin, Ram allowed her lips to soften ever so slightly. Indeed, shutting up the mastermind and all, it had been a satisfying remark. Above all, it rang with Emilia's trademark resolve and vow.

Plucking out evil by the roots and hearing Emilia's proclamation made the day's hectic turmoil worthwhile—Ram could admit that, at least to herself.

—However,

Ram: "—What? Staring so intently, how indecent."

Garfiel: "Nah, well, it's like… I'm thinkin' Ram's a fine woman even with a collar on, believe it or not."

Ram: "…"

Garfiel: “Ow-Ow-ow-ow-ow!”

She pinched the cheek that had offered up needless words, forcing tears into his eyes and drawing a shriek from him. Around Ram’s own neck was a rugged iron collar—the key had vanished when the mastermind went flying, leaving it impossible to remove.

In the end, after everyone at the mansion had teased her to no end about the collar, Roswaal removed it with his own hands, causing Ram’s feelings for her master to grow ever hotter.

A side note, but—

Subaru: “Ah, Emilia-tan, you’re awfully late getting back. Petra and Frederica’s appliqué skills have leveled up like crazy over here, but did something happen on your end?”

Emilia: “Mhm! We beat up the bad guys properly and helped reaaally lots of people who were in trouble!”

Subaru: “All in the one day I wasn’t around?!”

Thus, there was even a scene where the knight on house-sitting duty was left aghast by his mistress’s innocent report, but in its own way that, too, served as a fitting close to this broadly sketched, chaotic day.

Chapter 76:
Chance Meetings at the Imperial Capital

1

It was while Rem was strolling through the mansion where she was held under house arrest, that she noticed a certain woman.

In the heights of the battle at the Fortress City of Guaral, in order to treat a wounded Flop O'Connell, Rem had been abducted from the city along with him—taken, to the Imperial Capital, and placed under house arrest in what was probably one of the most magnificent mansions in the city.

However, while it was called house arrest, Rem still possessed relatively ample freedom.

She was not confined to cramped rooms or prisons, nor was she subjected to excessive violence or verbal abuse. While it could have hardly been called tranquil, it was possible for one to say that the treatment she got was mild.

Food was prepared for every mealtime, and a time for bathing was also available. In some ways, it was definitely a better place to live than in the village of the People of Shudraq.

However, even though she was not imprisoned, she still could not go outside the mansion, as the Soldiers responsible for security—the private army of Berstetz Fondalfon, kept watch, reminding her of her limitations.

In any case, leaving aside the topic of whether she was more free than not, the situation at hand was not one she wished for.

Naturally, she had made Kuna and Holly experience some inadequacy, and it would not be surprising if she were now the object of Priscilla's indignation, having left as she pleased.

Above all, how would the people that had left for the east react upon their return?

Louis, Medium, and the boy named Natsuki Subaru—.

???: “—Ah.”

And, it was while Rem was lost in her own thoughts that brought her heartache, that she heard a painfully feeble voice.

Upon turning her face toward the direction of the voice, she saw an unfamiliar figure in the garden in the center of the mansion—one likely used more as a courtyard for the purpose of mounting and dismounting flying dragons, than for preserving a lush green landscape.

Although she had not met all of the Soldiers and servants working in the mansion, she could tell at a glance that the person was neither of these.

For the reason, was because that very person did not walk on their own feet, and sat in a chair with wheels attached.

???: “Kuh, ugh…”

She was a fair-skinned woman with unruly dark-brown hair, which was parted in two on either side of her head. Her long-lashed blue eyes flickered, and then she put strength into her slender shoulders and leaned forward.

What those trembling arms were putting strength into was the wheeled chair she was sitting in—specifically, the wheels of her wheelchair. They possessed large rims, which the person sitting in the chair could turn by hand to move forwards or backwards.

However, it seemed one of the wheels had got caught in a ditch in the corner of the path and, unable to get out, she had been stuck there.

???: “…”

Biting on her thin lips with force, the woman strenuously tried time after time to turn the wheel.

Still, her slender arms did not provide the necessary strength, and the wheel just wiggled back and forth fruitlessly. If she were to raise her voice and call for help, someone would have rushed to her, and yet she did not.

She did not want to rely on anyone. Rem felt a sense of kinship with such obstinacy. Of course, she did not know due to what emotional state she was like that, but—

Rem: “—I’ll help you.”

???: “Ah…”

Unable to leave her be, Rem walked over to the woman stuck in the ditch, and called out to her from behind.

Immediately rolling her eyes, the woman looked over her shoulder and gasped at Rem’s presence. But soon her look became one of embarrassment, chewing on her lips as she went silent.

Rem, once again feeling a sense of kinship to her reaction, placed her hand on the back of the wheelchair.

The back of the wheelchair had handles on either side, so that a person standing behind could push it. And so, putting her hands there, and pushing it,

Rem: “One, two aaand three!”

Rem put her strength into it, the wheel bounced with a bang, and the wheelchair escaped from the ditch in which it was stuck.

Using her hands, the woman stopped the wheelchair which had moved slightly forward with too much momentum, then abruptly spun the wheels on the spot and looked back toward Rem.

And then—

???: “…Who asked you, to do that.”

And what came, was a very particular greeting.

Rem: "…"

Reflexively, Rem's eyes went wide and blinked in surprise, as she was taken aback by the woman's words.

Meanwhile, the woman averted her eyes from Rem, chewing on her lips,

???: "I would've been fine without help for something that trivial. I mean, what do you think you're doing, when you need a cane yourself? Y-you should rather worry about yourself."

Rem: "Ummm… Thank you for your concern."

???: "I'm not worried or anything! Are your ears perhaps not working properly? If not, then I guess the problem's in your head, yes it's rather in your head."

Rem belatedly realized that those stammered words were apparently meant to be a cutting remark.

Her tone was harsh, but since the subtle sense that she was not accustomed to such speech hung in the air, she lacked the talent to deal damage with such sarcasm.

Frankly speaking, from Rem's point of view, after encountering Priscilla, the difference in the potency of this woman and Priscilla, was about the same as that between a puppy and Mizelda.

???: "N-now, get lost. I don't have the free time to be concerned about… about you."

Rem: "If you don't have any free time, does that mean you have some role to fulfill?"

???: "A role…! Y-yes, that's right. I have a proper role. Unlike you…"

After having been asked a question in return by Rem, the woman answered, her cheeks stiffening. As she answered, she scrunched up her thin eyebrows and looked Rem over top to bottom as if scrutinizing her.

Then, she brought her right thumb to her mouth, chomped at it ever-so-slightly, and,

???: "…A face I haven't seen, and a presence I hadn't noticed. Who are you?"

Rem: "—. My name is Rem. Because of some circumstances, I was abducted to this mansion."

???: "Abducted…"

Rem: "Yes. Hmm, may I ask for your name?"

In order to approach the woman biting her nails and muttering, Rem asked for her name.

She thought that, perhaps, the likelihood of receiving an unfriendly rejection was higher.

???: "—Katya."

However, surprisingly without reserves, she—Katya had introduced herself as such.

Rem did not know if it was due to some ulterior motive, or if she had named herself reflexively while she was lost in thought, but Katya seemingly deliberated as she continued to bite her nails.

Katya: "By abducted, do you mean that you're a hostage too?"

Rem: "Hostage… That may very well be the case. It does not seem appropriate to request that I play such a role…"

Unmistakably, Subaru was probably the only one that would worry non-stop over Rem's disappearance.

Of course, she felt the Shudraqians and the O'Connell siblings would be anxious as well, and Priscilla might at least move an eyebrow, but that would not affect the overall situation.

Rem's existence would only affect the overall situation, when Subaru affected the overall situation.

However—

Rem: “I wouldn’t expect that person to go that far.”

To Rem, it did not seem likely that he could do it, nor did she think that he should.

In a short time, she had been shown, time and time again for a short period, a figure resisting and resisting earnestly with their lack of ability as he was tormented by absurdity. His figure, as he kept on shouldering the burden of having to do everything by himself.

Rem could not stand it at all. It was not because she disliked or hated him.

It was still difficult to verbalize why that was, though.

Rem: “…”

Katya: “…Hey, don’t just go silent on me?”

Rem: “Ah, sorry. I was just lost in thought… Katya, what are you to Berstetz?”

Called out to by Katya, whose eyes had sharpened, Rem apologized for her silence, then posed a question.

Since she was in this mansion, there was no doubt that Katya also had some connection to Berstetz. However, it was difficult to imagine their relationship.

If she were someone with fighting strength like what Madelyn possessed, or if she were to look like an Imperial Soldier, the relationship would be obvious, but Katya’s appearance made it difficult to establish any sort of connection.

If there was anything that came to mind—

Rem: “Berstetz’s daughter or grandchild, perhaps?”

Katya: “A relative of Prime Minister-sama? Oh, stop it you. In the first place, Berstetz-sama isn't married, and supposedly doesn't have a family. I'm not that big of a deal."

Rem: "Is that so? That's surprising."

"Surprising?", Katya said as she tilted her head, but Rem shook her head as to gloss over her words' true meaning.

Once before, at the time Berstetz and Rem had met face-to-face, he had explained the reason for his own rebellion against the Emperor —that was, his distrust of an Emperor that would not produce an heir. From Berstetz's standpoint as someone working for the nation, the Emperor's actions would seem like a dishonorable dereliction of duty.

Rem had been satisfied with that logic, even if it was difficult for her to sympathize, having been dragged into it.

However, the fact that Berstetz had started a rebellion for such a reason was unconvincing when he himself, just like the Emperor, did not have a family.

Of course, she believed Berstetz had his own reasons.

Rem: "But, if you're not either of those, why are you in the mansion?"

Katya: "…You're an unperceptive woman. I asked if you were also hostage."

Rem: "—. Does that mean, that you're a hostage as well, Katya-san?"

With Rem returning with a question, Katya begrudgingly nodded, the bitter look on her face unchanging.

Katya, too, was being held captive in the mansion as someone's hostage. —Slightly surprised at that fact, Rem spun around and surveyed the mansion.

A spacious mansion amidst the Imperial Capital, a mansion enveloped in a majestic atmosphere.

However, there were probably many other secrets lying within, of which Rem and Katya, as well as the injured Flop, were a part of.

Having confronted Berstetz directly, Rem recognized the old man as someone of great intellectual stature, a formidable wall standing in the way of Abel's attempt to regain the imperial throne.

However, Rem's imagination and speculation would probably never be able to wholly gauge just how dreadful Berstetz could be, should he be willing to scheme and target his enemy's weaknesses.

Rem: "Your family must surely be very worried about you having been taken hostage."

Katya: "…I wouldn't be so sure about that. To him, I might be nothing more than a replaceable tool. I-if I get in the way, he'll drop me like a hot potato."

Averting her gaze, so spat out Katya.

Even though her speech had not faltered, Rem could tell that those seemingly hateful words were not her true feelings. She had a clue as to what lay behind Katya's attitude.

Rem: "…"

After all, that was the same shade of obstinacy belonging to none other than Rem.

She did not know what kind of person Katya would curse and keep at a distance. However, this complaint was more for the sake of convincing herself rather than it was for Rem to hear.

It was a lie told because she did not want herself to have too much faith in or too high expectations for that person.

It was a lie precisely because she did not want to admit that the other person thought her irreplaceable, nor that the other person was irreplaceable to her.

It was a lie specifically to deceive "herself". Not anyone else.

Rem: “Katya-san, would you like to talk some more?”

Katya: “Wh-What… Doing something so selfish, to Prime Minister-sama…”

Rem: “I don’t think he’ll be angry. If he does get angry, then tell him I forced you to do it.”

Katya: “But, it isn’t actually like th… Ah, wait!”

With trembling lips, Katya attempted to reject Rem. Quickly moving around behind Katya, Rem tucked her cane under her arm and gently gripped the handle of her wheelchair.

While pushing the wheelchair, Rem could support her own body in addition to the other person’s. With this, she would not fall even without the cane, and surprisingly, it was not a terrible position.

Katya: “J-just doing as you please… As if I would…”

Rem: “In which direction is your room, Katya-san? My room is on the west side.”

Katya: “…O-on the opposite side, the east side.”

Rem: “Understood. Well then, let’s head that way.”

Hearing Katya’s feeble reply, Rem pushed the wheelchair and started walking. Only at the start was there a slight resistance, but Katya soon detached her fingers from the wheel, and went along for the ride.

She was aware that she was being a bit forceful in moving the conversation forward, but Rem was anything but hesitant in pushing it.

In honest truth, she did not possess any ulterior motives, such as befriending Katya to make visible a way out of this deadlock, or her holding knowledge of an important secret to the mansion.

Probably, Katya’s presence would not be useful in moving the situation along.

Faintly so, she understood that the reason why Berstetz, who held Rem and Katya's beings hostage, had no family himself, was so that he would have no weaknesses.

And yet, there were several reasons why Rem was trying to come to terms with Katya in this way, but—

Rem: "—There are so many things I have to know."

After having become a captive, she had the belief and resolve that she could not be the kind of weak person who would only spread the seeds of anxiety and worry in the people who knew her.

Therefore, Rem would make every effort. Even if she did not know how to, she would do things her own way.

Priscilla: "—No one can escape from who they are. Strive to remember my words, be diligent."

There were more pressing things to do than to repudiate her own helplessness.

Indeed, for the sake of putting into practice the words of that person, to not remain at a standstill.

2

—Flop slowly opened his eyelids, having felt the presence of someone else in the room.

Flop: "…"

Shaking off the restless hand of drowsiness that entangled him, Flop's consciousness returned to reality.

In the view of his now-open eyes, a clean white ceiling was visible, and he quickly came to the understanding that he was in the room of the mansion where he was being held captive.

He was way past the point of panicking because of this realization. It also did not catch him off-guard anymore, and, as a result, he did not make himself experience pain by suddenly moving his body because of his surprise.

But still, it was still too early to say that he was acclimated to the situation, considering there was still some feeling of uneasiness left.

Flop: “As a merchant, I can’t help but be impatient, being bedridden for days like this, alright.”

He was a peddler whose efforts on a given day determined how much money he had at its end.

He could hardly call it his strong suit, but having an elaborate business plan was the shortcut to success. And even if he did not succeed, he still needed to earn even just a little bit.

Thus, being tied to a bed in this manner, agitated and distressed him despite the quite leisurely position he found himself in.

Wondering how Medium would react if she knew he was being held captive, only made it worse.

In any case—

Flop: “I can hardly ask Wife-san to bring me to perfect condition at this very moment. What an irritating situation.”

In order to treat Flop’s injuries, Rem was also being held captive in the mansion.

For Subaru’s sake, as well as the others who worried for her, Rem had to be brought home safely at any cost, but her situation was far from being secure.

Rem’s current position, that of being Flop’s healer, would become quite uncertain once Flop made a complete recovery.

He had hoped that Rem would not immediately be disposed of, as someone who no longer had any use.

Flop: “I guess you could say that depends exactly on your mood, Miss Madelyn.”

Having collected and organized his thoughts, Flop proceeded to cast this particular subject of conversation towards the room's entrance.

Flop had been awakened by the presence of a certain someone. The other person's voice could not be heard, but it was obvious that someone was in the room and there were only two people who usually visited him.

Only two; whether it be Rem who came to treat him, or Madelyn who appeared more frequently.

Leaving aside Rem, who had been given unexpected freedom within the mansion; around Madelyn, Flop had to be somewhat careful.

Despite her childish appearance, she had tremendous physical strength and could easily rip and tear through Flop with her claws. In addition, she was a proud member of the dragonkin—someone who Flop, despite having been through many different paths in life, had no idea how to deal with.

Besides, Flop did not want to mislead Madelyn, nor deceive her with lies, even though she would possibly scold him for being blind to the situation.

Even Flop had not gone through life without telling a lie. He was proud of the fact that he had relied on the power of words more than anyone else in the Empire, precisely because of his apparent lack of strength.

Being that, the reason as to why he wished to avoid doing anything that would make Madelyn believe he was trying to win her over, was that she genuinely cared about Flop's precious "close friend".

He imagined a particular "close friend" of his would be appalled at his seemingly stupid way of life.

Flop: "That's the way I live my life, nothing I can do about it."

Flop was spending his time at the mansion with the determination to take the offensive.

Therefore, engaging Madelyn in a battle devoid of lies, in which he would make full use of his conversational arts and power of his speech so that her interest would not be exhausted—was something he expected to happen on this day.

But it was not to be. Since—

Flop: “Miss Madelyn? I thought you might be here to ask me to continue our conversation from yesterday. What was the surprising thing Balleroy said the first time Carillion flew in the sky? I cut off the conversation at that point where—”

???: “—While that sounds like an interesting topic, it shan’t be the one discussed now.”

Flop: “…”

Flop, who was lying on his bed, talking to the person who was supposedly there, fell in silence upon being answered by a voice different from the one he had expected.

Flop had assumed it was Madelyn at the entrance, but the answer was returned through the voice of a man. A voice he had heard before.

It was only his small pride, but Flop would never forget a voice having heard it once.

Even if it came from a corner of a busy market, Flop could recognize it. Which was why he had not mistaken the voice.

However, after hearing the voice in question, Flop’s feelings became complex to the extreme.

After all, his relationship with said party had changed quite drastically, at least as far as Flop was concerned.

Flop: “Village Chief-kun… No, perhaps I should say, His Excellency the Emperor-kun?”

???: “You rephrase yourself, and yet you came to that? Either way, it seems there is no substitute for the profane name you have dubbed me with.”

Calling out quietly, Flop strained his trembling arms and sat up on the bed. He still felt a faint numbness in his upper body and a tightness in his skin, but it was not unbearable.

Then raising his gaze, he finally caught sight of a figure standing at the entrance to the room.

Standing there was a young man with black hair, fair skin, and sharp eyes.

His attire was dominated by vermilion and his slender figure matched what he had seen many times before. His face, his eyes, his nose, everything was familiar.

Abel—No, Vincent Vollachia.

That was the name of the current Emperor of the Sacred Vollachian Empire, the rebellious wolf who had been driven from his throne, presently seeking to reclaim it.

Having been called disrespectful by the very man behind it all himself, Flop smiled and bowed his head.

Flop: “Excuse me, perhaps I should rephrase. No, perhaps I should also change my speech in general. How embarrassing, would you mind if I start over from the beginning?”

Vincent: “No need. Starting over shan’t make up for the deeds you have committed. More importantly, are you a citizen resolved to pledge allegiance and devotion to the Emperor of Vollachia?”

Flop: “I wonder. His Excellency is the Emperor of the country in which I live. Since the reign of His Excellency Vincent Vollachia, disputes, including skirmishes between tribes, have decreased dramatically. I’d say I’m grateful for a country that has become a better place to live.”

Vincent: “That is a very suggestive way of putting it. You dare play with idle words in front of the Emperor?”

The Emperor shrugged his slender shoulders and slowly stepped forward.

Flop's eyes widened as the figure became more clearly visible up close. For all intents and purposes, the figure was that of the very Abel he was already acquainted with.

But he knew that the man in front of him was not that Abel.

Flop: "I'm very embarrassed by my lack of knowledge, but you really have made a good likeness of him, haven't you? It'd need to be that good to befit the role of a body double, I guess."

Vincent: "If you continue to speak so frivolously, I shall have no choice but to muzzle you. It is naught more than the wish of the Flying Dragon General, Madelyn Eschart, that has provided you shelter here. But where shall the scales tip towards, the General's wishes or mine whims?"

Flop: "I'll accept your advice to take care in my words. However, I cannot promise that I'll be able to put it into practice! My feelings are very mixed, after all! I'd very much like to remark further on that face of yours!"

Vincent: "…"

Being pointed at with a snap, the other party remained silent after that loud insistence from Flop.

Flop was at a loss on how to address the other party—the one who was not Abel, who, for the sake of convenience, he had decided to call Vincent.

Flop knew that Vincent was a false Emperor, a man who had plotted to usurp the throne. However, Flop did not possess any reason to denounce him per-se.

If Flop and Abel were bound by a firm friendship, having built a relationship in which they would be willing to speak out on each other's behalf at every such event, then it would only be natural, but that was not the case.

Rather, Flop and Abel's relationship was more complicated as well.

Flop: "Unfortunately, the person I really want to give my remarks to is someone else, someone who's got the same face as you. But still, it truly looks very much alike… I helped Husband-kun do Village Chief-kun's makeup, it looks just like his bare face."

Vincent: "—. The matter of the Fortress City has reached my ears, so you were a part of that scheme too? I can only imagine that you have all tried to besmirch the Emperor's rule in some ungodly fashion. It was an act of barbarism, and one beyond measure."

Flop: "Is that so? It was a fun venture. And most importantly, there were no casualties."

Vincent: "That is just a justification based solely upon the results."

Flop's cheeks relaxed, and he thought about the plan for the fortified city that he, Subaru, and Abel had collaborated on.

It was a plan that Flop had found astonishing, but it was the funniest of all the plots in which Flop had ever been involved.

Everyone involved in that operation had certainly wished for its success.

Flop: "Miss Taritta and Miss Kuna did, and I did, as well. —That's why I can't unravel it."

Vincent: "…"

Flop: "Husband-kun, His Excellency the Emperor-kun… I wonder why he, who I still don't know how to call, was ousted from the Imperial Throne and put in that position."

Flop looked at Vincent, cutting him off, "More to the point".

He looked towards the usurper of the throne, whose expression did not even waver, his face a mirror image of the Emperor's.

Flop: "Just why did you and your people have to make our rock-solid Empire quake, why did you have to raise this disturbance?"

Vincent: "—. You are quite the talkative man, are you not?"

Flop: “It’s a tool of the trade. I’m a merchant. Also, my dear sister often compliments me on my good looks. That’s another tool of the trade.”

Vincent: “I see. In that case—”

Flop had a toothy grin on his face; Vincent nodded at his words, composed, before suddenly grabbing Flop’s face with his outstretched hand and pulling him closer.

Forced to lean forward, his wounds sore, Flop moaned out a “Muggh”. However, Vincent paid no heed to his cries of pain, but stared at Flop closely.

Vincent: “I can take your face and mouth right here and now to atone for your disrespect.”

His voice slid coldly into Flop’s eardrums with an intimidating quality that went down from his head to his body and froze his heart.

For a person who would not shut his mouth like Flop, disrespect towards the Emperor was considered to be unforgivable, yet Vincent’s reply was level-headed with a hint of resentment.

Even as he contemplated what it meant—

Flop: “…If you mean that I should watch my mouth, it might make more sense to take away my voice.”

Once again, Flop looked back at Vincent with an ugly look on his face, which was still being gripped, giving an answer that was likely to provoke him and make him even angrier.

For a moment, Vincent’s dark eyes narrowed at Flop’s answer, but the emotion that passed within was swept away without being expressed overtly.

Vincent batted one of his eyes shut, letting go of Flop’s face. His look was one which Abel, whom Vincent mimicked, used to do often when observing other people.

Vincent: “I made it clear that it was to be understood which of these is more important, mine whims or Madelyn Eschart’s wishes. However, then there would be no avoiding her defection nor rebellion. Is the attitude you have one of reading this far?”

Flop: “Huh? Oh, ah, I see. Miss Madelyn would get angry for sure if I die. That’s not good for you either… I hadn’t thought that far ahead, but surely…”

Vincent: “…”

Flop: “If I, as a prisoner, had risked my life to try and get one over on His Excellency the Emperor-kun, I could’ve at least encouraged Miss Madelyn’s defection. —Unfortunately though, I can’t do that now.”

At Vincent’s suggestion, Flop reassessed the value of his life.

With Madelyn’s interests now focused on himself, if Flop’s life were to be taken away unnecessarily, it would be difficult to tame the bestial danger she would pose.

If Madelyn were to defect from Vincent, the rebellious Abel side would have an advantage.

It was understandable that Vincent would suspect that he was provoking him due to that.

Vincent: “I hear that you will not yield to any threats and that you will not hesitate to risk your life. It is just as Berstetz said, you seem to be some kind of ill-begotten misfortune.”

Flop: “It seems that I’ve been put in such a position unknowingly. Now, what do you think, Fake Emperor-kun? I’m very difficult to deal with!”

Vincent: “I hear there was a healer girl who was brought here with you. If you care about that girl’s well-being, you shall refrain from unnecessary words and behavior, and remain quiet.”

Flop: “I’ve been completely shut down!”

With Rem being used as a shield, Flop suddenly had no more moves to make.

But there was probably no helping it; he had to get Rem back home safely, no matter what it took.

Besides—

Flop: “I myself can’t decide what I should do.”

Ultimately, one could say Flop’s position had become the same as Madelyn’s.

Should he, like Madelyn, join the rebellion she was part of, and then plot viciously to eliminate Abel, whom they had ousted, and slowly make him pay for his crimes?

A merchant whose only merit was that his little sister complimented him on his goodness.

Vincent: “Even without Madelyn Eschart, Berstetz shall not do you any harm. Bear in mind what your position is and make sure you spend your time here without stirring up any discord.”

Vincent declared that with his eyes fixed upon the silent Flop.

From what he said, Flop understood that he was trying to end this face-to-face meeting. That Vincent had determined there was nothing to be gained out of Flop, or that he had served the purpose of this discussion, and having thought as much—

Flop: “Fake Emperor-kun, why did you come to this room?”

Vincent: “…”

Flop: “It’s hard for me to imagine, having never rebelled, but still trying my best to realize the power of my imagination here, I reckon the position of His Excellency the Emperor must be rather busy. Even though things are already tough, when there are people like His Excellency the Emperor-kun, who keep acting wildly without giving up, it’s no wonder your business knows no bounds.”

Flop was not saying that his usual peddling was easy, but when there were loads of products that fit exactly with the buyer's needs, one's business was incomparable to the usual.

The position of the Fake Emperor would never be held secure while the real Emperor was still alive and well.

Under such circumstances, why had Vincent bothered to specifically visit Flop?

Well—

Flop: "Perhaps you were wondering how His Excellency the Emperor-kun was doing and wanted to hear it from me?"

Vincent: "Hypothetically, if I were a usurper, as your nonsensical nickname implies, it would be in poor taste, would it not? I would be attempting to find out what happened to the person I had ousted from the ones in that person's vicinity."

Flop: "The importance of gathering information is not so different in commerce or in battle, I guess. If we assume that, I don't think it's in bad taste to try to find out what's going on with your opponent."

Vincent: "—. Even if that were the case, you are misguided. I have seen with my own eyes how that person is doing without needing to hear it from your mouth. We even exchanged a few words."

Flop: "Is that so…"

A painful evasion after having hit the mark.

Flop took Vincent's answer as not having been such a frivolous statement.

What the circumstances were that he saw Abel in person and exchanged words with him, Flop had no room but to imagine, but he could not believe it to be an outright lie.

Although he was also concerned about Medium, Taritta, and Subaru, who were supposed to be by Abel's side, it seemed unlikely that he would be able to get an answer by digging deeper into the matter.

At the very least, he could not have done anything to Abel when meeting him face-to-face.

If he could have, it would not have been odd for him to have declared victory immediately. He found it hard to believe that he was tasteless enough to bother to come to do that; however, it would have been equally tasteless for him to continue this discussion while withholding that fact, and it did not seem to be either.

In other words, Vincent was not here to converse with Flop.

If so, there was only one possibility that came to mind.

Flop: “If you didn’t want to ask me something, is it because you had something you wanted to tell me, maybe?”

Vincent: “Troublesome, I believe that was Berstetz’s evaluation of your position, however, even if you look at it from my point of view, your way of being is one that falls into the troublesome category.”

Flop: “Am I to take that as a compliment? It’s more positive for my mentality to think so, so I’ll just take it as such.”

Flop reckoned his words were what made Vincent stop in his tracks as he was about to take his leave.

Flop: “…”

Frankly, Flop did not know whether stopping Vincent in his tracks here was good or bad for him.

If Vincent’s plan were fulfilled and the usurpation of the Imperial Throne were brought to completion, Abel would surely be forced out from his position in the Empire, but also in this world.

Was that what he really wished?

Was that what he wished for the person who was involved in the death of his precious “close friend”, Balleroy Temeglyph? Was that what he wished for the person who had taken everything away from him, for him to lose his life?

Flop: “Until now, I never knew what I wanted…”

Trying to think if there ever was a time, Flop quickly reconsidered his thoughts.

He did not need to recall anything. Before he had met Balleroy and the others, he had spent all his time trying to protect Medium and had no desire for anything else.

He was the same as he had been then. Then, the answer and the way he arrived at it was the same as then, too.

???: “You guys can choose what you wanna do.“

He remembered that blunt voice pushing Flop’s back like that.

So, rather than being swept away without knowing anything, Flop wanted to choose to set out walking knowing something.

Flop: “Can I ask you something, Fake Emperor-kun? What is it that you have come to tell?”

Flop asked him point-blank, interrupting the Fake Emperor busy in his usurpation of the Imperial Throne.

In response to his question, Vincent’s lips curved with a slightly different impression than the man Flop knew, and spoke.

That it was—

Vincent: “—The Great Disaster, regarding the reason for the destruction it brings.”

Chapter 77:
Twist of Fate

1

Otto: “—This is a report on the damage caused by the attack of the flying dragons.”

Emilia lowered her eyebrows with a pained expression at Otto’s explanation as he tapped the documents close at hand.

The Fortress City of Guaral had been hit by a “flying dragon cataclysm”—Several days had passed with them repairing the city and dealing with the injured, until it could be said that things had settled down for the moment, the results of which had thereafter become clear.

From Emilia’s point of view, the city was in a terrible state.

The splendid defensive wall that surrounded the city had been destroyed, and the numerous boulders that had been dropped from on high were still scattered around the city. The damage to the buildings was extensive, less than half of them having survived unscathed. A fair number of people had died, and the house where Emilia and her group were sleeping, with its second floor collapsed, was one that no longer had residents to return to it.

Emilia: “If only…”

If only they had rushed there just a little bit sooner.

Such regrets kept poking at Emilia’s chest like sharp needles; however—

Otto: “It’s pointless to speculate whether we could have rushed here earlier, so let’s quit with that.”

Otto was able to read Emilia’s thoughts, but he cut her off immediately. Emilia’s face dropped at his sharpness, but Otto gave a curt nod with his chin, indicating the outside of the window.

Otto: “Back then, the reason we allowed this to take priority was because a group of flying dragons passed by us overhead. Without that, we wouldn’t have had the option to hurry. In other words…”

Emilia: “In other words?”

Otto: “There was nothing we could have done to prevent it, you know. It’s a matter of cause and effect. You can’t have one without the other. It would be irrational to worry about that.”

Emilia gave Otto a strained smile as he slowly shook his head while explaining that.

His opinion felt like he’d read what Emilia truly felt inside, and that in itself, was of no surprise. Otto was a very good judge of people, so that was normal for him.

On top of that, she imagined Otto’s words to her were his way of consoling her.

He was telling her that worrying about “what if” scenarios was not constructive consideration.

And so Emilia was convinced, however—

Petra: “But the issue lies with how you said it. I hate the way you put it.”

Petra turned her face away in a huff looking really upset.

Sitting in a chair in front of Emilia, Petra was in the middle of combing her bright brown hair and polishing up to her usual cuteness. This role was one Emilia had been entrusted with lately, but Petra’s attitude of never skimping out on taking care of herself, even during their journey, was one that always left her impressed.

She must have been exhausted from running around the city yesterday, but now that a new day had come, she was properly remodeling herself into a new self.

That too was a boon of Petra's awareness of her position and sense of responsibility.

After all, she was—

Otto: "—To hear that from our Mistress, Lady Petra, is very upsetting."

As Otto remarked, Petra was in charge of organizing Emilia's group as the lady employing them.

—Emilia's group had entered the Vollachian Empire in search of Subaru and Rem, who had disappeared.

After many twists and turns and various hardships, they arrived in the Empire, but as they had expected, it was difficult to cross the border by regular means, and they ended up smuggling themselves into the country.

In doing so, they had to use aliases and fabricate a false story about the purpose of their journey, since things would get bad if Emilia and Roswaal's true identities were discovered.

As a result, Emilia was assigned the role of "Emily", the guardian escort, and the ones she had to protect were—

Emilia: "Lady Petra and Lady Beatrice."

Otto: "The reason we came to the Empire was to restore Lady Beatrice's health… and this is a goal that will actually be fulfilled once we collect what we are after, so it is not entirely a lie."

Petra: "I understand, but somehow… you know, it's fine after all."

Otto: "You stopping halfway has got me concerned, so it would be better if you just told me."

Petra: "I suppose? Like you know Otto-san, could it be Master's bad habits are spreading to you?"

Otto: "I knew I shouldn't have asked…!"

Otto had ended up cradling his head in his hands, so Emilia hastily retracted the words she was about to say.

Otto looked really uncomfortable with it, but as for Emilia, she found Roswaal's intelligence to be very dependable. So it was very encouraging to see two of the smartest people in the camp thinking alike.

Although it seemed that saying that would cause Otto even more undue suffering.

Anyhow—

Emilia: "We've also got far less injured people in the city thanks to Garfiel, yeah?"

Otto: "That is, without a doubt, true, and I think it is a great credit to Lady Petra, Frederica-san, and of course you, Emily, for helping out."

At Otto's nodded response, Emilia could finally release the tension in her cheeks.

Garfiel's hard work, Frederica and Petra's help, all made Emilia proud. It was a struggle of which she and her dear friends could be very proud of.

Emilia: "Otto-kun did a reaaally good job of talking with Zikr-san and the others, too."

Otto: "Fortunately, Zikr-san was a person who can be reasoned with, so the difficulties were minimal. I am also grateful to Mizelda-san, who I happened to run into, and she was able to run me through everything."

Petra: "Otto-san's face is Mizelda-san's favorite, isn't it?"

Otto: "I have never had someone be so open about something like that, so I was quite perplexed."

Otto gave a strained smile at Petra, who held up her small fist with a grin.

Mizelda, with whom Emilia had also exchanged words, was a very strong and kind woman. She had been kind to them from the beginning of their acquaintance and had shown them a lot of consideration.

Although part of her wondered why Otto and Garfiel were being treated differently.

Emilia: “I know she likes Otto-kun’s face, but Garfiel is cute, too…”

Petra: “Maybe it’s because Garf-san often has wrinkles between his eyebrows and nose. Also, perhaps it is because he is annoyed at being separated from Ram nee-sama.”

Otto: “…I am going to go ahead and not say anything at all.”

Petra, placing her finger properly on her own shapely nose, gave this appraisal of Garfiel.

Emilia thought that Garfiel’s changing facial expressions were also charming, so she wanted Mizelda to look at Garfiel more properly.

All such digressions aside—

Emilia: “But if the city’s cleanup is getting close to finishing its first stage…”

Otto: “Yes.”

Otto nodded at Emilia’s words and then looked out the window once more. Ahead of Otto’s gaze was the face of the city, still standing despite the damage—the City Hall.

Gathering there were the influential people of the Fortress City of Guaral.

In other words—

Otto: “Finally, I think we can start talking about progressing things forward.”

And as Otto said that, the discussion began.

2

???: “Hey, ya never thanked me, Pops.”

Ascending the walls of the half-destroyed city, Garfiel called out to the back of the previous visitor.

In honesty, they were not someone he wanted to call out to, but turning right back around the moment their back came into view would have made him feel like he had lost, so his competitive spirit won out over his disinclination.

In the first place, why did he have to be the one to turn around?

If anybody had to turn tail, unable to bear the awkwardness, it ought to be the other person, rather than himself.

With that in mind, he had kicked things off with words like those of a punk, but—

???: “—Tch.”

With the reply being a mighty click of the tongue, Garfiel immediately regretted his choice.

As a result of his stubbornness, he went through an even more unpleasant experience. Inside his head, he could hear Otto’s reaction, a “Well, of course” of exasperation.

Be that as it may, it was someone he was not fond of.

Although Garfiel had not been present when this previous visitor had been disrespectful to his people, upon hearing of it later, that affair had been more than enough to make him dislike the guy.

That had been Garfiel’s unchanging impression of Heinkel Astrea.

Heinkel: “…”

In light leather armor, a fine sword at his hip, Heinkel stood guard.

However, Garfiel had come to judge it as more of a display to cover up that he had nothing to do and no place to be, rather than it being an admirable desire to keep the peace in the city.

The scent of alcohol wafting from his back, the empty liquor bottles lying around him, were proof of that.

During the flying dragon cataclysm, Heinkel had apparently gone on an utmost ferocious rampage against the advanced flock of flying dragons, yet came to suffer a painful defeat against a Divine General.

Nevertheless, the tiny Schult had talked his head off in defense of Heinkel, but Utakata was frank, saying “He couldn’t do a thing”. That probably was the truth.

As evidence of this, among those Garfiel had to deal with while going around performing healing magic on the wounded, Heinkel had been amongst the ones with the most severe injuries. The damage he had received had been quite hideous, so much so that he would probably still be bedridden without Garfiel’s healing magic.

Garfiel: “Is that tongue-clickin’ supposed to be a thanks? Gee, that’s hella different from the social etiquette my amazin’ self’s aware of, oi.”

Even while bearing the other party’s situation in mind, Garfiel spat abuse.

Garfiel, too, had experienced defeat. He understood how frustrating it was, so he did not wish to heartlessly poke at the fact that he had been defeated.

However, with the other party refusing to be polite, Garfiel was tempted to make at least one snide comment. Not to mention that he did not have a favorable impression of Heinkel.

Garfiel: “This is the Empire. There may be some social etiquette my amazin’ self ain’t aware of, but… You’re from the Kingdom, ain’t’cha? On top of that, you’re the father of the Sword Saint, yeah?”

Heinkel: “…”

Garfiel: “As my amazin’ self said, he’s one tough asshole. Ya’d think that someone that strong’d have great parents, but ya didn’t even have the decency to be polite—”

Heinkel: “—No matter how great the parents are, it doesn’t mean their kids are just as great.”

Garfiel looked daunted, having continued his sarcastic nagging towards a back that would not even turn around.

He had assumed he would still be ignored, but an unexpected rebuttal had arrived. Garfiel’s eyes went wide, but Heinkel, still without turning around, said,

Heinkel: “And vice-versa. There’s no reason at all why the parents of a monster also have to be monsters.”

Garfiel: “Oh…”

Heinkel: “You’re way too bad at hurling insults. If you want to provoke someone, take a lesson from Miss Priscilla. As you are, you’ve failed.”

Garfiel: “Gahk.”

His attempt to get the upper hand through insults was seen through, and was replied to in kind, ultimately.

Having just been told what true provocation really was, Garfiel faltered. As things were, the conversation was finished. But were he to turn his back and leave, he would be the one defeated in the true sense of the word.

In the end, Garfiel stuck around out of stubbornness, sitting a short distance away from Heinkel, gazing over the southern horizon devoid of the ramparts with which to guard the now-defenseless city.

Having been assailed by countless flying dragons, the walls of the famed Fortress City of Guaral had been severely damaged.

The damage yielded by the boulders thrown from a high altitude had been extensive, and although the crumbling, demolished walls were being repaired as fast as possible, the city's defensive abilities were considerably lowered.

In particular, the city's southern wall had been the one to suffer the greatest damage.

The western wall, which had borne the first attack, was also in a rather horrible state, but that was nothing compared to this. Forget about the wall, the entire area had been razed to the ground.

Garfiel: "I heard that Emilia-sama… No, Emily and the Princess they call Priscilla fought a Divine General but…"

The ferocity of the battle could be perceived in clear terms, judging from the disastrous scene below them.

Most of the buildings had not retained their original shape, and a terrible shockwave had mowed down anything and everything in its path.

The battle with the dragonkin, that which is one of the "Nine Divine Generals", had its denouement orchestrated by a white light—Garfiel, too, had been in the city when the shockwave blew him away. Emilia had explained what it had truly been.

Garfiel: "—A Dragon's roar."

While ground dragons, water dragons, flying dragons and the like were species of dragons, Dragons were a cut above them.

Dragons possessed power said to be beyond all reason. With merely a single breath, everything was uprooted.

There was a fear that, had the duo of Emilia and Priscilla not strived to oppose it, the damage would have spread even further.

Garfiel: "…No matter what, my amazin' self's always in the wrong place at the wrong time."

As he praised Emilia and, while he was at it, Priscilla for their accomplishments, a bitter feeling brewed in his heart.

By failing to accompany them to Pleiades Watchtower, Garfiel had missed the chance to come face-to-face with the Divine Dragon Volcanica, whom Emilia had met. Not only that, but this time he had missed the chance to come into contact with yet another Dragon despite being in the same city.

In a Subaru-like way of saying things, he had to say that the fish got off the hook.

Heinkel: "…"

His sulking was not at all because he had been unable to meet a Dragon, an existence that had been spoken of since ancient times.

It was because Garfiel's role was to fight and defeat powerful enemies. To defeat those who would try to disrupt the Camp's goals, and to carry out his role as a military officer.

Going around treating the wounded was absolutely not a part of those duties.

Garfiel: "More than that, my amazin' self also couldn't do a thing when enterin' the Empire."

In the act of smuggling themselves into the Vollachian Empire, Garfiel had been useless.

They had relied on Otto's family, on the Suwen Trading Company, for getting into contact with the people that would guide them across the border. And when they got into a disagreement with them along the way, Petra had concluded negotiations in a dignified manner.

After that, when problems arose as soon as they entered the Empire, Frederica used her own blood to overcome the situation, and all Garfiel ultimately did was to knock out a guy he did not like, as to get him to shut up.

At the very least he had found hope in the name of the black-haired valkyrie, "Natsumi Schwartz", who was rumored to be in the Fortress City, but just when he had thought his reunion with Subaru would finally come to be—

Garfiel: “Just missin’ each other after the Captain left… Unlucky ‘til the very end, seems like absolutely everythin’ was my amazin’ self’s fault…”

Of course, he was fully aware that this was paranoia due to overthinking.

Just as Garfiel and the others had had a great adventure arriving in the Empire, Subaru, having been hurtled off into the Empire, had also been on a great adventure there. Nothing more, nothing less.

Getting involved in a major incident straight away, even in a place he had been hurtled off to, was a situation that was very much like the Subaru that Garfiel knew.

Garfiel: “—A scramble for the top of the Empire, that’s one hell of a big deal, Captain.”

A sign of great war that would engulf the Fortress City—no, that would engulf the entirety of the Vollachian Empire.

What kind of causality had led to him being right in the middle of such a situation? However, Garfiel thought, Surely this was the result of Subaru being who he is.

While eagerly, desperately struggling to return to his place beside Emilia and the others, he had bonded with the people he had encountered on the way, and unable to abandon them, he kept running.

Right now, he was someplace far away, in a big city to the southeast, seemingly negotiating with influential people.

Regardless of the outcome, it would be nice if he were to return safely—

Heinkel: “—Hey, brat.”

Garfiel: “Ahhn?”

Heinkel: “Your teeth’ve been clattering like hell for a while now. Can’t you behave and shut your mouth?”

Heinkel suddenly spat those words at Garfiel, who had been lost in thought.

The seemingly annoyed red-haired man glaring his way put a finger in his own mouth and traced his canine in demonstration. That was to say that Garfiel's habit of clacking his teeth was getting on his nerves.

Garfiel: "Ha, why should my amazin' self hafta listen to anythin' ya say? If it's that hard on the ears, ya can leave whenever ya want."

Heinkel: "Is that your best insult, you petulant brat? I was here first. Know your place."

Garfiel: "—Hk, the guy who chickened out against a Divine General shouldn't be so arrogant!"

Loathing the idea of being cornered in the same way as before, Garfiel forcefully shouted that back.

After asserting that, Garfiel realized he had made a rash remark. However, his opponent was his opponent. Retorting to such an extent, needing to feel guilty about that was—.

Heinkel: "Ahh, that's right, isn't it. —I got scared. That's why, it turned out like this."

Garfiel: "Pops…?"

Heinkel: "I also wrecked Miss Priscilla's mood so now I'm getting dead drunk. Aah, how irredeemable."

However, the words that Heinkel offered in return were weak, leaving Garfiel puzzled.

Lifting the bottle of alcohol in his hand to his mouth while he sipped its contents, Heinkel grumbled in a low voice which seemed to curse the world—No, seemed to curse his own being.

Just as if the very world itself had abandoned him, his demeanor seemed to have fallen to utter desperation.

Garfiel: "…Yer opponent was a Divine General. They're the Empire's strongest military force, s'natural ya couldn't beat 'em, Pops."

Unable to stand watching that pathetic appearance, he vocalized that comfort.

Despite having said it himself, Garfiel was astonished by the fact he had made that remark without shame. Just before, he had verbally abused Heinkel for losing to a Divine General, but now he was comforting him by saying it was natural for him to have lost.

It was incoherent, and probably completely failed at being comforting. If Garfiel had been in the same position as Heinkel, he might have flown into a fit of rage at being told the same thing.

However, Heinkel gave a spineless laugh at Garfiel's comfort,

Heinkel: "I may not have won, but I had a duty to carry out. All the more so if I'm to reap the benefits of going with Miss Priscilla… Heh, what a fucking masterpiece."

Garfiel: "It's, a masterpiece?"

Heinkel: "The thing I've been chasing for over ten years keeps slipping through my fingers. No matter how far I go, I'll never be able to change my piss-poor nature."

At Heinkel's incessant self-derision, Garfiel began to see him differently.

At first, due to the reckless actions Heinkel had taken at the Watergate City, Garfiel's impression of him had been enmity and disgust. After just a short period, the very moment he thought it had been affirmed, seeing Heinkel curse himself made Garfiel reevaluate his impression.

There stood a weak, exhausted, miserable man.

The words that spewed from his mouth were blades to himself and to others, though their sharpness was pathetic. If those were only directed towards others, Garfiel would merely scorn them and be done with it.

However, when he realized Heinkel directed them at himself as well, Garfiel felt an unpleasant sensation in his chest.

Garfiel: “Bastard, why’d’ya got the nerve to be rottin’ away like that. You’re still livin’. Then…”

Heinkel: “—. I wonder, why am I still alive?”

Garfiel: “—Hk, Ya really dare to say that in front of the person who saved ya?”

Heinkel continued to grumble words of self-abandonment which invited Garfiel’s wrath.

At Garfiel’s response, Heinkel glanced at him and muttered “Ah”, as if realizing it for the first time.

Heinkel: “Now that you mention it, you were the one that healed me. Be careful next time.”

Garfiel: “Aah?!”

Heinkel: “Don’t miss the opportunity to abandon the guys you hate to spare yourself from future troubles.”

Heinkel gave a spineless chuckle as he asserted so.

The moment he heard that, Garfiel felt the sensation of his vision being stained a deep red, and he found himself clutching the man’s collar and scowling at his face reeking of liquor from a close proximity.

He heard a light smashing sound of a liquor bottle shattering by his feet.

That was because Garfiel had seized him by the collar, and lifted his body up through sheer force, causing the liquor bottle, with its contents still remaining, to fall from Heinkel’s hand to the bottom of the ramparts.

Following the fallen liquor bottle with his gaze, Heinkel heaved a sigh.

Heinkel: “That’s just a waste, isn’t it?”

Garfiel: “Bastard, is that all ya got t’say?”

Without resisting, Heinkel turned his lethargic eyes towards Garfiel.

His blue eyes, bereft of spirit, were of the same origin as that of both Reinhardt, whom Garfiel had spoken to, and Wilhelm, whom he had gone under the gaze of.

Nonetheless, Garfiel could hardly believe that they were the same.

Just how could human eyes become so dull?

The emotions whirling in the utmost depths of those two eyes, over just how many months and years had they been degraded for?

Garfiel: “The fuck’s with that? Why’re ya lookin’ at me like that?”

Heinkel said that he had displeased Priscilla, having suffered a loss against a Divine General.

The truth of the matter was unclear, but Garfiel believed that it was far too inconsiderate to blame someone for lacking the power to be able to put up a good fight against a Divine General.

At least, that was Garfiel’s perspective, who had not arrived in time to have a chance to fight.

At Garfiel’s gaze and words, Heinkel’s eyes wavered slightly.

His eyes, which had not even been focused on Garfiel, the man right in front of him, finally connected with Garfiel so that he was clearly reflected in them.

And then—

Heinkel: “—My wife…”

Regardless of the fact that he had just been gulping down alcohol, the lips of Heinkel, spilling out that hoarse voice, were parched.

But, when he finally received words that held meaning, Garfiel clenched his molars, and decided he would hear what the wavering man had to say beyond that.

However, the words Garfiel expected, yet again were not heard.

Heinkel: “—Ah.”

Garfiel: “Oi?”

Still being clutched by the collar, Heinkel’s eyes lost focus of Garfiel once more. His gaze went past Garfiel, and directed themselves towards what lay behind him.

Garfiel thought that was frustrating and irritating, however,

Heinkel: “It’s a horse carriage.”

Garfiel could not help but turn around, at the words that had been spoken.

Garfiel: “…”

Since he was grabbing Heinkel, Garfiel’s back was facing the south side of the city—from beyond that horizon, there was indeed a small contour that could be seen approaching their direction.

Straining his eyes, even Garfiel was unable to tell if it was a dragon carriage or a horse carriage, but if he believed Heinkel when he called it a “horse carriage”, that was—

Heinkel: “—Hah, so it’s the honored return of the bunch who went out.”

Through different words, Heinkel affirmed the thoughts of Garfiel, the latter catching his breath.

The contour was still only the size of a fingernail, but its outline was becoming slightly more visible; that might be the carriage that the person whom Garfiel was eagerly waiting and searching for was riding in.

Heinkel: “Oi, let go of me, brat.”

Garfiel’s eyes sparkled with anticipation and excitement, an air of liquor-reeking breaths hanging over him. A frown crossed his face as he looked in front of him and was greeted by Heinkel’s sullen look.

The profile of a man who was just about to speak from his heart was no longer there, and all that was left was the face of a hateful man, spewing disgusting and reckless remarks to those around him.

The moment he realized that, Heinkel tilted his neck and broke free from Garfiel’s hands.

Garfiel felt that was both an escape physically, and an escape emotionally. What should have been caught by the tips of his fingers, had coldly slipped away.

Heinkel: “The person you’re waiting for seems to be coming. Why don’t you hurry up and go meet them?”

Garfiel: “…Bastard, you…”

Heinkel: “I’ll serve my duty as a lookout. My job is to report it if I see something after all. Even if I’m drunk, I can at least do that much… Though it’s probably not going to score me many points.”

With a wave of his hand, Heinkel drunkenly staggered as he turned his back to Garfiel.

For a moment, he hesitated if he should call out to that back to try to stop him, but in the end no words came out. Just as Heinkel had pointed out, Garfiel’s heart had already started to get impatient.

As soon as possible, he wanted to rush over to the contour approaching from beyond the horizon.

Heinkel: “It’d be tragic to miss the opportunity, wouldn’t it? Those final words, you’ll end up chasing them endlessly.”

Leaving just those words behind, Heinkel jumped off of the ramparts before Garfiel. Surprisingly landing safely inside the city, he headed for the center of the city.

That final comment, the earnest emotion contained therein, Heinkel had asserted that they would stab into Garfiel's heart like a thorn.

However—

Garfiel: "Now is—"

Shelving the existence of that thorn for now, Garfiel jumped down the opposite side of the ramparts that Heinkel had.

Landing outside of the city, Garfiel stretched out his bent knees and broke out into a vigorous sprint. His legs kicking off the ground like explosions, faster than even the wind, he ran directly for the oncoming contour.

Garfiel: "Captain…!"

Through the crevices in his sharp fangs, Garfiel's unbearably deep emotions leaked out.

It was intimidating to consider the feelings of Emilia, Beatrice, Petra, and the others, but Garfiel was also one of the people who had been earnestly awaiting a reunion with Subaru.

That was why, transforming his feelings of excitement into running strength, he headed for the carriage at a breakneck pace.

Just a little further, just a few dozen more seconds of running, he would be reunited with Subaru, and—

Garfiel: "—Ah?"

And so, those overflowing expectations turned to unexpected feelings of confusion.

His speed, fast enough to leave the wind behind, came to slow down, and before long the wind overtook him. On the contrary, he became fast enough to leave everything except the wind behind, and finally came to a standstill.

In Garfiel's trembling emerald eyes, the single carriage that had come from beyond the horizon—no, the multitudes of carriages and ox carts that were approaching were reflected.

Garfiel: "Th-this is…"

Hoping that he would be able to meet Subaru without hesitation, Garfiel blinked his eyes.

Considering the purpose for which Subaru and the others had departed from the fortified city, the current view was indeed one of the possibilities, but at that time, Garfiel had not thought that far ahead.

In any case, stopping in its tracks before the overwhelmed Garfiel, at the head of the convoy heading down the road towards the city, was the carriage drawn by an excellent Galewind Horse which he had brazenly arrived at.

And then—

???: "—You, what are you fooling about for. If you are a messenger of the city, surely there is something you ought to be doing."

So, examining his expression, the man in the Oni mask caused Garfiel to catch his breath.

3

???: "You must be exhausted, Miss Frederica."

At the aroma of the tea being gently offered to her tired and thirsty self, Frederica looked at the person's face with faint surprise.

A smile on his gentle face, he who showed appreciation for Frederica was a man whose point of view was close to the ground.

By nature, Frederica, who was tall in stature, often surpassed men in height, but even disregarding that, the one in front of her was a short person of a small build—however, over the course of several days, Frederica had recognized that in contrast to his height, he had a large heart, and possessed good will.

Frederica: “—Zikr-sama, I accept your consideration with gratitude.”

At the top floor of the City Hall, amidst the busy people, the man—Zikr Osman, had personally brewed her tea, and she accepted it with gratitude.

As the soft, warmth-infused scent crept into her nostrils, Frederica could not help but smile.

Originally, such a role should have been the responsibility of Frederica, who was a maid. However, Frederica’s current position in the Empire made her hesitant to engage in the work that had been ingrained in her over the years.

Ostensibly, Frederica’s role in the Empire appeared to be as a guard of dignitaries—in hindsight, since Otto and Garfiel’s roles were the same, there had been no need for Frederica to leave her role as maid, but it was too late to change things.

That was why, accepting the goodwill offered by the commander who despite being burdened with responsibilities in this place had personally brewed her tea, she quietly concentrated on gently hydrating her tongue and throat.

In fact, as might be expected of him for taking the initiative, Zikr’s tea-brewing ability was quite magnificent.

Frederica: “For a General of the Empire, you seem to be very talented at this kind of thing.”

Zikr: “Haha, I am honored by your praise. However, I am unable to bear responsibility for the taste of the other Generals’ tea. In my case, I was trained by the many older and younger sisters of my family.”

Frederica: “Well. If that is the case, I must thank Zikr-sama’s esteemed elder and younger sisters. Even in such a hectic situation, we can still enjoy the taste of tea.”

Zikr: “Indeed, you never know what will be useful in this world… Of course, my enthusiasm in being prepared is more for a beauty like you, Miss Frederica, than for my own family.”

There was no ulterior motive in Zikr’s casual repartee, and Frederica naturally accepted his praise.

Those words were not falsehoods, perhaps it was the influence of having spent time with so many sisters. His admiration for women was so deep and reverential that it was almost embarrassing.

At first, when told that the personage who took the name of The Womanizer was the head representative of the city, Frederica had been quite nervous and wary of the situation.

Frederica: “I would be troubled should something happen to Emily, Lady Petra, or Lady Beatrice.”

However, that concern had been dispelled upon meeting with Zikr in person.

The fact that they had been involved in lifesaving efforts in the city, which had fallen into turmoil after the devastation of the flying dragon cataclysm probably had some influence, but Zikr and the others had willingly taken in Fredrica and her group.

She was also grateful for Otto’s decision to speak with city representatives the moment he arrived in the city.

Frederica: “I heard that he wooed Mizelda-san as soon as he met her, Otto-sama is truly reliable during times like these.”

If Otto himself had been listening, he would have said, “I think that is somewhat misleading!” as his voice quavered; while thinking this, Frederica nodded quietly.

Although she thought of him that way, Frederica was helped considerably by Otto’s presence.

The responsibility of the two senior members of Emilia’s group, Frederica and Otto, was quite heavy. —After all, Roswaal and Ram were off doing something separately.

Frederica: "…"

In the search for the whereabouts of Subaru and Rem within the Empire, it had been decided that the group smuggling themselves into the country would split up into two.

The split groups consisted of Roswaal and Ram, as well as the six including Frederica and the others.

After separating from Emilia's group, which was searching for Subaru and his group through steadily asking around, the pair of Roswaal and Ram headed for an Imperial Noble with whom Roswaal was acquainted.

Frederica had never imagined that his reach extended to the Empire, although Roswaal was originally unable to make contact with this person whom he was close with.

In any case, with the choice to rely on his acquaintance, Roswaal headed there for negotiations, while Frederica and the others began to search for the whereabouts of the two people in a different direction.

As a result, the roles of Frederica and Otto had inevitably become more important.

Frederica: "Although, Emilia-sama seemed to be rousing herself up to do her best."

Frederica's lips parted at the thought of Emilia's enthusiasm, overflowing with motivation and responsibility at the fact that she was the most senior member.

If one strictly applied seniority to the Emilia camp, the utmost seniors would be Puck and Beatrice, followed by Emilia.

Having been separated from Subaru, it had become difficult for Beatrice to replenish her mana, and she was thus in a state of "Eko-mode" to keep her usage within limits, spending most of the day sleeping. That was why Emilia, the next oldest, was inspired to do her best.

Of course, the final decision had been left to Emilia, but the discussions leading up to that point had been carefully considered mainly between Frederica, Otto, and Petra.

The reason they had traveled to the fortified city was because of a rumor so incredible that she had doubted her ears.

Frederica: “A rebel army rising against the Empire, and the black-haired maiden who is supporting its ringleader…”

When Frederica had heard her name was “Natsumi Schwartz”, she had been unable to grasp its meaning, and her thoughts had come to a complete halt.

Frederica had also wondered if someone with the same name as the one she had previously heard of also unexpectedly existed in the Empire.

Frederica: “If Otto-sama had not recognized the true intention behind it, I wonder if I would have been able to realize it.”

Ultimately, it had been Otto who had explained that the name of the person being propagated through rumors was a message from Subaru.

Otto: “After all, that man has a tendency to think that cross-dressing is an all-purpose solution… In fact, I am afraid that it might encourage him to assume that it might be considerably useful.”

That had been Otto’s response, with a face somewhere between exasperation and acceptance.

The group had more or less concluded that since Subaru’s position in the Kingdom of Lugunica was known, he had taken measures to avoid having his name brought up within the Vollachian Empire.

By the end, only Emilia had been left tilting her head in confusion at the fact that the name of a woman she knew was being used, “Why, Natsumi’s name…?”.

In any case—

Zikr: “It will not be long before Miss Natsumi will be back. Finally, Miss Emily and Miss Petra’s wishes will be fulfilled.”

Frederica: “—Yes, absolutely.”

Zikr gave a nod to Frederica, who was engrossed in her thoughts while enjoying her tea’s aroma.

Just as he said, their reunion with the two people they were searching for—or at the very least, their reunion with Subaru was expected to come true in the not-too-distant future.

Frederica and her friends had been correct in assuming that the name Natsumi Schwartz was a message, and Subaru had indeed been confirmed to have been present in this fortified city.

The problem was that after he had left the city to resolve another matter, another situation had befallen Rem, the other person they were in search of—

Zikr: “…If only we had been able to protect Miss Rem.”

Frederica: “That was the extent of the situation. There is no reason to blame you, Zikr-sama, nor anybody else. Though, I certainly do regret the outcome.”

Frederica loosely shook her head at the words of Zikr, whose eyes were downcast.

When Frederica and the others had arrived at the city, it had not only been Subaru who had been missing, but also Rem. On top of that, Rem had disappeared in the midst of the flying dragon cataclysm.

It was said that, in order to make the Divine General assailing the city withdraw, she had made herself a hostage.

Frederica: “—. As soon as you wake up, I would be convinced that you were Ram’s younger sister.”

While she worried about Rem, Frederica lips spoke of such sentiments.

Frederica did not remember Rem, whose “name” and “memories” were stolen by the Authority of the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony. At least, she had no memories of her being awake.

All Frederica knew was what Subaru had told her about Rem’s personality and that she looked exactly like her twin sister, Ram. However, it seemed that she was also bold and daring like Ram.

Otherwise, she probably would never have been able to negotiate with one of the Nine Divine Generals and save a city which had its very existence in jeopardy.

Frederica: “…”

Then having accepted her negotiations, the other party had a reason to keep Rem alive.

Having considered it logically, that belief had been their sole salvation. If it had not been for that, Frederica and the others would have immediately pursued the whereabouts of the now missing Rem.

Of course, to tell the truth, she still could not help but to want to rush after her.

Frederica: “If Ram had been there, she would have… No, that girl is clever, she probably would not have done that.”

It was hard to judge which option Ram would have taken, in the opinion of Frederica, who was well acquainted with her.

Ram was wise. But at the same time, she also had a deep love. Frederica knew that she had been visiting her younger sister’s room as much, if not more, than Subaru, who had visited Rem every night.

She had wanted to reunite them. —After all, no matter how brash she was, Ram was her beloved protegee.

Zikr: “Miss Frederica, please do not worry too much about it. Conditions in the city have calmed down for the time being. Finally, we can begin to talk about the future.”

As Frederica gently placed her hand on her chest, Zikr spoke as such out of consideration for her.

As he said, the scars left by the flying dragons that had attacked the fortified city had finally been patched up, and the conditions were now suitable for discussing what to do in the future. Of course, what happened next would depend on the direction of the discussions, but—

???: “—General Second-Class Zikr!”

It was at the moment Frederica was about to reply to Zikr’s statement.

A sharp voice strained with deep emotion that was something different to being cornered, and reverberated through the City Hall. Running up the staircase, and rushing towards them was one of Zikr’s subordinates.

Zikr turned to him and said, “What is it?” as the man placed his fist in front of his chest, and,

Subordinate: “We have a report. Numerous carriages are arriving on the south side of the city, all from the Demon City.”

Frederica: “—! From the Demon City. Then…!”

Involuntarily, Frederica proactively reacted to the report to Zikr. Normally, her embarrassment would have outweighed her reaction, but at this moment, that did not bother her in the slightest.

Zikr nodded deeply at Frederica’s enthusiasm, and,

Zikr: “Have they returned? As expected, you are an ally with impeccable timing. Call Miss Priscilla, Miss Petra and the others at once.”

Subordinate: “Yessir!”

Frederica’s heart pounded at the good news that the person she had been waiting for had returned.

Her somber feelings of concern for Rem's safety had considerably improved from just before. At least for the time being, she thought that with this, half of their objective should have been fulfilled.

Zikr: "Everything is well, Miss Frederica."

Zikr gently smiled at Frederica, who stroked her chest in relief.

At his words, Frederica tried to thank him with an "Indeed".

However—

Subordinate: "—General Second-Class, the truth is, about that…"

Frederica's words were interrupted by those of the Imperial Soldier. Furthermore, as he began to speak with a tinge of unease, Frederica held her breath.

Zikr seemed to feel the same concern and turned to his subordinate, who had spoken in a low voice, and questioned "What's wrong?" as the tone of his voice lowered.

In response, the subordinate slightly hesitated, and then—

Subordinate: "The carriage has returned from the Demon City, but Miss Natsumi Schwartz is not present… they say that they lost track of her whereabouts in Chaosflame."

Indeed, it was a cruel declaration that the twists of fate would continue once more.

Chapter 78: A Volatile Reunion

1

Breathing deeply, she ran as if flying, doing her best to not shake the head of the girl held in her arms.

A caravan of wagons had arrived on the south side of the city, and the moment Emilia had overheard that so many had arrived from the Demon City Chaosflame, her silver hair had danced in anticipation of her long-awaited reunion.

Emilia: “Very soon, we’ll meet Subaru, Beatrice…!”

The girl she held in her arms, who had been asleep with closed eyelids—Beatrice.

In order to wake up the girl, who had been sleeping for a long time to avoid exhausting her mana, it was absolutely necessary for her to make contact with Subaru, whom she had a contract with, so that she could receive her mana supply from him.

Subaru also needed Beatrice to take his mana or he would be in trouble, so the two were truly intertwined with the same fate.

Their relationship, which usually appeared to be one in which they always got along endearingly, hand in hand, meant serious trouble now that Subaru had been flung off into the Empire and separated from them.

Subaru and Beatrice had to be reunited as soon as possible.

And in addition—

Emilia: “—Subaru.”

Emilia herself wanted to make sure Subaru was safe as soon as possible, even if only by one second.

She hadn't felt this restless since Puck unilaterally violated the contract and disappeared on his own accord—no, it was more than that.

Puck may have been fine on his own, but Subaru was not.

Someone who was able to understand Subaru should be there for him.

Emilia: "Ughhh, I'm sorry!"

Opening her eyes, Emilia took a shortcut to the front of the City Hall.

Although she should have entered through the doorway and then climbed the stairs to the top, her impatience was such that she instead formed a pillar made of ice. Riding atop the ice formation rising from the ground, Emilia, holding Beatrice, rose all at once to the top of the building.

It startled the guards and the townspeople, but she couldn't resist.

Now, finally—

Emilia: "Subaru!"

???: "Huh, Emily?"

When the ice elevator reached the top floor's height, Emilia jumped from there to the building.

When she landed and looked up, she saw that a decent number of people had already gathered in City Hall, and everyone seemed surprised by Emilia's sudden appearance.

In the midst of all this, it was Mizelda, a girl with a prosthetic leg who left a strong visual impression, and also the one that brought together the People of Shudraq, who accepted Emilia's appearance with a sense of ease.

She poked the floor with the tip of her wooden leg and looked at the icey pillar behind Emilia, then, Mizelda: “You use magic very conveniently. You are so different from us.”

Emilia: “Mhm, I was in a reaaally big hurry, so I went to… Oh, I’m sorry I startled you! I’ll dispel it in a second!”

At Mizelda’s impressed reaction, Emilia hurriedly dissolved the ice into mana.

In the Kingdom, it was rather common to do various things with magic, but in the Empire, it seemed as if there were not so many magic users. Considering how many people were said to want to fight in the Empire, it felt weird.

Mizelda: “Most of the time, if you hit them before they use magic, it’s the end for them.”

Emilia: “I do know that. But that’s only if you’re close by, not far away.”

Mizelda: “When you’re far away, that’s when my bow comes in. Taritta is better with the bow than I am, though.”

At the smiling Mizelda, Emilia returned a smile, with a “that’s right”.

The name “Taritta”, which she heard several times, must have been the name of Mizelda’s little sister. Taritta, who was apparently Mizelda’s pride and joy, had been with the group that left Guaral for the Demon City in the southeast—

Emilia: “—! That’s right. The people who went south are back, right?”

For a moment, her mind drifted elsewhere, but that was the reason Emilia had rushed over in such a big hurry using her magic in the first place.

Holding Beatrice closer to her chest, Emilia surveyed the hall on the top floor.

The fact that there were people in unusual travel clothes amongst the crowd proved that the group who had arrived at the Fortress City while traveling by horse and carriage were here.

In the midst of it all—

Emilia: “Subaru, are you there?! We’re all here to pick you up! Otto and Petra-san… Lady Petra will be here soon!”

She looked around, searching for the long-awaited black-haired boy in the crowd.

When Emilia heard at the house in which they had been staying that a carriage had arrived, she picked Beatrice up in her arms and hurried to the City Hall ahead of Petra and Otto.

They also would be running to the City Hall to meet Subaru in a big hurry.

Knowing she felt the same way as those two, but still running ahead while gasping for breath, Emilia knew she was unjust. Even so, she wanted to meet Subaru as soon as possible.

Beatrice was the same too, but Emilia had her own reasons to see Subaru—

Emilia: “—Hk, Subaru!”

Suddenly, her shoulder having been tapped from behind, Emilia reacted as if she had been flicked away.

It was so sudden that the person who had tapped her on the shoulder became startled and widened their eyes. However, the surprised person in front of her was not Subaru.

???: “Emily…”

Emilia: “Frederica… You got here first. Um, well.”

It was kind of awkward, and Emilia didn’t know what expression to put on her face.

Of course, Frederica was also worried about Subaru, so it was no surprise that she arrived at City Hall first.

Emilia: “Well, did you get to talk to Subaru? Look, I want to take Beatrice to see him. I, too, would like to talk to Subaru, but Beatrice first…”

Frederica: “—. There is something I must tell you.”

Emilia: “Huh?”

Frederica lowered the corners of her beautiful emerald green eyes and spoke in a somber voice to Emilia, who was sweating and talking as if looking for excuses.

She did not know why Frederica had such an attitude.

Emilia: “Ah, Garfiel…”

Upon looking, it was not only Frederica, but also Garfiel who had arrived at City Hall earlier. When Petra and the others arrived a little later, all of Emilia’s companions who had come to Guaral would be present.

All of them would greet the previously separated Subaru.

Or so Emilia was hoping, but—

Frederica: “Unfortunately, Subaru-sama has gone missing again, in the Demon City of Chaosflame… Subaru-sama was not among those who returned via carriage.”

Thus, Frederica painfully conveyed such a heartbreaking report.

2

???: “What do you mean, big bro and Rem-chan were taken away?!”

Widening her big round eyes, the girl shouted as she stomped her feet with a pitter-patter.

She was a golden-haired girl with a strange hairstyle of braids, ties, and various knots. The girl, who appeared twelve or thirteen years old, was taking a look at the adults around her with a face filled with bewilderment.

Gathered in the spacious room of the uppermost floor of the Fortress City of Guaral's City Hall, were those who had been assigned various roles within the commotion of this city, or rather, this Empire.

In the middle of such turmoil, Otto Suwen felt like hugging his head due to the fact that they had somehow been caught up in it.

Although, this was in front of the people who hoisted flags depicting a wolf pierced by swords. Believing that it would be unthinkable to show such a weak attitude, he kept his expression stiffened.

Strange-hair Girl: "I've come back and now the city's a mess, the walls are missing as well, it's a disaster! Among other things, big bro and Rem-chan aren't here, I'm startled and I feel dizzy!"

???: "Aa, uu!"

Just as she said this, the girl's eyeballs and head spun round and round as she frustratedly stomped. And to her side was a separate girl of about the same age, in order to follow suit, this young girl with blonde hair began to groan.

The adults looked puzzled and perplexed by the girls' two-person appeal.

The situation called for someone to take the lead, but Otto was wondering whether he should step in as he felt overwhelmed by a mysterious unease that prevented him from moving.

Otto: "…Um, have I seen this groaning girl somewhere?"

Next to the girl who took the initiative to speak, Otto could not help but feel that the girl who did not utter a meaningful word was somehow familiar to him.

Although Otto was generally careful not to forget people with whom he had exchanged words, his memory of times when he drank too much were vague. Since he started working in the Emilia Camp, he tried to avoid getting so drunk that he would lose his memory, but he wondered whether this was a child he came across in an inebriated mood.

Strange-hair Girl: “Hey, how’s big bro and Rem-chan doing? Does anyone know…”

Zikr: “—Before I go any further, may I make one thing clear, young lady?”

Strange-hair Girl: “Hmm? What’s that, Zikr-chin?”

While Otto was lost in thought, it was Zikr, the city’s representative, who approached the girl.

Otto had already exchanged words with him many times, and he regarded him as a trustworthy partner. Just the fact that he was someone he could communicate with in the Empire made him a rare find.

Zikr raised his thick eyebrows and looked at the girl from top to bottom,

Zikr: “If there is no mistake in my perception, is this young lady definitely Miss Medium?”

Medium: “Huh? Of course, what’s wrong? You can tell just by seeing.”

Louis: “Uu!”

The girl with her hands on her hips and her chest puffed out—she was called Medium, and next to her, who nodded her head, the girl he could not remember had taken the same posture.

At these words, Zikr looked at the person next to Medium with a troubled countenance.

And—

Zikr: “—Abel-dono, this is…”

Abel: “It is due to Olbart Dunkelkenn’s technique. The reason why her reply was off the mark was because of her original education, not because of this condition.”

Zikr: “I see. General First-Class Olbart’s technique… I am very glad you are unharmed.”

Abel: “If you are capable of calling this unharmed, that is.”

After hearing the explanation, Zikr gently put his hand on his chin and looked as if pondering. Having clarified this for Zikr, Abel calmly folded his arms and glanced at Medium.

Abel: “The ones that stayed behind are astonished. To see that you have shrunk, that is.”

Medium: “Me? …Ah! I see! Sorry, sorry everyone! I was so used to being shrunk, but now I’m tiny! Together with Subaru-chin!”

With a small body, Medium raised her hand and explained her situation. Even having heard that, Otto couldn’t come to grips with it at all, but the original imperial group seemed somewhat convinced.

This side, while confused and unable to deny that they did not know enough, thought that, more importantly, there was something in what she just said that Otto and his friends couldn’t miss.

???: “—Subaru”

Louis: “Uau…”

And at the same time, a faint whisper was uttered, probably with the same meaning.

It was the girl with a downcast face next to Medium who put a tone into the sound that was clearly differentiated from the groan that had come before. And the one who emitted the sound that had the same connotation as that of the girl was,

Emilia: “Are you worried about Subaru, too?”

Yes, it was Emilia who lowered her eyebrows at the girl's appearance.

Emilia, with Beatrice sleeping in her arms, was one of those who was particularly disappointed to hear that Subaru was not in the group returning from Demon City.

Compared to her and Petra, it would be presumptuous to call Otto's feelings disappointment. But it wasn't because he had a premonition that it might not be so easy to meet again.

In any case—

Louis: "Uu, aau."

Emilia: "No, I don't think it's your fault. I'm reaaally disappointed that Subaru isn't here, but this is no time to mope around. Subaru has been through so much more."

Louis: "Uu…"

Emilia: "You're worried about me? Thank you. I know you've been through a lot, too."

The depressed looking girl and Emilia were communicating with each other in this way.

The words spilling out of the girl's mouth had no clear meaning, but Emilia looked her in the eyes and exchanged words as if she understood what they meant.

That in itself attested to the heartbroken Emilia's determination, and it was an exchange that Otto couldn't help but feel relieved about. However—

Abel: "—I never expected that Natsuki Subaru's companions would come all the way here to visit."

It was a voice that blew through the hall like a cold, dry wind.

Emilia lifted her gaze and turned towards the person who had spoken with that voice—the man with the Oni mask on his face who had just exchanged words with Zikr and Medium.

Emilia’s amethyst eyes narrowed at the sight of the dark-haired man with the Oni mask covering his face.

Emilia: “Are you a friend of Subaru, too?”

Abel: “I have no friends. Nor does he think of me in that way. Our relationship is one where we are together while working towards a goal.”

Emilia: “So, you’re a comrade. He called you Abel, could you be the person Zikr-san was talking about earlier?”

The man’s response was stiff and sharp, but Emilia was unfazed and turned to Zikr. In response to her question, Zikr straightened his back while stating, “Yes”.

Zikr: “This is the one who is in the position to lead us, Abel-dono. I was only entrusted with the city under his direction.”

Abel: “Speaking of which, there certainly has been a lot of wear and tear.”

Zikr: “…For that, I am truly ashamed.”

With a grimace, Zikr bowed deeply to the man—to Abel over the damage the city had suffered.

Instead of dissatisfaction with unreasonable reprimands, Zikr’s bitter face was filled with remorse at his own inability to do his job.

Otto, who was present at the actual scene, thought that Zikr and everyone else in the city did their best to prevent it from being completely destroyed, but—

Medium: “Abel-chin, don’t say mean things like that! Everyone tried their hardest!”

Abel: “Even so, are you not angry as well, having had your brother taken away from you?”

Medium: “Big bro worked so hard he was taken! If big bro hadn’t been taken away, we would’ve been in big trouble! That’s my big bro! Even taken away, big bro is so cool!”

It was Medium who took a vigorous swipe at Abel’s statement.

Judging from the flow of the conversation, her brother was probably the male peddler who had been kidnapped alongside Rem. Mizelda had said that he was a gentle and friendly lady-killer.

According to other stories by Kuna and Holly, that man and Rem both being taken was the decisive factor causing the enemy, a member of the “Nine Divine Generals”, to withdraw the flying dragons.

In other words, Medium’s remarks about her brother were not far off the mark.

Abel, who had just returned from Demon City, had no way of knowing about this situation—

Abel: “Zikr.”

Zikr: “Sir.”

Abel: “Disregard what I previously said. From the beginning, you were dealing with Madelyn Eschart and a group of flying dragons. You deserve recognition for your work in a situation where the city may have needed to be abandoned.”

Zikr: “—! I am honored.”

The words that continued without hesitation were not the result of being struck by Medium’s persuasion.

From the start, these words were already prepared to be said to Zikr. From the very beginning, he had no intention of blaming him for the damage suffered by Guaral.

Medium: “…Abel-chin, your personality is awful!”

Louis: “Uu!”

Abel: “Stop.”

Medium and the girl attacked Abel from both sides as he stood with his arms crossed. Abel gave a short rebuke as the two of them clung to him, pulling his sleeves and poking him in the waist.

One could get a rough idea of their relationship over there—

???: “—So? When are we going to progress on this?”

Meanwhile, the woman who had been quietly watching the developments finally moved her lips.

It was a fox-eared beauty with a presence terribly out of place and an excessively glamorous personality—in a sense, a person who, just by being there, one could not help but be aware of; like Emilia, who had uncommon beauty and Abel, whose eccentric Oni mask was eye-catching.

It was obvious even if not explicitly stated.

She was the reason why Abel and Medium left the walled city for the Demon City, Chaosflame.

???: “General First-Class Yorna Mishigure.”

Who muttered these words?

Perhaps someone in the room called out the name. However since no one voiced a correction, it was self-evident that it was correct.

—Yorna Mishigure.

She is the ruler of the Demon City, Chaosflame, and a member of the “Nine Divine Generals”, the most powerful military officers in the Empire.

Having her on their side will be a major boon that would shake up the state of this broad Empire.

The journey on which Subaru went missing was originally intended to recruit her.

Zikr: “General First-Class Yorna, first of all, I would like to thank you for your visit. I am Zikr Osman, a General Second-Class of the Vollachian Empire.”

Yorna: “I have heard your name along the way. In person, you seem to be a good-looking man as Medium and Taritta said.”

Zikr: “Miss Medium and Miss Taritta?”

Zikr, who had begun speaking sternly, blinked at Yorna’s response.

This was not the time for this, but his gaze turned to Medium and another tall woman. The brown-skinned woman in male attire, she was probably Taritta, the topic of discussion.

The two responded to Zikr’s gaze with a smile and a nod. Zikr, who was known as the “Womanizer” for his gentle, manly behavior, may have been embarrassed but he seemed very happy.

With a cough, he cleared his throat as if to calm his emotions,

Zikr: “So, would General First-Class Yorna be willing to fight alongside Abel-dono?”

Yorna: “You may think of it that way. I have my own agenda, but my interests… are aligned with Abel’s.”

Abel: “It is settled. There is no issue in the pact with Yorna Mishigure.”

Yorna wore a luxurious kimono and held a golden kiseru in her hand. Although her previous reputation gave the impression that she was quite a worrisome woman, her demeanor was calm and collected.

Otto’s group had heard that Chaosflame had been severely damaged.

That is why a huge caravan of carriages arrived at Guaral, and why they had to accommodate such a large number of people at once.

And in the midst of all the devastation that the Demon City suffered

???: "—Subaru was sent somewhere."

???: "…"

It was Emilia, with a voice that sounded like a silver bell, who broke into the conversation.

Entering the story from a different angle, Abel's gaze through the Oni mask turned towards Emilia. Emilia didn't flinch, despite the obvious unwelcoming gaze.

Beatrice was in her arms, Petra and Frederica stood quietly by her side, and Garfiel had a stern look on his face. Otto may have contributed a little to that as well.

Indeed, Emilia's statement may just be some noise to them.

However, they had their own circumstances. It would be a problem if the conversation proceeded while ignoring them, who had rushed across the border to reach there.

Emilia: "Once more, let's start over from the beginning. —I am Emily, and you are Abel, right? Subaru's friend… No, his comrade."

Abel: "—. Yes."

Emilia: "Subaru had gone to another city with you… Well, to Yorna-san's and then something terrible happened and you got separated. Is that right?"

Yorna: "Yes, that's right. Something terrible doesn't quite cut it, though."

Both Abel and Yorna nodded at Emilia, which raised her well-shaped eyebrows as she confirmed what had just been described. After receiving their reactions, especially Yorna's words, Emilia accepted them with an open heart and said, "That's right.".

From the perspective of the parties involved, the superficial words of an outsider could be offensive, and Emilia, too, was careful to choose her words with care, knowing that her words fell into that category.

Emilia: “You couldn’t say where Subaru got whisked away to after getting separated from the rest of the group. Even though everyone searched, you could not find him, and there were many people without homes. So, that is why you came back to this city like this and we are discussing this here… Is that right?”

Abel: “There is nothing to correct. Still, that was a tragedy of that magnitude. Considering the scale of it, it’s hard to believe that the missing person is safe—”

Emilia: “—Subaru is fine. That’s for sure.”

Emilia interrupted Abel, speaking up in a low but powerful voice.

The trust in her voice made Abel’s black eyes narrow through the Oni mask. Abel’s eyes, tinged with deep thought, sought the basis of Emilia’s remark.

Sure enough, Abel took a pause and then asked Emilia, “What makes you so sure?”.

Abel: “You do not know the details of what transpired within the Demon City. Under such circumstances, disappearing when one wrong move could cost him his life —How can you be so sure that he would survive in that situation?”

Emilia: “…”

So far, all Otto and the others had heard were the news of the destruction of Chaosflame and the rumor that it was caused by an unbelievable calamity.

The genuineness of Abel’s words was unknown, and it was impossible to gauge the extent to which he had dramatized the facts. But Otto could be sure that it was not a meaningless bluff.

At the same time, there was a small hitch in the way he spoke.

Abel’s tone was cold, but he could sense his intention to learn more about them. —No, it was more about finding out about Subaru through Otto and the others.

He seemed to think that Subaru was hiding something from him. If it was about Subaru's position within the kingdom, they could not carelessly hand over that information.

Otto: "Emily, this is…"

Emilia: "I believe in Subaru, and I believe that Subaru is going to do his best until we get there to get him. No matter how hard things are."

Fearing leading questions, Otto tried to control the conversation, but Emilia had answered ahead of him. However, it was a statement of trust based on idealism, not a concrete basis.

It was not what Otto feared, nor was it what Abel wanted. So, naturally, Abel was disappointed and lowered his gaze.

Abel: "This is all wishful thinking without any persuasive evidence. Disappointing that this is your rationale."

Emilia: "Yeah? I think it's reaaally nice and important for people to believe in me. I feel safe when I can trust someone, and it gives me strength when they trust me. Are you different?"

Abel: "After all, feelings are just feelings. It can hardly be the deciding factor beyond that."

Emilia's eyes wavered at Abel's answer, shaking his head and closing one eye.

Otto missed the opportunity to interject, but that was enough for him to understand that the two were water and oil. That is to say, such was the difference between Emilia, who believed in the value of the heart, and Abel, who did not.

This rift was likely to be a difference in outlook on life and was not likely to be easily bridged.

Therefore—

Abel: "—No one can say for sure whether Natsuki Subaru is alive or dead. Just because he has always avoided death by a hair's breadth, there is no guarantee it will be the same this time."

That affirmation seemed to have been Abel's conclusion in this conversation.

As Emilia heard that and her lips pursed together,

Emilia: "Do you mean Subaru—"

She quickly looked at Abel and was about to say something.

But, one girl straightened up faster than she could proceed with her words. It was the little girl in Emilia's arms, who had her eyes closed.

Beatrice: "If you need confirmation that Subaru is alive, Betty has it, in fact."

Emilia: "Beatrice!"

Frederica: "Sama!"

Embraced within her chest, Beatrice opened her eyes, which had a characteristic pattern to them. Emilia, whose eyes widened, immediately called to her, to which Frederica hurriedly added the honorific title.

Whether or not it was enough to disguise things, Beatrice's words had a certain effect in attracting Abel's attention and the attention of others who did not know what was going on.

Abel: "Why is it that you have the certainty of Natsuki Subaru's being alive or dead?"

Beatrice: "It's a simple matter, I suppose. It's because Betty and Subaru are connected by the soul, in fact."

Yorna: "—Ah, so that's how it is. If this and that child are deeply connected, I can see the logic behind that."

Emilia: “Yes, they are in a contractual relationship. That’s why…”

Abel: “This girl is in her debilitated state? That makes sense.”

Despite the lack of a clear explanation, Abel and Yorna were able to figure out the situation.

Revealing the fact that Beatrice was a Spirit was not good for Otto and the others, who had entered the Empire under false identities, but the two in question had likely already realized it.

It was hard to imagine, however, that Abel and his group, whose purpose was to rebel against the Emperor in the Imperial Capital, would do anything about them on the grounds that they have violated the decree of the Empire.

Otto: “If you are convinced, then you understand. Apart from Natsuki-san’s comfort and location, we do have means to confirm whether he is alive or dead. Since Beatrice-sama says so, we can be certain that no matter where… Natsuki-san is alive in the place where he was sent to.”

Yorna: “—Is that so? Then perhaps Tanza will be a little better off.”

Yorna’s eyebrows lowered slightly at Otto’s additional words.

She whispered these words, which seemed to be a person’s name. Someone who lost their life from the way they spoke. —It would seem that this, too, was not unconnected with the destruction of the Demon City.

To delve into this, though, one would have had to be prepared to venture into Yorna’s world.

Petra: “Um, can we backtrack a bit?”

Emilia: “Petra-chan.”

Frederica: “Sama!”

Suddenly, not wanting to miss the momentary silence, Petra raised her hand and asked for the right to speak; Emilia carelessly called out to her again, and Frederica immediately came to her aid.

With Petra standing proudly beside her, she drew the attention of a group of adults who were strangers to her.

Petra: “Earlier, Medium-chan said that she was made tiny. Is that true?”

Medium: “Ah, yes, it’s true! I used to be really tall! About the same height as that blond boy over there… Umm, no, it was about the same height as that woman!”

Garfiel: “First, why did ya write off my amazin’ self?”

Frederica: “I know what you mean. Although, I am not too happy to hear about my height, either.”

Having been pointed out by Medium, Garfiel and Frederica each responded in turn.

However, Medium’s story was probably true, as no one had refuted it. It’s hard to believe, but apparently something mysterious happened to cause a person’s body to shrink.

Perhaps that meant—

Petra: “Has Subaru been made tiny, too?”

Petra asked in a serious, slightly firm voice.

That was a big question that Otto and the others could not afford to ignore. It would have been difficult enough just to meet up with Subaru, who was sent to the Empire, but they were not expecting a situation in which his body would be shrunken.

Otto, feeling like praying that he had heard wrong, was convinced, however, that his prayer had never been and would never be fully heard.

Not knowing Otto’s feelings, Medium nodded her head lightly and said, “That’s right.”.

Medium: “Subaru-chin is just like me! Maybe a little smaller? Anyway, they made him so tiny! But I heard that Subaru-chin and Yorna-chan beat up Gramps together, so Subaru-chin is amazing!”

Emilia: “Yes, Subaru is amazing!”

Petra: “Yes, Medium-chan is right.”

Beatrice: “Naturally, I suppose. He’s Betty’s partner, in fact!”

While the content itself was difficult to welcome, Medium’s unhesitating praise was music to the ears. In fact, Emilia, Petra, and Beatrice were in a good mood after hearing the praise for Subaru.

Neither Garfiel, Frederica, nor Otto felt bad. They did not, but as that praise was accompanied by unwelcome information, Otto became rather concerned.

Otto: “If Natsuki-san is also shrunken… I guess, he became a child? Not tired of just dressing up as a woman, now he’s becoming a child… infantilized? What a restless person…”

Frederica: “Indeed, pestering Subaru-sama for having a partner is regrettable but… But I’m worried, I can’t let him meet with Clind.”

Otto: “That’s one thing, but I’m sure there are other concerns that are more important…”

By what means was such a phenomenon caused?

Since this event was so far removed from reality, there were concerns about whether or not it could be reversed, and if so, whether or not there would be any after effects. In the worst case scenario, there was even a possibility that Subaru would return to the Kingdom of Lugunica as Emilia’s knight while remaining small.

Otto: “Well, in terms of ability, it’s not much different, anyway.”

Subaru would indeed be outraged were he to hear this, but if they could find him, then this would be acceptable as tolerable damage.

If he could grow up properly from then on, he wouldn’t have too many problems with his relationship with Emilia, a half-elf. She would be able to wait until he got older.

Otto: “I should not… Maybe I am a little out of my depth too.”

It seemed like the order of priorities for concern was in disarray.

For the time being, it was a setback that they could not meet up with Subaru, but thanks to Beatrice, they were now certain about his survival.

Now, with Zikr and the others—No, if the representative was Abel, they should decide if they wanted to continue this line of cooperation with them or not.

Garfiel: “—Beatrice-sama? Why do ya look so outta it?”

Otto: “—?”

With a hand on his chin, about to consider the options, Otto casually directed his attention to the words uttered by Garfiel.

Garfiel’s gaze turned to Beatrice in Emilia’s arms. She woke up, but wanting to avoid exhaustion, she remained in Emilia’s arms, with her good mood from the earlier praise of Subaru being short-lived, as her eyes widened.

What her trembling eyes were looking at was not Medium.

There was another girl, snuggled up beside her as if they were sisters. Beatrice stared at her, not even having heard her name yet.

Beatrice: “…Why are you here, I suppose.”

Louis: “Uu?”

Beatrice: “Answer, in fact! No, do not do anything unnecessary, I suppose!”

Immediately after asking the question in a trembling voice, Beatrice’s voice rose as her expression changed.

At the sound, the little girl who had her head tilted, jumped in surprise, and naturally, Otto and the others were surprised by Beatrice's reaction.

Otto: "B-Beatrice… sama, what's wrong? You suddenly yelled at that girl…"

Beatrice: "Yelling is the reasonable thing to do, in fact! Otto! Did you not realize it, I suppose?"

Otto: "Me? What do… ah."

Faced with that reprimand, something asserted itself in the back of the bewildered Otto's mind.

At first, when he saw the girl, it was a nagging, nebulous feeling that had been there from the start, but that gradually became clearer and clearer because of Beatrice's attitude.

Yes, Otto had recognized this girl. A sense of déjà vu that should not have cropped up in the Empire, a place he was visiting for the first time.

Otto: "Unbelievable, she is…"

Otto stared at the girl, as a startling possibility surfaced in his mind.

The possibility that drifted in the air was something that seemed to be placed in the corner of Otto's hazy memory. At that time, Otto's leg had been sliced open, and he was slipping in and out of consciousness from the pain and blood loss.

So, although he didn't see clearly who it was that had done it—

Emilia: "Beatrice, Otto-kun, what is it? Both of you, just looking at that girl…"

Confused by the reaction of Otto and Beatrice, Emilia addresses her without honorifics, but no one complemented her words. And then, that was no longer needed.

That was because there was no reason for the confusion to stay as confusion any longer.

Beatrice: “—It’s Gluttony, in fact.”

Emilia: “Eh…”

Emilia’s eyes widen as Beatrice speaks up in a calm, but hard tone of voice.

However, it was not only Emilia who froze, but everyone else who heard her voice, and it was at this moment that Beatrice’s voice had the attention of everyone in the room.

Therefore, everyone overheard the identity of this little girl.

Beatrice: “That girl is, the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony… a girl named Louis Arneb, I suppose.”

3

—The moment Beatrice’s words were uttered, an atmosphere of volatility overtook the room.

Garfiel: “You’ve gotta be kiddin’ me. A Sin Archbishop? What the hell do ya think you’re doin’?”

Understandably, shock, horror, and confusion spread as Beatrice’s words echoed.

That was what the young girl had said. Ordinarily, no adult with sound judgment would accept a thing like that without hesitation. However, that was not the case for Otto and the others.

Naturally Otto, who vaguely recognized the girl’s—Louis’s appearance, as well the members of the camp who believed Beatrice would not tell a lie, immediately accepted it as a fact.

Accordingly, Garfiel had stepped forward, cracking his knuckles and baring his fangs.

Immediately, Garfiel narrowed the pupils of his green eyes and glared at Louis.

Garfiel: “On top of that, it’s Gluttony? Isn’t that the one who’s been hoggin’ the top spot on our amazin’ selves’ list of bastards to beat up? Is this the way of the Empire?!”

Medium: “W-wait! That’s not right! Louis-chan isn’t a bad girl!”

Blocking Garfiel’s view, Medium spread her arms to protect Louis.

Her wish to protect the girl behind her was commendable, but it was exceedingly unlikely that she could stop Garfiel’s wrath. In the first place—

Otto: “You say she is not a bad girl, but are you being serious? Just so you know, both of my legs were painfully gouged by her. I still have some garish scars, should I show them to you?”

Medium: “That wasn’t… L-Louis-chan, maybe it was a different girl…”

Otto: “Sorry but, she had clearly introduced herself as such. There were victims other than me… undoubtedly, an incalculable number of them. Some were our friends, and the friends of our allies.”

Medium: “B-but, but but…!”

With her eyes tearing up, Medium desperately searched for some words of rebuttal.

However, whether her intelligence was as childlike as she looked, or even if it was only her appearance that had shrunk, Otto intended to shut down this war of words.

In any case, it was impossible for anyone in the world to defend a Sin Archbishop.

Sin Archbishops and Witch Cultists were abominations of such a degree.

That’s why Emilia, identical in appearance to the Witch of Envy who was the cause of it all, was unable to escape ridicule for her impossible dream.

Medium: “Maybe, Louis-chan was like that before… but Louis-chan is different now!”

Garfiel: “Different from before? What the hell are ya basin’ that on?”

Medium: “Because! She was friends with Big bro, Subaru-chin, and Rem-chan! I’ve been with her this whole time… and she hasn’t done a single bad thing! She didn’t!”

Otto: “—With Natsuki-san?”

Medium’s desperate, futile resistance, shouting as she frantically searched for words, had hit his ears with something strange that was too large to ignore.

Subaru had acted together with Louis. —Surely it was not because he had not known who Louis was. Subaru should have quickly guessed Louis’s true identity.

Petra: “Otto-san, Subaru couldn’t have gone as far as losing his memory or something right?”

Otto: “For a moment, that fear washed over me, but from what I’ve heard from Mizelda-san and Zikr-san, I think that is not much of a concern.”

To Petra’s anxious words, Otto dismissed his anxieties due to the evidence put forth for consideration.

If it were the case that he had worked together with the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Louis, who was here; a situation where Subaru had been robbed of his “memories” was certainly scary.

Since he remembered Subaru, there was probably no concern that his “name” had been eaten; but whether his “memories” had been was a question of Subaru’s own personal symptoms.

However—

Emilia: “—The stories of Subaru we’ve heard in this city are still of the Subaru we know. So there’s no need to worry about that, Petra-chan… Petra-sama.”

Petra: “Thank you, Emily.”

At the words of Emilia, who had reached the same conclusion, Petra also finally showed an expression of relief.

Though that was the reasoning for why they could say Subaru’s “memories” had not been eaten, it was hard to say it was a basis for making a decision on how to deal with Louis who was here now.

Of course, there was no denying the question of why Subaru had not done anything about Louis one way or the other, but—

Otto: “Since it’s Natsuki-san, it probably was not a matter of getting his hands on a young-looking girlfriend or something like that. —Is it possible he was concerned about the Authority’s nullification requirements?”

Frederica: “We’ve talked about it before. Even if we defeat the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, we don’t have any definite proof that everything that was lost would come back.”

Otto: “It is troublesome, but if that’s the case then it is understandable why he did not act rashly.”

As Garfiel had said, crushing the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony was an ardent wish of theirs, as well as the Royal Candidates, and also for the world, that was hard to let go.

However, this was not because of a simple desire for revenge; their primary goal was the restoration of the damage Gluttony had wrought.

If taking Louis’s life would return the victims of her Authority to how they were before, there would not be a problem.

However, what would they do if the victims were not restored? Subaru might have been wary that if they acted rashly, the way to return the victims to normal may be permanently lost.

Garfiel: “—I know what you’re thinking Ottobro. But that doesn’t mean we hafta let the pipsqueak go free.”

Despite understanding Otto’s thoughts, Garfiel arrogantly declared that.

In truth, he was right. Even though he was afraid that taking her life would eliminate the possibility, it was hard to believe taking her into custody would cause any problems.

Rather, the danger of leaving a Sin Archbishop alone was likely far greater.

Therefore in times like these, Garfiel, who tended to make snap decisions, was reliable.

Bit by bit, Garfiel closed the gap in order to pin down the dangerous Sin Archbishop. At Garfiel’s approach, Louis shrank her small body down with an “Uu.”.

Medium: “Abel-chin! Say something!”

Protecting Louis behind her and facing off against Garfiel, Medium called for Abel.

Abel, who had not interjected during this course of events, turned his attention to Medium’s appeal.

Abel: “What do you want me to say? Handling this is your business.”

Medium: “But, I can’t persuade them well!”

Abel: “Don’t foist the responsibility of your vice on me. After all, it is unneeded.”

Medium’s eyes wavered as she was told it was unnecessary.

Perhaps Abel’s cruel way of speaking had given her the impression that he had forsaken Louis. However, in truth that had not been the case.

Abel had said there was no need for himself to get involved.

Garfiel: “M, My amazin’ self’s not goin’ to go easy on ya even if you’re a woman!”

???: “That’s splendid. Since otherwise, you might end up using my beauty as an excuse for your shoddiness.”

In front of Garfiel, who had paused, Yorna had stepped in directly between them and stood leisurely.

Wearing thick soles on top of being tall to begin with, Yorna looked down on Garfiel, kiseru in hand. Returning her gaze head on, Garfiel fiercely bared his fangs.

Yorna would defend Louis, and had declared her intention to do so.

Since she had originally come to Guaral from the Demon City alongside Louis, they had known she had no intention of eliminating her, but that in itself was hard to believe.

Otto: “I will say it again, but she is a Sin Archbishop. Surely you’re not saying that the horrors of the Witch Cult are not known in the Vollachian Empire?”

Yorna: “We know the deeds of those ruffians, and their repulsiveness. Naturally, we also know the malice of those calling themselves Sin Archbishops.”

Otto: “I hear the wounds of the Fortified City of Garkla still have not healed.”

The large imperial city had been destroyed in a rampage of Greed, a Sin Archbishop of the Witch Cult.

The offender, Greed, was defeated in Pristella, but it was common knowledge throughout the world that there was no choice about where the Witch Cult would rampage. Naturally, in the Empire as well.

In spite of that, the fact was that they had left Louis at large.

Otto: “Do you think you can win them over? I have to say that is imprudent.”

Abel: “If something is useful, I shall consider how to use it. It is you people that are severely mistaken in thinking that all would take your side.”

Otto: “…”

Abel dodged Otto’s questioning, and effortlessly pointed that out condescendingly.

As he had said, the reaction of those gathered on the top floor of City Hall was mixed. Of course there were those who appeared disgusted and hostile upon hearing that Louis was a Sin Archbishop. However, like Medium and Yorna, a considerable number of them showed reluctance towards eliminating Louis.

In particular—

Mizelda: “—I’ll say this: Subaru and Rem are both our friends. Since they were the ones who brought Louis with them, they are the only two who have the right to decide Louis’s fate.”

Frederica: “Mizelda-sama…”

Mizelda: “Of course, if the Chieftain disagrees then I will yield.”

With eyes conveying a strong sense of purpose, and having cast a piercing gaze that way, Mizelda would try to take the side protecting Louis. Frederica, who had had many opportunities to exchange words with her at City Hall, gasped under that strong gaze.

Mizelda was the representative of the Shudraq, and the other Shudraqians would follow her. —No, more accurately, they would follow the Chieftain who had returned to the city.

The target of Mizelda’s words and gaze was the woman dressed formally in black, who had been entrusted with the decision. Taritta, the new Chieftain of the Shudraq was asked by her older sister, “What should we do?”.

Taritta: “My opinion is the same as Sister’s. However, this decision wasn’t because Sister said so, as I am protecting Louis for my own reasons. Since I owe Louis a debt of gratitude.”

Mizelda: “Ha, I see.”

At Taritta’s clear answer, Mizelda relaxed her lips and nodded.

Otto’s side did not know what these sisters’ relationship was like, but it seemed like Mizelda had happily accepted Taritta’s assertion.

However, they did not have the luxury to consider that heartwarming.

Beatrice: “A Sin Archbishop, on top of that someone like Gluttony; turning a blind eye cannot be done, in fact. Will you all cool your heads, I suppose?”

From Emilia’s arms, Beatrice’s words were filled with strength.

She had come this far by suppressing her exhaustion, but in an emergency it was necessary for her to display her abilities. Like Subaru, not hesitating in such situations was a bad habit of Beatrice’s.

Emilia: “That’s no good, everyone calm down! Fighting like this—”

While the spirits of Beatrice and Garfiel, alongside those of Yorna and the Shudraq, had risen in preparation for battle; Emilia tried to stop the dispute with a heartbroken look on her face.

In fact, if it came to seriously stopping the dispute through brute force, Emilia was the one with the ability best suited for doing so.

If she were to use her immense mana to freeze Guaral, Otto would aim to secure Louis in the meantime. At worst, they would cut ties with everyone in Guaral.

Emilia: “Is more dangerous than turning a blind eye to a Sin Archbishop—”

That was when Otto watched for an unguarded moment.

???: “—What is the matter, you plebeians, have you not yet fought enough? That is quite hot-blooded, is it not?”

Otto: “…”

Suddenly, a powerful new voice shook the atmosphere within the large chamber of City Hall.

It belonged to a woman whose shoes clacked loudly as she leisurely came up the stairs. Some time ago, Otto had said that Emilia, Abel, and Yorna had presences that were impossible to ignore, but the owner of that voice too, was cloaked in an air which did not match that impression.

With the hem of her blood-red dress swaying, a beautiful woman leisurely appeared.

She had fair skin and orange hair, and had boldly adorned herself with numerous ornaments, but even the glitter of those jewels lost out to her natural beauty—Priscilla Barielle.

In the Fortress City of Guaral, the final person who had an influential voice had appeared.

Following behind her as she walked unhurriedly, was her attendant Schult, whose small, humble movements drew attention, as well as Al, with his unforgettably eccentric appearance.

Together with Abel, Medium, and the others, Al was also one of the people who had headed to Chaosflame with Subaru. On his way back, he had gone to meet up with Priscilla, and now it seemed they were entering in together.

Originally there was supposed to be one more person, Heinkel, who was nowhere to be seen, but that was a minor detail.

More importantly, from Otto’s point of view, a being had joined in who seemed like she would make this volatile atmosphere even worse.

Fickle and powerful, Priscilla carried such a presence that was impossible to predict as to which side she would choose.

Rather, it almost seemed like it would be better if they could just conclude she was an enemy.

Priscilla: “I made my way here after hearing that Abel and the others had returned, but I had not expected this kind of atmosphere so soon. Even if the city is this devastated, it seems a starved dog cannot choose where it barks.”

Emilia: “Priscilla! Everyone is reaaally tense right now! Don’t say strange things.”

Priscilla: “Nonsense. If I had not come, you would have made it snow once again. Let me tell you, no matter how chilly you make it, I shall not stop baring my shoulders. Still, it does get cold.”

Emilia: “I’m sorry about that, but…”

Emilia had an absurd exchange with Priscilla as she entered, then apologized.

However, the reason the end of that sentence had lost its strength was not because of Emilia’s remorse.

It was because the high-pitched clatter of a hard object falling had reverberated throughout the large chamber.

Medium: “—Yorna-chan?”

Suddenly, Medium turned her head and murmured, looking up at the woman standing just in front of her. Her blue eyes stared at the single kiseru that had fallen at Yorna’s feet.

Yorna had been fiddling with it in her hands, a fine item that did not seem cheap.

Louis: “Uu…”

With a groan, Louis, who was at the center of the conversation, picked up the fallen kiseru. However, Yorna did not accept the picked up kiseru when it was offered to her.

Instead, Yorna’s gaze was solely on Priscilla; the presence that had just set foot into the large hall.

Staring at Priscilla, Yorna's eyes widened.

Yorna, who usually seemed imperturbable and unflappable, was astonished.

Her painted crimson lips were wide open, trembling.

Yorna: "Pr, Prisca…?"

She called Priscilla that. —A different name that didn't sound familiar.

Frozen in shock, the wide-eyed Yorna addressed Priscilla by that similar but different name. Three people present responded to that name.

One was Zikr, another was Abel, and the last one, needless to say, was Priscilla.

Zikr looked at Yorna speculatively, Abel contemplatively, and Priscilla scornfully.

Priscilla: "What, you? Why do you behave like that towards me… no."

Priscilla looked back at Yorna with her crimson eyes, not concealing her displeasure.

Without pause, her sharp tongue seemed ready to strike her, but right before; she stopped short. Priscilla again gazed intently at Yorna.

Yorna's blue eyes and Priscilla's blood-red eyes had locked with one another, and a moment of silence passed.

Then Priscilla let out an "Ahh" like an exhale,

Priscilla: "—If I think about it, you are indeed mine dear mother, aren't you?"

Like that, a remark which would give rise to an explosion distinct from the already volatile situation, had been stated matter-of-factly.

Chapter 79:
A Roar of Scarlet Laughter

1

—Priscilla's sudden appearance had brought forth a whirlwind through the power of her words.

???: "…"

But at that moment, a certain silence and blankness pervaded the hall, giving everyone the illusion that time had stopped.

It was a statement that could not be misheard, but she didn't quite understand what it meant. She couldn't get the meaning correctly from the sound, that's the impression she had.

"Dear Mother", it took some time for her to search her brain for the word that the sound means.

However—

Emilia: "—? Yorna is Priscilla's mother?"

Emilia tilted her head curiously, and as soon as a different sound for "mother" came forth from her, "Dear Mother" and "mother" connected, and she understood the essence of "Dear Mother" and "mother".

Controlling the fluttering sensation in his own head, Otto compared the two people who had his attention — Yorna and Priscilla. Yorna who was staring at her, unable to move, and Priscilla who was looking at the former with a calm expression.

They had different hair and eye colors, and they were of different races to begin with.

Of course, in the case of mixed blood, there were individual differences in which the blood of a parent was stronger, but Priscilla and Yorna had no similarities in appearance.

If one could say so, they both had lustrous good looks but—

Otto: “If we treated people like family at that level, the world would be full of big families.”

Concluding this, Otto held his confusion in check.

Still, hearing about Priscilla and Yorna’s relationship made some sense. —Priscilla’s stern attitude and personality certainly gave off a strong sense of imperial style.

Priscilla: “I can feel the unpleasant eyes that are fixed on mineself, but that is okay.”

Otto gasped at the warning look in Priscilla’s eyes, reading the intent of her gaze. Leaving Otto aside, Priscilla looked at Emilia and said,

Priscilla: “Half-devil, it is as you say. To think that she had become one of the “Nine Divine Generals”. Since I was a child I supposed so, but how strange it is.”

Emilia: “Well, I’m surprised. But now that you mention it, I guess you both look a lot alike.”

Priscilla supported her chin with the fan in her hand, and Emilia nodded in reply.

Just before, Otto had denied to himself any similarities in external appearance between the two, so while Emilia’s unexpected judgment worried him, he had set that aside for the time being.

The problem was—

Yorna: “—Wait.”

Priscilla’s words were deterred by Yorna herself, who had been unexpectedly singled out by her. She closed her eyes for a moment, and erased the apparent turmoil from her expression,

Yorna: “I was a little surprised, but that is an unacceptable statement. Why do you think I am your mother…”

Priscilla: “Stop making up trifling evasions. If you plan to trick me, you must change your soul. No matter how you change your appearance, you cannot deceive my scarlet eyes.”

Yorna: “—Hk.”

Yorna’s expression of feigned calm once again stiffened at Priscilla’s decisive response.

Priscilla’s language was conceptual and, in addition, held no intention to compromise with others. This made it hard to take in the exact meaning of what was said, but it seemed to have been fatal to Yorna.

Yorna was clearly flustered by Priscilla’s gaze and the sharpness of her tongue.

However, Yorna wasn’t the only one who showed strong turmoil on this occasion—

???: “—Absurd.”

Clearly, the amazement towards the situation at hand spilled over.

It was faint, so faint that it could have been missed, but it was coming from the other party, and Otto did not miss the voice that spilled out from behind the Oni mask.

Abel, a man who seemed cool-headed rather than calm and unperturbed, made that one comment.

“Priscilla” he called out, while hiding the slight agitation behind his mask,

Abel: “Are you serious? Yorna Mishigure is Sandra Benedict?”

Priscilla: “—I see, you did not know that either, Abel. I do not blame you. I have no way of knowing except by my own words.”

Emilia: “But, you noticed that Priscilla isn’t being told anything, right?”

Priscilla: “Do not interrupt me. Shut up, you half-devil.”

Emilia: “You don’t have to say it that way…”

Priscilla, who responded to Abel’s question in a nonchalant manner, glared at Emilia, who had interrupted her, in order to silence her.

Whatever the case may be, this was an exchange that left out those in the Kingdom, including Otto, and those in the Empire who did not know what was going on. Otto was especially interested in the content that delved into Priscilla’s internal affairs, as she was also a Royal Candidate, but—

Garfiel: “—Put off the unexpected reunion talk. Right now, the priority is this kid’s story!”

Garfiel snarled as he bared his fangs, undaunted by the change in the air.

The opponent who those green eyes pierced was Louis; still protected by Yorna and Medium. Garfiel was right, they could not move forward or backward until they decided what to do with her.

Of course, the conclusion in Otto’s mind that Louis should be restrained and deprived of her freedom was unassailable.

Garfiel: “My amazin’ self isn’t sayin’ to kill her, but I’m sayin’ to tie her up and roll her over. That’s the one thing my amazin’ self won’t compromise… “Tinos limbs are going away.”“

Al: “—That’s probably going to be something bro doesn’t want to hear.”

Garfiel: “Huh?”

Garfiel, who concurred with Otto, bared his fangs at the remark.

The person who interrupted them was Al, who had come up to the top level with Priscilla. He was still the same eccentric looking guy, scratching the nape of his neck with his one-armed hand in a somewhat unenthusiastic manner.

Al: “First of all, lemme apologize to you first. —I’m sorry I couldn’t bring bro home after we went to Chaosflame together.”

Emilia: “Al… no, thanks for apologizing. But I’m not the only one disappointed that I didn’t get to meet Subaru, Beatrice is the one disappointed the most.”

Al: “Oh, then I’m sorry to that child and to the others as well.”

Al bowed his head as he uttered an apology for Subaru’s absence.

Al’s usual frivolous attitude notwithstanding, his apology seemed genuine. However, a sincere apology does not necessarily lead to forgiveness or a good impression.

Otto: “If anything, an easy apology will only increase the number of people who will take advantage of you. In fact, if you’re willing to apologize, I would prefer that you don’t interfere.”

Al: “That’s harsh. But, as I said earlier, doing such a thing to this lil’ girl is something that bro… Natsuki Subaru doesn’t wish for.”

Garfiel: “So, why the hell?! You’re just sayin’ random things…”

Al: “—I too, tried to kill the lil’ one and was stopped by bro.”

Garfiel’s irritated words were drowned out by Al’s dry words. At this response, that caused Garfiel’s breathing to hitch, Al shrugged his shoulders and nodded at Louis,

Al: “You guys are like that. Isn’t it natural that I’d consider killing her? But even then…”

Otto: “Did Natsuki-san reject it?”

Al: “To be honest, I couldn’t believe my ears. Originally, I was thinking that he had some lil’ stranger girl with him, but then I found out that she was a Sin Archbishop. He was trying to protect her with his body. I thought I knew that bro had a lot of crazy ideas, but he exceeded my imagination.”

As he said this, Al’s gaze shot through his helmet at Louis. Under the gaze, Louis groaned “Uh—…“, but instead of hiding behind Medium and the others, she looked straight back at him.

The light in those blue eyes was neither dull nor feeble.

Otto: “…”

As he watched, Otto examined Al’s testimony.

Otto himself believed that the reason Subaru was not able to get his hands on Louis was “naivete”.

The “naivete” that Subaru and Emilia possessed was both a weakness and a strength.

Once you let go of it, you can never get it back, and even though Otto felt like it was difficult to handle, he never wanted it to be gone.

Otto: “We, the people around us, can make decisions without such “naivete”.”

Al: “I understand, bro. But it’s hard now. After all, we’re talking in front of all these people. There is no going back from that.”

Frederica: “…Otto-sama”

Frederica stepped firmly and called out to Otto’s profile. Her beautiful eyes flickered with concern and anxiety at the prospect of taking action here.

Otto also felt that it was a mistake to mention the identity of Louis here. —No, to start with, the problem was that Louis had already been accepted by the people involved.

Taritta and Mizelda’s resolution became prevalent in the Fortress City.

Therefore—

Otto: “So, you are saying you are just going to let her roam free?”

Al: “Sure, I wouldn’t have forgiven her if she’d done something wrong. But…”

Medium: “Louis-chan was always trying to protect Subaru-chin. She never misbehaved while she was with us. She never will!”

Medium raised a frantic voice, taking in Al’s words.

Her statement was just wishful thinking, and Louis’s actions to date did not guarantee what Louis would do in the future. That was the biggest focal point of the issue.

Petra: “I watched the Master do it, so maybe I can make an oath magic seal…”

Otto: “—. We should not do that. I thought, for a moment, that was possible.”

Petra hesitantly suggested the idea, but Otto rejected it.

Petra spoke of a “magic seal,” a binding of the soul to make the recipient keep their word, something Roswaal has inscribed on his body that, if broken, would kill him.

Roswaal, as the mastermind behind the events that occurred in the “Sanctuary” and at the former Roswaal mansion, personally inscribed it to demonstrate his surrender to the camp.

As the words suggested, a “magic seal” was clearly “magic.”

Superstitious as it may seem, some say that magic would eventually rebound on the user. If one continued to bind others through magic, the magic would eventually burn one’s soul as well.

He had no intention of having Petra take on such a burden, and even if she were able to do so and inscribe a magic seal that would bind Louis’ actions, it would be no more than insurance.

Otto: “Because we do not have a full picture of what we can bind to buy us peace of mind.”

The Authority of a Sin Archbishop, no one knew its full extent.

As long as they did not know what hidden curveballs would be thrown out, ultimately, no matter how they were bound, Otto's wariness of Louis could never be lifted. That is, unless they took a life.

If so, then not making use of anything like a magic seal, which could lead them to carelessness, was what would keep their vigilance steady.

Otto: "Regrettably, that is my conclusion."

Garfiel: "Ottobro! Ya sure about that?! That's a Sin Archbishop!"

Hearing Otto's thoughts, Garfiel raised his voice in a scream.

Even though he was absolutely right, Otto understood the frustration of being forced into a situation where he felt he was being stifled, wanting to empathize with his younger brother's heartache.

Otto: "However, discussing it here will not get everyone's approval. With the current situation in which there is still a lot left to be heard, I do not wish for things to break down with all of you."

Priscilla: "Therefore, if we are to use force, it should be after hearing what they have to say, correct? How obstinate."

Otto: "I do not intend to do such a rash thing, but I will take that in itself as a compliment, Priscilla-sama."

When Priscilla brilliantly expressed Otto's sentiment, he at least attempted to put up a good front.

Whatever the case, to Garfiel, the answer was a frustrating reality.

Abel, who has considerable influence in the city, and the "People of the Shudraq," who have shown their non-negotiable stance on the treatment of Louis—there was no way to dissuade them.

There was no basis for eliminating Louis beyond her being a Sin Archbishop.

Since that did not work, there would be no other recourse remaining on their side but to use force. However, killing Louis would not necessarily erase the effects of the Authority of Gluttony, and would it be worth it to have the disadvantage of turning all of the Empire against them thereafter?

Emilia: “Fighting like that just makes all of us a little less anxious. That’s how it is, right?”

Otto and Garfiel: “…”

Garfiel, fangs gnashing, and Otto with one eye closed.

Emilia’s amethyst eyes flashed as she traced the flow of the conversation and came to this conclusion. Beatrice, in her arms, called out her name, “Emily.”

Emilia: “I’m sorry, …Lady Beatrice. You’re worried a lot, I know you are.”

Beatrice: “…As long as you understand properly, good, I suppose.”

They exchanged glances and words very close to each other, and Beatrice’s round eyes were downcast. Emilia nodded her head, understanding Beatrice’s feelings, and turned her gaze toward Louis and Medium.

The girl who leans on her like a sister returned her gaze.

Emilia: “That little girl… Louis might be reaaally dangerous. That’s just what Otto-kun and the others have said, and you know that, don’t you?”

Medium: “…Yeah, I know.”

Emilia: “But you didn’t see Louis do anything that was dangerous or bad; did Louis do anything to you or Subaru?”

Medium: “Hmm, she tried to protect us. It’s true; I’m not lying. Isn’t that right? Abel-chin, Al-chin, Taritta-chan, and Yorna-chan?”

Staring directly at Emilia, Medium was trying her best to choose the right words. As she decided, she asked those who had returned from the Demon City with her to agree.

Abel and Yorna, both still recovering from their earlier exchange with Priscilla, reacted sluggishly, but Al shrugged and Taritta nodded.

Taritta: “Yes, Louis certainly tried to protect everyone. She was very fond of Subaru, in my opinion.”

Otto: “I would say “As expected of the Lolimancer”, but the atmosphere’s not one that can be joked about like that.”

Beatrice: “…That moniker, Betty does not like it very much, in fact! Be careful, I suppose.”

Beatrice’s disgruntled, low voice slightly relaxed the hostilities that had been present just up till a moment ago; perhaps Beatrice had decided to leave it to Emilia’s judgment as to how to proceed with Louis.

Even with the same conclusion, Emilia would softly adjust it to what Otto and Beatrice had presented.

Then, Emilia spoke, looking at Louis.

Emilia: “You were concerned about Subaru. I don’t believe that’s a lie. So, I want to believe in you as much as this girl who is trying so hard to believe in you.”

Garfiel: “—Hk, Emilia-sama, she’s!”

Emilia: “Even Garfiel was so biting towards us at first. But now he’s reaaally good friends with us, isn’t he?”

Emilia’s discourse was a bit disingenuous, given that Garfiel and Louis were in different positions and under different circumstances. However, when Emilia said it, it was true that it was hard to respond back.

As the situation progressed, Garfiel’s cheeks hardened in bitterness. Emilia’s response was a small apologetic “Sorry.”

Emilia: “It might be difficult. But I think it’s best to start there, if you can talk about it properly, instead of going all in and just being so hostile at the beginning. Of course, sometimes you have to be hostile from the start…”

Garfiel: “…”

Emilia: “I’m here with all of you, and I think it would be nice if everyone here could get along with me. I want to tell them that I want to be friends with them. For that, I have to open my clenched hand first.”

Saying this, Emilia looked down at Beatrice in her arms. Beatrice looked at her gently and then gave a small nod.

Seeing Beatrice’s nod, Emilia slowly stepped forward.

Right in front of Yorna, past the glaring Garfiel, and in front of the small Medium sheltering little Louis behind her back.

And then—

Emilia: “This is reaaally a roundabout way of saying this, but… I believe in Zikr-san and Mizelda-san and others who have been so kind to Subaru and Rem, and I want to believe Medium-chan and everyone else who believes in them. So please let me believe in you, who Medium-chan believes in.”

Louis: “…Ah, Uu.”

Emilia: “Not us, but for these children that are being very nice to you, it’s reaaally nice to know that there are people who believe in you.”

As she said this, Emilia gently held out her right hand to Louis.

With Beatrice being held with her left hand, Emilia lowered her waist, moving towards Louis. Emilia’s action made even Medium, who was trying to protect Louis, suddenly move towards her.

Emilia: “Louis-chan.”

And so she called out to them.

Perhaps it was her appeal that prompted Louis to extend her hand, or perhaps Emilia's words had some meaning for the Sin Archbishop bereft of a human heart.

As Emilia held out her right hand, Louis placed her own right hand on top of hers.

Otto was momentarily concerned about the possibility of the Authority being activated on Emilia as a result of this, but Otto regretted this concern and felt that he should despise it with all his heart.

Either way—

Louis: "Uau."

Emilia: "Hmm, I'm worried about Subaru, too."

Embracing each other's hands, Emilia smiled in reply, and that was the resolution for both Otto and the Emilia Camp. The conclusion was "put on hold."

—However, Otto was proud of Emilia, because even though the pitfalls were the same, the way Emilia said it and the way he would have said it would have been different.

2

Garfiel: "—My amazin' self won't take my eyes off of ya, y'know."

Regarding the handling of Louis, it had been decided to be placed "on hold".

In response to that, Garfiel, who until the very end, had declared that he could not accept it, asserted his stance towards Emilia and the girl she had shaken hands with.

Since Garfiel's concerns and warnings were natural, Otto would not interject.

Otto: “A Witch Cultist, let alone a Sin Archbishop is not something I can imagine changing their ways, after all.”

Otto’s dry, pragmatic thinking came to that conclusion.

Even if it had been a touching historic exchange between Emilia and Louis. However, while he thought that it was not like himself, Otto had also thought this.

—The defeats of the White Whale, the Great Rabbit, and the Sin Archbishops of Sloth and Greed had also been unimaginable.

It had been Natsuki Subaru who had, in little over a year, brought these things about many times.

The world saw these as achievements of the Emilia camp, but everyone in the camp understood that Subaru’s contributions were especially significant. Therefore, he had to thoroughly consider the possibility.

It might have been that, once again, Natsuki Subaru had done something unthinkable.

Otto: “I do not like it…”

The question of how the people around them would evaluate Subaru, when that actually happened, had him feeling crestfallen.

He thought that others should also get to know Subaru’s true humanity quickly—.

Zikr: “Once the discussion has settled down, if I may?”

In the large hall where the mood of the discussion had relaxed, Zikr had raised his hand and, with those words, began to speak.

Having drawn attention to himself, he gave the preface of “With your permission” to his remarks.

Zikr: “Although I am very interested in the relationship between Miss Priscilla and General First-Class Yorna, there are some things I want to first confirm with Abel-dono.”

Abel: "—. You may speak."

Zikr: "Yes."

Abel, who had been keeping his mouth shut, assented when this topic had arisen.

Although he had not interjected regarding how Louis would be handled, it seemed he had put a brief pause to the shock from before. Having been addressed, he gazed at Zikr, his black eyes urging him to continue speaking.

Zikr: "I am aware that General First-Class Yorna's cooperation has been acquired, and that the collapse of Demon City of Chaosflame… That as a result, Miss Natsumi has fallen into danger. What I wanted to inquire additionally was about a rumor that has spread over the past few days—"

Abel: "—A rumor."

Zikr: "Yes. —The rumor that somewhere, the child of His Excellency the Emperor, a Crown Prince of black hair, is present."

Zikr reverently bowed his head, as he informed Abel.

That rumor—one which alluded to the existence of the son of the Emperor Vincent Vollachia, had been spread, and had even reached Otto's ears.

On top of that, the rumor said that the Emperor's son had a rebel army—that is to say, he was the leader of the group gathered at the Fortress City of Guaral, and that he was flying the banner of revolt against the Emperor, or something of the like.

However, he did not remember seeing anyone who had looked like that in the city.

Zikr: "According to the reports, this rumor had spread from the East. It has already spread all over the Empire, but its source…"

Abel: "It is as you have guessed, it was spread from the Demon City. —It takes power to threaten the throne. And power will only gather under a great cause.”

With his arms crossed and shaking his head slowly, Abel answered dispassionately.

That answer was convincing, but in the first place, an effort to threaten the Emperor’s throne was not an issue their camp really wanted to be involved with.

As for Otto, his focus had turned to how to curb the possibility that Emilia would say she could not abandon these people, having met them once.

Due to that, it could be said that he was late in noticing the possibilities he normally would have noticed.

Therefore—

???: “…A black-haired, Crown Prince.”

Petra, who seemed to be pondering, was the one who had muttered that bit by bit.

She had been brooding over something, forming a small crease on her pretty eyebrows. Then, she timidly expressed her thoughts.

Those were—

Petra: “Um, according to what Medium-san and the others had said earlier, Subaru became smaller right? Like me or Beatrice-chan.”

Frederica: “That is what has been said. I cannot really imagine it, but if it was Subaru, it is possible to have encountered such a misfortune… Ah.”

Otto: “—!”

Nodding at Petra’s words, Frederica’s eyes widened as she sorted through the information. Almost simultaneously with Frederica’s realization, Otto had also understood what Petra had been thinking.

And now, he had to curse how off-the-mark his own thinking had been.

Petra: “Could it be that the rumored child of the Emperor is Subaru?”

In the place of Otto, who had cursed that possibility, Petra had directly cut to the heart of the matter.

Unmoving, the girl’s eyes were fixed on Abel, and through the Oni mask, his black eyes met them. Without the slightest waver, Abel calmly nodded in assent to Petra’s questioning,

Abel: “Correct.”

Petra: “—hk, Something like that…”

With the look in her eyes sharpening at that short answer, Petra had tried to raise her voice.

However, faster than Petra could respond,

???: “—Ku, hahahahaha!”

Like so, a wholeheartedly amused voice resounded.

Laughter that had not paid heed to the circumstances, shattered the mood in the large chamber. However, the reason no one could raise their voice immediately after that outburst was because that loud laughter was Priscilla’s.

She held a fan to her mouth, as if to not show her teeth while she laughed.

Priscilla: “Of all things, that foolish commoner as the Crown Prince, that makes me laugh. Ahh, Abel, you, do you plan to kill mineself with laughter? You have considerably changed your way of doing things, have you not?”

???: “Princess?”

Priscilla: “What is it, you should laugh as well, Al. No, did you also take part in this conspiracy? If so, how skillfully have you made mineself laugh! I must say you have performed the duties of a clown splendidly.”

Turning towards a surprised Al, Priscilla looked pleased while commending him. The unpredictability of Priscilla’s reaction had temporarily taken away the zeal in the large chamber.

Of course, that did not mean it had erased all the confusion.

Emilia: “Umm, what do you mean? There’s no way that Subaru is the Emperor’s child, right? After all, Subaru came from beyond the Great Waterfall.”

Frederica: “Emily, that is one of Subaru-sama’s jokes.”

Emilia: “Is that so? Then, for real?”

Otto: “As for the question of whether he is a child of the emperor, it is not true. A fabrication.”

Emilia: “Eh? Eh? Eh?”

A dizzied Emilia expressed that she did not understand a thing.

In short, Subaru’s infantilization and the goal of Abel’s group had luckily aligned.

Frederica: “To be precise, I think it would be more proper to say they made use of it once it happened.”

Otto agreed with what Frederica had said, that this had been an effective use of the situation.

When Abel and the others had raised a rebellion, they wanted a good pretext like that. To act as a figurehead for that purpose, there was no one more convincing than the Emperor’s child.

Of course, it was quite possible that using someone who did not exist as the leader would be a double-edged sword.

Otto: “Since Natsuki-san does really exist, do you intend to use him as a double edged sword?”

Abel: "An insolent manner of speaking, but it is to my liking. In that case, you should also understand."

Otto: "—Though, it is frustrating."

Rightfully, Otto and the others would be justified in resenting Subaru's circumstances being exploited.

However, although his reply that it was frustrating was not a lie, it was true that there was a certain noticeable value in the course of events Abel had devised.

That was because—

Frederica: "—For Subaru-sama, whose whereabouts are unknown, it would cause the likelihood of him losing his life to be greatly reduced."

Otto: "…Yes."

Otto nodded bitterly at Frederica's understanding.

Emilia and Garfiel were slow in comprehending Otto and Frederica's thoughts. With the two showing their confusion on their faces, they racked their brains and asked "What does that mean?"

Emilia: "I have absolutely no idea what you're talking about, but…"

Garfiel: "My amazin' self gets that Captain's been given a weird title. But, wouldn't makin' him the Captain of the rebellion be even more dangerous?"

Otto: "No, it would draw attention, but the threats to his life would be lightened more or less. Because the value of the Crown Prince can only be effectively demonstrated while he is alive."

The Crown Prince, a dissident threatening the reign of Vincent Vollachia.

This existence within the rebel cause had utilizable value to both allies and enemies of the current Emperor. It goes without saying for the rebelling side, but if he was kept alive there were many ways to use him on the Emperor's side as well.

Executing him would dampen the spirits of the rebel army, while a living Crown Prince could be used to force them to give up their righteous cause.

Otto: "That is to say, no matter where Natsuki-san was hurled off to, and even if he was taken into custody, the likelihood of him avoiding being killed on the spot is high. Instead of that—"

Emilia: "Instead of that?"

Otto: "…The struggle for the Vollachian throne, any way out of this rebellion has vanished."

Receiving a blessing goes hand in hand with having to bear responsibilities.

Regardless of whether he wished for it or not, Subaru was right in the middle of the rebellion of the Vollachian Empire, at the highest position, placed as the figurehead.

For that reason—

Priscilla: "—Well, how can you not help but laugh?"

And with those words, they could finally guess why Priscilla, who had gotten the answer well before, was cruelly laughing.

Chapter 80:
Iris and the King of Thorns

1

—The complicated discussion in the large chamber was approaching a temporary conclusion.

Zikr: “To be frank, the situation had been vastly different from what we had expected at the start. However, it can be said that averting the fall of the Fortress City, as well as acquiring the cooperation of General First-Class Yorna are certainly good results.”

It was Zikr who promptly gathered the topics fluttering about and began summarizing them.

The man with the fluffy hair looked over the faces of everyone in the large chamber with those wide eyes of his. At Zikr’s words, Emilia said, “Yes, that’s right,” with a nod.

Emilia: “Some disheartening things also happened, but the fact that everyone is gathered here is because we did our best. This time, let’s rely on that and fulfill everyone’s goals.”

Zikr: “As expected, thank you for your beautiful response, Miss Emily. It is as you said, let us strive to fulfill the goals of everyone here. To that end, there is one more thing I must tell you.”

Otto: “In the end, there is one more thing? …Assuming it is a continuation from our discussion just before, I do not really have a good feeling about it.”

Seeing Zikr’s single raised finger as he nodded at Emilia’s words, Otto grumbled as his cheeks stiffened.

As if supporting Otto’s unpleasant hunch, Zikr continued with an “Indeed”,

Zikr: “This would be a continuation of the previous discussion. This discussion also involves Miss Natsumi, who is being treated like the black-haired Crown Prince."

Emilia: "Natsumi… huh? But, isn't it Subaru who's being treated like the child of the Emper…"

Frederica: "Emily, we do not know how Subaru-sama is introducing himself in the Empire."

Emilia: "Ah, I see. That's right. I'm sorry, I got it all mixed up in my head."

Having interrupted the discussion, Emilia placed her hand over her mouth.

The alias "Natsumi Schwartz" that Subaru was introducing himself under in the Empire was his plan for concealing his true identity, while informing Emilia and the others searching for him of his whereabouts.

For that reason, Subaru was intentionally using the name of someone Emilia and the others knew—he was using the name of Emilia's friend, Natsumi Schwartz.

When Zikr met Subaru, it was when he had been using that alias.

Therefore, Zikr was using "Natsumi" to refer to Subaru. That was what had gotten mixed up inside Emilia.

Emilia: "Huh? But, if that's the case, why is he being called Miss Natsumi…"

Beatrice: "Keep talking, in fact, shaggy-head. It will soon be time for Betty to sleep again, I suppose."

Emilia: "Ah, I see. That's right. I'm sorry, I have to think about Beatrice right now."

The question that had emerged within Emilia was sunk down by the voice of Beatrice in her arms. If it had anything to do with Subaru, it was natural that Beatrice would want to hear it even more than Emilia.

For the sake of the girl who could not stay awake for very long, she had to set aside her present questions.

Prompted by Beatrice’s and Emilia’s gazes, Zikr started by saying, “As a matter of fact”.

Zikr: “Strictly speaking, it is not about Miss Natsumi herself. I am worried about her welfare as her whereabouts are unknown, but I believe that just as Abel-dono had thought, wherever she is found she will be courteously protected. However—”

Emilia: “Is there something making you uncertain about Subaru being in danger?”

Zikr: “As I prefaced, it is not about Miss Natsumi herself. A separate situation that has extended from that…the existence of His Excellency the Emperor’s child is now well-known publicly, causing changes in the Empire’s internal situation. In other words—”

???: “—Even in other lands, the flames of war have begun to rise?”

Cutting off Zikr’s words, speaking so in a quiet voice had been Abel.

Zikr bowed his head reverently with a “Yes”, and Abel ran his fingers along the cheek of his Oni mask without looking Zikr’s way, hiding the expression on his face.

However, just before his hand could hide his expression, Emilia’s eyes had surely grasped it.

—That Abel’s lips had very slightly taken the shape of a sadistic smile.

Emilia: “Though, I don’t think this is an amusing discussion at all…”

???: “As the half-devil said, it is quite an unpleasant subject. That those who straddle the fence would take advantage of these convenient circumstances.”

Priscilla agreed to what Emilia had muttered as she looked at Abel, who had hidden his expression.

While she declared that she would not wear a coat no matter how cold it was and shrugged her white shoulders,

Priscilla: “If you have a righteous cause, and have acquired the chance to fulfill your own desires, all that is left is to decide under what ”timing” you shall act. If too early, then even yourself shall be made to bleed, but if too late, even should you take part, you shall come home empty-handed. Even if it is a period for ascertainment, try to think about it.”

Otto: “Uprisings in various places… Although, I had heard that Emperor Vincent Vollachia’s reign was stable and that people of the Empire were enjoying the peace.”

Abel: “In the end, peace and the like are nothing more than fleeting, ephemeral, dreams.”

At Priscilla’s and Otto’s words, Abel lowered the hand he had placed on his face. Out of the lips where any trace of the smile Emilia had seen had already disappeared, Abel continued speaking dispassionately.

Abel: “The true nature of the people of the Empire—no, the true nature of mankind lies in conflict, and as long as there is life, the blaze known as belligerence shall not be extinguished. Even if you try to put a lid on it, the heat therein shall continue to fester inside.”

Otto: “And eventually, with no place left to go, it will be a huge explosion?”

Petra: “That’s really unfortunate…”

Otto and Petra each expressed their own impressions of Abel’s manner of speaking.

Emilia also thought she understood the intention of Abel’s abstruse expression. Looking at the outcome that had occurred, it was not possible to deny that idea.

However, she did not like the idea that fighting was natural for humans.

Emilia: “I don’t really get it but, that sounds reaaally lonely.”

Abel: “Lonely? On what grounds do you think as such, half-devil.”

Emilia: “After all, even though the Emperor of the Empire must have worked as hard as he could. For all of that to get destroyed, to not be rewarded for that hard work, wouldn’t that be lonely? Whether he wins or loses, I think it would be painful.”

The Emperor of Vollachia, whom she had never directly met, seemed extremely pitiful to Emilia.

It was also true that Abel, Zikr, and the others were raising a rebellion in this manner, and that once the people of the Empire had joined in, they started to raise their voices together.

In her studies, Emilia had also learned that the fact that the Vollachian Empire had not had a large battle these past few years was Emperor Vincent Vollachia’s achievement. Setting aside what Vincent was thinking, at least he had been continuing to create a society without war.

With that having been destroyed, if he lost, the country would be taken from him, and even if he won, he would have ended up having waged a war himself.

Emilia: “Times like this, when somebody gets mad, it’s like they’ve already decided for it to become painful.”

For that reason, Emilia could not help but find Vincent pitiable.

If it were possible, she thought it would be good if they could properly discuss just what in the world he was thinking, and what they could do to arrive at a good ending for everyone.

Abel: “—. I see, regardless of which came first, I understand that thing’s way of being.”

Emilia: “Eh?”

Abel: “Without a doubt, you people are of the same kind as Natsuki Subaru.”

Emilia silently held her breath at Abel's brief comment, his arms crossed.

Faced with the glint in Abel's black eyes, which could be seen behind his Oni mask, Emilia had realized it. —Sure enough, with what had just been said, the impression she had felt was not wrong.

Even though Subaru and Abel were comrades, and had been continuously working together until Emilia and the others had entered the Vollachian Empire—

Emilia: "—You, is Subaru someone you reaaally hate?"

Abel: "…"

Emilia: "I'm sorry if I'm wrong. Still, I don't think I'm wrong."

His black eyes narrowing, Abel went silent in response to Emilia's question. Seeing his reaction right in front of her, Emilia did not retract her opinion.

Abel hated Subaru. —Emilia felt that was so.

It was not because Abel was quiet, or because he said haughty things in a manner that somewhat resembled Priscilla. When he spoke to Otto or Zikr and the others, there was a definite difference.

Emilia felt that it was the hatred Abel harbored regarding Subaru.

Abel: "—Zikr, coordinate with those who have begun raising their voices in revolt. Give rise to even stronger winds, and fan the force of the flames. Until the black smoke reaches the Imperial Capital."

Zikr: "Will that be all right? The original objective was the Nine Divine Generals…"

Abel: "In the end, that is a secondary objective. The important thing is to enact upon the war situation. The standpoints of Groovy and Moguro are cause for concern, however, the situation has changed."

Abruptly, Abel, who had taken his eyes off of Emilia, began to give instructions to Zikr beside him.

Emilia thought she had been ignored, but that was Abel's declaration that he did not intend on continuing their current conversation any longer.

Was the reason he did not respond because she had been off the mark, or was it something else?

In any case—

Abel: "—We may be ready to advance on the Imperial Capital sooner than expected. Do not lose even the slightest bit of focus."

—In order to reunite with Subaru and Rem, the choice to change paths and separate from Abel and his group, was not one that Emilia and the others had.

2

Beatrice: "Emilia, you have to be careful, in fact. Betty and the others are the only people in this country who genuinely care only for Subaru, I suppose."

Beatrice spoke again shortly before she fell back asleep after their discussion in the hall.

The conversation veered off to the left and right, but if one focused solely on Subaru, it would be hard to say that it was the best situation for him. Even if the threat to his life could be reduced, even if only a little.

Emilia: "Subaru is not someone who would be okay with that, with everyone arguing around him."

Beatrice: "In fact."

Otto and Abel surmised that his life was guaranteed no matter on which side of the Empire he was captured on. It was what the smart kids thought, and they may have been right.

But when had Subaru ever behaved exactly the way Emilia and the others thought he would?

If people around him were in danger, Subaru would move immediately, neglecting himself.

She could not believe that she was the only one who would accept being safe in such a situation.

That was why—

Emilia: "—I want you to remember that we all still care about Subaru and Rem, so we're going to work with the intention of putting them first."

Priscilla: "And why are you bothering to proclaim this to me?"

Emilia: "Because, if I did it on my own without telling anyone, everyone would get in trouble, right?"

It is important to communicate one's goals and principles properly.

Not telling Frederica and Petra whether or not they would be back by dinner would be a waste of the meal that they had prepared for them.

Emilia: "Subaru also used to say that spinnuching was important. But I am not sure what spinach is…"

Priscilla: "On what haphazard foundation did you have the nerve to approach me with such vague knowledge? Was that courage you had cultivated from your experience of being persecuted as a half-devil?"

Emilia: "No, I don't think so. When I was in my home forest, and everyone hated me, I didn't feel like I was getting used to it or getting stronger."

When she was living in the Great Forest of Elior, she was hurt no matter what anyone said to her. Expecting the slightest thing, being betrayed, and not learning anything, despite repeating it over and over again.

So, given that Emilia now looked a little bit stronger.

Emilia: “That’s thanks to Subaru and everyone else… I left the forest, participated in the Royal Selection, went through a lot of hard times, and became the person I am today. Priscilla, isn’t it the same for you?”

Priscilla: “Do not compare yourself with me. I was born perfect.”

Emilia: “Yes… but, I won’t lose to you either.”

Priscilla: “You can attest for yourself whether you are worthy of the words that have passed your lips. Whether or not it catches the corner of my eye depends on that.”

Priscilla responded to Emilia’s tightly clenched fist with a shrug of her shoulders.

After the discussion in the hall was over and Beatrice was returned to the inn, now having fallen asleep, Emilia was looking for Priscilla to tell her about the previously mentioned plans.

Perhaps she was busy, she thought, but fortunately, she was listening to her.

Emilia: “When I think back, Priscilla always gets things right, doesn’t she?”

Priscilla: “Ho, it appears that some unpleasantness is about to ensue for me.”

Emilia: “Should I stop?”

Priscilla: “Fine, you are forgiven. You may continue.”

Emilia responded with a nod to Priscilla, closing one eye and urging her to proceed.

Leaving the City Hall, they walked alongside one another down the street. Emilia, not seeing her companions Schult and Al, looked around for the two of them.

Emilia: “It’s been that way since the beginning of the Royal Selection; Priscilla says nasty things and interrupts her opponents in mid-sentence, and yet she does a good job of listening to what they have to say while also lending an ear."

Priscilla: "Even I have not the ability to surmise everything in the world. Shall I not be curious to see what kind of drivel will come out of the mouth of someone other than mineself?"

Emilia: "Well? But, I remember Anastasia-san said to me, "I'm not going to talk to you.""

Priscilla: "That she-fox?"

Emilia: "Yeah. Oh, I'm not saying I'm holding a grudge, okay?"

With Priscilla walking leisurely by her side, Emilia thinks back to her exchange with Anastasia.

Initially, at the Royal Selection, Anastasia tried to snub Emilia from the discussions. That in itself was not an unusual treatment, and she did not hold it against Anastasia.

However, the point she wanted to make was—

Emilia: "—I'm friends with Anastasia-san."

Priscilla: "…"

Emilia: "To put it correctly, I promised that we would be friends. I said we would after the Royal Selection… I felt like we could do that, no matter where we started off. That's why."

Priscilla: "Surely you do not wish to form a friendship with me as well?"

Emilia: "Eeh. Is that no good?"

Because of her successful experience with Anastasia, Emilia mustered up the courage to try.

Most people, if it were Anastasia and Priscilla, would have had the impression and assessment that Priscilla was more difficult to deal with. However, Emilia was different.

For Emilia, who had few relationships, Anastasia and Priscilla were valued nearly equally.

Therefore, it could be concluded that this was what led to this kind of offer.

Then, in response to Emilia's offer, Priscilla pulled her fan out of her cleavage and,

Priscilla: "Behold, more drivel that even I could not have predicted suddenly sprang forth."

Opening her fan with a sound, she cut Emilia's words off abruptly.

At Priscilla's response, Emilia's eyes widened, and she let out a tiny giggle. Seeing her smile, Priscilla's eyes narrowed.

Priscilla: "And what follows drivel must be absolute japes? Either way, you are provoking my displeasure."

Emilia: "Oh, no, no, sorry. However, I felt that you might say no, Priscilla, so I just knew that. I'll ask again tomorrow."

Priscilla: "Tomorrow or not, my answer shall remain the same."

Emilia: "But, you never know what tomorrow will bring."

For the time being, Emilia believed that it was not wrong to take up the challenge boldly.

Of course, there was the worry that she would think it was harassment and hate her even more.

But if Emilia thought so, then Priscilla was—

Priscilla: "Do as you please."

Emilia: "Yeah, I'll do that."

Even if she dismissed it as futile, she will not use force to keep her from doing so.

Emilia also felt like she was taking advantage of the situation, though, because she was in a difficult position to do so.

In any case,

Priscilla: “Well? Was that the conclusion of your ambush on me?”

Emilia: “No, that was only the first one… not the second one, because of what happened with Subaru. There’s something else I still want to talk about.”

Priscilla: “Now, what is the purpose of discussing the first matter with me? As long as your proposed plan does not interfere with my course of action, I will have nothing to do with it.”

Emilia: “But, Priscilla is good friends with Abel and Zikr, right? You seem to be discussing a lot of things, and I was wondering if you could tell everyone.”

Priscilla: “I withdraw my previous statement. Your drivel dances beyond my imagination. It is not often that I change my words.”

Emilia: “—? Is that something I should be happy about? Is that bad?”

Her crimson eyes looked to the side toward Emilia, who bent her lips when she didn’t get an answer.

It was probably not very welcome, but if one did not know what exactly was wrong, there was no way to fix it, even if one thought it should be fixed.

Priscilla should be good friends with Abel and Zikr, so would it be a mistake to want to convey to everyone what Emilia and her group’s policy was aside from that?

However, Emilia and her group would be much better off going to talk to them in person.

Anyhow—

Emilia: “I don’t know if I can get along very well with Abel…”

Priscilla: “Ku.”

Emilia: “Priscilla?”

Holding her open fan to her mouth, Priscilla let out a small chuckle. When Emilia looked over to her face in profile, Priscilla slightly relaxed the corners of her eyes and said,

Priscilla: “Being hated by you, who even tried to talk to me, would truly be the epitome of his tactlessness.”

Emilia: “Gh, I don’t hate him. I just thought he might not quite be my cup of tea to deal with.”

Priscilla: “Your being aware that someone is hard to deal with, as well as your aversion are accumulations of the main factors behind those things, called your likes and dislikes. However, it is probably natural for you people to evaluate Abel in such a manner. — Mineself wonders if your judgement is correct.”

Emilia: “…Priscilla, do you feel the same way?”

To Emilia’s question, Priscilla remained silent and did not respond.

However, to Emilia, it felt as if that silence was saying that she shared Emilia’s opinion that Abel hated Subaru.

Emilia: “Priscilla, do you know why? Up until a little while ago, you were talking to Abel and the others, weren’t you?”

Priscilla: “Unfortunately, the discussion that had kept mineself back had no relation to your foolish commoner. Those like him do not even become an ounce of the subject of conversation… No, having heard the tale of the Great Disaster which destroyed the Demon City, mineself will not say it was completely unrelated to that foolish commoner.”

Emilia: “Demon City… Ah, then, you were talking to Yorna? To Priscilla’s mother.”

In the middle of the discussion in the large chamber, the topic of the parent-child relationship between Priscilla and Yorna came up.

In the end, it had been washed away by the matter of how Louis should be handled after that, but that probably was not the case for the people involved.

Naturally, the reunited mother and child should have discussed it.

Emilia: “Still, I was also surprised. That Priscilla also has half demi-human blood…”

Priscilla: “Nonsense. Do not equate mineself with you. I think it surely must not be the case, but did you draw close to me because you had felt an affinity over that?”

Emilia: “That wasn’t it at all, but is it not true? Then, is Yorna-san Priscilla’s foster parent? If that were so, that would also be surprising. After all, I also…”

Priscilla: “Nonsense, do not make me repeat myself, you fool. That too is your impulsiveness.”

Emilia: “Ehh? Then, what do you mean?”

If Yorna and her were biologically parent and child, her foxkin blood should have flown inside Priscilla, but that had been denied.

If you were to then think that meant a foster parent, that had also been flatly denied.

Emilia, being a half-elf raised by her mother and aunt by blood Fortuna, had thought Priscilla was the same in some ways.

Emilia: “Not blood related, and not a foster parent… In that case, how is she your mother?”

Priscilla: “Is there any reason why mineself must explain everything to you?”

Emilia: “No, I don’t think so. But if you don’t tell me, I’ll be reaaally curious.”

Knowing it was selfish, Emilia had tried asking Priscilla for the truth. Of course, the possibility that just as she had rejected a friendly relationship, she would refuse to give her an answer, had been high.

However, Priscilla was silent for a moment, and then,

Priscilla: "—Iris and the King of Thorns."

Emilia: "Eh?"

Priscilla: "It is an old story. Do you know it?"

Emilia: "Well, I do know it. Umm, Lady Petra likes that kind of thing."

At the words that had abruptly left Priscilla's lips, Emilia's eyes widened as she nodded.

She had been taught that "Iris and the King of Thorns" was an old story that had been passed down from long, long ago, and was a historical account that originated from the Vollachian Empire.

Emilia, too, had also heard no more than a brief outline, but from the story she heard from Petra, it seemed like it was a love story between an emperor of Vollachia from long ago called the "King of Thorns," and a girl named "Iris."

Unfortunately, Emilia had said that she still did not understand what was so interesting about it, but—

Emilia: "What about that story? Is it a story that Priscilla likes?"

Priscilla: "It seems you are a half-devil who cannot put two and two together. Naturally, it is bound to be related to the course of the conversation thus far."

Emilia: "Thus far… Priscilla and Yorna's parent-child relationship and this old story?"

Priscilla: "—Iris and the King of Thorns had joined hands to bring about an end to the civil war that had swallowed up many races in the Empire. However, right before the pair that were linked heart-to-heart could be wedded, they were betrayed, and the story ends."

Emilia: "…A sad story, isn't it."

At the gist of the story Priscilla had told, Emilia muttered this as the corners of her eyebrows dropped.

It was very disheartening when people who had worked their hardest were not rewarded. Now, just as she despaired at the situation the Emperor of Vollachia was placed in, she held the same feelings for the end of the couple that had long ago been made into a story.

At Emilia's reaction, Priscilla exhaled with a "Ha",

Priscilla: "However, the story and the historical facts differ. Historically, having lost Iris to betrayal, the "King of Thorns" descended into madness, and decided to eradicate the wolfmen and molemen that had raised their blades. For the few that had escaped, even now, as soon as they are found in the Empire, they are burned at the stake."

Emilia: "It's understandable to be angry about that, but… still, the people in this day and age—"

Priscilla: "Have no relation with that? You are no stranger to that yourself, having been persecuted as a half-devil."

Emilia: "…"

The sharpness of Priscilla's phrasing had stung, but Emilia's skin was hard as iron against that kind of insult. However, even if she did not bleed, the pain of being struck remained the same.

Deciding she would properly complain about that later, Emilia was more curious about where things went from there in the rest of Priscilla's story.

What had the King of Thorns done after losing Iris and taking revenge on the traitor?

Emilia: "With that, is the story of the King of Thorns over?"

Priscilla: "—. With having merely given in to anger, it could not possibly be said that he had only descended into madness. Thus, after that, the King of Thorns had directed his madness towards Iris, who he had lost."

Emilia: "Towards Iris?"

Raising her eyebrows at the story's unexpected turn of events, Emilia repeated back the words she had heard. Priscilla nodded at those words and turned her crimson eyes to the sky.

Frustrated, Emilia's lips trembled as she sought Priscilla's next words.

Emilia: "The King of Thorns, what did he do to Iris?"

Priscilla: "He laid a curse upon her."

Emilia: "A curse? That's…"

Was that something you would put on someone precious to you, much less someone whose loss caused you suffering?

Indifferent to those doubts of Emilia's, Priscilla spoke of the curse's details.

That was—

Priscilla: "—The secret art of dragging a lost soul back, without handing it over to Od Lagna."

Emilia: "A dead person's soul?"

Priscilla: "It is said that there is a secret art called the Sacrament of the Immortal King which can even revive the dead, but its existence is considered questionable. However, this Commandment of Thorns is a curse born of insatiable yearning."

The dead coming back to life was astounding, but more important than that now was that which was called a curse.

The subject of the souls of the dead and their fate was also discussed at the Pleiades Watchtower through the Books of the Dead, in which the memories of the deceased were imprinted within them.

The existence of the Books of the Dead convinced them of the existence of the soul within humans.

Emilia: “But, what does it mean to drag down a soul? Does it mean they come back to life?”

Priscilla: “It does not work that way. Iris’ body was torn apart after her death, and even if her soul returned, it would not bring her back to life. In the first place, the Commandment of Thorns has no such power.”

Emilia: “Then what would happen? If there was no body—”

If there were no place for the returning soul to enter, where would the soul go?

In response to Emilia’s question, Priscilla quietly lowered her gaze. Instead of looking at the sky, her crimson eyes looked into Emilia’s amethyst ones, and—

Priscilla: “The usual. If the soul does not return to Od Lagna, it will return to the earth, and without receiving the proper treatment, it will enter its next vessel. —You could call it resurrection, or even reincarnation.”

Emilia: “…”

Priscilla: “So long as the curse is not undone, so long as the Commandment of Thorns that entangles them is not undone, the departed soul shall continue to rise again. Again and again it will repeat itself, pilling up the lives and deaths over and over again. —One of these lives, the life before Yorna Mishigure, was that of mine dear mother.”

3

Abel: “…”Sandra Benedict”, that caught me by surprise.”

Yorna: “You are the one who is far too ill-natured, for you hid the matter of Prisca.”

With firm, cold voices colliding, a quiet heat intermingled in a stone room.

Exchanging their gazes, choosing their words in order to search for what lay in each other’s hearts, were Abel, displaying his true face with the Oni mask that covered his face removed, and Yorna, puffing the purple smoke from her kiseru.

Until just now, there had also been a third person present in this place, Priscilla.

However, as soon as she deemed that the essential discussions had concluded, she immediately excused herself from this place. Abel accepted this attitude, but it did not cause Yorna’s turmoil to vanish.

That was a matter of course. —For even the mistress of the Demon City could not easily come to grips with the change within her own child.

Yorna: “How about we both honestly admit that our secrecy has had harmful results?”

Abel: “I had my reasons for keeping it a secret. Even you should be able to guess.”

Yorna: “—. That’s… indeed.”

Casting her eyes down at Abel’s answer, Yorna ruminated while her long eyelashes quivered.

Her unexpected encounter with Priscilla brought about an enormous ripple through Yorna’s heart. That was a reality that she had never expected, nor harbored even a fragment of hope for, as it had been an absolute impossibility.

In negation of that, a healthy Priscilla appeared before her in such a way, and while it filled Yorna with joy, there was no doubt it had been a tremendous gamble for Abel.

The situation of Priscilla = Prisca still being alive was one that should not have been possible.

Behind the scenes of that impossible event, there was no doubt that Abel was involved.

Yorna: “Just what are you—?”

Abel: “—That which I promised you, was a means to dispel that Commandment of Thorns. Perchance, if you desire the answer to that question, I have no reason to grant you any other reward.”

Yorna: “…”

Straight to her face, Abel rejected Yorna’s query.

Abel refused to speak of that answer, forcing Yorna to weigh it against her greatest desire.

For so, so long already, piling up lives and deaths time after time, this soul continued to view the world.

Even though she could barely remember the face of that person anymore, that was why—.

Abel: “Yorna Mishigure—No, thou who the King of Thorns fell in love with at first sight, Iris.”

Indeed, using the name that long, long ago, Yorna’s beloved person had used many times to call out to her, the man at the front of however many generations had piled up with the blood of her beloved person, called out to Yorna.

Abel: “Muster up more of your courage. For your dearest wish, and above all—to keep Prisca Benedict, the daughter who you should have lost, alive in the future.”

In a voice so cold that it was incomparable to that of her beloved person, he imposed so.

Chapter 81:
The Fierce Lady and the Clown

—The Sacred Vollachian Empire, under the reign of its current emperor, Vincent Vollachia, was enjoying an era of peace and tranquility unprecedented since its founding.

There had been small skirmishes, but other than the rebellion of Yorna Mishigure, there was no situation where thousands of people were involved in a conflict.

As long as the relationship with the Kingdom of Lugunica, which had been in a standoff for many years, remained stagnant, no civil war or even a situation of falling into territorial disputes with other countries could happen.

It was easy to say that the times were on their side, but that did not bring peace of mind to all the hard work that had gone into maintaining this peace.

To begin with, was this a feat that could be accomplished simply by having the times on one's side?

To continue to take the very fact of wars away from the Vollachian Empire, which had been a constant source of strife and reason for conflict, for nine years of its reign, was a contradictory act of kindling a bonfire on thin ice.

It was due to the skill of Vincent Vollachia, the current emperor, who had even been called a "pacifist".

However—

???: "—Though I'm sure His Excellency would never be happy about being called a "pacifist" himself."

???: "Reaaally~? You don't feel bad about being recognized for your deeds, regardless of whether they were right or wrong, do you? In fact, the stability of the country is what His Excellency the Emperor wants, isn't it?"

???: "So you're proud to be called a "Demi-Human Lover"?"

???: "Undeniably. I'm the one who popularized the name in the first place!"

???: "Good grief, this looks to be the wrong person to make an example of. These days, my old friends who visit me are an odd lot. It keeps me occupied, though."

The woman donned a wild smile on her beautiful face and narrowed her green eyes as she brushed her bangs back from her forehead.

She was tall and slender with a supple, well-trained body.

Her long, smooth-skinned arms and legs and feminine curves were enclosed in a merchant marine-like garb, and she carried a curved sword in its scabbard beside the fine chair on which she sat. Her whole body was filled with the high spirits characteristic of a warrior, as if to prove that it was not an ornament but a practical weapon.

Above all, on her left cheek, there was a long, large, white scar that ran from her forehead to her chin.

It was an eye-catching scar, and once you saw it, it was burned into your mind and difficult to forget.

However, even the scar was nothing more than an ornament to the person who gave others the impression that she was beautiful, the "Scorching Lady" as she was called.

—The "Scorching Lady" High Countess Serena Dracroy.

That was the name and title of the fierce lady before them, one of the greatest nobles in the Vollachian Empire.

To Roswaal, her counterpart, she was a friend with whom he had been in contact from across the country since before this all happened.

Roswaal: “Of course, aaaaas long as you are serious when you call me an old friend.”

Serena: “Friends or not, I’m not going to play such trivial games with you. First of all, when you are a high countess, all anyone wants to do is to talk about profit and loss. Sometimes I want to have luxurious small talk without such things. Is that too much to hope for?”

Roswaal: “I’m not saying it’s too much to hope for, but I’m heartbroooken~ by that sorrowful plea.”

With a small chuckle, Roswaal reached for a cup from the table in front of him and sipped his tea, enjoying the warm aroma. The aromatic warmth danced on his tongue. —Unfortunately, Roswaal could not glean much more than that from the food and drink.

The lack of taste in anything he eats or drinks is part of the burden Roswaal had to bear, and the price he had to pay, in order to get to where he is today.

At any rate, there was no way he could not thank her for the hospitality she had extended to him as a guest.

There, Roswaal glanced at the petite figure sitting next to him, the one who had probably enjoyed the taste of the tea on Roswaal’s behalf, who had let out a small sigh,

???: “These tea leaves have lost their potency. It’s recommended that you change the waitstaff.”

Her sharp crimson eyes narrowed, and she commented on the tea with an even sharper statement.

Roswaal closed one eye at her relentless and dismissive tone, while its recipient laughed in amusement with a “Ha”,

Serena: “Something so clearly stated. Should the waitstaff be changed?”

???: “Yes, they are being disrespectful to the tea leaves.”

Serena: “In fact, with everything in the household being so busy, I was the one who brewed this tea.”

???: “Is that so? Then, it would be for the best if you did not make it at all.”

Serena: “A girl who doesn’t know how to show due consideration, I like that. You have a fine wife.”

With teeth showing in response, Serena looked at Roswaal mischievously.

As usual, she was a woman of great magnanimity, or perhaps, a woman who showed a forgiving attitude toward rudeness and impoliteness. Despite her position as a prominent noblewoman, she did not have the usual personality of being obsessed with authority.

This way of thinking and being had not changed since the first time they met.

Roswaal: “However, I’m not the kind of person who caaan’t~ tell the difference between rudeness and an insult. Please watch what you say, Ram, because this is only marginally humorous.”

Ram: “That is understood, dear.”

Roswaal: “—. Serena, I must correct you; she is my servant, nooot~ my wife.”

Serena: “I see, I guess it wasn’t like your demi-human tastes were finally caught. The relationship between our two countries was tense, but I had thought not having an invitation to the ceremony was rather standoffish.”

Roswaal sighed at Ram, who had calmly accepted what he had pointed out and then unconcernedly moved closer. Serena’s response as she chuckled to herself also seemed slightly off from Roswaal’s intentions.

However, from experience, Roswaal had known for a while now that the deeper he dug into this subject, the more detrimental it would be. Therefore, he would not delve any further.

In any case—

Ram: “Even so, Ram was surprised when she heard it. That is, that Roswaal-sama and Countess Dracroy had such a close relationship.”

Serena: “I doubt I could unscrupulously call a relationship without contact in years “close”. When I think about it, to come visit me without contacting me in this hectic situation… If you were to be that overtly rude, I would surely end up wanting to burn you to death like my father.”

Roswaal: “Serena, that joke isn’t very funny if you’re not from the Empire.”

Serena: “Hmm? Is that so. In high society, it’s usually a sure bet at making people laugh.”

That statement, which had unintentionally made Ram be taken aback, was a joke which poked fun at one event from her succession conflict—In fact, it had come from the true story of how she had burned her father to death and seized control of the Dracroy household.

Since she had said that the sword wound on her cheek was also inflicted by her father before she killed him, it had made Ram reflect on her courage in having ended up deciding it was a funny anecdote, and on the attitude of the Empire that laughed it off.

When Roswaal had gotten to know her, she had still been a teenager—Serena had visited the Kingdom of Lugunica on business, and had endeavored to resolve a dispute that had occurred there.

To put it simply, since he saved Serena's life when she had been targeted by assassins, and moreover, revealed that the attempt was orchestrated by her father who had shunned her, his ties to the Dracroy family were unexpectedly deep.

However, Serena's personality had not changed before or after that fierce experience, so she must have been born with her fortitudinous, fiery demeanor.

Roswaal: "It's true that I want to reminisce over old stories, and behaviour in your high society, but… As you might have guessed, there was a reason why we suddenly visited without contacting youuu~."

A pleasant chat with an old friend was also enticing, but there was nothing important to Roswaal other than the fulfillment of his long-cherished wish.

Everything in Roswaal's life was for the sake of a wish that had sunk to the deepest recesses of his heart. —Therefore, his visit to the Empire, and even his blinking and breathing, were all contributions for the sake of his dearest wish.

Roswaal: "…"

Currently, Roswaal and Ram had parted ways with Emilia and the others, visited the territory of High Countess Dracroy in the northwestern part of the Empire and were having an audience with Serena Dracroy, the lord.

Needless to say, the purpose of the visit was to secure Subaru and Rem, who had disappeared from the Pleiades Watchtower and were believed to have been hurled to the distant land of the Empire. For Roswaal, it would have been enough if he could secure Subaru, but he had not done a foolish thing like saying that aloud.

In any case, they would bring their missing friends back to the Kingdom. That was the purpose of this journey.

However, even if they were to say that their goal was to merely bring them home, the matter was not that easy or straightforward.

For the four major countries other than the Kingdom of Lugunica, they all had their own reasons for why coming and going was difficult. The Kararagi City States, which required connections and a lot of money, were relatively preferable, and one could say that the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko was excusable in its ease of understanding, as long as one didn't err in their timing and approach to their faith.

From that point of view, the Empire, which did not get along with the Kingdom, surpassed the rest in difficulty.

Relations between Lugunica and Vollachia had historically been bad for a long time, and although they had now miraculously confirmed a non-aggression pact, that too was doubtful in how far they could freely trust in it.

Rather than being proof or a sign of friendly relations, the confirmed non-aggression pact gave the strong feeling of a warning that, since it was time for both countries to shift their focus inwards, they should be careful not to interfere with each other unnecessarily.

It appeared likely that there was a connection between the matter of the national border now being blocked, and the backing for the non-aggression pact.

Or possibly—

Serena: “—This major incident shaking the Imperial Capital was also a plot by a faction that wants to annul the non-aggression pact or something? There’s a limit to how suspicious you can be. It’s an idea unbecoming of a man of the Kingdom.”

Serena’s green eyes suddenly narrowed as she guessed exactly what was on Roswaal’s mind.

This fierce lady was rather sociable, though had catastrophic tea-brewing abilities; however, she was one of the very few in the Empire entrusted with the role of High Countess, with powers of observation that were genuine.

Imperialism, unlike the way things were done in the Kingdom, did not question age or origin if one had ability. Inevitably, the more capable one was, the higher the position one obtained.

Accordingly, Serena Dracroy had earned and continued to hold the position of High Countess.

The point she just made was another possibility that Roswaal had considered and taken to heart.

By the time Roswaal and his group had entered the Empire, the fuel of the rebellion was already bearing smoke. Until now, the efforts to quench the fires, which had been done at the first sign of trouble, had not borne fruit.

If the high probability that this would lead to full-scale rebellion was seen, then naturally they must have been some cause present there.

That was why—

Ram: “—A war for territory with the Kingdom of Lugunica, that is what they are looking for.”

When Serena pointed out that she was skeptical, Ram placed her hands on her lap, and spoke in a quiet voice.

The eyes of the fierce lady turned to Ram, and she stared straight back at them with her light-crimson eyes.

Ram: “Above the reign of Emperor Vincent Vollachia being threatened, there are those who do not desire the peace that has been created. If that is the case, then after destroying the peace and quiet, what would those people want? It is natural to wonder if that is the Kingdom of Lugunica.”

Serena: “Is that so? There are people who revolt just because they don’t like the idea of anyone being superior to them. Such was the case last year with the leader of a band who raised their swords against me.”

Ram: “Let’s leave those peculiar instances out of the discussion.”

Serena: “I wouldn’t go as far as to call it peculiar, but you certainly missed the point.”

With a finger running along her shapely chin, Serena scrutinized Ram’s opinion.

Roswaal did not interject during the discussion because he saw nothing in Ram’s opinion that needed correction. He had never discussed these impending issues with Ram, but he was not surprised that she was also concerned about the same possibilities as he was.

In any case—

Roswaal: “Serena, surely you don’t wish to go to war with the Kingdom of Lugunica either. Of course, it’s a different story if you’re so outraged that you want to rebel against the Emperor.”

Serena: “Fortunately, I’ve never been dissatisfied with His Excellency’s meritocracy. The behavior of General First-Class Yorna, whose tantrums from time to time are also a stranger to me as someone who possesses territory far away from the Demon City. It’s just…”

Roswaal: “It’s just?”

Serena: “That I don’t wish for war with the Kingdom, what kind of speculation did that view arise from? Supposing you say that our side will stand little chance, my heart will also start to waver with the wind.”

Serena’s lips relaxed while she looked at her, her gaze infused with a tingling sensation.

It was her way of expressing her own pride in Roswaal’s words. She was called the Scorching Lady, and as a woman who held the position of High Countess with her prowess, it was inexcusable for her to be looked down upon.

That was not the basis on which to compare Ram’s remarks about tea.

Serena did not pour her heart and soul into tea, but she did pour her heart and soul into her family name.

Serena: “How about it, Roswaal. Am I mistaken? Or, was it your slip of the tongue?”

Roswaal: “Hmm…”

Serena questioned him in order to block off his escape routes, and as he looked back into the green eyes of his old friend, Roswaal noticed Ram next to him, peering at his side.

From the change in the atmosphere, she could probably sense that the result would be poor depending on how he answered.

In addition, if Serena’s good mood were to be soured, it would make it very difficult for Roswaal and the others to move around in the Empire. Not simply because they would lose their backer or supporter, but also because Serena knew of Roswaal’s background.

Taking all of that into account, and adding Serena’s personality and humanity into the mix, the best answer that Roswaal could give in this situation was—

Roswaal: “Indeed, sorry about the misunderstanding. Let’s rectify that. —If it comes to war with the Kingdom, a large amount of blood shall be shed in futility. That of the Empire, too. That’s why I don’t recommend it.”

Serena: “Oh?”

Serena’s eyebrows twitched and lifted at Roswaal’s matter-of-fact response.

The pale sword-inflicted scar on her face trembled, and the pupils of her eyes narrowed slightly. It had not yet connected to an outburst of emotion, but depending on the words that followed, such an outcome may arise.

But he had already decided on the words that would follow. Neither did he intend to attempt any lies nor pretense on her.

Were the Kingdom and the Empire to battle, a great deal of Imperial blood would be spilled.

The heart of the matter was—

Roswaal: “After all, the Kingdom has the Sword Saint, Reinhardt van Astrea. Every Imperial Soldier who comes across the border will amass into a great river of blood.”

Serena: “Oh come on, that’s an illegal move!”

Roswaal: “Even if you call it an illegal move, as long as it exists, there is no choice buuut~ to place it on the table for discussion. Though as you say, it’s a trump card that destroys the discussion. However…”

At that point, Roswaal cut off his words, and closed one of eyes, which differed in color between left and right, leaving only blue side open,

Roswaal: “There will be no hesitation whatsoever to play this trump card at the outset.”

Normally, trump cards and secret weapons are meant to be saved if at all possible, but this was not the case with the Sword Saint. To draw that card at the outset would be the most effective, and the results would also be stupendous.

Above all, the person in question would accept the duty with pleasure.

Serena: “Good grief, not even having the decency to let me do a thought experiment, you’ll make me cry, military strategist.”

Suddenly, the atmosphere from just before dissipated, and Serena flumped her weight against the back of her chair. She pouted her lips as if she were a sulking little girl,

Serena: “In the Empire, I have only been able to hear rumors, but… From your point of view, is that which is called the Sword Saint a supernatural monster?”

Roswaal: “Up until the previous generation, the Sword Saints also haaad~ a certain charm to them, but the current generation’s Sword Saint is more appropriate for that expression. If you do not know the real thing, you won’t be able to actually feel that, though.”

Serena: “The way you speak, it’s just as if you have seen all Sword Saints up until now. However, I see…”

Raising a wry smile at Roswaal’s response, Serena frowned with her shapely eyebrows.

Due to their long relationship, Serena believed that there was no way Roswaal was going to speak words without much thought put into them, and was thoroughly scrutinizing him.

However, for all Imperials other than her, whether they would be reasonable had yet to be decided.

Roswaal: “If you overestimate your own power, or underestimate the power of the Sword Saint, you will be unable to escape the tragedy. So, I shall blow an adverse wind into your mind. You shoooould~ not go to war.”

Serena: “…”

Roswaal: “Annnd~ well, supposing you choose to wage war against the Kingdom, then at that time, I’ll become your opponent. Shall I show you? The ruthlessness of the relentless onslaught of magic from an altitude so high that you would not be able to do a thing.”

Although he shrugged his shoulders and jested about showing her, Roswaal was also quite the strategic force to be reckoned with.

Although not as powerful as the Sword Saint, he could still suppress thousands of common soldiers by simply flying through the air and wielding magic. If he chose battlegrounds he had a strong compatibility with, it was also possible that he could overcome the war front by his lonesome.

Serena: “In that regard, I can easily believe it, unlike the hearsay about the Sword Saint. After all, I have seen a glimpse of that with my own eyes.”

Roswaal: “That was also over a decade ago. Currently, I can show you far more developed magic now than I did back theeen~.”

Serena: “You’re an unfathomable man. Be that as it may, outstanding power comes with its own set of shackles. I guess that’s the reason why you are unable to wield it freely in the Empire.”

Roswaal: “Correct.”

This time, having been cornered, it was Roswaal’s turn to put his hands where she could see them.

In fact, if the tactics they had just discussed were to be put into action, Roswaal would continuously rain magic from high in the sky, out of reach of people, and would be able to reduce the Empire into naught but scorched earth until his mana was exhausted.

However, even when speaking in terms of the wide world, there was no one except Roswaal in the world today who was capable of doing such a thing with magic. It would be more or less the same in the places he used discretion.

Showing his preeminent magical talent within the Vollachian Empire was similar to exposing his true identity.

Therefore, Roswaal had to refrain from any flamboyant behavior after having entered the Empire.

The same reasoning and restrictions had been imposed on Emilia during their time apart.

Ram: “Though in the situation over there, there’s a chance that she’ll forget about that and flare up right away.”

Roswaal: “I’m going to have to rely on the children she has with her over theeere~. Well, if I take the circumstances into account, Garfiel should also be able to keep her in check, so I shouldn’t worry too too much.”

Or rather, if he was unable to place trust in them, he would not have gone separate ways in the first place.

That it would be okay to entrust decisions over there to them, because he had trust in that, the current state resulted. —Such a way of putting it like “trust”, he thought that if Otto and Petra were to hear it then they would certainly make a disagreeable face.

Serena: “—Let me guess, you were not the only ones who entered the Empire under these circumstances, were you?”

While Roswaal and Ram exchanged words, Serena, who raised her posture from the back of her chair, continued. As she met their gazes, she traced the sword-inflicted wound on her cheek with her finger, and,

Serena: “Something you’re looking for… no, someone you’re looking for? It appears to be someone greatly important to you guys.”

Roswaal: “Even in the relationship between you and I, your way of asking sure makes it difficult to nod alooong~.”

Serena: “Nevertheless, your actions serve as proof for that. Otherwise, one would not go through the trouble of crossing the locked down border to come into Vollachia. —Unless it is destiny.”

Narrowing her eyes just slightly, Serena muttered in a quiet voice.

Unable to understand what she meant, Roswaal frowned with a feeling of unease. However, before he could question the true meaning of those words, Ram was quick to nod and say, “Yes”,

Ram: “There is someone I must bring back at all costs. Someone equivalent to Ram’s very life.”

Roswaal: “Ram.”

Ram: “No amount of hiding it or deception is going to work with her.”

Although he chided Ram, who easily disclosed information that was not unlikely to become a weak point, Ram retorted, and Roswaal was instead unable to offer a rebuttal.

If the action itself could be said to be the answer, then the truth was just that.

Roswaal: “However, even if you’re going to show weakness, then you should have some presentation techniques.”

Serena: “Don’t condemn Ram like that. Isn’t it a commendable thing? What surprises me more is that you went to such lengths for the sake of what’s important to her. She appears to be very important to you.”

Ram: “Yes, because there is no replacement for Ram.”

Roswaal: “That is an undeniable fact, but I’m somewhaaat~ concerned about the way you put it.”

Roswaal and Ram claimed that there is someone they wanted to bring back, although that someone differed between the two of them. This in turn, seemed to have caused a misunderstanding for Serena, who did not know that this was the case.

Since they wanted to secure assistance, they would share detailed information about the people they were searching for afterwards.

Serena: “—Whatever the case, I understand why you warned us not to start a war.”

With the conversation having returned to Roswaal’s warning, the discussion before this last one, Serena’s expression had suddenly stiffened. She looked at the naturally tense faces of Roswaal and Ram, and with a mindful gaze, she continued, “But”,

Serena: “I’ll listen to your advice, but I can’t vouch for the attitude of the other citizens of the Empire. Most of them would go into a frenzy, even if they were to be told they had no chance of winning a fight against the “Sword Saint”.”

Roswaal: “That is a point of difference with the Kingdom, where there is no need to explain the true power of the “Sword Saaaint∼”.”

Ram: “Yes, that is correct. In the Kingdom, if you had the chance to get a glimpse of the “Sword Saint” Reinhardt, there would be no need for any further explanation.”

Since the four great countries shared a treaty prohibiting Reinhardt from leaving the country of Lugunica, the people of other countries had almost no chance of ever seeing him.

If they could have gotten that chance, there also would not have been any need to bother with this kind of roundabout persuasion.

—One look at the “Sword Saint” Reinhardt van Astrea, and anyone could have sensed right away just how foolish it would be to oppose him.

Only lunatics living in a world completely detached from reason would not understand that.

Serena: “If it is really as grave as it sounds, I guess I can only hope that His Excellency will suppress the rebellion without incident, or that the rebel side taking his place is reasonable.”

The rebellion had already broken out, and caused the public to take interest in what really their objective was.

If the rebel side had concrete ideas and no unreasonable ambitions like fighting the Kingdom, the war between the two countries and the massive bloodshed Roswaal had spoken of could be avoided.

Of course, there would be nothing better than if the Emperor's side could suppress the rebellion properly.

Roswaal: "No matter how this civil war is resolved, it would be troubling if an attack is aimed at Lugunica afterwards. Because a quarrel with the Empire would be an incident I have not planned for."

—All of Roswaal's actions were a path leading towards a dearest wish that must be granted.

Thus, the fact that he had acquired the opportunity to have an audience with Serena in the Empire was also no exception.

It wasn't any different in regards to desiring assistance for the sake of bringing Subaru back, or persuading her, an influential person within the Empire, of the futility of going to war with the Kingdom.

For Roswaal's dearest wish, Subaru's presence was indispensable.

Furthermore, a fight with the Vollachian Empire, or something of that sort, was not included in the path Roswaal had to follow. So this was not the time for a war between the Kingdom and the Empire.

There must be no interference until the day of the "Dragonkindling Ceremony", when the covenant between the Kingdom and the Dragon will be renewed.

Issues that hinder the Royal Selection must be removed.

And for that—

Roswaal: "—We must have His Excellency the Emperor quickly suppress the rebellion, and far extend this first time of peace and tranquility since the founding of the Vollachian Empire"

Serena: “Hmm? I haven’t seen that evil look in a long time. Some kind of sinister plot?”

Hearing Roswaal’s words, Serena raised her eyebrows in amusement.

He himself was not aware of the evil face that had been pointed out, but from what she said, he must have had such an expression. Nevertheless, Roswaal’s plans should not run counter to Serena’s expectations either.

She was also a member of the Imperial nobility, and as long as she did not take part in the rebellion herself, she should naturally side with the Emperor.

Ram: “Countess Dracroy.”

Suddenly, next to Roswaal as he was thinking that, Ram started her own conversation with Serena.

At that call, Serena looked at Ram and,

Ram: “May Ram have a moment?”

Serena: “Sure, I don’t mind. Though, please don’t call me Countess Dracroy. I just want to chat with a friend …Serena, please”

Ram: “Then, Serena-sama. —It seems you are really close with Roswaal-sama, correct?”

Serena: “Yes?”

Serena’s eyes widened when Ram, who had changed on what to call her, focused her gaze on her. However, her face instantly turned into a mischievous one, and she nodded and said, “I see, I see.”

Roswaal had a bad presentiment about what it was she had just realized.

Serena: “You’re curious about how I met this guy, right? From the looks of it, you guys also seem to have known each other for a long time but…”

Ram: “It’s been exactly ten years.”

Serena: “In that case, we’ve been acquainted just a little longer. Ram, can you drink?”

Ram: “It is not at the same level as with tea, but Ram is pretty picky if it comes to alcohol.”

Serena: “Alright!”

Serena slapped her knees with her palms and gave Ram a smile of her own.

It seemed like it would come to them having a good drink with reminiscent talks serving as a snack. Moreover, if they were going to talk about when he had met Serena, Roswaal also had a few youthful indiscretions.

Roswaal: “Serena, I appreciate the invitation, but we have some urgent business to attend to. About those matters—”

Serena: “You want my help for that, don’t you? If that’s the case, all the more reason you shouldn’t spoil my mood. If you haven’t seen me in a while, then at least have a drink with me”

Roswaal: “…Ram.”

Giving up on trying to dissuade Serena from her unheeding attitude, Roswaal looked at Ram.

Just as Roswaal wanted to bring Subaru back, Ram had come to the Empire to bring back her other half, Rem. She thought since she had sincerely answered Serena’s earlier questioning, she might be able to bring her mind from wine glasses back to a constructive discussion.

However—

Ram: “Barusu aside, Ram does not think it would be wise to refuse Serena-sama’s offer for Rem’s sake.”

Roswaal: “Really, is that the only reaaason~?”

Ram: “Of course, if Ram could also hear stories about Roswaal-sama before he met Ram and the others, then even if we end up in the same stalemate, Ram could say it was an excellent plan.”

Ram was not ashamed if it could serve her goals and have real benefits at the same time.

And much to Roswaal’s regret, Ram and Serena were exceedingly compatible. There was no doubt that their drunk talk would also be lively, and that they would get along well.

That would very well be the beginning of a headache for Roswaal.

Roswaal: “In a sense, I should perhaps see this as a necessary price to pay?”

All so that they could reach their goal, then leave the Empire and return to the Kingdom.

When he called on an old friend and asked for help, he was prepared to pay some kind of price. However, he had by no means thought it would turn out like this.

Serena: “Just now, another guest left right before you guys arrived. She sure was a merry one, so I was about to feel lonely.”

Ram: “Because they were also close to you?”

Serena: “Technically, it was the husband of the guest with whom I had been close, but yes. She should be back soon, so I’ll introduce them then. Right now, rather than that—”

Having stood up, Serena headed to the display cabinet in the corner of the room. When the door opened, lined up inside were a variety of bottles of alcohol, large and small, and they could see she had great taste.

Serena chose one of them, and while she was returning with three glasses from the shelf,

Serena: “It was when I was serving as an emissary representing my father, that I happened to meet Roswaal. I was targeted by assassins while heading to the Kingdom… they were sent by my father, but Roswaal saved me there.”

Ram: “So that is how it was. Continue.”

Then, alcohol was poured into the glasses on the table, and the old stories began.

The conversation between the curious Ram and the talkative Serena was lively, and while Roswaal felt uncomfortable, he decided that this was a necessary moment and surrendered himself.

Roswaal: “…”

All for the fulfillment of his dearest wish, and to regain the pieces necessary for that—.

—Roswaal’s predictions had missed their mark, and he was compelled to prevent getting even more deeply involved in the Empire’s civil war, when two days later, the name of the black-haired maiden siding with the rebel army, “Natsumi Schwartz,” reached Countess Dracroy’s manor and Ram seized control of High Countess Serena Dracroy.

Chapter 82:
The Rebels' Intent

Serena: "—Ultimately, subduing my person will keep the Dracroy domain from making a move. As I thought, you've got yourself a fine wife, haven't you Roswaal?"

Roswaal: "…It's troublesome that I have had to correct you countless times already, but Ram is my atteeendant~."

Met with Serena's comment, who was unusually brave considering the circumstances placed upon her, Roswaal unpleasantly replied while feeling like he was at his wit's end.

Visiting Serena's territory, the Dracroy Domain, he was searching for someone in the Vollachian Empire—In order to secure the missing persons of Subaru and Rem, he had requested assistance two days earlier.

Holding the position of High Countess, Serena was widely known throughout the Empire. It was hoped that she would be able to obtain highly accurate information, with the condition that it was about "A boy with black hair, black eyes, who would stand out whether he wanted to or not."

No matter where he was whisked off to, it was hard to believe that Subaru would keep quiet, so the degree of their expectations were high in that sense as well.

Therefore, it was inevitable that this would happen, and at the same time it was unexpected.

Roswaal: "Ram, let me ask just in case, but the reason for this reckless action is…"

Ram: "—It is Natsumi Schwartz."

Roswaal: "Isn't thaaat right?"

The sound spun by Ram's lips, it held the meaning of a name that was difficult for Roswaal to disregard.

Having been sent off to the Empire, Natsuki Subaru, isolated without support, directed a distress signal to those who understood the meaning of that name—Roswaal and Ram also immediately picked up on its intent.

In indicating that he was here, Subaru's judgment was unusually praiseworthy. Indeed, Subaru's actions themselves were without fault.

If there was a problem, it was the "side" from which the beacon of that distress signal had been raised.

Therefore, Ram resorted to what could be called a surprise attack or reckless action.

The result yielded a scene of Ram holding her wand thrust forward, forcing Serena to keep seated on the sofa. However, this could not be blamed solely on Ram's reckless behavior.

The reason was—

Serena: "—The black-haired maiden leading the rebellion, Natsumi Schwartz, is the person you're searching for?"

Ram: "To be precise, that person is an added bonus for Ram."

Serena: "Though, that is not the case for Roswaal. Thus, what is not so for Roswaal, must be extraordinarily important to you."

At the words of Serena, whose movements were being restrained by the wand pointed at her, Ram held her tongue.

Even while Ram prevented her from moving about, Serena's thinking remained sharp. In these circumstances, she did not lose her composure, and had a general understanding of Roswaal and Ram's situation.

—"Natsumi Schwartz" was something like a pseudonym that Natsuki Subaru had been using.

Although the exact meaning of the name was more complicated than that, if one considered the reasoning behind Subaru's deliberate use of it in the Empire, his intention in using the pseudonym was clear.

Roswaal too, would like to respect that intention if possible, but—

Roswaal: "Of all the things, to be on the side of the rebel army is…"

Even though he could pick up on the intention of using a pseudonym, the direction from which the beacon had been raised had been unexpected.

The rebellion that had occurred in the midst of them smuggling themselves into the Empire was already cause for concern. It was no exaggeration to say that not only had it sprouted, but had also blossomed into a poisonous flower.

For better or for worse, it was truly Subaru-like to not proceed as they had expected.

Roswaal: "Ram, have you also received any of Subaru-kun's baaad~ influence?"

Ram: "That is unthinkable. There is not a single breath of Barusu's influence on Ram's behavior."

Serena: "Even though you have been put into this situation as the result of his actions in the first place?"

Ram: "Roswaal-sama, the discussion with Serena-sama."

As soon as the situation deteriorated, she changed the subject and pushed for the initiative.

Closing one eye at Ram's boldness in speaking, Roswaal turned to face Serena once again.

Currently, Roswaal and Ram had been summoned to her office, and had just heard about the "black-haired maiden" from none other than Serena's lips.

Having been told about the features of Subaru and Rem, the people being searched for, she probably had the impression that it was just to the extent of a conversation topic with the detail of “black hair”. However, it was something holding a meaning which Roswaal and Ram could not miss.

Serena: “Regarding the problems that have occurred in the Fortress City, as a High Countess, I must make some sort of declaration of my intentions.”

It happened directly after Serena had declared this. —That Ram moved to suppress her.

The bold nature of Serena, and the fact that she did not have guards stationed in her office would be the ruin of her.

Her personal guards were standing by in the hallway outside the office, oblivious to the high tension in the room. Of course, as soon as Serena raised her voice, they would storm into the office.

Ram: “In that case, I will tear Serena-sama apart.”

Serena: “Oh, how frightening. I like it when I can tell you’re serious and not just making threats. Roswaal, you are…”

Roswaal: “She is not my spouse, but my servant… that discussion is already settled. I’d rather make an effort to return to a peaceful rapport between the three of us, without changing the nature of our relaaationship~.”

Serena: ““Us”, what a terribly laudable way of putting it. For you, who always deems everything as the matters of other people, to harbor the problem as your own is refreshing.”

At the chuckling Serena, Roswaal sighed with one eye closed.

It was certainly just as she said, as because of what Ram had done, it could not be the matters of other people. It was not about the master-servant relationship or responsibility, but it was also an emotional issue.

Besides, while Ram’s action was certainly hasty, it could simultaneously be said that the haste was the value of the reckless action.

After all, if Ram was not suppressing Serena—

Roswaal: “Your pride, the Flying Dragon Squadron, will burn the rebels to nothing in the blink of an eye.”

Serena: “…”

At Roswaal’s words, Serena Dracroy slightly narrowed her eyes.

The Flying Dragon Squadron owned by Countess Dracroy—That was, commanding the numerous flying dragons that inhabited the Vollachian Empire, the attack force that flew around the Empire’s tallest summits freely.

Originally, flying dragon riders, who possessed the technique of taming flying dragons, allowing them to command the flying dragons that bore no thought for people, would display overwhelming fighting strength on the battlefield. Because Roswaal could take flight, and thereby had the capability to completely defeat most opponents, he understood. —He understood that mastery of the air was the ultimate move to dominate the battlefield.

Therefore, in the Vollachian Empire, it was easy for the houses with excellent flying dragon riders to elevate their military gains.

Surpassing the trend that has been going since before the previous generation Count Dracroy, Serena Dracroy’s era is considered to have the strongest Flying Dragon Squadron.

If she truly wanted to mobilize the Flying Dragon Squadron, an ordinary rebellion would be no problem whatsoever.

Serena: “Unexpectedly, the person you are looking for is now in the rebel army, and you are troubled that I will deploy my troops. But, you can’t just stand here and stare at me forever, can you? How will you proceed?”

Ram: “Serena-sama, what about your family?”

Serena: “It’s pointless if you’re looking for a relative. I haven’t found a good partner since Roswaal dumped me.”

Ram: “Roswaal-sama?”

Roswaal: “Don’t take jokes to be the truth. In general, such a thing as fellow aristocrats of the Kingdom and the Empire, the relationship between both countries makes it impooossible~. Serena, this is not the time to be making jokes.”

Even when disregarding Roswaal and Serena’s relationship, Ram could not be said to be very patient right now.

Although it was hard to tell from a quick glance, Ram strongly regretted the events at the Pleiades Watchtower. She blamed herself for losing Subaru and Rem and being separated from them.

There was no doubt that her impatience was behind her extreme actions this time as well.

Roswaal: “Let’s not provoke Ram unnecessarily, shall we not try to aim for a good landing together?”

Serena: “A good landing together, huh? If that’s the case, what exactly do you guys specifically want?”

Roswaal: “…”

Serena: “There are no fools who would fly on a flying dragon without a destination. In such a case, the mileage would be bad, and my riders are also precious. If you’re going to call anything here unnecessary, it would be just that. You should understand my concerns. Right?”

Resting her chin upon a single one of her hands, Serena gazed at Roswaal as if testing him.

Considering that Subaru had joined the rebel army, since it was highly likely that Rem was also there, it was not unreasonable for Ram to have made a quick decision. Blaming him for that in itself was meaningless as long as time could not be turned back.

If they wanted to, there was the means of harming Serena, then taking advantage of the chaos to flee from the territory.

However, that would be nothing more than a foolish act which abandons their original goal, and creates needless enemies. Even in an Empire where strength meant everything, soldiers were not so foolish as to gratefully accept when their masters were defeated by foul play.

To dampen the power of the Flying Dragon Squadron under Countess Dracroy's possession, such a thing may have been welcomed by the rebel army, Roswaal held doubts about if that action was worth his old friend's head.

Of course, if it was a necessary sacrifice for his dearest wish, Roswaal would not hesitate to take Serena's life.

Though, if the sacrifice was not needed, then he did not think he would go out of his way to make it.

Therefore, the words that Roswaal offered here to Serena were—

Roswaal: "—In this situation, would you like to join the rebellion together with us?"

Serena: "Huh?"

Roswaal: "If you do that, then the discord between you and us will be buried. If our goals become the same, Ram will lose her reason to point her wand at you. Essentially, we'll be able to settle things between us peacefully."

Serena's eyes widened at Roswaal, who said this bluntly with his hands folded in front of his chest.

Shock and astonishment flashed in those eyes of hers, and so did a little bit of inquisitiveness. With the meaning of her interest being piqued, she did not give a remark that was completely off base.

Relying on that, Roswaal began to work on his relationship with her.

Serena: “Settle things peacefully you say, but it seems that would only be about here. What awaits at the end of your invitation is an insurrection. My territory has received relief from His Excellency the Emperor, what gain would there be unnecessarily aggravating the situation—”

Roswaal: “—You have no dissatisfaction with His Excellency the Emperor. Is that truly the case?”

Serena spoke logically about the security of her foothold. However, interrupting her mid-sentence, Roswaal looked her straight in the eye.

As a High Countess of the Empire, she was a talented person who appeared to be broadminded and good at actualizing her intentions. For this reason, he had to look her firmly in the eye when he told her this.

Emilia: “When somebody is speaking with you, you should look at their face!”

Suddenly, those words flashed through Roswaal’s mind.

Unexpectedly, he felt like he had received a push from those words, and—

Roswaal: “It’s not like I spent the last two days passing the time quieeeetly~. While you were busy, I’ve been pricking up my ears as much as I could.”

Serena: “So instead of keeping my alcohol company until morning, you’ve been hard at work eavesdropping?”

Roswaal: “With the workload you have, I recommend you change your lifestyle of drinking until morning every day.”

It would naturally be different with the conditions that guests were being welcomed at a time of peace, but even then, his earnest wish as her old friend was for her to curb the amount she drinks.

In any case, putting his concerns over Serena’s liver aside, Roswaal would present the fruits of his attentive listening. The secret circumstances that this Dracroy Domain held, that was—

Roswaal: “—I heard a rumor that the incident from the year before last, in which a Divine General conspired in an attempted assassination, has had quite the lasting impact.”

Serena: “…”

Roswaal: “I heard that the perpetrator of that incident, the Divine General who lost his life, was a flying dragon rider… and in addition, that person was also one of your subordinates. His name was…”

Serena: “—Balleroy Temeglyph.”

Saying that in a low, quiet voice, Serena interrupted Roswaal.

She was still resting her chin against her hand, however the heat housed within eyes had changed from before. In some way, the hue of enjoying this situation had disappeared into a silence resembling the surface of a lake bereft of wind.

With those quiet eyes, she looked over to Ram, who was behind and to the side of Roswaal, and,

Serena: “Lower your wand, Ram. I’ll talk even if you don’t point it at me.”

Ram: “But…”

Roswaal: “Ram, do as she says. Serena doesn’t go back on her word.”

Roswaal held her back through those means, and Ram reluctantly lowered her wand.

Of course, she immediately repaired her readiness, but Serena could not find fault with that vigilance either. Only, she turned her face towards the window, to the scenery extending out there—No, she looked up to the sky.

To the sky where flying dragons flapped their wings, and flew about freely.

Serena: “Do you think it has freedom? This sky?”

Roswaal: “…From your way of speaking, that doesn’t seem soooo~.”

Serena: “In the Empire, the water, the soil, the air, even the flesh and blood of its people, all of it belongs to His Excellency the Emperor. Even the sky is no exception to this. —Who do you think’s been claiming that?”

Roswaal: “I wondeeer~, limiting it to “who” makes it quite difficult, doesn’t it? After all, that is something everyone«s been thinking.”

At Roswaal, who shrugged, Serena gave a short reply of “Is that so?”.

The name she mentioned—Balleroy Temeglyph, was a former member of the Nine Divine Generals, and the perpetrator of the assassination attempt on the Emperor that took place in the Imperial Capital the year before last.

Originally, he was a capable person appointed to an important position in the Dracroy Domain by Serena, and because of his remarkable strength and excellence as a flying dragon rider, there seemed to be good prospects that he would work his way up and advance to the rank of General First-Class.

As a matter of course, Balleroy turning his blade on the Emperor had also put Serena, who had recommended him, in a bad position.

Although the position of High Countess was not even taken away, the Imperial Capital’s feelings were poor, the expectations they held in her Flying Dragon Squadron were lost, and she was also never given an opportunity to recover.

And to top it all off, the person who had been installed as Balleroy’s replacement in the Nine Divine Generals was—

Roswaal: “—The Flying Dragon General, Madelyn Eschart, is a selection akin to a snide remaaaark~, isn't it."

Serena: "With no military experience, a being that suddenly rose to the position of General First-Class on the Prime Minister's recommendation, it seems her lineage is surprisingly that of a dragonkin. With a dragonkin who can control flying dragons without the secret technique of taming flying dragons, taking the time and effort to train flying dragon riders would be useless, wouldn't it?"

Ram: "That's not the position of Serena-sama, who has a Flying Dragon Squadron."

Serena: "Woah, don't look down on my Flying Dragon Squadron. Not needing riders has both advantages and disadvantages. It's true that the time needed for training is eliminated, but a flying dragon without a rider can only rely on its instincts for tactics. On that point, a flying dragon rider can understand and apply tactics."

Ram: "…"

Roswaal: "Most importantly, the dragonkin in question seems to crush them with force in numbers."

Vollachia's secret of taming flying dragons—even Roswaal did not know the details of the technique to employ the ferocious flying dragons that bore no thought for people. However, he had heard even though a talented flying dragon rider could discipline a single flying dragon, they would need to stay with them at all times.

In other words, flying dragon riding had to consist of one flying dragon and one person.

In contrast, the existence of the Flying Dragon General, who could command countless flying dragons without putting in all that time, was the natural enemy of Serena, whose strength lay in the Flying Dragon Squadron, as well as a thorn in her side.

Serena: "Balleroy was a trusted friend who was at my place for a long time. If he went against His Excellency, and even pointed a spear at him, it could be said to be inevitable that the fault would turn towards me. But—”

Ram: “Whether you are willing to resign yourself to that disgrace is a different story, isn’t it?”

Serena: “—. Each and every thing you say appeals to the depths of my heart.”

Ram: “Ram is obliged.”

Responding to Ram’s bland expression of gratitude, Serena sighed deeply.

Serena did not deny what Roswaal and Ram had pointed out when being pressed by their respective voices. By the time she had Ram lower her wand, she had already resolved herself.

That was a sign of her willingness to talk on an equal footing, rather than divulge the circumstances under threat.

In other words—

Serena: “—Even with all this, I didn’t mean to cause trouble while you were here, okay?”

With those words, Serena Dracroy touched the white scar on her face and smiled fiercely.

Her strikingly ferocious smile was the same one Roswaal had seen in his younger days when he met her; the ambitious one she had shown before she stole the position of head of the family from her father.

However, now her smile was directed not at her father, whose eyes had clouded when his daughter began to steal the trust of his retainers from him, but at the fearsome being who ruled this vast Empire—.

Roswaal: “—I see, Serena, you”

Seeing that smile, Roswaal belatedly realized his misunderstanding.

In an attempt to prevent the situation caused by Ram's snap decision from getting worse, he had tried to guide Serena's thinking by clarifying the position the Dracroy territory had been placed in, but that was a mistake.

There was no need to steer her in the direction of supporting the rebellion.

Even the rise of the rebel army with the "Black-Haired Maiden" was nothing more than a chance for her. Serena had already decided where she would stand, and in her own way, had shown consideration for Roswaal and the others.

She showed consideration in her own way by not dragging in an old friend that had come to find a missing person and did not know anything.

However, Roswaal and the others had thoughtlessly stepped into the opposing camp. Without realizing the Magic Stones had already ignited, they had poured additional mana in.

In other words—

Serena: "I was as careful as I could be. Only this once, would it be alright to regret meeting a clever wife. Or maybe, that you went out of your way and turned down my marriage proposal."

Roswaal: "Serena."

Serena: "Don't worry. If I were to reveal your identity, I'd be suspected of having colluded with the Kingdom. In that case, a war on two fronts would be pure insanity. If I'm going to do it, I'll fight a battle where there's a chance of winning."

Control of the discussion was stolen, and the situation with Serena had reversed.

Since their positions overlapped, there was no reason for Roswaal and the others to harm Serena. On the other hand, Serena had the leeway to make full use of Roswaal and the others' circumstances.

Ram: "Roswaal-sama, could it be…"

Roswaal: “Aah, we’ve stepped straight into the hunting grounds of a beaaast~. —Serena, if we hadn’t broached the subject?”

Serena: “In that case, I would have given you the appropriate hospitality for a few days, and then let you escape before the civil war was in full swing. But if I’m invited to fight together by an old friend, then there’s no helping it, right?”

Roswaal: “So barefaced…”

It was unclear whether she had intended to act in concert with this rebellion, or take action independently. Nevertheless, Serena had already decided to rebel.

They did not know whether that was anger at the Emperor’s cruel behavior, or connected to the fact that her confidant lost his life.

If only one thing was certain—

Serena: “His Excellency the Emperor Vincent Vollachia, there is an exceedingly great amount of people who have accumulated discontent with his peaceful reign. If great flames of war rise once, those flames will spread in one swoop.”

Roswaal: “…Those flames of war, might you have any idea aboooout~ them?”

Serena: “I wonder what it could be. You’re the one with an idea, aren’t you?”

Chuckling, Serena seemed to have an ace up her sleeve that Roswaal did not know about.

Roswaal, on the other hand, also had an idea of a singularity that would be no matter to be trifled with if left unchecked, although he was unsure how it would affect this unfamiliar land.

If it was him, no matter what predicament he fell into, he would get through it one way or the other. All that remained was who he met in that predicament, how much he wished to save them, and how his influence would spread.

Or perhaps—

Roswaal: "—Have you also gone and set the whole Empire ablaze, Subaru-kun?"

If that were to happen, how should Roswaal act?

Of course, for his long-cherished wish that must be fulfilled, it was necessary to return to the Kingdom with his reputation intact. Even if that was not the case, there were the promises he exchanged with Subaru.

It was unilaterally imposed on him, but unlike Subaru, he could not revoke it. The future that someone else lacks was something that was difficult for him to accept, as he had decided to pick up the pieces.

Even without his promise to Roswaal, he would probably struggle as much as he reached out.

At the very least, Roswaal would only act to reduce the number of his attempts.

Then it becomes just a matter of not letting Subaru realize things had turned out in an undesirable way.

Serena: "Well, thanks to Ram endangering my life, my ill wills have ended up vanishing. I'll forget about my duties for today and open a celebratory drink."

Ram: "Having pointed the wand, it might not be Ram's place to say this, but are you sure about that?"

Serena: "We both needed to cultivate stronger unity toward the same goal. That's why we should drink and get to know each other. Considering who we're going to challenge, it's a very natural activity."

Serena nonchalantly invited Ram to have a drink with her, with a face that blithely forgot her previous outburst.

Ram was unusually perplexed by Serena's big-heartedness, as she seemed to be relieved that she no longer had to hide things from Roswaal and Ram.

That said, it was unthinkable that Serena would eloquently trick Roswaal and the others and catch them off guard with a shallow move like that.

In doing so, Serena would risk her own strength, and even her own life, in exchange for Roswaal's freedom in the Empire.

Roswaal: "So, are you going to wait for the flames of war to rise? Or will you become them yourself?"

Serena: "I at least know where I stand. No need to rush, it's not far off. —Or is it your idea to stay put quietly?"

Roswaal: "…That's not it."

Serena: "Right? It's the same for me."

Although both parties may have had different ideas of these "Flames of War", they seemed to have had a similar perception of what they had in mind.

Roswaal crossed his arms thoughtfully as he noted that fact. Serena, meanwhile, had nonchalantly gone to her display cabinet and started looking for a drink to loosen their tongues.

Ram: "Roswaal-sama, in the Fortress City of Guaral."

Roswaal: "In terms of position, Emilia-sama and the others are closer to us, attacking from the East. The same rumors will be heard over there, so if they can join us, they will. Of course, it would be frustrating for you."

Ram: "…No."

Shaking her head, Ram replied with a bottled frustration.

She would like to be reunited with Rem as soon as possible. With rumors of Subaru all over the Fortress City of Guaral, Rem was most likely to be there.

On the other hand, even with Roswaal's flight magic, a vain attempt would be a heavy setback.

Finding people in a wide Empire required a certain mind-numbing rationality.

Roswaal: "For that reason, let's wait and see. As she says, the flames of war that will rise.."

Ram: "—Yes."

With some hesitation and her wavering voice, Ram nodded her head in a healthy manner.

—A few days later, the "Flames of War" that Serena Dracroy had spoken of, rose.

The momentum of the rebellion, led by the son of Emperor Vincent Vollachia, spread throughout the Empire and also to rebel groups in various regions.

Among them, it was said that the first to declare their intention to join the rebel army was the High Countess Dracroy, and it was said that the brave lady had a handsome stranger and a lovely servant at her side.

Chapter 83:
Warfare and Warzones

—Steadily, the rebellion's flames of war spread throughout the Vollachian Empire.

Over the past few days, the Empire had been bustling as if the tranquility of the past few years was nothing but a fabrication, stirring up the thirst for blood built up within it until it had turned to sludge.

The history of the Vollachian Imperial Family had been a river of blood for generations, and the current Emperor was expected to put an end to this horrifying tradition.

In fact, during the reign of the Emperor, although there were some skirmishes, the situation that was considered a major upheaval was avoided.

The people were supposed to be enjoying "peace" for the first time since the founding of the country.

However—

???: "When you look at it from the outside, the people of the Empire didn't want a peaceful and safe life."

On his knees sitting in his chair while looking at a map showing the state of the war, he muttered in a compassionate mood.

Vincent Vollachia, the Emperor; it wasn't known what principles he used to run the country, but it is not like he maintained peace by chance either.

Exhausted physically and mentally on a year-by-year basis, he built an unprecedented era of peace in the Empire.

One could only imagine the disappointment in their hearts when they found out so easily that they were not wanted. —The people were stupid, and the Emperor was pathetic.

???: “From my point of view, I don’t know why they bother to increase the possibility that they might die… I don’t know what goes through the minds of those insane people. That guy… uh, yeah, and Jamal and others.”

He remembered how he used to advocate for the pride of the imperial people in his spare time.

Todd Fang braced himself as he tried to remember the man whose face was no longer blurred. It would be troublesome if he made a careless remark and was found to have forgotten Jamal.

At the very least, Jamal still has to live within his heart and mind in front of a woman who should be treated with care and respect.

???: “—Todd, are you tired?”

Suddenly, at the edge of Todd’s vision as he unfolded the map, he saw the face of a woman leaning over.

Frankly, it was heart-wrenching. She must have been on the roof of the carriage just before. Todd’s perception could not grasp when she had arrived next to him.

However, there were countless such masters in the world. The world would be a very difficult place to live if they were frightened by the existence of opponents whom we could not beat in a fair fight.

Most people faltered because they confused not being able to win with not being able to kill.

Even if one could never win, there were some people who they could easily kill.

Todd did not consider such an opponent a threat. Hence, neither did the woman next to him—Arakiya.

Arakiya: “Todd?”

Sliding in through the open window, Arakiya sat on the carriage bench—or, rather, squatted on the seat with her knees bent, unceremoniously.

Even though she had been living in the Imperial Capital for a long time, she had not mastered the manners of the city at all.

This was either because the person in question did not have that kind of education, or the people around her did not raise her right. It was commonplace to leave strong people like her to their own devices because they were strong.

In Vollachia, the strong took precedence over all qualifications.

Hence, a vicious cycle was established in which no one could blame the strong Arakiya for any unseemly or disrespectful behavior. Of course, if one were stronger than she was, one would be allowed to complain about her manners—

???: “Because “The Blue Lightning” is a name worthy of an even greater weirdo than Arakiya.”

If one was in the Vollachian Empire, one would have plenty of opportunities to hear rumors about the Empire’s most powerful, the First.

For better or worse, each and every rumor about the First were considered bad even by the esoteric values of the Empire. Above all, they were ill-suited for someone with Arakiya’s upbringing.

As a result, this behavior of Arakiya’s had probably not been enforced.

Of course, Todd had no reason to correct that, but he did anyways—

Todd: “Arakiya, sit down properly. It’s unsightly.”

Arakiya: “Sit? Me? In the chair?”

Todd: “What else is there? What do you think a chair is for?”

Hearing the inquiry with a strange look on her face, Todd replied with a grimace. In response, Arakiya wondered, but obediently assumed the correct way to sit in the chair.

However, since her legs were spread, he hit her knees to make her put them together.

Todd: “People down there see how the strong behave. In the Empire, anything goes as long as you’re strong, but that’s the thing, soldiers have hearts too. Even you don’t have to think about whether it’s easier to fight a superior officer with good or ill will, do you?”

Arakiya: “…Is there a point in doing that? Anyway, I’m going to fight alone.”

Todd: “After you ravage the battlefield, what about hunting down the survivors? Who’s going to clean up the corpses? Who will negotiate with those who surrendered?”

Arakiya: “…”

Todd: “In fact, if you want to be alone, why am I here? Your words are full of contradictions.”

After a mild argument, Arakiya, who made a difficult face, fell silent.

Fortunately, he now knew that this was not the face of the vigilant second most powerful person in the Empire with pent-up frustration, but rather a face of acceptance that he had a point.

In the beginning, he was careful about pointing things out, but now he did not hold back.

Once he got the hang of it, Arakiya was like training a sheepdog.

What makes it different from a sheepdog was that the dog itself was also a wolf with tremendous strength.

He laughed at himself for thinking like that, though.

Arakiya: “Todd, are you tired? I knew it.”

Todd: “If I’m tired, it’s because of the long journey. You are a hard worker. I can see why His Excellency the Emperor and the Prime Minister and others find you useful.”

Arakiya: “…Necessary, so.”

Arakiya again expressed her concern for Todd, who had fallen silent. After Todd lashed out to dismiss her concerns, Arakiya’s eyes dropped to the floor.

Arakiya was probably aware that she was being used as a convenience.

She was not the type to indulge in life stories, and since Todd was not interested, she did not delve into the topic, but considering future treatment it might be worth asking.

If people who know Todd can feel closer to him on their own accord, it was a worthwhile deal.

Todd: “You—”

Arakiya: “The map, what were you looking at?”

However, his attempt to speak was completely squashed by Arakiya, who changed the subject. “Mmm,” Todd choked on his words, and tilted the map so that Arakiya could see it.

The map showed the entirety of Vollachia, but it was a simplified version that only showed the major cities and topography, on which Todd had drawn this and that according to his own senses.

Arakiya stared at it, her well-shaped eyebrows risen a great deal,

Arakiya: “…I don’t get it.”

Todd: “No doubt.”

Arakiya spoke of incomprehension, but Todd did not blame her for being ignorant of it.

In fact, it was not due to Arakiya's learning shortcomings, but simply because the map was written in such a way that no one but Todd could decipher it.

No special words or symbols were used, but the meanings were reworded, or intentionally incorrect symbols were used so that information could not be extracted by others.

Even if the map was inadvertently dropped, Todd's actions would not be exposed from it. Also, in the unlikely event that he was captured, he may be kept alive for the purpose of deciphering the map.

It was worthwhile since this move called the third hand avoids suffering setbacks.

Todd: "Significant notes record the location and scale of the battle. Nonsensical notes are just a distraction. I won't tell you which is which."

Arakiya: "I don't know, so even if you tell me …Do you have a lot?"

Todd: "Yeah, I've never seen a situation this out of hand since His Excellency had acceded to the throne."

Although a subjectless question, Arakiya's question referred to the rebellions that had taken place throughout the Empire.

Not only was it an expression of rebellion against the Emperor, but there had been frequent clashes between actual Imperial Soldiers and rebels, and the call for rebellion was high and widespread throughout the region.

However, this was just a catalyst, what became the symbol of the righteous cause of the rebel army planning to usurp the Imperial throne was—

Todd: "The illegitimate child of His Excellency The Emperor, the black-haired Crown Prince."

Arakiya: "His Excellency's child… for real?"

Todd: “Well. What’s important is not whether it’s true or not, but rather that such a rumor is being spread, and that the force of the flames is continuing to grow stronger without being extinguished.”

Arakiya: “…”

Todd: “That’s why hardworking people are being recruited all over the place. Incidentally, I was as well.”

As one of the Nine Divine Generals personally selected by the Emperor, it was natural that Arakiya was in a position allowing her to speak with Emperor Vincent Vollachia who supposedly resides on an unreachable plane of existence.

It was a mystery to what extent Arakiya’s sense of values could be trusted, but even from her perspective, it seemed the existence of the Emperor’s illegitimate child being held up by the rebel army was questionable.

However, as Todd himself had said, whether it was correct or not was not important.

Todd: “If they didn’t want people to think this rumor was important, they should have extinguished the fire while it was still small. Because this fuddled uproar is the result of having fallen behind there.”

Arakiya: “—. Is it connected? The thing with Gladiator Island.”

Todd: “That was…”

Having closed one eye, Todd was interrupted by the muttering Arakiya next to him.

She had mentioned the matter of the Gladiator Island Ginunhive, which was the first task for Todd’s group as well as a secret order by Berstetz, the Prime Minister of the Empire, and they had failed it spectacularly.

It had happened just a few days prior, but having been ordered to kill all the Gladiators on Gladiator Island, Todd and Arakiya had proudly headed there in high spirits—and retreated just before they went ashore, ending the matter without anything happening.

Naturally, Berstetz reprimanded him for failing to fulfill his duty, but Todd's instincts for sniffing out danger led to him firmly refusing to land on that island.

He had sensed that there was a threat over there that he absolutely should not confront.

Todd: "…"

Todd, who placed absolute faith in that feeling, did not regret not landing on the island.

The fact that after that, the Gladiator Island was taken over by the Gladiators and was contributing to the spreading flames of war as a part of the rebellion happening all over, could not possibly compare to endangering his own life.

Even if Todd were to regret that decision, it would be—

Todd: "Ridiculous. That's not like me at all."

Arakiya: "Todd?"

Todd: "It's nothing. You worry too much. Rebellions are happening all over the place, but none of them will last long. —They're just dreaming."

Todd took the time to deny the question Arakiya had begun to ask earlier, and then shrugged.

He had not intended to mislead her or play her for a fool. Truly, the rebel army was dreaming. It was the kind of nightmare that felt good while in that dream-like state of mind, but the self-hatred when they woke up would make them want to die.

Or perhaps, it had been a nightmare unfolding to its end before they could wake up.

???: "—General First-Class Arakiya! Private First-Class Fang! We are arriving!"

It was right after Todd spat that out, that the sharp voice from the coachman's seat of the horse carriage had reached them.

The shaking spreading from beneath their seats gradually subsided, and the speed of horse carriage heading towards their destination had decreased. Then the carriage slowly stopped, and Todd and Arakiya exited out the door.

Todd: "…"

The two had lined up on a small hill, and the weather was dark and overcast with thick clouds, which seemed to Todd as if the sky was apprehensive about the future of the Empire as it plunged into an unending civil war.

If he lowered his sight to capture this poetic impression, what could be seen was a battlefield on a sprawling wide plain with a group of familiar uniforms fiercely clashing with another unfamiliar group of uniforms..

—With the Western Plains as the battlefield, the clash between the Imperial and rebel armies had already begun.

Todd: "Who is the opponent?"

With the Imperial soldiers having already set up an encampment, one of them came over to the pair on top of the hill.

That person looked daunted, having received Todd's question as soon as they opened their mouth. Judging from his cloak, he was probably a "General". To his bewilderment, Todd, who was nothing more than a Private First-Class, started speaking to him quite overbearingly.

However, upon noticing Arakiya next to Todd, they straightened up,

General: "The citizens of Kunohelemente are in high spirits after killing their consul. It seems the consul had just arrived after being appointed."

Todd: "Seems like an ill timed move. That consul was also unlucky… So, is that pest with that group who are burning with enthusiasm?”

General: “It has not been confirmed. We believe he is not here.”

Todd: “If he was, he should have shown his face at the beginning. —General First-Class Arakiya.”

Arakiya: “Mm…”

Nodding after receiving the report from the “General”, Todd called for Arakiya. Turning around with a sigh-like reply, she was ready for this opportunity to fully demonstrate her abilities as ranked second within the Empire.

With that out of the way, all that remained was for Todd to make sure that no unnecessary obstacles were introduced.

Todd: “Give the signal and let your troops retreat. I recommend completely focusing on withdrawing. Otherwise—”

General: “Otherwise?”

Todd: “General First-Class Arakiya’s flames do not choose who they incinerate.”

It was not a statement particularly intended to threaten, but it seemed to have had the same effect on the “General” who heard it.

They gasped slightly and glanced at Arakiya. Arakiya with her usual stoic expression noticed that gaze and looked at the “General.”

Faced with the crimson eye not covered by her eye patch, the “General’s” cheeks stiffened,

General: “Sound the drums! Pull back the troops!”

The “General” immediately switched gears and issued directions to the subordinates in the camp in a sharp voice.

Unlike the unreasonable common soldiers, a battlefield with a proper “General” thankfully meant a conclusion could be reached more quickly. However, that did not make the battlefield pleasant, so they should finish their unpleasant duties quickly.

Todd: “Arakiya, don’t hit the soldiers who withdraw after hearing the drums.”

Arakiya: “And the others?”

Todd: “Do as you please.”

Arakiya’s eye flickered with a slight bewilderment at having been told to do as she pleased.

Todd immediately reflected that the way he said it had been poor. She was a woman with the power to do unthinkable things, but Arakiya did not seem to particularly like fighting.

So it was not appropriate to tell her to do as she pleased on the battlefield—

Todd: “—Kill anyone who opposes you.”

That was the best possible way to issue commands.

Arakiya: “…”

As soon as the sound of drums echoed through the air, the battlefield they could look down upon from the hill transformed.

The audible sounds of steel and steel exchanging blows in a sword fight faded away, and in its place angry roars and battlecries, the great volume of the pursuers and the pursued, began to sweep over the battlefield.

However, that would not last long either.

—The raining explosive flames turned those wannabe-hunters pursuing fleeing backs to ash.

It was when the ally in front of them, the compatriot beside them, or even one of their own limbs was engulfed in flames, that they were freed from their crazed pursuit and noticed.

That they were not the hunters, but merely the hunted.

Todd: “…”

Gripping a branch in one hand like a child playing and lighting the lower part of her legs on flames, Arakiya rose above the hill, higher and higher, high up in the sky, and then made flames rain down from the sky incessantly.

A terrifying tactical weapon that seemed to change the color of the world, that was an appropriate description for this spectacle.

Flames headed full speed at the ground, burning enemies in accordance with the commands Todd had issued. Those who stopped upon seeing their enemies being burnt, these lecherous bystanders thought twice about stopping to stare.

If they stopped, Arakiya’s flames would not be able to choose who to scorch.

General: “Sound them sound them sound them!! Sound the drums! Everyone, fall back—hk!!”

Witnessing the war situation being rewritten, the “General” raised his voice with all his might.

Although all Imperial Soldiers face the battlefield with the readiness to die, that was not the same as not being afraid of dying in vain.

Even if they remained there, they would not obtain any more prestige than a stray dog that burned to death.

Therefore—

???: “—Private First-Class Fang! Stop General First-Class Arakiya!”

While he watched as the flame devil engulfed the battlefield, collapsing the battle formation of the rebels, an angry roar hit Todd’s eardrums, who felt like he had already accomplished his job.

When he turned around, a different Imperial Soldier, from the “General” who ordered the soldiers to withdraw, was shouting with his soot black stained face making a desperate expression.

As Todd frowned, wondering what the meaning of this was, the soldier's face illuminated red from the flames,

Soldier: "The other side has come forth to surrender! The battle is over!"

Todd: "Can we allow such a convenient offer? I don't like saying this, but unlike the situation where if we didn't pull back we would also suffer damage, we can now unilaterally annihilate them all. It's better to cut off any unnecessary sources of the trouble and make an example out of them."

If Arakiya's ability was used well, their side could secure victory without losing a single soldier.

Todd thought that it would be more appropriate to make an example of them, and make them regret their decision to join the rebellion, rather than allowing them to surrender and get the upper hand.

However, Todd's opinion was overturned by the soldier's appeal that followed.

Soldier: "We can't! Those who have surrendered are accompanied by the Crown Prince!"

Todd: "—What did you just say?"

At the Imperial Soldier's report, Todd reflexively grabbed him by the collar. The soldier choked out a "Guh", but Todd did not care as he brought his face closer,

Todd: "Why has the Crown Prince turned up here? I thought you said he wasn't here."

Soldier: "Th-they hid him… and now, he's emerged…"

Todd: "Tch, was their intention to use a trump card? Those guys don't even know the value of their hand."

Releasing the soldier whom he had grabbed by the collar, Todd gave a deep exhale.

He then looked up at Arakiya circling overhead and hesitated on whether to call out to her. And then, after careful consideration,

Todd: “Drag the messenger here.”

Soldier: “Huh? But…”

Todd: “Bring him here. If they don’t want to get annihilated, make him run desperately.”

The soldier began to argue with Todd’s nonchalant instructions, then quickly realized that it was pointless and turned away.

Todd also did not want to wield Arakiya’s brute power either, but he had no choice but to do so while it helped the discussions move forward quickly.

—Especially in the worst case scenario, when the other party had the Crown Prince.

Soldier: “Private First-Class Fang.”

Not long after, the soldier from earlier returned to Todd.

Beside him was a ragged-looking young man, and in contrast to the bravery of the armor he was wearing, his face appeared dismal and depressed as he realized his defeat.

There was no helping it. Even Todd felt the same way when he saw Arakiya’s violence against the other side.

Although he felt pity for him, there was something he needed to confirm.

Todd: “I hear you guys have the Crown Prince. Is that the justification for your revolt?”

Messenger: “Ye-yeah. The Crown Prince desires the Imperial Throne. We sympathize with that aspiration, and in order to pave the way for that ally…”

Todd: “—That’s a lie.”

Messenger: “Ah?”

Staring intently into the face of the person who was saying something significant, Todd interrupted. Hearing that, the man’s expression was one of bewilderment, and a shiver ran through him.

That reaction convinced Todd. —They were all talk, but no show.

Messenger: “Ack.”

The next moment, Todd swung the axe at his waist and smashed the upright standing man’s head open.

The man with the axe thrust into the top of his head grunted softly and fell to the ground with his eyes rolled back in his head. In response to Todd’s immediate action of slaying the messenger, the soldier slightly widened his eyes,

Soldier: “Private First-Class! Such arbitrary actions are…”

Todd: “This guy lied. The opponent doesn’t have such a thing like the Crown Prince on their side. These people chose the low road when it came to surrender. —General First-Class Arakiya will continue to do as she has been doing.”

Soldier: “Guh… If… if the Crown Prince is truly here then…”

Todd: “He’s not.”

At Todd’s declaration, the soldier was unable to continue with any further words, and kept silent. As Todd then gave a nod, he dragged the corpse of the fallen enemy at his feet.

Todd scraped the flesh and blood from the axe with his fingers and let out a long sigh.

Together with Arakiya, he traveled around the country crushing the seeds of rebellion, but each time he did so, the presence of the Crown Prince stood in his way.

The illegitimate son of Vincent Vollachia, the only possibility to give legitimacy to the rebellions that erupted across the Empire— How many would attempt to revolt under the guise of that illegitimate child.

Even worse was Prime Minister Berstetz's order to capture the Crown Prince unharmed if at all possible, and bring him back to the Imperial Capital.

Todd: "Ahh, good grief, I can't help but say it. —How long until we can go back to the Imperial Capital?"

Every attempt to return to the Imperial Capital was unsuccessful, somehow it became a journey that took them all over the Empire.

Todd bit his lip as he thought of his fiancée, who even now was still waiting for him to return to the Imperial Capital.

The flames engulfed everything on the battlefield, and those who chose to resist were regretfully burned to nothing.

He pitied those who had failed to see this future and ended up choosing to stand on the wrong side, but at the same time he scorned them.

The uprising was crushed. No matter how much they raised their spirits, they would never be able to gain victory over the weight of the Empire.

While he was thinking that there was absolutely no doubt about this, Todd suddenly had a thought.

Todd: "…"

The beginning of a genuine uprising, and the rebellion's flames of war spreading in every place.

Just as if it was by somebody's design, beyond the blaze of warfare spreading throughout, somebody was present.

Endlessly, endlessly, Todd's survival instincts were being made to throb, by somebody.

Todd: "…"

With warfare spreading its flames, and the literal burning battlefield coming to a close before his eyes, Todd came to a standstill.

This warfare engulfing the Vollachian Empire, just who in the world desires it? Whatever the case, Todd would read through it, and obtain what he wished for no matter what.

For that purpose, he would spare no effort, no consideration, and nothing whatsoever. If there was one thing that concerned him.

Arakiya: "—. Is it connected? The thing with Gladiator Island."

Flashing through the back of his mind was Arakiya's question, posed just before arriving at the battlefield.

Fundamentally, Todd did not look back to the past. No matter what he did, it would be made correct by the future. Nevertheless, that incident was the only thing that continued to bring him unease.

Without stepping ashore, Todd had abandoned the Gladiator Island, withdrawing.

That decision was sure to have been the right one. He was supposed to hold no regrets.

However, possibly, by some chance, if there was some reason to have regrets, that was—.

Todd: "—The retreat on that day, it was the only time my life had been in checkmate."

Chapter 84: Tea Chamber

1

—As the flames of rebellion spread throughout the Vollachian Empire, signs of unrest were growing with each day.

More than nine years had passed since Vincent Vollachia ascended to the throne as the Emperor, but this was the first time domestic affairs were burnt to a crisp, and people's hearts have been in turmoil.

The history of the Vollachian Empire was a history of war.

Even if a historically unprecedented era of peace had arrived, conflicts occurring in places beyond the reach of the eyes and ears of the Imperial Capital could not be completely prevented. As a result, people were never truly at ease.

But even so, the people living in the Imperial Capital of Lupugana had had a semblance of peace.

As the Imperial Capital was under the Emperor's heel, it was only in that magnificent city that conflicts did not occur. In a way, this safety rested upon Emperor Vincent Vollachia's authority—However, that was a thing of the past.

The year before last, an attempt to assassinate the Emperor had occurred in none other than the Imperial Capital. The Emperor had been so severely wounded as to nearly lose his life, the perpetrator a Divine General.

Since that incident, the people learned that they were never truly safe within the Empire. After they learned it, they also anticipated this.

Therefore the Emperor's status remained unshaken by the spirit of rebellion of the Nine Divine Generals at the peak of the Empire's military might and the Vollachian Empire would not collapse no matter how much it was shaken to the core—.

???: "—The safety and expectations of the people have been greatly shaken as of late."

A report acknowledging the cracks in the basic principles laid out in the Empire.

When this report echoed through the majestic throne room, every person trying to close their ears to these unpleasant words could have been mercilessly beheaded on the spot, so it was not surprising everyone was so hesitant.

The civil officials and military officers, lined up here in the Imperial Capital's Crystal Palace—even if their respective battlefields differed, all the people gathered here at the very core of the Vollachian Empire were doubtlessly warriors. Even those people could not help but hesitate, because to be seen here as a cowardly warrior was directly linked to nothing but death.

It was not death that any of them feared. What they feared was dying in vain.

They feared they would meet a death unbefitting a brave warrior of Vollachia.

Therefore, the generals paid respect to the white-haired wise old man who proposed it, Prime Minister Berstetz Fondalfon. And then, they awaited the response of Vincent, to whom the Prime Minister issued his report.

Vincent: "…"

The large throne, enclosing the entirety of his slender body, had been continually passed down as a symbol of authority since the era of the first Emperor of Vollachia.

With the national flag hoisted behind the throne, the national emblem of a wolf pierced by swords looked down upon the troops. With the Sword Wolf behind him, Vincent sat calm and composed.

Leisurely leaning back against the throne, Vincent showed no sign of military might.

In fact, no one had ever heard a rumor that this Emperor, endowed with unfathomable wisdom, would excel at martial arts. It was unlikely that anyone had seen him wield a sword or express an interest in hunting.

As long as an Emperor resided on the Imperial throne, he was expected to rule the entirety of the Empire without exception.

Even though the Empire valued strength above all, martial arts skill was not a requirement for the Emperor at its top. That was because the Emperor's sword was none other than his peerlessly powerful followers.

However—
